I summarize the role that the scholars of the regime and the corrupt leaders of the Awakening have played, and continue to play, alongside the modern Crusader campaigns, in four basic objectives, in addition to a fifth, which is more evil than them in the long run. These objectives are:

1. Ruling that the apostate rulers governing Arab and Muslim lands are Muslims, despite their legislating without Allāh's permission, their ruling by other than what Allāh has revealed, their allegiance to the kuffār enemies, their safeguarding of their interests, and fighting in their defense alongside their armies and under their command – not to mention the various forms of kufr and corruption they commit – and considering all of this to be fiṣq (immorality) and ẓulm (injustice) that does not go beyond being minor kufr (kufr aṣḡhar) which does not expel them from the fold of Muslims. Consequently, ruling that they are legitimate Wulāt al-Umūr (rulers) over the Muslim subjects, deserving all rights of obedience, allegiance, and cooperation.

2. Ruling on the legitimacy of the American Crusader occupation and other occupations of Muslim lands, under the pretext that this is a legitimate seeking of their assistance justified by necessity. Issuing fatwās on the legitimacy of normalization with the Jews. And bestowing legitimacy upon the occupation of Palestine under the pretext that all of this was done under political, military, and economic agreements and treaties concluded between the kuffār and the 'legitimate' Wulāt al-Umūr, including 'Arafāt and his authority, the architects of Oslo, Madrid, and the Road Map.
3. Prohibiting resistance against the Crusader and Jewish occupiers, describing it as terrorism against the musta'minīn (those granted security) and mu'āhadīn (those with covenants), and as rebellion against the 'legitimate' Wulāt al-Umūr. Thereby, withdrawing legitimacy from any form of their Jihād.
4. Ruling that the Mujāhidīn and resistance fighters are 'mischief-makers in the land' (mufsidūn fī al-arḍ). Permitting their killing, imprisonment, torture, and pursuit by the (Muslim!) ('legitimate!') Wulāt al-Umūr and their (musta'minīn!) and (mu'āhadīn!) masters, who, with all their equipment, hundreds of thousands of soldiers, planes, smart bombs, and destructive missiles, have become (dhimmiyyīn!). And prohibiting the violation of the dhimmah (covenant of protection) of the Wālī al-Amr who granted them security and brought them for 'our benefit' and 'our victory'!. So how can the 'terrorists' frighten them!!
5. As for the fifth, the most calamitous and malicious of all, and the one with the farthest-reaching impact in destroying the roots of Islam and resistance among Muslims, it is

To discuss this malicious, far-reaching, and long-established institution, and its satanic role in the war against Allāh, His Messenger, and the believers, would require independent volumes. I wish I could provide the documents and references concerning its genesis, its fatāwā, and its record in the world of hypocrisy; if so, I would have dedicated myself to producing this important work. I ask Allāh to appoint for this task pens of truth from the people of the Land of the Two Holy Sanctuaries themselves, who are undoubtedly more knowledgeable of its intricacies. There are critical issues that the Saudi government has undertaken through these official religious institutions that must be investigated. I will mention some of these by title for those who wish to research and investigate, such as: Saudi Arabia's role in (destroying the Afghan Jihād and pursuing Arab Afghan Mujāhidīn), (destroying the Arab Jihād in Bosnia), (besieging Arab Mujāhidīn and their brothers in Chechnya) and supporting Russia, considering the Chechen issue a Russian internal affair – as recently stated by Saudi Crown Prince ‘Abdullāh ibn ‘Abd al-‘Azīz during his visit to Moscow in September 2003 – as well as (its role in infiltrating and co-opting Muslim minorities worldwide), (its role in infiltrating and co-opting Muslim communities in the diaspora), (its role in overthrowing the Islamic Emirate in Afghanistan), (its role in the first and second Iraq wars), (its role in combating the Jihādī current as part of the campaign against terrorism), (its role in supporting Arab regimes that faced confrontations from Jihādī movements, such as what happened in Syria and Algeria)... The issues are numerous, and the role of this religious institution, its history, and its "achievements" constitute a lengthy research topic. However, for the sake of brevity and benefit, I draw attention to the following concise points:

The nucleus of this religious institution began to form during the era of King ‘Abd al-‘Azīz, who managed to deceive some well-intentioned people in Najd, convincing them that he came to revive the da‘wah of Shaykh Muḥammad ibn ‘Abd al-Wahhāb (may Allāh have mercy on him). When the Ikhwān discovered his deception and confronted him—after the English had installed him as sultan over Najd and the Ḥijāz—he annihilated them in the Battle of al-Sabīlah with the cooperation of the English, as the Ikhwān were divided amongst themselves, and some sided with him under the pretext that he was the walī al-amr. That was the beginning.

After ‘Abd al-‘Azīz, the religious institution, which had not yet fully crystallized, in cooperation with the princes of the ruling family, undertook the ousting of Sa‘ūd and the installation of King Fayṣal as the new walī al-amr. One of the first acts of this cunning man (the founder of secularism in Saudi Arabia, as the author claims) was to codify this institution and make it official. Over time, the (Council of Senior Scholars) and other bodies and institutions were established, such as (Da‘wah and Guidance), the (Commission for the Promotion of Virtue and Prevention of Vice), and the (Supreme Judicial Council), etc. It was engineered so that the Muftī of the land would head it, forming the first real (Vatican) for Muslims, headed by a (Pope) for Muslims, which the Saudis, with the power of (petrodollars) and the sanctity of the Two Holy Sanctuaries, sought to impose on the Arab and Islamic world. They succeeded in this to a large extent... This was aided by the external wing of the Saudi religious institution, spearheaded by the (Muslim World League), the (Saudi Red Crescent), the (World Assembly of Muslim Youth), the (International Islamic Relief Organization), and other official institutions, in addition to dozens of theoretically non-governmental, private charitable da‘wah organizations. The billion-dollar budgets, the influence of the Two Holy Sanctuaries, and the legitimacy and authority they bestowed upon the Saudi kings and their scholars, enabled them to achieve their objectives, which were carefully drawn up in London, inherited thereafter by Washington, and executed with great skill by Riyadh. With time and the succession of kings after Fayṣal, the corruption of this religious institution increased, especially after the death of its scholar who attempted reform, Muḥammad ibn Ibrāhīm Āl al-

Shaykh (may Allāh have mercy on him), who discovered the beginnings of kufr and misguidance in the ruling establishment and clashed with it through his valuable treatise ("The Arbitration of Laws") and his famous letters to the princes of Āl Saʿūd. Then death overtook him before he could achieve anything. Subsequently, deviation became entrenched during the era of his successor, Shaykh ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz ibn Bāz, and the other strong pillar, Shaykh Ibn ʿUthaymīn, who, along with the Muftī of the land, formed the main pillar for the legitimacy of Āl Saʿūd and the frontline in patching up their flaws.

Then they were succeeded by even worse, after they had passed on to what they had put forth. Shaykh ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz Āl al-Shaykh took over the banner of soothsaying in the Land of the Two Holy Sanctuaries in the year 2000, along with the rest of the anṣār from the Shaykh's (instruments) and the kings' (machines)!

Several factors contributed to the success of this institution, foremost among them:

1. Exploiting the religious authority of the Two Holy Sanctuaries and their existence under the rule of Āl Saʿūd.
2. The enormous financial budget spent on the work and activities of these institutions.
3. The enormous budget spent on propaganda for these institutions, their men, their scholars, and their "achievements," until it was implanted in the minds and reality of Muslims throughout the Arab and Islamic world.
4. The presence of a vast number of sincere preachers and workers for daʿwah and Islām, serving with full dedication in these institutions out of a desire to deliver good to its people and cooperate in righteousness and taqwā, unaware of the final outcome and who would reap the fruits of these efforts: Āl Saʿūd, then the Crusaders and the Jews.

5. Exploiting the Salafī identity and the Wahhābī madhhab (may Allāh have mercy on its founder), which spread and gained foundations and acceptance within the circles of the Islamic Awakening (Ṣaḥwah), especially its Jihādī elements in the Arab and Islamic world, and what these institutions practiced in terms of printing books and distributing pamphlets carrying the Salafī ‘aqīdah and other sciences, and the good therein. This work found acceptance in the Islamic world. This continued until the Saudi government recently found itself burdened with carrying the message of the Wahhābī da‘wah, which formed a basis in the intellectual foundation of most contemporary Jihādī groups. This has recently plunged it into a real crisis with America, so, under duress from America, it suddenly decided to fight this identity after the September events when the Americans discovered their predicament with the Muslim ‘aqīdah of al-walā’ wa-l-barā’, which the Wahhābī da‘wah focused on extensively.

The real problem that this Saudi institution has caused for the Islamic and Arab Ummah in general is that while the destructive role and hypocrisy of all institutions and personalities of the Sultān's scholars in most Arab and Muslim countries are limited to the local sphere, expanding partially in proportion to the size of their state, the strength of their government, and their regional role, the Saudi institution is an exception. For the aforementioned reasons, its harm extends to encompass the entire Islamic world, as it has gained accepted authority in all countries. This is due to the confusing overlap that occurred between it and the blessed Islamic Awakening (Ṣaḥwah) that became active in Saudi Arabia and had its scholars and du‘āt during the last two decades of the 20th century (1400-1420 AH). The problem was that this Ṣaḥwah emerged from the womb of that official religious institution, graduated under its scholars, and senior sincere du‘āt within it became entangled in carving great idols out of the symbols of that religious institution, foremost among them the ill-mentioned Ibn Bāz and Ibn ‘Uthaymīn, who played a disgraceful role alongside the invading campaigns and the existing agent governments in Saudi Arabia and elsewhere. This reached the point where senior Mujāhidīn leaders and du‘āt in Saudi Arabia itself cried out from the affliction of this clerical institution, after it issued fatāwā to imprison their best and most prominent figures in the prisons of Āl Sa‘ūd and decreed, under the directives of Nāyif ibn ‘Abd al-‘Azīz, to ban hundreds of them from teaching and delivering khuṭbahs.

The Muslims' crisis with this institution deepened when its affair, and the affair of its scholars and its fatāwā—which supported colonialism and its agents, and fought against Jihād, Mujāhidīn, and anyone who contemplated resistance—became confused. This is because the contemporary Jihādī current, as I mentioned earlier, has relied for many of the fundamentals of its thought and beliefs—especially in adopting the fiqh of evidence, the principles of al-walā’ wa-l-barā’, and many fundamentals of ‘aqīdah—on the same intellectual-creedal school (Salafiyyah) that the Saudi religious institution trades in. Many well-intentioned du‘āt whose activities overlapped with it adopt this school. This led large segments of Jihādī thinkers inside and outside the Kingdom to hold much respect and veneration for these references. The effect of this was extremely detrimental to Jihādī circles. Those who realized the true state of this institution faced clashes and fierce debates within Jihādī circles and endured much hardship while trying to expose the falsehood of this institution. Thus, this institution fought Jihād and the Mujāhidīn inside and outside the Kingdom, had a detrimental effect on Jihād in a number of Arab and Islamic countries, played a role in besieging the Islamic Emirate and overthrowing the Taliban, and in the campaign against Jihād and the Mujāhidīn led by America under the banner of the global war on terrorism. Today, it stands as an obstacle to acts of Jihād and resistance against the Americans in Saudi Arabia, especially after the triumphant attacks in May (2003) when Saudi istishhādiyyūn blew up the luxurious residences of American military families and their intelligence personnel in Riyadh.

- A simple survey of Saudi media—newspapers, magazines, radio, and television—is enough to see the flood of fatāwā and interviews with dozens of scholars from the official and unofficial institutions, all lined up to hurl insults and false accusations at the Mujāhid youth, exploiting some of their mistakes, and to lavish praise and expressions of loyalty upon the "sole Islamic regime in the world that is based on Islamic Sharī'ah," as they claim! And to fill the world with noise about the rights of kuffār and mu'āhadīn, knowingly confounding truth with falsehood...
- The shameful positions of the official religious institution in Saudi Arabia have provoked the anger of the Mujāhidīn, sincere scholars, and honorable sons of the Arabian Peninsula, and they have stated this in much literature and many statements.
- I have compiled some of what Shaykh Usāmah ibn Lādin has issued regarding this religious institution, as well as some of what was issued by one of the most prominent political opponents of the Saudi regime, Dr. Sa'd al-Faqīh, in a book titled "Testimony of the Mujāhidīn Leaders and Heads of Reform and Opposition in the Land of the Two Holy Sanctuaries Regarding the Sultān's Scholars in Their Country Called 'Saudi Arabia'."
- Both men are trustworthy, regardless of our opinion on their differing methods of confronting the Saudi regime and its religious and other institutions. I will quote short excerpts from my aforementioned book of some of what they said:

It came in Statement No. (11) of the Advice and Reform Committee, signed by (Usāmah ibn Lādin), dated 27/7/1415 AH - 29/12/1994 CE, titled:

"An Open Letter to Shaykh Ibn Bāz on the Invalidity of His Fatwā Permitting Peace with the Jews..."

"Your Eminence, Shaykh: We intended by mentioning the foregoing to remind you of your duty towards the dīn and towards the Ummah, and to alert you to your great responsibilities, for indeed, the reminder benefits the believers. We wanted to remind you at this time when falsehood has swelled, and the purveyors of falsehood and misguidance have run rampant, truth has been buried, du‘āt have been imprisoned, and reformers have been silenced. Stranger still is that this did not happen merely with your knowledge and silence, but rather it was passed on the back of your fatāwā and positions. We will remind you, Your Eminence, Shaykh, of some of these fatāwā and positions to which you may pay no heed, although they could cause the Ummah to plummet seventy autumns into misguidance, so that you may realize with us, even if only partially, the gravity of this matter and its detrimental consequences.

Here are some examples:

1 - It is no secret to anyone the extent to which rampant corruption has spread, encompassing all aspects of life, where various munkarāt, no longer hidden from anyone, have become widespread, as detailed in the Memorandum of Advice submitted by a group of scholars and reformers. Among the most dangerous things they clarified was shirk with Allāh, represented in legislating and enacting man-made laws that permit prohibited things, the most heinous of which is dealing with ribā, which is rampant in the country, through state institutions and its usurious banks whose towers compete with the minarets of the Two Holy Sanctuaries and fill the country from one end to the other.

It is necessarily known that the usurious systems and laws by which these banks and institutions operate are legislated by the ruling regime and approved by it. Nevertheless, we have only heard from you that dealing in ribā is ḥarām and not permissible!!, paying no attention to the talbīs (deception) your words cause among the people by not differentiating between the ruling on one who merely deals in ribā and the ruling on one who legislates and codifies ribā.

Although the difference between them is clear and significant: one who deals in ribā is a perpetrator of one of the major destructive sins, whereas one who legislates and codifies ribā is an apostate, a kāfir whose kufr expels him from the millah by this action, because he has made himself an equal to Allāh and a partner with Him in permitting and prohibiting – and this is what we have detailed in an independent research paper that will be published soon, in shā’ Allāh.

And although Allāh and His Messenger have declared war on the one who deals in ribā and does not desist – {And if you do not, then be informed of a war [against you] from Allāh and His Messenger.} (Al-Baqarah: 279) – we still hear from you expressions of praise and adulation for this regime, which has not only become addicted to dealing in ribā but has also legislated, codified, and permitted it. And he (peace and blessings be upon him) said: "Ribā has seventy-three gates, the mildest of which is like a man marrying his own mother." (Ṣaḥīḥ, narrated by al-Ḥākim).

Ibn ‘Abbās (may Allāh be pleased with them both) said: "So whoever persists in ribā and does not desist from it, it is the right of the Imām of the Muslims to demand his repentance; if he desists, fine, otherwise, he should strike his neck." (Narrated by Ibn Jarīr with his isnād from Ibn ‘Abbās). This is regarding one who deals in ribā, so what about one who declares ribā permissible and legislates it?!!

The economic and political crises in which the country is floundering, and the astonishing spread of crimes of all kinds, are nothing but a punishment from Allāh and part of the war He, the Exalted, declared on those who do not desist from dealing in ribā and similar munkarāt, and the destruction He decreed for ribā: {Allāh destroys ribā and gives increase for ṣadaqāt.} (Al-Baqarah: 276).

2 - And when the King wore the cross on his chest and appeared with it before the world, joyful and pleased, you interpreted his action and justified it, despite its heinousness and ugliness, and despite the clarity that this act is kufr, and the apparent state of its doer being one of contentment and choice with knowledge.

3 - And when the invading Crusader and Jewish coalition forces in the Gulf War – in collusion with the regime – decided to occupy the country in the name of liberating Kuwait, you justified that with a strained fatwā that rationalized this heinous act which insulted the honor of the Ummah, stained its dignity, and desecrated its sanctities, considering it a matter of seeking help from the kāfir in times of necessity, while neglecting the restrictions of such assistance and the Shari‘ah-recognized parameters of necessity."

4 - And when the ruling Saudi regime assisted and supported the heads of socialist-communist apostasy in Yemen against the Yemeni Muslim people in the recent war, you remained silent. Then, when the tables turned on these communists, you issued – at the behest of this regime – an "advice!!" calling for everyone to reconcile and make peace, considering them Muslims!! This deluded people into thinking that communists are Muslims whose blood must be spared. When were communists ever Muslims? Were you not the ones who previously issued a fatwā declaring their apostasy and the obligation to fight them in Afghanistan? Or is there a difference between Yemeni communists and Afghan communists? Have the concepts of ‘aqīdah and the principles of Tawḥīd been lost and confused to this extent?

The ruling regime continues to harbor these imāms of kufr in various cities of the country, and we have not heard any condemnation from you. The Prophet (ṣallallāhu ‘alayhi wa sallam) said: "Allāh curses whoever shelters an innovator." (Narrated by Muslim).

5 - And when the regime decided to oppress Shaykh Salmān al-‘Awdah and Shaykh Safar al-Ḥawālī – who proclaimed the truth and endured harm for the sake of Allāh – it procured a fatwā from you by which it justified all the oppression and abuse that the two Shaykhs and those with them among the du‘āt, mashāyikh, and youth of the Ummah were and are subjected to. May Allāh release them from their captivity and lift the oppression of the oppressors from them.

These are some examples, not intended to be exhaustive, but the situation required their mention as we address your recent fatwā concerning what is slanderously called "peace with the Jews." This fatwā was a calamity for the Muslims, as you yielded to the political desire of the regime when it decided to reveal what it had previously concealed: its intention to enter into this farcical surrender with the Jews. So you issued a fatwā permitting peace, both unconditional and conditional, with the enemy. The Prime Minister of the Zionist enemy and its parliament did nothing but applaud it and praise it. The Saudi regime subsequently announced its intention to implement further normalization with the enemy.

As if you were not content with permitting the land of the Two Holy Sanctuaries to the Jewish and Crusader occupation forces, you even dragged the third of the Holy Sanctuaries into the calamity by adding Shar‘ī legitimacy to the deeds of surrender signed by the traitors and cowards among the ṭawāghīt of the Arabs and the Jews.

Indeed, this talk is gravely dangerous and a general catastrophe because of the deception it entails for the Ummah.

A group of scholars and du‘āt of the Ummah have preceded us in alerting you to this. They submitted several appeals to you in this regard, including their appeals to you some time ago to refrain from issuing a fatwā permitting this alleged "surrender-peace" with the Jews, clarifying that it does not meet the necessary Shar‘ī conditions, and warning of the immense religious and worldly dangers resulting from it. Among the signatories to that appeal were the esteemed Shaykhs: ‘Abdullāh ibn ‘Abd al-Raḥmān ibn Jibrīn, ‘Abdullāh ibn Ḥasan al-Qu‘ūd, Ḥammūd ibn ‘Abdullāh al-

Tuwayjirī (raḥimahullāh), Ḥammūd ibn ‘Abdullāh al-Sha‘ībī, ‘Abd al-Raḥmān ibn Nāṣir al-Barrāk, Salmān al-‘Awdah, Ibrāhīm ibn Ṣāliḥ al-Khuḍayrī, ‘Abd al-Waḥhāb al-Nāṣir al-Ṭurayrī, Ibrāhīm ibn Muḥammad al-Dubayān, ‘Abdullāh ibn Ḥammūd al-Tuwayjirī, ‘Abdullāh al-Jalālī, ‘Ā’id al-Qarnī, and many others (ḥafīzahumullāh jamī‘an). You will find the text of their appeal with this letter, in shā’ Allāh.

In the recent Yemen war, when the aforementioned statement was issued, twenty-five scholars issued a fatwā opposing it, clarifying the correct Shar‘ī position on the matter. Among these esteemed scholars were: ‘Abdullāh Sulaymān al-Mas‘arī, Ḥammūd ibn ‘Abdullāh al-Sha‘ībī, ‘Abdullāh al-Jalālī, Salmān al-‘Awdah, Dr. Safar al-Ḥawālī, Dr. Nāṣir al-‘Umar, Yaḥyā ibn ‘Abd al-‘Azīz al-Yaḥyā, Dr. ‘Abdullāh ibn Ḥammūd al-Tuwayjirī, and many others (ḥafīzahumullāh jamī‘an).

And in Statement No. (12) of the Advice and Reformation Committee, signed by Usāmah bin Lādin, dated 28/8/1415 AH (29/1/1995 CE), titled: "The Second Letter to Shaykh ‘Abd al-‘Azīz ibn Bāz." It included the following, from which we quote:

"However, everyone was surprised, not only because you reaffirmed your previous fatwā in what was published by the newspaper called 'Al-Muslimūn' on 19 Sha‘bān 1415 AH, corresponding to 20 January 1995, in its issue No. 520, but also because of the additions and interpretations this reaffirmation contained regarding your understanding of what is called 'peace with the Jews.' These interpretations included matters that the Jews and their agents would not have dreamed of you issuing when they praised and applauded the previous fatwā.

The Ummah in general, and the people of Palestine in particular, were expecting you to fulfill your Shar‘ī duty by inciting to Jihād, rousing determination for it, urging people towards it, and supporting and backing those individuals and groups shouldering its burdens.

They did not expect such a fatwā from you, which criminalizes the mujāhidīn striving to liberate Al-Aqṣā and Palestine. Yes, it criminalizes them, because through their Jihād operations against the Jews, they violate the Gaza-Jericho Agreement signed by the 'Walī al-Amr of the Muslims in Palestine,' as you claimed. And violating an agreement signed by the Walī al-Amr of the Muslims is not permissible!!

With this fatwā, you discourage and dishearten those who offered their fathers, sons, brothers, and husbands as shuhadā' in the path of Allāh to liberate Jerusalem and Palestine. Because, according to this fatwā, they would have died in a state of sin, as they violated an agreement made by the 'Walī al-Amr of the Muslims in Palestine.' This is the meaning of your words and the implication of your fatwā. Do you comprehend what you are saying?! Or do you say about Allāh that of which you have no knowledge?!

If you do not know, then that is a calamity; but if you do know, then the calamity is even greater.

Fifth: What causes fear and anxiety is not merely the issuance of this fatwā by you, but what is more calamitous is that this fatwā was issued according to a methodology you follow in issuing such fatāwā, the most important characteristics of which are:

1 - It stems from the principle of accommodating evil rulers in their political whims and justifying their positions and actions.

2 - In pursuit of that, it distorts evidence and twists the necks of texts to make them conform to those desires.

3 - And if the applicable texts in the given situation do not suffice for this, the ruling is made ambiguous in a way that allows the rulers to achieve their desired outcome.

4 - It is based on ignorance of the reality (al-wāqīʿ), which is the basis (manāṭ) of the ruling, and it is not permissible to issue a fatwā based on ignorance of it (1).

5 - And because it is based on the fluctuating desires of rulers, it has been characterized by much contradiction and inconsistency.

6 - We have provided examples in our previous letter that attest to the truth of this statement.

The clear invalidity and manifest corruption in this methodology are not hidden, because it is based on caprice and favoritism in issuing fatāwā." End quote.

As also stated in the publications of the Islamic Movement for Reform, headed by Dr. Saʿd al-Faqīh in London: Bulletin "24," titled "Shaykh Ibn ʿUthaymīn: Answers that Raise Questions," dated 12 Rabīʿ al-Thānī 1417 AH (26/8/1996 CE). This bulletin was issued after the "Al-Muslimūn" newspaper published an interview with Shaykh Muḥammad ibn ʿUthaymīn. It is titled: "Shaykh Ibn ʿUthaymīn... Answers that Raise Questions."

Excerpts from some of Ibn ʿUthaymīn's Sharʿī political fatāwā, including the following:

The Shaykh said, in response to a question about obedience to the Walī al-Amr: "And if we assume, in a remote scenario, that the Walī al-Amr is a kāfir, does that mean we should incite people's hearts against him until rebellion, chaos, and fighting occur? Undoubtedly, this is a mistake. The maṣlaḥah (benefit/interest) obtained through this path is not hoped for; the maṣlaḥah that this person desires cannot be achieved this way. Rather, great mafāsīd (corruptions/harms) result from it. Because, for example, if a group of people rises against the Walī al-Amr in the country, and the Walī al-Amr possesses power and authority that no one else has, what will happen? Will this small group overcome? It will not overcome; on the contrary, chaos and corruption will occur. And matters will not become stable. A person must first look with the eye of the Sharīʿah, and not look at the Sharīʿah with a one-eyed view, looking at texts from one angle while ignoring another. Rather, one must reconcile between the texts."

As for the other question about bayʿah (allegiance), the Shaykh said: "No doubt, this is mistaken. And if he dies, he dies a death of jāhiliyyah, because he will die without having a bayʿah to anyone upon his neck. And the general principles in the Islamic Sharīʿah are that Allāh says: {So fear Allāh as much as you are able}. So if there is no general Khalīfah for the Muslims, then whoever is a Walī al-Amr in a region is its Walī al-Amr. Otherwise, if we were to adopt this misguided opinion, people today would have no Khalīfah, and everyone would die a death of jāhiliyyah. Who says this? The Islamic Ummah has been divided since the era of the Ṣaḥābah. You know that ʿAbdullāh ibn al-Zubayr was in Makkah, and Banū Umayyah were in Shām, and likewise, there were people in Yemen and people in Egypt. And the Muslims have continued to believe that bayʿah is to whoever holds authority in the place where they are; they give him bayʿah and call him Amīr al-Muʾminīn, and no one denies this. So this person is splitting the unity of the Muslims by not adhering to the bayʿah, and by contravening the ijmāʿ (consensus) of the Muslims from ancient times."

And in the course of his answer on the issue of bayʿah, the Shaykh said: "Then, if a person is given bayʿah for leadership over a country, and then a crown prince (walī ʿahd) is appointed for him, he is his successor. When the term of the first ends, the second becomes the Walī al-Amr without a new bayʿah, and people's affairs cannot be set right except by this. If we were to say that the crown prince does not have the authority of succession until he is given a new bayʿah, chaos would ensue. But Shayṭān casts such opinions into the hearts of some people so that the Muslim community (jamāʿah) may be divided and the instigation (taḥrīsh) occurs, about which the Messenger (ʿalayhi al-ṣalātu wa al-salām) said: 'Indeed, Shayṭān has despaired of being worshipped in the Arabian Peninsula, but [he seeks to sow discord] through instigation among them.' " End quote.

Al-Faqīh commented on Ibn ‘Uthaymīn's fatāwā with scathing and sarcastic remarks, befitting the charlatanry and falsehoods they contained, which reach the point of contradicting the clear Qur’ān, the authentic Sunnah, and the ijmā‘ of the Ummah's scholars throughout its history.

And in Bulletin (28), dated 11 Jumādā al-Ūlā 1417 AH (23 September 1996 CE), this bulletin was issued after a comment by Shaykh Ibn Bāz was published regarding Bin Lādin's statement and the call to fight the Americans. It is titled: "Ibn Bāz between Muḥammad ibn ‘Abd al-Wahhāb and Ibn Taymiyyah."

Sa’d al-Faqīh said: "But we were deeply pained by this great tazkiyah (commendation/purification) that the Shaykh gave to the current Saudi state under the leadership of the Custodian of the Two Holy Sanctuaries. The Shaykh said: 'This Saudi state is a blessed state through which Allāh has given victory to the truth, supported the dīn, united the word, eliminated the causes of corruption, and secured the land. Through it, great blessings have been achieved that none can enumerate except Allāh.'

This statement from the Shaykh is very dangerous because the Shaykh knows full well that what he said is the exact opposite of reality. Those who reiterate that the Shaykh is being misled are mistaken, because we know with certainty – and we are witnesses to this in this world and the Hereafter – that this is not true. And that the Shaykh is fully and detailedly informed about what is happening in the country and knows all the details of the Shar‘ī violations committed by the regime at the state level and at the level of influential individuals. Indeed, the Shaykh, as those close to him know, is much more knowledgeable than those who claim to be aware of what is happening, because most of the people of reform convey news, information, observations, and advice from themselves to the Shaykh himself. We have personally witnessed many sessions in which the reality was explained to the Shaykh in detail, without ambiguity. Indeed, we can say that the ḥujjah (proof/argument) has been established against the Shaykh, and that responsibility has been discharged towards him by a large number of mashāyikh, university professors, and reformers. And the establishment of the ḥujjah by clarifying the reality in detail to the Shaykh has occurred repeatedly by people whom the Shaykh trusts and whose words he accepts. Whoever doubts this need only read the Memorandum of Advice that was presented to the Shaykh and reviewed by the Quintipartite Committee and the Council of Senior Scholars, both of which the Shaykh heads. No one can argue that this memorandum is not a ḥujjah against whoever has read it. Those who try to defend the Shaykh by portraying him as a naive man sitting in a cellar, only aware of what the regime informs him of, are mistaken. For the Shaykh is in contact with the whole world, internally and externally, and has detailed knowledge of the situations, a follow-up forced upon him by a large number of du‘āt, reformers, and students of knowledge.

Therefore, the Shaykh commits a grave error and a dangerous slip when he gives this tazkiyah to the state while knowing its true condition, and he also knows, through his Shar‘ī knowledge, the danger of such an act. The Shaykh is not unfamiliar with the writings and sayings of the scholars of the Da‘wah, especially Shaykh Muḥammad ibn ‘Abd al-Wahhāb. The Shaykh, for example, knows with certainty that the regime rules by other than what Allāh has revealed, despite repeated warnings and advice.

So what does the Shaykh say then about the statement of Muḥammad ibn ‘Abd al-Wahhāb concerning those who give tazkiyah to those who rule by other than what Allāh has revealed? He (raḥimahullāh) said: 'Indeed, these ṭawāghīt in whom people believe obedience is due, apart from Allāh, are all kuffār, apostates from Islām. How could they not be, when they make ḥalāl what Allāh has forbidden, and make ḥarām what Allāh has permitted, and strive to spread corruption in the land through their words, actions, and support? And whoever argues on their behalf, or denies [the rightness of] those who declare them kuffār, or claims that this action of theirs, even if it were false, does not take them into kufr – then the least that can be said of such an arguer is that he is a fāsiq (transgressor). Because the dīn of Islām is not sound except by disassociating from these [ṭawāghīt] and declaring them kuffār.' (Al-Rasā'il al-Shakhṣiyyah, p. 188).

So if merely not performing takfīr [of them] is a major crime according to Shaykh Muḥammad ibn 'Abd al-Wahhāb, then what about one who describes them with the best descriptions of Islām, gives tazkiyah to their state and system, and attacks those who denounce them?"

Allāh the Exalted said: {Indeed, those who conceal what We sent down of clear proofs and guidance after We made it clear for the people in the Scripture - those are cursed by Allāh and cursed by those who curse.} (Al-Baqarah: 159).

And this is regarding merely one who conceals knowledge. So what about one who goes further than merely concealing knowledge, to giving tazkiyah to the ṭāghūt, and giving tazkiyah to one who allies with the enemies of Allāh, and giving tazkiyah to the oppressor who wages war against Islām and the Da'wah, and who spreads ribā and corruption?

We would be pleased if the Shaykh were to repent from this matter and cease such dangerous endorsements that implicate him in the words of Shaykh Muḥammad ibn 'Abd al-Wahhāb. We would also be pleased if the Shaykh transformed from a defender of the regime into a defender of truth and Dīn, and an exposé of the regime's crimes against Islām. However, this is not the most important thing. The most important thing is for Muslims to remember that they only take their Dīn from those whose words align with the Book (the Qur'ān) and the Sunnah, and who apply the knowledge of Sharīʿah with honesty and sincerity to reality, so that they may be among the reforming scholars who speak on behalf of Allāh. A Muslim is not bound by the words of Ibn Bāz or Ibn ʿUthaymīn; rather, he is bound by the word of Allāh and the word of His Messenger (ṣallā Allāhu ʿalayhi wa sallam). Among Allāh's favors upon us is that there is no priesthood or Vatican in Islām that monopolizes the interpretation of the Qurʾān and the understanding of the Sunnah. Instead, the truth in the Book and the Sunnah is the judge of men, and men are not the judges of the Book and the Sunnah. The problem with Shaykh Ibn Bāz is not merely his endorsement of the regime; rather, the Shaykh was forced to contradict himself more than once in his fatāwā due to his appeasement of the regime. Among the examples of this explicit contradiction is the Shaykh's fatwá prohibiting seeking aid from non-Muslims, which was directed at Jamāl ʿAbd an-Nāṣir, in which the Shaykh stated that seeking aid is not permissible even in cases of necessity [1].

(1) The Shaykh issued a similar prohibition for the Mujāhidīn in Syria against Ḥāfiẓ al-Asad when he forbade seeking aid from apostate parties and the Iraqi regime in that Jihād. The text of his fatwá was "The absolute prohibition of seeking aid." Refer to the author's book, The Jihādī Islamic Revolution in Syria (1/264).

This was in line with the regime's desire at that time. Years passed, and the situation reversed. Āl Saʿūd needed to overturn the fatwá, so the Shaykh changed his stance along with them. He did not merely permit seeking aid out of necessity but considered it obligatory, and deemed anyone who did not act upon it a sinner. Another contradiction the Shaykh fell into was when he issued a statement advising Ḥikmatyār to join the Walī al-Amr, Rabbānī, even though Ḥikmatyār had his own army and land under his control, while Rabbānī's advantage was that the state's whim was with him. When the Yemen war occurred, the communist separatists were, according to the Shaykh's theory, in the position of Khawārij against the ruler. Nevertheless, the Shaykh issued a statement calling for the sparing of blood and reconciliation between the two parties, and did not call for joining the Walī al-Amr, because the regime's whim was with the communists. This is in addition to a list of fatāwā issued by the Shaykh according to the regime's desire, foremost among them the fatwā to summon foreign forces, which the Shaykh considered obligatory and not merely permissible. Then came the statement of the Council of Senior Scholars against the Charter of Demands, the Council's statement against the Memorandum of Advice, the Council's statement against the Defense Committee, and the Council's statement ordering the arrest of the two Shaykhs, Salmān and Safar, for the purpose of "protecting society from their errors." And the recent fatāwā that declared Americans to be mu'āhadīn (those with a covenant) whose blood is inviolable, and considered killing them one of the greatest forms of corruption in the land.

One wonders, has the Shaykh read the words of Shaykh al-Islām Ibn Taymiyyah regarding one who issues fatāwā contrary to the Book and Sunnah in agreement with the ruler's whim?

Imām Ibn Taymiyyah said in Al-Fatāwā:

"Whenever a scholar abandons what he knows from the Book of Allāh and the Sunnah of His Messenger, and follows the ruling of a ruler that مخالف to the ruling of Allāh and His Messenger, he becomes an apostate, a kāfir, deserving of punishment in this world and the Hereafter."

(Al-Fatāwā, Vol. 35, pp. 372-373).

We ask Allāh to grant all Muslims insight into their Dīn and bestow upon them al-furqān (the criterion) by which they can distinguish between the scholars of ar-Raḥmān and the scholars of the Sulṭān. (End of quote).

In Bulletin (31), dated 2 Jumādā al-Ākhirah 1417 AH, corresponding to October 14, 1996, titled:

"A Major Crime in the Prisons of Āl Saʿūd," al-Faqīh reported dangerous information about torture in Saudi Arabia and held the official scholars responsible for it, saying:

"It has been confirmed to the Movement from informed sources within the security apparatus that torture squads have committed the heinous crime of violating the honor of a large number of detainees and repeatedly sexually assaulting them, in an attempt to crush their personalities and destroy their high morale.

Information coming from inside the prisons has indicated that those detained because of their Jihādī past are subjected to a series of pressures that end in that shameful outcome – and refuge is sought in Allāh (wa al-ʿiyādhu billāh). Anyone connected to that current is required (under duress) to confess that he believes in the takfīr of rulers, society, and scholars. If he does not agree, he is severely tortured with various types of psychological and physical torment. If he persists in refusing, he is threatened with sexual assault, at which point these human dogs do not hesitate to carry out that threat and commit the filthy crime. He might even be filmed in this shameful position to further humiliate and blackmail him to the greatest extent possible.

The Movement has learned that this despicable crime, occurring in the heart of the Arabian Peninsula at the hands of the henchmen of the 'State of Tawḥīd,' is carried out in implementation of the program proposed by advisors to the Ministry of Interior from North Africa [1]. These advisors succeeded in convincing the Minister of Interior of the effectiveness of this method in achieving the important goal of 'drying up the sources' by destroying the personalities of those young men and crushing their morale and psyche. Yes, perhaps some threats of assault occurred in the past against those believed to have no backing to protect them. Perhaps investigators even exploited their authority in isolated, rare individual cases without the knowledge of their superiors. But it never crossed anyone's mind that these practices would turn into routine work with the knowledge, direction, and approval of senior officials, headed by the Minister of Interior personally.

That Nāyif bears responsibility for this crime does not in any way absolve his influential brothers. Every decision-maker in this state's policy is responsible for this filthy crime and bears its consequences just as Nāyif does, and deserves what results from it in the present and the future. His being outside the Ministry of Interior will not and cannot absolve him. If Nāyif places no value on honor (ʿarḍ), dignity (sharaf), or protective jealousy (ghayrah), as he has done in his personal life, then this crime will extend to his brothers, and they will all be accused of what Nāyif is accused of.

(1) Among the most prominent advisors to the Minister of Interior, Nāyif ibn ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz, was a team of Egyptian security experts headed by the former Egyptian Minister of Interior, Zakī Badr, who was known for his immorality, obscenity, depravity, as well as his kufr.

Indeed, the responsibility extends beyond the influential figures of Āl Saʿūd to those who bestow upon them and their actions the legitimacy of Tawḥīd, and who persist in endorsing this regime and its supposed concern for Dīn, daʿwah, and serving Islām, claiming that it has achieved at its hands 'blessings that none can count except Allāh.' We do not consider these individuals merely negligent in denouncing explicit and public evil (munkar) – for which they deserve the threat mentioned in Sūrat al-Baqarah for those who fail to speak out. Rather, they are, in truth – and we say this with full conviction, knowledge, and understanding – partners in the crime. Yes, partners in it, and they will be held accountable for it on the Day of Resurrection as if they had committed it themselves. For they are among the strongest pillars upon which the regime relies for its stability, and their statements and positions are among the strongest arguments the regime uses to justify its practices. In fact, their crime is greater because they have donned the robes of scholarship and assumed the responsibility of issuing fatāwā, yet they did not shy away from lying about Allāh and His Messenger and deviating from the truth with which Allāh entrusted them. The tragedy is that they know all this from their knowledge of the biographies of the scholars of the Salaf, such as Imām Mālik, Imām Aḥmad ibn Taymiyyah, and others. They know that they are not merely helpers of oppressors, but are the oppressors themselves. They know all this, and they know that the sin, crime, and fate of a scholar who defends and endorses an oppressor are greater than the sin, crime, and fate of the oppressor himself. We truly do not know why some naive individuals insist on seeking refuge with them and complaining to them while they see them endorsing Kufr, Shirk, ḡulm (oppression), fusūq (immorality), and ‘iṣyān (disobedience). Indeed, they see them competing and scheming to find an excuse and an interpretation for every crime of the regime, no matter how heinous, in a way that would not even occur to the regime's own stalwarts. If people have been impressed by memorized texts and manuscripts, the Qur’ān described the learned men of the Children of Israel who do not act upon their knowledge as being 'like a donkey carrying books.' In fact, many Orientalist scholars, enemies of Islām, have not fallen short in memorizing texts and manuscripts, studying them, serving them, classifying them, and arranging them, despite their enmity towards Islām and their war against it.

We say it once again: the official scholars are partners in this filthy crime, and we bear witness before Allāh and then before the people that the proof has been established against them, both in terms of knowledge of the Shari‘ah and knowledge of the reality. (End of quote).

And in Bulletin (33), dated 16 Jumādā II 1417 AH - October 28, 1996, titled: "Who are the Scholars of Islām?" al-Faqīh said:

"The distinction between official and unofficial scholars was not clear before aṣ-Ṣaḥwah (the Awakening) entered into a confrontation with the regime, which began clearly with the Second Gulf Crisis. It escalated thereafter with the reformist steps that followed the events of that crisis, and then reached its peak with the fierce campaign against scholars and du‘āt (preachers), launched by the regime two years ago and still ongoing.

This is not the place to categorize scholars, but rather to piece together the picture that has formed in the wake of that ordeal and harsh experience, and subsequently to review stances and perspectives regarding official scholars, especially those who until recently were classified as if they were part of the aş-Şaḥwah entity and the reformist movement.

No one disputes that Āl Sa‘ūd rely heavily on a massive religious establishment that secures 'legitimacy' for them. All members of Āl Sa‘ūd – even the atheists among them – agree on the necessity of this institution to ensure the obedience of the people, for whom Dīn constitutes a major part of their psychological and cultural makeup. The most important components of this religious establishment are the Council of Senior Scholars, the judges, and the Committee for the Promotion of Virtue and Prevention of Vice. Despite the largeness of this institution in terms of numbers, its moral value is tied to a very small number of scholars who have given it its weight in the present time and turned it into an effective force. Were it not for the connection to one or two symbols from among those scholars, this entire institution and its influence would have completely collapsed. The reason for this is that those who make up this institution, whether they are members of the Council of Senior Scholars, judges, or the Committee for the Promotion of Virtue and Prevention of Vice, are of two types: The first is obscure, unknown, and has no scholarly or da‘wah history that would make him influential enough for the regime to benefit from. The second is famous and well-known but is exposed for his betrayal of Dīn, and it is agreed upon that he 'eats by his religion,' sells fatāwā, and trades in his Sharī‘ah knowledge. All that remains apart from these are one or two individuals known and famous for their extensive knowledge of Sharī'ah sciences and their scholarly and teaching activities, and at the same time, their integrity at the financial and behavioral level, and their avoidance of the problem of (financially) trading in fatāwā and religious positions.

Before the confrontation between aṣ-Ṣaḥwah and the regime began, and before the scholars entered the test of 'changing evil' (denouncing munkar), the star of these few had risen for the two aforementioned reasons, and for another reason: the absence of a confrontation between Islām and the regime. This limited the criteria to personal righteousness, financial honesty, and the degree of asceticism and piety. As for testing scholars on the extent of their confrontation with oppression, their proclamation of truth, and their denunciation of evil, that field had not yet opened. Therefore, a small number of official scholars gained acceptance among the people and earned great credibility.

The Gulf Crisis came, and it was the first test. The official scholars were exposed from the very first moment; not one of them spoke a word of truth. Indeed, some of them went beyond issuing a fatwā permitting seeking aid from the kuffār to making it obligatory, and consequently, declaring anyone who did not do so a sinner. When the du'āt and scholars moved to criticize the wrong situations, seeking to change the evil with their tongues and fulfilling the duty of conveying the message and proclaiming the truth which those official scholars had abandoned, another development occurred.

A five-member committee, chaired by Shaykh Ibn Bāz, was formed by royal decree. The task of this committee was to discipline those du'āt, dismiss them from giving khuṭbahs (sermons), and prevent them from performing their Sharī'ah duty. This committee studies the lists submitted to it by the Ministry of Interior and the reports prepared by the Mabāḥith (secret police), and then decides based on that information that so-and-so must be stopped from preaching or teaching, so-and-so must be completely dismissed, and so-and-so must be warned. When the lists are presented to this committee, rarely does anyone escape; everyone is suspended or dismissed. At the hands of this committee, tens, perhaps even hundreds, of preachers and du‘āt were dismissed. While the Council's fatwá legitimizing the kuffār's occupation of the Arabian Peninsula was unlimited Sharī‘ah support for the regime, the formation of the five-member committee was the first time it was revealed that this institution was part of the regime. Many du‘āt and reformers thought that this development was alien to the members of this institution, but the reality is otherwise. There was no change in the policy and thinking of those scholars; all that happened was that they came to the forefront with the regime, and their role was exposed after there had been no confrontation.

After that, the religious establishment's confrontation with ad-da‘wah took an overtly political form when the Council of Senior Scholars issued a statement against the Charter of Demands, transforming itself into a defender of the regime against the du‘āt and reformers, as well as against the entire populace that supported these demands. The Council's statement against the Charter of Demands was not a slip or a lapse but a deliberate, foundational act. This was proven when this stance was repeated in the Council's statement against the Memorandum of Advice – a statement that contained expressions unacceptable even to a lay Muslim, because it attacked intentions and objectives and accused the preparers of the memorandum of bad faith and intending sabotage. Then the Council repeated the process in its statement against the Defense Committee, as a prelude to the security campaign launched against the Committee thereafter. Then came the stage of true and comprehensive confrontation with ad-da‘wah, the reformers, and the scholars of truth, where the Council, especially Shaykh ‘Abd al-‘Azīz ibn Bāz, lent its cover for the arrest of the two Shaykhs, Salmān and Safar, in a long speech, which the regime openly used to justify the arrest of the two Shaykhs and the launch of the massive campaign against reformers and du‘āt.

Ever since the elite scholars were arrested, the campaign of repression and arrests intensified, and an open war was declared on ad-da‘wah, the Council has remained in its absolute loyalty and complete obedience to the regime. Position after position has been repeated in its dedication to endorsing and defending the regime, and accusing anyone who seeks to denounce evil of inciting fitnah (strife) and confusion. It has gone even further, volunteering a set of fatawā describing other actions as 'corruption in the land' and stressing the necessity of applying ḥadd al-ḥirābah (punishment for highway robbery/waging war against society) to their perpetrators."

Indeed, understanding this issue and perceiving it correctly is crucial for the integrity of the Ṣaḥwah's path. There is a significant difference between considering these scholars as part of the Ṣaḥwah entity, advocates of reform, and scholars of Da‘wah, or considering them part of the regime—indeed, one of its pillars and more important to it than the secret police or the media apparatus.

The mission of a scholar in Islam is not merely personal piety and financial integrity. Rather, his mission is to speak authoritatively on behalf of Allāh, bear the trust of knowledge, and inherit from the Prophet. A scholar commits a grave crime merely by neglecting the duty of conveying the message and concealing knowledge. Allāh the Exalted said: {Indeed, those who conceal what We sent down of clear proofs and guidance after We made it clear for the people in the Scripture—those are cursed by Allāh and cursed by those who curse.} (Al-Baqarah 2:159).

A scholar is not safe from this curse—the curse of concealment—unless he fulfills what is mentioned in the verse that follows it: {Except for those who repent, correct themselves, and make evident [what they concealed]. Those—I will accept their repentance; and I am the Accepting of repentance, the Merciful.} (Al-Baqarah 2:160).

Concealing knowledge is not concealing the Book and the Sunnah, for no one can conceal the Book and the Sunnah. Rather, it is failing to apply them correctly to the contemporary issues (Nawāzil) upon which a scholar is obliged to apply the texts. This is a grave crime if it is limited to mere concealment. So how much worse is it if he betrays the trust and lies about Allāh when conveying from Him something other than what He, the Glorified, intended in His Book and the Sunnah of His Messenger? These are the ones intended in the saying of Allāh the Exalted: {And recite to them the news of him to whom We gave Our signs, but he cast them away; so Satan pursued him, and he became of those who go astray. And if We had willed, We could have raised him thereby, but he clung to the earth and followed his own desire. So his example is like that of the dog: if you chase him, he lolls his tongue out, or if you leave him alone, he (still) lolls his tongue out. That is the example of the people who denied Our signs. So relate the stories that perhaps they will give thought.} (Al-A'rāf 7:175-176).

This is the manner in which the Qur'ān described scholars and distinguished between one who fulfills the duty of conveying the message, one who conceals it, and, even more severely, one who lies about Allāh and betrays the trust.

The discussion here is not for the purpose of advising or reminding those scholars—although advising and reminding them is a duty, no matter how great their crime. Rather, it is a message directed to the youth of the Da'wah and all who belong to the path of reform, that they should know their men [i.e., recognize true leaders].

The accumulated fame and good reputation of some scholars, established before the real test began, should not divert us from the Qur'ānic method of identifying the scholars who are to be followed and obeyed.

What is required here is not to criminalize so-and-so, or insult so-and-so, or curse so-and-so. Rather, what is required is that the Muslim youth not deceive themselves and continue to deal with those scholars as if they were reformist leaders and figureheads in denouncing evil.

Revering a specific person for his knowledge, age, or for an effort he made at some point, never means placing him in a position of leadership, to be followed, and to be resorted to in times of new critical issues (Nawāzil). Instead, it is paramount to return to the Qur'ān and the Sunnah, learn how to deal with scholars according to what is stated in the Qur'ān and the Sunnah, and identify the true scholars whom the Ummah should consult for fatāwā and whose choices they should abide by.

What was reported from Shaykh Ibn 'Uthaymīn in Al-Muslimūn newspaper and what was reported from Shaykh Ibn Bāz in the Saudi press, which my article 'Al-Iṣlāḥ' (Reform) addressed, represent an example of the exposure of this group.

This is an opportunity for those who wish to evaluate according to the Qur'ānic method and the Muḥammadan path. Those close to the two Shaykhs observe their personal commitment in terms of worship, uprightness, financial integrity, and asceticism. They also observe the breadth of their Sharī'ah knowledge and their abilities in teaching and instruction. However, they also observe what we meant in our previous discussion regarding a major problem in the most important issue, which is the issue of them fulfilling their duty of conveying the message.

We hope that Shaykh Ibn Bāz and Shaykh Ibn 'Uthaymīn will repent to Allāh, rectify themselves, and clarify—meaning that they acknowledge whatever in their statements contradicted the Sharī'ah and alert the Ummah to this error, as per the guidance of the Qur'ān. We hope that Shaykh Ibn Bāz and Shaykh Ibn 'Uthaymīn will transform into individuals who proclaim the truth, confront injustice, fight tyranny, and support every banner of Da'wah and reform.

However, what is more important is that the youth of the Ṣaḥwah and those belonging to the path of reform realize the reality of the scholar who acts upon his knowledge, calls to it, is patient with the harm he endures for it, and strives in His cause (mujāhid fī sabīlih). And [they should realize] the reality of the scholar who concealed what Allāh taught him, or worse, lied about Allāh and His Messenger and betrayed the trust.

Sufficient time has passed for testing, and the days have proven that the Council of Senior Scholars (Hay'at Kibār al-'Ulamā') and all those affiliated with it have not taken a single stance in support of the Da'wah or against injustice. All their positions have been recorded as being with injustice and tyranny and against the Da'wah. It is indeed foolishness and poor judgment for a person to seek protection from his enemy.

The problem with the members of the religious establishment is not mere incompetence. An incompetent person can admit his incompetence, say, "I am incompetent," resign, and leave it with a clean slate. But none of them has done so; had one done it, he would have achieved much good. Their problem, however, is their weighty, serious, and active standing with falsehood, supporting it with words, stances, fatāwā, and defending it by all possible means.

This discussion is not intended to say that so-and-so is righteous, so-and-so is among the people of Paradise, and so-and-so is among the people of Hellfire. Allāh knows best the hearts of people, their intentions, their motives, their deeds, and their final outcomes. However, what is intended is the practical aspect of the issue: who is the scholar that should be followed.

And it is as if, through this review, we have come to know the reality of the scholar who should be followed, and whether the members of the Council of Senior Scholars (Hay'at Kibār al-'Ulamā') deserve this attribute or not). End quote.

And in Newsletter (155), dated 9 Dhū al-Ḥijjah 1419 AH – April 5, 1999 CE, titled: 'An Open Letter to Shaykh 'Abd al-'Azīz ibn Bāz,' al-Faqīh said:

Allow us, Your Eminence the Shaykh, to review your record over the past years regarding the issue of conveying the message.

Many statements have been issued by you in which you praise the state and describe it with the best Shari‘ah-based descriptions, despite your full and detailed knowledge of what is happening in the country and all the details of the Shari‘ah violations committed by the regime at the state level and at the level of influential individuals.

Indeed, as those close to you know, you are far more knowledgeable about what is happening than even those who claim to be informed, because most people of reform convey their news, information, observations, and advice to you. We personally witnessed many sessions where the reality was laid out to you in detail, without ambiguity. Rather, we can say that the proof has been established against you, and responsibility has been cleared with you by a large number of Shaykhs, university professors, and reformers. The establishment of proof by detailing the reality to you has happened repeatedly by people whom you trust and whose words you accept. There is no greater evidence of this than the Memorandum of Advice (Mudhakkirat al-Naṣīḥah) that was presented to you and reviewed by the Quintipartite Committee and the Council of Senior Scholars (Hay’at Kibār al-‘Ulamā’), both of which you preside over. No one disputes that this memorandum is a proof against anyone who read it. We reckon that you cannot excuse yourselves by claiming that you only know what the regime informs you of. On the contrary, you have detailed knowledge of the situations, an 'obligatory awareness' forced upon you by a large number of Du‘āt, reformers, and students of knowledge. Therefore, you may be committing a grave error and a dangerous slip when you praise the state in this manner, while you currently know, and also know from your Shari‘ah knowledge, the seriousness of such an act. Someone like you is not unfamiliar with the writings and sayings of the scholars of the Da‘wah, especially Shaykh Muḥammad ibn ‘Abd al-Wahhāb. If you know with certainty that the regime rules by other than what Allāh has revealed, despite repeated warnings and advice, then what is your position on the statement of Muḥammad ibn ‘Abd al-Wahhāb about those who praise those who rule by other than what Allāh has revealed? He (may Allāh have mercy on him) said:

"Indeed, these ṭawāghīt, in whom people believe obedience is obligatory besides Allāh, are all disbelievers, apostates from Islam. How could they not be, when they permit what Allāh has forbidden and forbid what Allāh has permitted, and strive to spread corruption on earth through their words, actions, and support? And whoever argues on their behalf, or denies [the kufr of] those who declare them kuffār, or claims that this action of theirs, even if it were false, does not take them into kufr—the least that can be said of such an arguer is that he is a fāsiq (transgressor). For the Dīn of Islam is not sound except by disassociating from these individuals and declaring them kuffār." (Al-Rasā'il al-Shakhṣiyyah, p. 188).

If merely not declaring them kuffār is a major crime according to Shaykh Muḥammad ibn 'Abd al-Wahhāb, then what about one who describes them with the best descriptions of Islam, praises their state and system, and criticizes those who denounce them?

And you, Your Eminence the Shaykh, know with certainty that the regime has imposed ribā (usury) upon the people, established mighty edifices for it, supported it with the state treasury, and made the state's economy dependent on it. You know with certainty that the regime allies with the kuffār, supports them, aids them, seeks their help, empowers them, implements their plans, and conspires with them against the Muslims. You know with certainty that the regime encourages moral corruption and contributes to its spread through media and education, by supporting cells of corruption protected by the princes, and by restricting and obstructing the Da'wah. You know with certainty the crimes committed by the regime against the Du'āt and the war it wages against them through imprisonment, displacement, siege, and intimidation. Indeed, you are among the most knowledgeable of this because you are often the first to be informed about an arrest, a raid, a suspension, or similar incidents. You know with certainty the forms of injustice inflicted upon individuals, groups, and tribes by the regime as a system and by influential individuals within it, because many of the oppressed often seek refuge with you and write to you for help.

Your problem, Your Eminence the Shaykh, is not merely praising the regime. Rather, you have been forced into contradictions more than once due to accommodating the regime. Among the examples of this blatant contradiction is the fatwá prohibiting seeking assistance from non-Muslims, which was directed at Jamāl ‘Abd al-Nāṣir, in which you stated that such assistance is not permissible even in cases of necessity. Years passed, and the situation reversed; you not only permitted seeking assistance in necessity but considered it obligatory, and sinful for those who did not act upon it.

You repeatedly changed your fatwá to follow the ruler in the cases of Afghanistan and Yemen. This is in addition to the list of fatāwā issued by you according to the regime's desire, beginning with the fatwá to summon foreign troops, then the statement of the Council of Senior Scholars (Hay’at Kibār al-‘Ulamā’) against the 'Letter of Demands,' the Council's statement against the 'Memorandum of Advice,' the Council's statement against the 'Committee for the Defense [of Legitimate Rights],' the Council's statement ordering the arrest of the two Shaykhs, Salmān [al-‘Awdah] and Safar [al-Ḥawālī], in order to 'protect society from their errors,' and the recent fatāwā that deemed Americans as protected covenanters whose blood is inviolable, and considered killing them among the greatest forms of corruption on earth. Have you, I wonder, read the words of Shaykh al-Islām Ibn Taymiyyah concerning one who issues fatāwā contrary to the Book of Allāh and the Sunnah of His Messenger in agreement with the whim of the Sulṭān? He said in Al-Fatāwā: "And whenever a scholar abandons what he knows from the Book of Allāh and the Sunnah of His Messenger and follows the ruling of a ruler that contradicts the ruling of Allāh and His Messenger, he becomes an apostate, a disbeliever, deserving of punishment in this world and the Hereafter." (Al-Fatāwā, vol. 35, pp. 372-373).

Concealing knowledge is not concealing the Book and the Sunnah, for no one can conceal the Book and the Sunnah. Rather, it is failing to apply them correctly to the contemporary issues (Nawāzil) upon which a scholar is obliged to apply the texts. This is a grave crime if it is limited to mere concealment. So how much worse is it if he betrays the trust and lies about Allāh when conveying from Him something other than what He, the Glorified, intended in His Book and the Sunnah of His Messenger? These are the ones intended in the saying of Allāh the Exalted: {And recite to them the news of him to whom We gave Our signs, but he cast them away; so Satan pursued him, and he became of those who go astray. And if We had willed, We could have raised him thereby, but he clung to the earth and followed his own desire. So his example is like that of the dog: if you chase him, he lolls his tongue out, or if you leave him alone, he (still) lolls his tongue out. That is the example of the people who denied Our signs. So relate the stories that perhaps they will give thought.} (Al-A'rāf 7:175-176).

Your problem, Your Eminence the Shaykh, is not mere incompetence. An incompetent person can admit his incompetence, say, "I am incompetent," resign, and leave it with a clean slate. Your problem, however, is your weighty, serious, and active standing with falsehood, supporting it with words, stances, and fatāwā.

The time has come, as long as there is life remaining, for you to strive for a good ending and a good remembrance [after your death], after you fulfill the duty of reform and clarification. Have we not conveyed the message? O Allāh, bear witness). End quote.

I believe that these two testimonies are sufficient to define the official religious establishment of Saudi Arabia, from the words of some of its sincere and honorable members—and Allāh is their reckoner. The matter has now worsened, and discontented pens and tongues have multiplied within the Islamic Ṣaḥwah circles in Saudi Arabia. Whoever wants more on this can turn to internet sites where many of these scholars have found an outlet to proclaim the truth and express their opinions.

The Stance of the Sulṭān's Scholars in the Islamic World on the American Occupation of Iraq

When America invaded Iraq in March 2003, it had failed, despite a year of prior diplomatic efforts in international institutions and the United Nations, to obtain clear legitimacy for its invasion of Iraq. The inflammation of global public opinion in general, and Arab public opinion in particular, with feelings of rejection and resentment led to fear and panic among Arab rulers regarding the consequences of the occupation of Iraq. This was clearly evident in the media.

Furthermore, the American administration's declaration of its intention to target the political and geographical map of the Middle East confused Arab rulers due to fear for their thrones and their inability to confront America, having shackled themselves with what prevents them from doing so. Governments gave the green light to their media outlets, including mosque pulpits (manābir), to declare positions of rejection of the war in Iraq. This was the situation in the Arab and Islamic world generally, with the exception of Kuwait, which officially and practically declared its support for America and its war on Iraq. Nevertheless, America compelled seven Arab countries to open their lands, waters, and airspace for the aggression and to provide logistical services. Thus, Kuwait, Qatar, Bahrain, Oman, Saudi Arabia, Egypt, and Jordan provided their services, as did Pakistan. Turkey provided partial support as a result of refusal, reluctance, and coercion.

It appears that the Arab rulers were disgruntled by American recklessness, which disregarded their dignity and interests and failed to consider their capacity for relative collaboration or what the Arab street could tolerate of it. This was reflected in a tendency to turn a blind eye to some popular expressions of frustration, such as demonstrations and conferences, many of which ended with police and riot control forces killing some demonstrators and breaking the bones of others. This atmosphere also led the official religious establishment and semi-governmental mosques to experience a kind of "awakening of conscience," in which the sincerity and emotion of some scholars mixed with the rulers' desire to exert some pressure on America. Thus, we were surprised when the Shaykh of Al-Azhar, Sayyid Ṭanṭāwī, who had spent most of his time combating "terrorism," issued a fatwā at the beginning of the war declaring Jihād in Iraq, permitting martyrdom operations against the invading forces, and paving the way for demonstrations at Al-Azhar Mosque. He was followed, to our surprise, by the Muftī of the Nuṣayrī state in Syria, Aḥmad Kaftārū, who called on Muslim youth to carry out martyrdom operations. In this way, many scholars and leaders of the official and semi-official Saḥwah (Awakening) made themselves comfortable on satellite channels and began calling for Jihād.

Indeed, contingents of Mujāhid youth moved to Iraq under the eyes and ears of some Arab regimes, crossing into Iraq from Syria.

Soon, the war proceeded in its well-known fashion, and matters returned to their usual course, with scholars combating "terrorism" in the media alongside their governments and their master, America.

However, what is strikingly peculiar is that this temporary "awakening of conscience" did not affect the Saudi religious establishment. On the contrary, the efforts of Saudi scholars were focused on declaring the illegitimacy of Jihād in Iraq against America, both during and after the invasion. They proclaimed the invalidity of its banner and harped on the theme of recklessness that led people to Guantanamo. This harping even extended to independent scholars, prominent pioneers of the great Saḥwah. For example, Shaykh Salmān al-ʿAwdah surprised us with his "fiqh of the personal project" during an interview on an Arab satellite channel during the war. When asked about the legitimacy of going for Jihād in Iraq and whether it was an individual obligation (farīdah) because the enemy had occupied the heartland, he evaded the answer. Instead, he spoke to us of a strange matter: that if the enemy invades, it is not incumbent upon the entire Ummah to go and defend. Rather, everyone should be preoccupied with their "personal project," which might be da‘wah to Allāh, a university graduation project, publishing a magazine, a job, perhaps a marriage project, or even reading a book. He went so far as to say, even if the "personal project" was a session of contemplation!

I do not know contemplation of what?! Is it contemplation of honor being violated, or of lives being taken?! Or of Kufr (disbelief) flourishing all around him, even where he sits, prays, and contemplates?!

This was from one of the independent scholars, let alone the flood of fatāwā from the official imāms of the Two Holy Mosques and the "counter-terrorism jurists" on satellite channels – the scholars of the Sulṭān in Saudi Arabia.

And so it was. The evidence, as I said, could fill a large, independent "black book" on the role of the official religious establishment in Arab and Muslim lands in supporting the "Third Crusades" and combating those who resisted them. And to Allāh belongs the command, before and after!

Today, the official Saudi establishment is at the forefront of institutions lying in wait for Jihād and the Mujāhidīn, especially in Saudi Arabia. Matters have escalated to the opening of media centers to consolidate the efforts of thinkers and scholars in "combating terrorism," with the Saudi government and its client scholars believing that this will alter the plot America has hatched for the Saudi regime, which it has decreed for change, and for the map of the Arabian Peninsula, which it has decreed for division. The Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) spoke the truth when he said:

“Whoever aids an oppressor in his oppression, Allāh will give that oppressor power over him!”

In conclusion, I say:

Understanding the power equations in the conflict between Islām and Muslims on one side, and the Crusader campaigns on the other, constitutes a fundamental element of the Jihādī ‘aqīdah. It is a necessary foundation for seeking correct methods of resistance by which the Jihādī elite can lead the Ummah to stand with them in confronting these invading campaigns, performing this obligation (farīḍah), and ultimately achieving victory, by Allāh’s permission.

After reviewing the Crusader campaigns, especially the Second and Third, we move to the next chapter, which is a review of the history of the Islamic Saḥwah and its schools.

This Saḥwah bore the responsibility of confronting colonialism since the classical religious authority of the Muslims dissolved and lost its role in confronting it, after we were faced with rulers from our own kin, and scholars and Islamists at the forefront of their armies and security apparatuses. So, on to Chapter Five, by Allāh’s permission.

A Brief Overview of the Contemporary Islamic Saḥwah

(1930 - 2003 CE)

Allāh the Exalted said:

Abū Dāwūd narrated from Thawbān that the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) said: "The nations are about to call each other [to attack] you as diners call one another to a dish." Someone asked: "Will that be because of our small number at that time?" He said: "Rather, you will be numerous at that time, but you will be like scum, like the scum of the torrent. And Allāh will remove the fear of you from the hearts of your enemies and cast weakness (al-wahn) into your hearts." Someone asked: "O Messenger of Allāh, what is al-wahn?" He said: "Love of the world and hatred of death."

And the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) said: "Islām began as something strange and will return to being strange as it began, so glad tidings (ṭūbā) to the strangers."

The Ottoman Khilāfah officially fell in 1924, after a phase of decline that began in the early nineteenth century, and it had effectively died by the early twentieth century. The Crusader states had chipped away at its peripheries and then divided its legacy when this fall was declared.

The stirrings of an Islamic Saḥwah had begun to emerge since the mid-eighteenth century. Some of its pioneers attempted to restore and reform the Ottoman state, cooperating with its righteous elements and with the earnest reform efforts of Sultān ‘Abd al-Ḥamīd. However, "the perfumer could not mend what time had corrupted." The state fell, the colonial era began, and the Khilāfah has been absent ever since – for 79 years now. This earthquake triggered a reaction in the Islamic world, which resulted in the birth of an Islamic Saḥwah of diverse leanings and objectives, all ultimately seeking to restore the Khilāfah, reinstate Islamic rule, and achieve an Islamic renaissance (Nahḍah).

The most prominent emerging schools and centers of the Saḥwah were as follows:

- The Muslim Brotherhood School:

Founded by Shaykh Ḥasan al-Bannā (may Allāh have mercy on him) in 1928. It adopted the restoration of the Khilāfah as its slogan and goal. Ḥasan al-Bannā summarized his movement's program and method in his saying and slogan:

"Allāh is our objective. The Messenger is our role model. The Qur'ān is our constitution. Jihād is our path. Death in the way of Allāh is our highest aspiration."

The Muslim Brotherhood spread throughout Egypt, entering most of its cities and villages, and became the largest of the contemporary groups in Egypt and its surroundings. Within a short period, it spread to the Levant. A number of Islamic societies and movements joined it, and it attracted many cadres and personalities, growing until its base numbered in the tens of thousands. It then expanded to various Arab and Islamic countries, where groups emerged either under the same name or local names, but all originating from the same principles and based on the same foundations. The methodology of the Muslim Brotherhood's da'wah can be summarized as a movement that combined some Salafī ideas, some Ṣūfī principles, a Jihādī inclination, and an organizational activist structure, along with clear political orientations, in addition to features of nationalist spirit and patriotic sentiment. Depending on the circumstances of each country, the Brotherhood engaged in political activity and contested elections. They had Jihādī contributions in Palestine and against the English in Egypt. Over time, they developed their own shaykhs, writings, and extensive library. They also adopted a distinct methodology (manhaj) that evolved over time, its features changing, and they practiced education (tarbiyah) and da‘wah accordingly.

The Muslim Brotherhood movement is rightly considered, as they call it, the "mother group" for most political fundamentalist movements, and even many Jihādī movements, in the Arab and Islamic world. The Muslim Brotherhood gave birth to movements with other names, and youth gatherings adopted its ideology, giving themselves local names, but they were all groups that emerged from the same "cloak."

Among those groups that emerged independently in their respective countries following this model were: - The Sudanese National Front - The Islamic Tendency Movement in Tunisia, which later changed its name to the Ennahda Movement - The Hamas Movement in Algeria, founded by Mahfoud Nahnah, which transformed into the Movement of Society for Peace - The Algerian Renaissance Movement - The Reform and Renewal Movement in Morocco - The Islamic Vanguard Movement, founded by Shaykh Issam al-Attar in Germany, which spread among immigrants and students in Europe, and so on.

- Movements ideologically close to the Muslim Brotherhood's methodology: In some countries of the Islamic world, such as the Salvation Party in Turkey (which changed its name to the Welfare Party, then the Virtue Party), the Jamā‘at-e-Islāmī in Pakistan, and similar groups in Muslim Southeast Asia.
- Ḥizb ut-Taḥrīr al-Islāmī (The Islamic Liberation Party):
Founded by the Palestinian Shaykh Muḥammad an-Nabhānī. It originated in Jordan and Palestine, and Ḥizb ut-Taḥrīr spread in the 1940s. It also raised the slogan of the Khilāfah but was distinguished by being more inclined towards political education and guidance. It proposed the theory of establishing the Islamic State after securing support (nuṣrah) and power (shawkah) for the da‘wah, which should migrate to a place where this could be achieved. It made Jihād contingent upon achieving this, leaned towards clandestine work, and adopted the principle of coup d'état in some countries.

- Educational Reformist Schools:

These adopted the spread of religious awareness and scholarly grounding to rebuild the infrastructure in Muslim societies, such as the Association of Muslim ‘Ulamā’ in Algeria. These schools prepared the ground for a political vision based on the concept of civilizational and civil resistance to colonialism, leading to qualifying the people for Jihād.

- Tablīghī Jamā‘at and Da‘wah Groups:

And similar groups in method and approach. These movements originated in the Indian subcontinent. Their idea is based on reforming the individual Muslim at the level of worship (‘ibādāt) and conduct, establishing a foundation of Sharī‘ah basics, and dedicating oneself to this, away from the arenas and clashes of politics, so that the movement can spread without hindrance from authorities. The movement expanded and gained millions of followers and devotees (murīdīn). Its core idea is that its affiliate dedicates a part of his time—daily, weekly, monthly, and annually—to go out fī sabīl Allāh (in the path of Allāh) on da‘wah journeys from mosque to mosque, where they meet people and call them to righteousness, religion, and commitment.

- Salafī Movements and Schools of Ahl al-Ḥadīth:

These movements found that many innovations (bida‘) had infiltrated the beliefs of Muslims, while many Sunnahs had been abandoned in their place. They perceived that the extent of polytheistic practices (shirkīyyāt) and deviations had nullified the original, correct creed for most Muslims, to the point where they were almost outside its principles. They believed the path to success (falāḥ) lay primarily in calling for the purification and correction of Tawḥīd as the basis for reforming the individual and society, which would automatically lead to society becoming qualified for the establishment of Islamic rule. Most Salafī movements in the Arab and Islamic world resembled a scholarly, educational method. The adoption by the Third Saudi State, led by ‘Abd al-‘Azīz and his allies thereafter, of the Wahhābī da‘wah to "trade with it" (exploit it for political gain) in the Arabian Peninsula—a story touched upon in previous chapters—led to an alliance between the governmental and private religious establishment and the government. This contributed to an active movement of teaching in universities and the establishment of official and private societies and institutions to spread the da‘wah and the ideas of its founder, his descendants, and subsequent scholars of the da‘wah. It also led to the revival of the heritage of Shaykh Ibn Taymiyyah and other imāms of the Salafī da‘wah, such as Ibn al-Qayyim, al-Shāṭibī, and others. The publication of these works and those based on them further increased the spread of the Salafī da‘wah and the schools of Ahl al-Ḥadīth in the Arab and Islamic world. Indeed, Allāh may support this religion with a dissolute man and with people who have no share [of good].

Subsequently, new movements were born through the merging of ideas from different movements. Thus, the movement called "Surūrism" (Surūriyyah), named after one of its proponents, emerged, representing a blend of the Muslim Brotherhood's activist thought and Salafī orientation. Similarly, the current known as "al-Salafiyyah al-Jihādiyyah" (Jihādī Salafism) was born, a branch of Quṭbist thought and Salafī da‘wah – contemporary schools born from older ones. Likewise, some activist Ṣūfī groups emerged, blending spiritual education (tarbiyah), Sufism, and political orientations, as seen in North Africa and elsewhere.

During this period (1930 - 2000) that we are briefly analyzing, some Jihādī Ṣūfī movements also emerged, such as those that arose in the Indian subcontinent, Central Russia, and North Africa during this period.

Thus, many Islamic preachers (du‘āt), scholars (‘ulamā’), orators (khuṭabā’), writers, and thinkers influenced the paths of the Saḥwah according to their activities and contributions. Phenomena of religiosity and a return to commitment spread, such as the prevalence of the ḥijāb and beards, and other manifestations of observance. The printing, publishing, and trade of various Islamic books flourished, as did the publication of Islamic magazines and newspapers. Many mosques became active with da‘wah, circles of knowledge (‘ilm), remembrance (dhikr), and reform. Private institutions and societies engaged in various forms of righteousness (birr) and piety (taqwā). Various types of Islamists, both groups and individuals, entered the arena of political, intellectual, and literary life. Numerous violent clashes also occurred between Islamists and some governments. In short, the phenomenon of the Islamic Saḥwah imposed itself on Muslim societies and became a prominent landmark in their contemporary history.

The Main Phases of the Islamic Saḥwah:

The path of the Islamic Saḥwah, from its inception to the present day, can be distinguished into four main phases in terms of its activist and methodological structure, performance, and general characteristics in each stage:

The First Phase (1930 - 1965): The Emergence Phase

This can be called the (Pre-Crystallization) phase. The most important characteristic of this phase is that the general features of the Saḥwah were mixed in terms of methodological composition, especially in its mainstream current, such as the Muslim Brotherhood movement. In it and similar movements, Ṣūfī influences, stemming from the classical structure of the Ummah's religious authority during the Ottoman era, were mixed with Salafī influences that arrived with the winds of renewal (tajdīd) and reform (iṣlāḥ), the most prominent of which was the birth and spread of the Wahhābī da‘wah in the Arabian Peninsula since the eighteenth century, and the contemporary proponents of this school in other regions. This was blended with nationalist sentiments that appeared in the late Ottoman Empire as a reaction to the policy of "Turkification" that characterized its final period, which spurred other peoples, especially Arabs and others, towards nationalist fervor (‘aṣabiyyah) and rallying around it. The schools and trends of the Ṣaḥwah were also characterized by inflamed national sentiment because the phase was one of confronting colonialism. It was also marked by the method of education (tarbiyah) and behavioral reform.

This period was relatively rich in foundational writings for these schools. Most symbols and groups of the Ṣaḥwah also practiced Jihād in one form or another against the colonizers, either through armed Jihād or through civil resistance and political action.

The Second Phase (1965 - 1990): Crystallization and Differentiation of the Ṣaḥwah movements:

This occurred during the post-independence phase under national governments characterized by secularism and subservience to colonialism after its departure, as we discussed in previous chapters. The winds of Westernization blew, and the frenzy of intellectual invasion was unleashed, spreading secular doctrines, nationalist and patriotic currents, and Western-originated political and intellectual schools such as democracy, socialism, capitalism, communism, and others. Due to the establishment of governments based on concepts contradicting Dīn and their natural clash with various schools of the Ṣaḥwah (Awakening) – which had played the primary role in confronting colonialism – these secular currents were able to reap the fruits of the efforts of those Ṣaḥwah movements and the peoples who had waged Jihād against colonialism under the banner of Islām. Methodological problems arose for the Ṣaḥwah as a result of the new situation, along with Fiqhī (jurisprudential) issues requiring it to define a political, Sharīʿah-based, and practical stance. The rulers were outwardly Muslims, but in reality, they governed by other than what Allāh revealed. They and their aides killed those who enjoined justice among the people. They allied with the kuffār and assisted them against the Muslims! Parts of Muslim lands remained occupied, especially Palestine with its chronic problem and the treacherous stance of the governments towards it. There was the issue of clashing with the authorities versus appeasing them, separating from them versus making peace with them, or disassociating from them and confronting them. Or was it to engage with them through the gateway of "legitimate," "legal," and "constitutional" practices? These circumstances forced the Ṣaḥwah to differentiate its ranks and crystallize based on its position on these issues and its method of dealing with the apostate, ruling, tyrannical authorities. Among the intellectual and ʿaqīdah (creedal) issues raised... the Ṣaḥwah thus split into four main schools. The Ṣaḥwah continued to grow and contribute, but through differentiation in its structure and methodologies. These schools are:

1. Non-political Ṣaḥwah

These are the schools, currents, and groups that saw safety for the path of Daʿwah and its adherents in shunning politics and working through Daʿwah and reform, each according to its capacity. Despite the differing, and perhaps entirely contradictory, perspectives of each of these schools, they converged on the point of shunning politics and staying away from its arena in the face of the problems confronting the Ummah. Among these non-political schools were most Ṣūfī movements, their mosques, and their leaders, who returned to adopting the principle of behavioral upbringing, ‘ibādah (worship), and rectifying the individual's relationship with their Lord. This reached a point where one of their major figures in Bilād al-Shām – the Shaykh of the Qādiriyyah ṭarīqah in Syria and its surroundings at the time – would instruct his followers upon joining the ṭarīqah to pray two rak‘ahs he had innovated for them, in which the worshipper would make the intention, saying: "I pray to Allāh the Exalted two rak‘ahs, the sunnah of abandoning politics... Allāhu Akbar," and then begin the ṣalāh.

Among these non-political schools is Jamā‘at al-Tablīgh wa al-Da‘wah, with its branches, mosques, callers, and itinerant followers in the path of Da‘wah. Their guides and officials ensure that politics and its issues do not seep into their mosques and conferences!!

Also participating in shunning politics were the schools termed "al-Salafiyyah al-‘Ilmiyyah" (Scientific Salafism), which dedicated themselves to correcting ‘aqā’id (creeds) and striving to spread Sharī‘ah knowledge, particularly in Ḥadīth and its sciences, ‘aqā’id and its branches, and other areas of Sharī‘ah sciences based on that. From this emerged the school of Shaykh al-Albānī under the slogan "al-Taṣfiyah wa al-Tarbiyah" (Purification and Education).

Among the schools that turned to thought, research, and education was what came to be known as "al-Quṭbiyyah" (Qutbism) – specifically, "al-Quṭbiyyah al-‘Ilmiyyah al-Salafiyyah" (Scientific Salafi Qutbism). This school adopted the intellectual methodology of Professor Muḥammad Quṭb and many intellectual aspects of his brother, the Shahīd (martyr) Sayyid Quṭb (may Allāh have mercy on him), while setting aside his political, activist methodology. Some of these schools were characterized by quasi-activist educational Ṣūfism, such as Jamā‘at al-‘Adl wa al-Iḥsān in Morocco, and similar groups. I draw attention here to what I mentioned in the introduction: I am not here to present a critical study from methodological and structural aspects, nor to list positives and negatives, but rather to provide a general classification.

As I said, these schools, despite their differences and contradictions, converged on an idea summarized as follows:

Changing the conditions and reviving the Ummah depends on reforming the individual. If the individual is reformed, society will be reformed, and its rulers will be reformed – “As you are, so will you be ruled.” As for the Ummah's local and external problems, they have no concern with them, “and none but Allāh can avert it”!

As for the differences between these various schools in the method of reforming the individual: one sees it as behavioral, another as creedal, educational, or intellectual, and so on. These trends were unable to present a logical vision for a mechanism that would generate a solution to the existing problems through this upbringing, nor its duration or stages. The most that the esteemed Professor Muḥammad Quṭb expressed in one of his books in the early nineties, titled Ḥawla Taṭbīq al-Sharīʿah (Regarding the Application of Sharīʿah), after presenting the method of تربية (upbringing) for the "solid base," was, as I recall him stating: "And when the solid base extends and becomes a hard nut that resists breaking... one day... Allāh's relief will come to it, and its state will be established, and then people will enter Allāh's Dīn in droves...!!!"

As for Shaykh al-Albānī – "and I am still in the process of definition and example, not evaluation and commentary" – his last fatāwā condemned Jihād and the Mujāhidīn in confronting governments, with his famous fatwā: "Revolting against the rulers in this era is, in reality, revolting against Islām!!!!" Similarly, the propositions of Ṣūfī and reformist groups also revolve in the realms of the unseen regarding change and its mechanism. It seems to me that the brutality of governments and their way of dealing with the Ṣaḥwah in all countries in the late fifties and early sixties contributed significantly to the formulation of the non-political schools of the Ṣaḥwah, although one cannot deny that sincerity and concern for the safety of the Da‘wah and its adherents were often the reason behind this methodology. And Allāh the Exalted knows best.

2. Political Ṣaḥwah

These schools of the Ṣaḥwah were, from their outset, in complete contrast to the previous ones. These groups described the situation more accurately. They said that the Ummah's problems, whether internal or external in origin, are political problems, and solutions must be sought through the practice of politics.

Furthermore, it is an injustice, and even a creedal error, to remove politics from Dīn under any pretext. The solution is not to shun politics to avoid clashing with authorities and their brutality, but rather to storm the political arena through the legitimate and legal channels provided by the authorities, each according to its context. This is done by forming Islamic political parties, political and semi-political associations, engaging in intellectual, literary, and political activity, entering the electoral and democratic arena if available, or infiltrating the apparatuses of authorities and oppositions as feasible and according to the conditions of each country. The banners of this political Ṣaḥwah were carried by al-Ikhwān al-Muslimūn (Muslim Brotherhood) parties and similar groups, and movements that emerged from them, whether under the same name or local designations. This phase (1965-1990), and perhaps a little earlier in countries that gained independence early like Egypt, Syria, Pakistan, and Turkey, witnessed many experiments in "Islamic" democracies! These experiments continued into the early nineties and persist, but after the establishment of the New World Order, they entered a new phase which we will discuss later, Inshā'Allāh. Among these political experiments are:

- The experience of al-Ikhwān al-Muslimūn and Islamists in parliamentary elections in Syria shortly after independence in 1946 until the early fifties, leading to the era of military coups in the mid-fifties and early sixties.
- The experience of elections and parliamentary life in the last days of the monarchy in Egypt before ‘Abd al-Nāṣir's coup in 1952.

Political life in most of the Arab and Islamic world then witnessed a phase of military and party dictatorships during the sixties and seventies. This phase was a period of collision between the Ṣaḥwah and the authorities. Most du‘āt (callers), and even politicians among them, spent a portion of their lives in prisons, emerging with more developed democratic ideas.

Anwar al-Sādāt's era in Egypt saw an opening after he succeeded ‘Abd al-Nāṣir in the early seventies. He opened prison doors for Islamists to counter the growing leftist tide, so al-Ikhwān and other Ṣaḥwah figures entered party political life in Egypt.

- Then, King Ḥusayn in Jordan licensed al-Ikhwān and a number of Islamic groups to operate, and this developed in the late eighties into participation in parliamentary life. Some even entered the government and ministries.
- In the monarchies of the Gulf, the Arabian Peninsula, and Morocco, Islamists and some Ṣaḥwah schools formed part of the royal authority's entourage, especially in Saudi Arabia.
- Kuwait then began its parliamentary experiment as the first Gulf state where Islamists entered political life as parties.
- The Islamic Tendency in Tunisia, led by al-Ghannūshī, also underwent a tragic experience.

- The National Islamic Front in Sudan, led by al-Turābī, allied with Ja‘far al-Numayrī and became part of the government, then led a coup and ruled Sudan, then returned to the opposition.
- Similarly, al-Ikhwān al-Muslimūn and their counterparts in the Ṣaḥwah current had their parliamentary party experience in Yemen.
- However, the most prominent Arab democratic experiment was what happened in Algeria after the opening initiated by President al-Shādhilī and the rise of the Islamic Salvation Front (FIS), whose experience serves as a highly significant lesson.
- On the Islamic level, the most prominent experiment, and closest to the Arab world, was that of Jamā‘at-e-Islāmī in Pakistan. It entered the democratic party experiment early on and continues to this day.
- Likewise, the experience of the National Salvation Party (Millî Selamet Partisi) in Turkey since the sixties, which brought its leader Erbakan to power twice: first as Deputy Prime Minister in the mid-sixties, and the second, more importantly, in 1996 when it won a parliamentary majority and Erbakan became Prime Minister in 1995. In both instances, the military overthrew the experiment.

Overall, most Islamist contributions to political life remained in the opposition, forming a small part of its strength in legislative parliaments. In rare cases, they reached executive power, as in (Jordan, Algeria, Turkey), but in all cases, their claws were clipped, and they were distanced from the centers of influence and decision-making.

- With the beginning of the nineties, many non-political schools – Ṣūfī, Salafī, Tablīgh wa al-Da‘wah, and others – followed their predecessors from al-Ikhwān and their counterparts into parliamentary practice. Democracy infiltrated most components of the Islamic Ṣaḥwah, as we shall see, and we will comment on this experience in the following section, Inshā' Allāh.

3. Jihādī Ṣaḥwah

Shortly after the establishment of post-independence governments on the basis of ruling by other than what Allāh revealed and allegiance to the Eastern and Western colonial powers that appointed them, various segments of the Ṣaḥwah clashed with them. Most governments practiced a policy of oppression, killing, imprisonment, and abuse. These conditions began to interact and reinforce their consequences on all levels of political, economic, and social life. The seeds of revolution against that reality and the motivations for Jihād began to form in the thought of the Islamic Ṣaḥwah.

In the early sixties, a number of early thinkers and du'āt concluded that the Ummah's problems were longstanding: foremost among them was the rule of kufr (disbelief) and allegiance to enemies, not to mention aggression, injustice, occupation, plunder of wealth, and so on and so forth. These are problems whose persistence the enemy guards through its deputies with the force of arms, iron, and fire, prison chains, and executioners' whips. They concluded that the requirement of Allāh's Dīn in such circumstances is for Jihād to be a farḍ 'ayn (individual obligation) – firstly, to establish the rule of Allāh in the land, and secondly, in defense of the Dīn, lives, wealth, and honor. Thus, the harbingers of Jihādī thought began to form, مطرحing concepts like Ḥākimiyyah (Allāh's sovereignty), al-Walā' wa al-Barā' (allegiance and disavowal), differentiation, and separation.

The undisputed pioneer of this Ṣaḥwah was the master and teacher Sayyid Quṭb (may Allāh have mercy on him). Professor Abū al-A'ālā al-Mawdūdī (may Allāh have mercy on him) in Pakistan also made a unique contribution. Contributions followed, and the primary foundation for activist Jihādī thought was formed, which soon spread, and its nuclei began to form in Egypt, then al-Shām (the Levant), then North Africa, and elsewhere. Experiments followed, as will be detailed somewhat in the next two chapters, Inshā'Allāh.

4. Deviant and Aberrant Ṣaḥwah

As a result of the clashes between the various preceding schools of the Ṣaḥwah and the ṭawāghīt (tyrants) of the Arabs and non-Arabs among the rulers of Muslim lands, a deviant, aberrant current was born in those tragic circumstances, represented by what became known as the current of Takfīr (excommunication), or al-Takfīr wa al-Hijrah (Excommunication and Migration), as the media named it. It initially emerged in Egypt, but its seeds were found in every environment whose conditions resembled the period in which it was born there.

Most rulers openly displayed various forms of kufr (disbelief) and riddah (apostasy), from ruling and legislating by other than what Allāh revealed to allegiance to the kuffār, and other consequences thereof. These rulers employed police, aides, intelligence agencies, security forces, and oppressive apparatuses. Governments established prisons and torture chambers without accountability or oversight. Each ruler also propped himself up with a crutch of "soothsayers and magicians" (compliant scholars) who would testify to his ranks of Islām, Īmān (faith), and Iḥsān (excellence), and to the legitimacy of his regime, bestowing upon him the rights due to a legitimate Sharʿī ruler. Meanwhile, many figures of the political and non-political Ṣaḥwah inclined towards sycophancy and faltered in speaking the truth. Some even dared to enter the structures and apparatuses of power. The Ṣaḥwah was characterized by an inability to confront that reality, while at the same time, most of the Ummah's populace was immersed in a consumerist, heedless, and frivolous life. Naturally, among the youth of the Ṣaḥwah were those who possessed fervent enthusiasm and intense jealousy for Allāh's Dīn, matched by their share of ignorance of the sciences of Dīn, its principles, and its regulations, as well as a lack of experience in Fiqh al-Wāqī‘ (understanding of reality) and its data.

One of them would look at a kāfir ruler, and a jailer violating honor, shedding blood, and cursing Allāh, His Messenger, and His Dīn without shame or fear. The tormented youth saw that there was no doubt these were kuffār – and undoubtedly, this was a correct conclusion. Then the youth looked at hypocritical ‘ulamā’ (scholars) who knew all this yet testified to its legitimacy and justified it. They said, there is no doubt about the kufr of these who concealed what Allāh revealed and exchanged it for a paltry price. Then they looked at incapable, sycophantic, and retreating Ṣaḥwah leaders. They asked them about this kufr and its rulings, and the ruling on those who perpetrated it. The du‘āt and Ṣaḥwah leaders condemned this misguidance as fisq (transgression) and ḡulm (injustice), but they did not dare, or did not conclude, to declare it kufr. So they judged these regimes and their apparatuses as Islamic, merely unjust and transgressive. Here, an intellectual shock occurred in the minds of some youth, so they applied the known principle, "Whoever does not declare a kāfir to be a kāfir is himself a kāfir," at all levels, ignorant that this principle applies to the kufr of one whose disbelief is unanimously agreed upon without interpretation or deduction, such as Jews, Christians, and Magians. They misapplied it to anyone who did not declare those rulers kuffār, and the wretched chain (of Takfīr) continued. So, anyone who did not declare kāfir those whom they declared kāfir, has himself become a kāfir...

Due to a lack of knowledge, coupled with fervor, tension, and prison conditions, the ideology of Takfīr was born. And due to ignorance and for the same aforementioned reasons, they differed on the limits of Takfīr, so they declared each other kuffār. From here, various schools and groups emerged, differing in the principles of Takfīr and their expansion of it...

On the periphery of these ideas, these individuals looked at societies and the vices and corruption in which most people were immersed. Thus, the idea of the jāhiliyyah of these societies was born. Then, some of them declared these societies kuffār because they appeased their rulers, did not bother to learn their Dīn, and fell into nullifiers of faith due to their ignorance and lack of effort to understand their Dīn. The idea of separating from these societies to live in isolated communities, where the inhabitants would raise themselves and their children on Dīn and virtue, was proposed, giving birth to the idea of Hijrah... This was often compounded by isolation, ignorance, and the injustice they suffered from the authorities and their scholars, then from the Ṣaḥwah and its leadership, and then from the people and society... Thus, the phenomenon worsened... The angles of deviation within it varied... Some of these groups considered themselves "the Jamā'ah of Muslims" and declared all others kuffār... Others hesitated due to some knowledge they possessed or some fear of piously issuing a ruling of Takfīr, so they began to research the excuses of ignorance to mitigate these rulings for some. Opinions differed in interpreting the texts of early scholars regarding the excuse of ignorance, its limits, and its conditions. So, they issued rulings at times and paused for clarification at others, giving birth to what are called "At-Tawaqquf wa at-Tabayyun" (Suspension and Verification) groups... The seventies and eighties witnessed the availability of growth factors for these deviant currents, which harmed Islam, Muslims, the Ṣaḥwah, and themselves. They provided a golden opportunity for the enemy to undermine the popularity of the Jihādī current and the entire Islamic Ṣaḥwah, as the government accused anyone they wished to destroy of belonging to this despised current, which was isolated by the common Muslims, both righteous and corrupt.

This is a summary of the story of Takfīr within the Ṣaḥwah circles, where the equation for its generation can be summarized as follows:

A kāfir oppressive ruler + a murderous criminal executioner + a scholar hypocritically subservient to the Sultan + an incapable Ṣaḥwah + a populace largely overcome by corruption + enthusiastic, ignorant, oppressed youth = ... the birth of the Takfir current.

And as is always the way of Shayṭān... some leaders of this current sought some knowledge and returned to searching the books of the ancients for what would support their principles and ideas. Thus, this current came to have its deviant emirs and fuqahā' and its misguided publications... Violence became predominant among its followers in all situations. Intelligence agencies lured some of them, where they found an outlet for indulging in the blood of innocents, then the blood of each other, and the blood of those whom the intelligence agencies wanted to draw in to destroy them, and to destroy Jihād, the Ṣaḥwah, and the future of Islam as they wished, as will be detailed somewhat in the upcoming two chapters, inshā'Allāh.

Thus, these four schools of the Ṣaḥwah crystallized. With increased communication during this period through all means of contact, these schools spread in Arab countries according to their precedence in gaining independence and the spread of the Ṣaḥwah within them. They also spread in some countries neighboring the Arab world, such as Turkey, Pakistan, and parts of Africa... As a result of the massive wave of emigration that pushed millions of young Muslim students and workers to diaspora communities in Europe, America, Australia, Canada, and elsewhere... many cadres, leaders, and du'āt of the Islamic Ṣaḥwah from its various schools emigrated to Western countries and others, as a result of oppression and persecution. They established Islamic centers and mosques. Many community groups and institutions also went there without coercion, but rather with the intention of spreading da'wah and Islam. So these four Ṣaḥwah schools spread within the diaspora communities. As a result of the available freedom and the availability of means of communication and publication... Ṣaḥwah centers in the West contributed to re-exporting their developed thought and experiences. They came to have their own newspapers, magazines, and means of communication, and the Islamic Şaḥwah in the diaspora became an important part that contributed to advancing its course, enriching it, and increasing its contributions on all levels. The West and diaspora communities also became a stage for the presence of all Şaḥwah schools found in the Islamic world.

The Third Phase (1990-2000): The Crisis Stage

The last decade of the twentieth century, following the launch of the New World Order, was a critically important juncture in the history of the Islamic Şaḥwah, with all its four schools and the various aspects within each school. It was also a period of our confrontation with the ṭawāghīt of Arab and Muslim lands. As we indicated in the previous chapter, the beginning of this decade witnessed the launch of the New World Order and its selection of Islam, and the Islamic Şaḥwah in particular, as a strategic, civilizational, doctrinal, and even military adversary to Western civilization, after its leadership had passed to America and its followers from NATO European countries.

The policy of the West in confronting the Şaḥwah, through the agency of rulers and their various apparatuses during this decade, can be summarized in the following brief points. We will list them and then follow with a summary of the trajectory of each of the four aforementioned schools: the Apolitical, the Political, the Jihādī, and the Takfirī. The confrontation by rulers and the West against the Şaḥwah was characterized by the following:

1. Striking the Jihādī trend of the Şaḥwah by promoting its "moderate" counterpart, as defined by their standards.
2. Expanding the base of "moderate" fundamentalism (according to their concept) by widening the door of democratic participation for Islamists to enter state institutions, in order to achieve the aforementioned goal in the previous point.

3. Assisting the Takfīr current to emerge and cloning takfīrī seeds under intelligence sponsorship. And adopting a media policy to conflate Takfīr with Jihād in order to isolate the Jihādīs from the Ummah and cause discord between them. This was applied in Algeria (1993-1997) and succeeded...
4. Launching an "American-style Islamists" campaign through the media in an onslaught of Westernization and moral decay, in order to dismantle the fundamentalist roots of Islam that ensure the generation of seeds of resistance.
5. Launching a security "counter-terrorism" campaign against the Jihādī current.
6. Launching a political and media "counter-terrorism" campaign against the Jihādī current, using the official religious establishment as a primary front, supported by sectors of "moderate Islam."

Let us examine the impact of these confrontational policies on the trajectory of each of the four Ṣaḥwah schools during the last decade of the 20th century.

1. The Non-Political Ṣaḥwah (1990-2000)

Perhaps the most prominent features of what befell the schools of this Ṣaḥwah – such as some Sufi, Salafi, Da‘wah, and reformist schools – during this decade are two:

The first: The politicization of many of its figures and groups over time, and their entry into partisan and parliamentary work through the doors of democracy, which governments opened wide to achieve the ulterior goal of fragmenting the Ṣaḥwah and making its three other schools stand in a state of siege and confrontation against the Jihādī current. Many figures from Sufism, Tablīgh, and Salafism entered the democratic and electoral field, either as independents or as parliamentary blocs and gatherings in various Arab and Islamic countries that opened this path.

The second: The revival of the doctrine of Irjā' with a contemporary political dimension and identity among the various schools of this Şaḥwah, despite their doctrinal contradictions, from the furthest extents of Sufism to the furthest extents of Salafism. This involved redirecting focus towards the ruler's declared Islam and Īmān, and separating this identity of his from his method of governance, policies, and public and private practices.

The aim, it seems, was to lift the Shar'ī impediment to participating in the government's legislative, executive, and judicial institutions, an impediment caused by declaring such participation as upholding kufr.

Thus, the base of these schools, in their apolitical capacity, began to shrink. They began to practically overlap in their political, and consequently Shar'ī, propositions with the other school (the Political Şaḥwah) that had preceded them in these practices by several decades. These blocs formed a real competitor within the ranks of the Islamic Şaḥwah to the political school of the Muslim Brotherhood and their likes in some countries, especially when some of them entered into electoral alliances with secular currents!!!!. In other cases, numerous alliances occurred between the two Islamic schools (the newly politicized and the originally political) to form large Islamic blocs and working fronts to confront the ruling political current or the secular opposition.

2. The Political Şaḥwah (1990-2000)

The period (1970-1990) witnessed an increase in the intensity of confrontations between various Şaḥwah schools and Arab and Islamic governments and their security agencies. This included military clashes of Jihādīs with governments, as happened in Syria, Lebanon, Egypt, Libya, Algeria, and elsewhere, or the clashes of political du‘āt and some prominent scholars and preachers with governments... These confrontations resulted in the expansion of the Islamic Ṣaḥwah's popularity in general, and the spread of Jihādī thought and its popular base in particular. As I mentioned, governments, their Western advisors, and those managing the present and future of those regimes saw that matters were heading towards a dangerous point. So, the cunning plan their minds concocted, after the phase of filling prisons and mass graves with Islamists, was political openness towards them. Rulers thus made way for Islamists to enter the game of democracy and participate in it, either as Islamists, or under the banners of licensed secular parties... or as independents. This decade (1990-2000) witnessed a significant shift in the practices and methodologies of the Muslim Brotherhood and its affiliated schools in order to justify those political practices. Many books and research papers were authored. Articles were written and enthusiastic speeches were delivered encouraging this direction, advocating for taking advantage of "legitimate channels" and "available opportunities," and so on with such justifications... The Muslim Brotherhood, its branches, and some other Islamic blocs participated in municipal elections in most Arab and Islamic countries. They also participated in parliamentary elections, as happened in Jordan, Egypt, Lebanon, and Kuwait... They entered semi-governmental institutions in Saudi Arabia and the Gulf states in various capacities. The parliamentary experiment was launched in Tunisia and Morocco, as well as Mauritania and Algeria at the end of that past decade. Similar developments occurred in most countries of the Islamic world, notably the most famous of those experiments in Pakistan and Turkey...

The most important of these experiments, in terms of their scale and political significance, were what occurred in Tunisia, Pakistan, then Algeria, and finally Turkey... whereby the authorities, at the end of this decade and the end of the 20th century, became convinced of the necessity of closing this door and returning to confrontation with all schools of the Ṣaḥwah using an eradicationist approach, as we will see, inshā'Allāh, in paragraph (Fourthly) concerning the stages of the Ṣaḥwah. However, it is worth mentioning here that the methodologies of the Muslim Brotherhood and its branches of Islamic movements witnessed an overturning of many fundamentals of the methodology built on the ideas of its early founders like Ḥasan al-Bannā, 'Abd al-Qādir 'Awdah, and especially Sayyid Quṭb (may Allāh the Exalted have mercy on them). The angle of methodological deviation widened due to loitering at the gates of Sultans and accepting positions in their secular institutions, which are based on the principles of apostasy, legislation without Allāh's permission, and allegiance to disbelievers and enemies of this Ummah...

We will address the issue of democracy in more detail and its impact in Chapter Eight, inshā'Allāh.

3. The Jihādī Ṣaḥwah (1990-2000)

The Jihādī Ṣaḥwah – as we will see in the next chapter in some detail, inshā'Allāh – had engaged in real and extensive confrontations with some governments during the seventies and eighties. In these, it suffered many casualties, its popular base expanded, and it became subject to security pursuits of an intelligence nature... The Afghan gateway, opened for Jihād since the year (1984) for the Islamic Ṣaḥwah in general and the Jihādī Ṣaḥwah in particular, had tempted most of its leaders to go to Afghanistan, where they underwent a unique experience during (1984-1992). The security storm orchestrated by America, executed by Pakistan, and followed up by Arab and European countries shortly after the fall of the Soviet Union and the end of America's need for Islamist support against the Russians, resulted in the dispersal of most Jihādī cadres and those wanted by security services in their home countries (due to their clashes with their governments). They sought political asylum in Western Europe and similar places like Canada, Australia, etc., or moved to other Arab countries where their governments' hands could not reach them due to the lack of security cooperation agreements between those countries at the time...

However, successive American administrations after the Second Gulf War ("Desert Storm") laid out a comprehensive plan to confront the Jihādī current, termed the "International Confrontation to Combat Terrorism," which George W. Bush escalated into a real global war after September 2001, as we will see, inshā'Allāh...

The global counter-terrorism program during this decade can be summarized in the following points:

- Broad Outlines of Global Counter-Terrorism Programs 1990-2000:

1. Drying up financial sources.
2. Targeting Jihādī leaders and cadres with killing and capture.
3. Extradition agreements and exchange of "terrorist criminals" (Jihādīs) between different countries.
4. Eliminating safe havens and shelters for Jihādīs.
5. Shifting security cooperation from regional to international levels.
6. Expanding counter-terrorism legislation.
7. Media warfare to defame and isolate the Mujāhidīn.

Thus, this global campaign to combat terrorism, led by America, resulted in turning the leaders, cadres, and elements of Jihādī movements into individuals living under the constant fear of pursuits, assassinations, kidnappings, capture, and the closure of safe havens... The plans to dry up resources took care of cutting off their livelihoods and the sustenance of their families and children, who had roamed with them to the east and west of the earth, scattered, being scorched by the fires of this contemporary "Trench" (Ukhdūd) for the believing strangers fleeing with their Dīn.

There is an important observation, which is the emergence of a new Jihādī school during this time that can be called:

- The Phenomenon of Individual Jihād

Due to the oppressive atmosphere weighing on the conscience of the conscientious youth of this Ummah, some of them, from time to time, carried out Jihādī actions here and there, as individuals not belonging to any organization. This phenomenon is old, dating back to the arrival of the "Second Crusades" at the beginning of the 18th century (as per author's dating). For example, the action of the martyr Sulaymān al-Ḥalabī, who emigrated from Aleppo in northern Shām to Cairo, passing through Bayt al-Maqdis, where he met some scholars and obtained a fatwá to kill General Klèber, commander of the French campaign in Egypt, whom Napoleon had left as his successor when he returned to France. Sulaymān (may Allāh have mercy on him) killed him, and the incident was one of the initial reasons for the evacuation of the French campaign from Egypt. Then he (may Allāh have mercy on him) was executed, along with the scholar who issued him the fatwá. This phenomenon recurred according to circumstances.

However, during the decade (1990-2000), after the launch of the "Third Crusades" (the author's term for contemporary conflicts) and the establishment of the New World Order, these practices began to multiply and form a phenomenon and a Jihādī school worthy of attention, study, and development, as will be discussed later, inshā'Allāh. Some military personnel, civilians, and various forms of the "Crusaders'" presence were subjected to brilliant and effective individual Jihādī operations that confused the enemy and heralded the growth of seeds of resistance. If these seeds are destined to mature, I believe they will form the most important foundations of the coming confrontation, by Allāh's permission.

4. The Deviant Ṣaḥwah and the Takfīr Current (1990-2000)

It is very important for understanding the phenomenon of Takfīr to understand the equation that constitutes it, which we summarized as:

An oppressive kāfir ruler + a criminal, blood-shedding executioner + a scholar hypocritically serving the authorities + a helpless Ṣaḥwah (Awakening) + a populace predominantly characterized by corruption + an ignorant, zealous youth... = The birth of the Takfīr current.

The summary of what has happened to this phenomenon since its birth in the early seventies until today is that it remained limited and isolated, failing to gain popularity or spread, neither within the circles of the Islamic Ṣaḥwah nor among the general Muslim populace. While communication and relationships continued between various members and groups of the Ṣaḥwah in its three political, non-political, and Jihādī aspects, despite their differences and disputes—where intellectual communication, personal relationships, and even cooperation at various levels of agreement occurred—the entire Islamic Ṣaḥwah unanimously agreed on rejecting the phenomenon of Takfīr and the ideology of its proponents. This helped in its decline and contraction.

Due to the extremely malevolent nature that characterized the thought and behavior of its individuals—marked by ignorance, extremism, violence, and irrationality, in addition to deviation from the foundations of Sharīʿah—this current could not gain ground within or outside the Ṣaḥwah, except in the form of shrinking, isolated pockets here and there, ruminating on their grudges and ignorance, and undertaking the liquidation of one another. However, it is worth noting some important observations under the heading of this phenomenon:

The first observation: Although the groups of the Takfīr current declared takfīr upon the Muslim masses, their ‘ulamā’, the leaders of their Ṣaḥwah, and their callers because they did not declare takfīr upon the rulers and their henchmen, and did not declare takfīr upon those who did not declare takfīr upon the rulers, and did not declare takfīr upon those who did not declare takfīr upon these... and so on, which is their wretched chain and the foundational premise of their ideology. Yet, the strange thing is that they did not adopt the idea of waging Jihād against the kāfir ruler, over whose disbelief they broke ties with people! The Takfīr groups were not known to have fought rulers except in a few instances. This is not to mention that they did not call for Jihād against the original kuffār among the Jews and Christians who occupied the heartlands of Muslims. Meanwhile, their hands were stained with the killing of innocent Muslims. This is what the noble tradition (athar sharīf) highlighted as one of the characteristics of these vile factions: “They leave alone the idol-worshippers and kill the people of the Qur’ān.”

The second observation: The ṭaghūtī governments, and behind them the enemies of Islam, realized the importance of this deviant current in combating Jihād and halting its Ṣaḥwah. This is due to a simple paradox:

The Jihādīs want to mobilize the Ummah and recruit it to fight external enemies from among the kuffār, such as the invading Jews, Crusaders, and pagans, and to confront the ṭawāghīt rulers who undertook to achieve their enemies' goals and fight their own Ummah. In contrast, the Takfīrīs operate from the principle of declaring takfīr upon the generality of the Ummah! So how could they wage Jihād alongside them after having stripped them of their religion!

The second important matter that those malicious rulers, their aides, their intelligence agencies, and their research centers—dedicated to warring against Islam and Muslims—realized is that pinning the accusation of Takfīr on the Jihādīs, by claiming they are Khawārij who declare takfīr upon rulers, their aides, and their ‘ulamā’... and declare takfīr upon the common people (which is a false claim), is crucial. This is because the Jihādīs, as is well-known, do not haphazardly apply chains of takfir. They have their disciplined jurisprudence based on the well-known creeds of Ahl al-Sunnah wa-l-Jamā‘ah, and their writings and media platforms are the greatest proof of this. Therefore, for governments to pin this accusation on the Jihādīs is one of the most important ways to separate them from their popular base. Consequently, they worked to demolish the clear, dividing wall between these two trends, contradictory in methodology and objectives, namely (the Jihād current) and (the Takfir phenomenon).

The third and very important observation: The intelligence agencies hostile to this Ummah, working day and night to devise means to confront its Jihādī Ṣaḥwah, when they saw the benefit of the shameful actions of Takfir—especially after their heinous crime against Jihād and the Ummah in Algeria, which was an experimental field for intelligence agencies, as I will explain in Chapter Six in a brief on the Algerian experience, in shā’ Allāh—they realized that one of the most successful means to confront Jihād and the Jihādīs, and to separate them from the Ummah, is to accuse them of Takfir. This way, people would hate them, they would become isolated, and thus it would be easy to eliminate them. This is what they applied in Algeria. When intelligence agencies studied this (Takfirī) phenomenon, they discovered the equation I referred to regarding the birth of Takfir, which arises naturally in the aforementioned environments. So, they deliberately set out to generate Takfir currents through artificial cloning in circles where Jihād was naturally expected to emerge due to colonial presence or a ṭāghūtī regime. Examples of this include what happened in Saudi Arabia since the Kuwaiti Desert Storm war, and the birth of the seeds of Jihād and resistance. The Saudi intelligence, whose Interior Minister Nāyif bin ‘Abd al-‘Azīz took the former, notoriously disreputable Egyptian Interior Minister (Zakī Badr)—famous for his eradicationist theories and the brutality of his methods—and a team from Egyptian intelligence as advisors to establish his repressive apparatus in Saudi Arabia since 1991. Among the results of this was the little news that reached us about what happened there to clone Takfir and use it to accuse the anticipated Jihād in Saudi Arabia.

Several survivors from the infamous (al-Ruwais) prison in Jeddah, both Saudis and non-Saudis from among the Jihādīs, recounted that after the two bombing incidents in Riyadh and Khobar in 1994, and the subsequent activity of some Jihādī organizations in Saudi Arabia, thousands of young men were arrested for interrogation, whether they had prior Jihādī involvement or were suspected of it. The youth were subjected to various horrific forms of torture, which Saudi security imported from Egypt, Tunisia, Syria, and other countries well-versed in the "sciences" of torture. However, what they benefited from the Algerian security experience was the utility of the Takfir current in destroying Jihād! This was one of the most important lessons: they proceeded to clone and generate it by creating the components of the right side of the equation:

One of those who witnessed the experiment in al-Ruwais prison in Jeddah, Saudi Arabia, said:

"After rounds of physical torture involving beatings and electricity... a supervisor of psychological torture, a Shī'ī man from the Nakhāwilah, who introduced himself as (Abū Nāyif), in his sixties and lame, would come to us. He would make us hear such forms of blasphemy, cursing of the religion, the Lord, the sanctities of Islam, mockery of its rituals, and cursing of Jihād and the Mujāhidīn... that what we had suffered in the torture sessions seemed insignificant compared to the hideousness of what we heard. Then he would say to us: 'You want the rule of Sharī'ah?! And what is this that the walī al-amr (ruler) governs by? Is it not Sharī'ah? Don't you like the Sharī'ah of the (...!!...) [and he would mention a sexual act in vulgar colloquial language],' and he would laugh, and the executioners would laugh. He would continue: 'This Shaykh Ibn 'Uthaymīn and Ibn Bāz say it is Sharī'ah, and that it is the state of Tawḥīd...' and he would go on in this manner... Often, the detained Jihādī brothers would be taken, gathered naked, covering their private parts with their hands. Then they would be called one by one. The detainee would be tied and hung, then an executioner would come and fondle his genitals with a stick in his hand. Then he would bring a plastic model of a male genital organ and begin to pass it over the detainee's anus! And threaten him with rape and sodomy if he did not comply with what was demanded of him. Then he would demand that he sign papers of a report confessing that he declares takfīr upon the walī al-amr, declares takfīr upon the 'ulamā', and declares takfīr upon Saudi society!! It was narrated from some brothers that some had the act of sodomy committed against them and were raped by Saudi executioners!!"

Employees receiving salaries from "the state of Tawhīd by which Allāh has benefited [people] and through which goodness has been achieved that none knows except Allāh!!" – according to the false testimony so often repeated by the Muftī of the land – their "esteemed father" – and the Council of Senior Agents (a play on 'ulamā', scholars), and it seems this is some of that "goodness"!!. We have previously presented the Saudi opposition's statement regarding these heinous matters, which I hesitated greatly to include out of modesty and to preserve the feelings of those who read this book.

But I found that "The right of the Truth (Allāh) is more binding than the right of creation," as Ibn al-Qayyim (may Allāh have mercy on him) said. And people must know at least a part of what goes on.

The witnesses from (al-Ruwais) prison added that foreign detainees from other Arab countries were severely tortured to sign confessions stating that they had transferred the ideology of Takfīr to Saudi Arabia, and that they had brought weapons and ammunition into the Kingdom. All this under duress of threats and torture methods similar to those known to be used in countries with a long history in such practices, like Egypt, Syria, Jordan, Tunisia, and others. Some of them mentioned to me that there was a torture session with whips called (al-mawzah, "the banana") because the detainee's skin is peeled in it!! He is tied backwards, his hands to his feet, so his back arches and his shape becomes like a banana, and he is beaten on his stomach and... There is an iron cage called (Sandarīllā, "Cinderella") in which the detainee is hung, his four limbs tied to the bars, then it spins rapidly, and he is electrocuted periodically. The detainee comes out unconscious, water is poured on him, and he is demanded to confess... and so on... So, contemplate the equation anew...

An oppressive kāfir ruler + a criminal executioner repeating blasphemy then reminding them of the ‘ulamā’s ruling that the walī al-amr upholds Tawḥīd (and here the mechanism of Takfīr is triggered in the mind of the poor detainee). Then the detainees are left in group cells where intelligence officers or some afflicted with Takfīr are planted to stir up discussion in these atmospheres, so the "genes" of Takfīr are cloned. Then confessions are signed in exchange for release. Glorified be He Who said: {Shall I inform you upon whom the devils descend?} (Al-Shu‘arā’: 221). We heard these testimonies in 1995. No real confrontation had yet begun in Saudi Arabia. But now that its signs have started to appear, Saudi intelligence has a huge archive of these Takfīrī "treasures," for the ignorant among the Sultan's ‘ulamā’ to rely on and issue fatwās that the Mujāhidīn fighting the Americans and their tails from the House of Sa‘ūd are Takfīrī Khawārij!

Anyone following the media and its coverage of events orchestrated by the Jihādīs today sees the focus on accusing the brothers of being Khawārij, and on the ideology of the early Khawārij, through a theatrical production accusing them of having split the unity of the Muslims, declared takfīr upon the ruler and the ruled, stored explosives in Makkah and Madīnah, and placed bombs inside booby-trapped copies of the Qur’ān! And killed innocent Muslims and those under covenant of security... and so on. The trap has succeeded to a large extent. A number of trusted ‘ulamā’ in Saudi Arabia came out to participate in this play, prepared and directed by Prince Nāyif and his advisors from Arab intelligence agencies.

This observation is one of the most important things to be aware of regarding the interplay between Takfīr and intelligence agencies. Some detail will follow when we touch upon a brief account of the Jihād catastrophe in Algeria in the next chapter, in shā' Allāh.

Fourthly: The Islamic Ṣaḥwah in the post-September (2001) world:

The West had raised a slogan expressed by the late French President – may he go to hell – (Mitterrand) when he said: "We will strike extremist Islam with moderate Islam." This led to the inauguration of the "flourishing democratic era," making political Islamic schools of thought practically part of (the elite) – Pharaoh's elite – alongside (the ruler, the priest/soothsayer, and the aides). The Ṣaḥwah achieved some gains, but the price was to stand against the Jihādī tide.

However, over the past decade, a logical development occurred that was not in the calculations of the West or its apostate agents, who, due to their grudges, could not comprehend the gushing spiritual momentum and nature of Islam. And look at some of Allāh's signs:

- The "moderate" Islamists, as they call them, ultimately have no commodity to offer but Islam.

So, if they are given space (mosques... schools... seminars... lectures... publications... newspapers... parliament halls... contact with the public), they have no commodity other than Islamic projects and talk about: (implementing Sharī'ah... Jihād for Palestine... issues of justice and oppression... combating corruption... social reform... commitment and Islamic ethics... etc.). Even with personal objectives and partisan interests, these messages—whether their proponents are sincere or merely use them to trade in slogans—have significantly contributed to expanding the popular base for Islam and religious conceptions. This was a huge horizontal gain on the path of Islamizing societies, which, by their innate nature, realize—after the religious spirit has permeated them—the need to confront those situations and clash with them when peaceful reform is not possible.

Similarly, the Jihādīs or "extremists," as they call them, find in such respites and atmospheres of political and security relaxation an opportunity for clandestine expansion, reorganizing their ranks, and acquiring broader bases within the general margin of the Ṣaḥwah. The same can be said for non-political, Da‘wah-oriented Islamists.

The creeping Islamization of Arab and Islamic societies, which the West calls "the return to fundamentalism," deeply troubles them. Even though a large segment and the vast majority of societies are moving towards immorality, disobedience, and detachment from religion according to the program of secularization and those who implement it. Yet, they wish to extinguish Allāh's light with their mouths, with all its traces, and they do not want truth to exist, nor for those who carry it to have the right to movement and life. Over a decade, the Crusader West and the Sages of Zion—our rulers who are their lackeys—discovered the mistake of democratic openness, so they raised a new slogan: "We want (democracy without Islamists in Muslim lands)!!"

Although this statement is self-contradictory, because democracy means the people ruling themselves and signifies the principle of the Ummah's sovereignty. The natural and logical thing is to respect its choice, out of respect for the principle itself. But the hypocritical West and its followers—the rulers and secularists in our countries, who are even more audacious in their hypocrisy—were ready to lick up the principle itself, so they said what they said: "(Democracy... but... without Islamists!!)."

Soon, the slogan turned into practical application, and most countries closed the democratic margin. Other countries chose to deflate it from within, by tailoring electoral laws or constitutional amendments that leave Islamists with only the husks. Consequently, only opportunistic Islamists, or those prepared to tailor and re-stitch Islam according to the taste of the ruler—who is himself ruled by his master, the enemy of Islam and Muslims—continue in the game.

Thus, Islamic democracy in Algeria was brutally suppressed (1991) through a military coup, the price of which was a civil war that has so far claimed about one hundred and fifty thousand lives. Similarly, Islamic democrats and their leader Erbakan were removed from the head of government and parliamentary majority in Turkey via a soft political coup, only to be thrown into prisons or banned from political activity. Musharraf then launched a military coup against Pakistan's democracy, subsequently tailoring a system for them that was (democratic, dictatorial, military, civilian, intelligence-led, under American supervision!). Jordan, Yemen, Morocco, and others tailored electoral laws that cast Islamists as a minority in the corridors of parliament. Or, in the best-case scenarios, they were given ministries of water and electricity... or the Ministry of Mills and Fisheries... in countries that are not even on the sea! And so on...

The West discovered it was facing a tight, divinely ordained equation, driven by the vibrant spirit of this divine religion. The essence of this equation is:

If the enemies of Islām strike the Islamists and confront the Awakening with coups, prisons, and oppression... they provide justifications for taking up arms, and the Jihādīs expand, growing in depth and quality! And if they open space for political moderation to counter the Jihādīs with moderates, Islām spreads horizontally and at the grassroots level and proliferates! So they return to oppression, and Jihād returns to growth! Then they return to openness, and Islām returns to spread and expand! This occurs in a recurring cycle of Allāh's plan against them.

Thus, they found that awareness, development, the communications revolution, and the world of satellite channels and the Internet had opened the minds of the peoples. That the thrones of colonial governors and their deputies among our rulers were threatened. That Israel was besieged by fundamentalism. That oil sources and the weapon stockpiles of government armies were vulnerable to falling into the hands of popular revolutions led by hardliners. So, the West decided on direct invasion and occupation of the center of the conflict (the Middle East): the Levant, Egypt, Iraq, and the Arabian Peninsula. It sought to extend greater control over what remained by supporting apostate rulers to increase oppression, just as America increased the capabilities of its military bases. The American presence alone, in the Central Command area of operations (Central Asia, the Arab world, and the Horn of Africa), reached about 1.5 million American soldiers under a single central command. Its forces are distributed from Kabul, Tashkent, and Merv... in Central Asia, from the farthest east of Muslim lands, to Baghdad, Amman, and the Arabian Peninsula... to Egypt, Western Sahara, and Somalia in the Middle East... to Tangier and the Atlantic coasts in the farthest west of the lands of Islām. This is what they today call (the Greater Middle East), and they are laying plans to occupy it culturally in all aspects. The prelude to this, as we saw, was the destruction of the Islamic Emirate in Afghanistan, the occupation of Iraq, and the declaration of war on the Awakening in all its spectrums. Bush "corrected" Mitterrand's statement when he divided Islamists into moderates and "stray" hardliners... for the slogan, American style, to become:

"(There is no moderate Islām! All Islamists are extremists and must be eliminated)."
This American war was to include everyone, starting from the Jihādīs, extending to the moderates, and passing through the smallest humanitarian charitable institution working in distributing copies of the Qurʾān or caring for orphans.

And this was by the grace of Allāh. For this policy resulted not only in cornering the entire Awakening and preparing it for resistance and taking up arms, but also in opening the door for the ordinary man in the street to take up arms under the banner of Islām.

This is what some of America's pharaonic masterminds had warned against, just as the president of Egypt exclaimed before parliament at the beginning of America's invasion of Iraq that America's policy would create for us a hundred Bin Ladens instead of one... But the foolish, bigoted Bush, captive to his Zionist advisors, did not comprehend this plan of Allāh against him. So he proceeded with the policy of eradication, to be followed by the rulers of Muslim countries. Part of this was what I heard yesterday from the Saudi Crown Prince Abdullah... in a hysterical speech addressed to the people on the evening of August 1, 2003, saying:

"(Anyone who harbors a terrorist is a terrorist like him. Anyone who sympathizes with a terrorist is a terrorist like him. And when the state confronts terrorists, there is no place for neutrality or a middle ground)."

This is the gist of Bush's current slogan:

"(Whoever is not with us in our war on terror is against us, and there is no place for neutrality)."

Indeed, the equation proceeds with the grace of Allāh, for the most important causal conditions for victory to be realized through the entire Ummah entering the battle, forcibly or voluntarily. As for the divinely decreed causes of victory, that is Allāh's victory, which He sends down when He wills, upon whom He wills, where He wills... And we ask Allāh that we witness it and be among the fuel for its realization in the path of Allāh.

As for the effect of this blundering policy on the four schools of the Awakening in the few years after September 2001, it is, in brief, as follows:

First: The Non-Political Islamic Awakening after September 2001:

In Amman, the capital of Jordan... one of the leaders of (Jamā'at al-Tablīgh wa al-Da'wah) shouted in detention, at the interrogator, astonished and protesting, saying:

"(We did not practice Jihād or politics, nor did we confront you! We call to Allāh in our mosques, reform people, and save them from corruption and the world of taverns and crimes... )!" The expert interrogator, an intelligence officer who had learned his lesson, told him: "(This is the problem: you are the bus! You take people from the street to the mosque. Then the Ikhwān come and take them from the mosque to politics! Then the extremists come and take their pick of the youth for Jihād and extremism! We want to cut off this entire path from its roots. We want to stop the bus! ..)"

This explains the whole truth of the confrontation today. It is a true, realistic story, extremely expressive and significant...

Thus, governments today confront the non-political religious Awakening and suppress it. They close mosques, restrict schools, and ban sermons... Indeed, Saudi Arabia is now referring more than 1,800 preachers and callers to psychological rehabilitation courses! To distance them from extremism and make them understand the fundamentals of the world of American hegemony post-September and Iraq! Egypt has announced that it has dismissed thousands of teachers accused of fundamentalism from the teaching apparatus! This is within the framework of the war of ideas and curricula... Kuwait announced it has no choice but to confront hardliners, and most Islamic countries announced amendments to religious and general education programs. It even reached the point where the Minister of Culture in Pakistan (Zubaida Jalal) demanded, on television screens and before the media, the deletion of Sūrahs: (Āl 'Imrān, Al-Anfāl, and Al-Tawbah) because they call for terrorism!!

Second: The Political Awakening in the Post-September (2001) World:

As I mentioned earlier, avenues for effective political participation are closed to them today, and they are subjected to repression. If there is anything to add, it is the birth of prostrate political Islamists and callers, compressible without limits, and prone to dilution without restraint. They have transgressed the methodology, their methodology. Indeed, they have surpassed previous angles of deviation... A few days ago, I heard one of the Muslim Brotherhood candidates for the Press Syndicate elections in Egypt, responding to a newspaper's question: "You are an Islamist, so how can you represent 400 journalists from all spectrums?" He said: "(I have my orientation! But when I represent journalists, I represent the Muslim, the Christian, the Communist, those who have a religion, and those who have no religion!)" Contemplate if such words leave any room for contemplation!

The representative of the Islamic Movement in Iraq sits in the local governing council under (Bremer) to pass and justify the occupation! The Muslim Brotherhood and the Surūrīs in Saudi Arabia fight against Jihād and Jihādīs, hand over their members to the intelligence services, and call on them to surrender to the state through their homes! And you can say the same about the Islamists in the parliament in Morocco... Those democratic Islamists who remain in the political game have become an essential part of the battalions of the New World Order in confronting the bearers of the banners of Jihād and resistance in the Ummah...

It must be noted that their margin for positive contribution is shrinking day by day, as political Islamists try to fight colonialism under the dome of parliament! And limit the tyranny of the Pharaohs through marches! And there are still those among them who think this is possible!

Third: The Jihādī Awakening after September (2001):

America has targeted Jihādīs – groups and individuals, and even their supporters and sympathizers – in its war. This was after realizing that they are, in practice, the living heart of the Ummah and its remaining weapon to defend itself. The details of this confrontation involve many witnessed events, which I will leave for the next chapter, Inshā'Allāh.

Fourth: The Deviant Awakening of the Takfīrīs after September (2001):

This phenomenon has shrunk further. Were it not for what Arab and Islamic media in some regions, like Saudi Arabia, try to highlight and talk about its existence, no one would have heard of it. And praise be to Allāh.

After this brief review of the path of the Islamic Awakening and the summary of its harvest over more than seventy years since its birth, it remains for us to conclude this chapter with a summary and to draw attention to two important phenomena of the non-Jihādī Islamic Awakening, as we will leave the coverage of Jihādī observations for the sixth chapter.

- Conclusion on the Path of the Islamic Awakening and its Outcome (1930 - 2003):

This conclusion can be expressed very briefly by saying that the Islamic Awakening, in all its four schools, has reached bankruptcy, failed to achieve its goals, and entered the bottom of the crisis. There is no hope for the continuation of what is sound among them unless they reconsider their methodologies, objectives, and methods of operation according to the constants of Islamic Sharī'ah with the discipline of a committed Muslim, and according to the givens of the new Fiqh of reality in light of the contemporary American Crusader campaigns in the post-September world and the occupation of Iraq. The path of the Awakening during those seven decades can be expressed by the following diagram:

This diagram clearly shows:

1. That the Awakening, with most of its convergent trends, was born shortly after the Caliphate, around 1930.
2. The schools of the Awakening proceeded and grew convergently, intertwined in their nature, in a mixed manner regarding methodology, objectives, and methods, until around 1960.
3. Each of its four schools continued its contribution and path until 1990 in a distinct manner.
4. Between (1990 - 2000), the paths of the political and non-political Awakenings converged as the latter approached the former.
5. The path of the Jihādī Awakening declined from 1990, reaching the year 2000 in an exhausted state.
6. As the year 2000 approached, all schools of the Awakening began to collapse in their contribution and path.
7. With the year 2001 and the beginning of the post-September world... signs of collapse and disintegration emerged in all schools of the Awakening. This indicates the continued collapse of the political and deviant schools, along with signs of a renaissance for the Jihādī Awakening due to the conditions of direct colonialism. Additionally, the non-political Awakening is expected to flourish as a result of conditions of oppression, colonialism, and general helplessness. It also indicates that all have reached the bottom of the crisis.

Considering that I belong to the Jihādī current and write for it, and my discussion of the other schools of the Awakening is only brief and to the extent that they intertwined with the path of the Jihādī Awakening, the details of my conceptions of reform and contributing to shaping the future path will focus on writing about the horizons of the Jihādī current and the program for reforming its path throughout the remaining chapters of this book.

As for reforming the path of the political and non-political Awakenings, that is the work of their proponents, writers, and theorists. If there is any advice for them for the sake of Allāh, His Messenger, His Book, the leaders of the Muslims, and their common folk, it is that Islamists should stay away from the doors of the rulers and the three institutions of apostasy: executive, legislative, and judicial. For entering them is ḥarām, not approved by Sharīʿah, and a disobedience to Allāh not justified by political sophistry – as we shall see with Sharīʿah evidence later, InshāʾAllāh. Although we seek excuses for some of them for actions and sayings that contradict the requirements of Īmān and Tawḥīd, on the grounds that they are interpreting based on maṣāliḥ mursalah (unrestricted public interest) and considering the state of istiḍāf (being deemed weak or oppressed).

Indeed, whoever follows the condition of most of them will find in it a confirmation of what is reported in the athar from the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him): “A servant does not draw nearer to the ruler except that he draws further from Allāh.” In their experience and the bitter harvest that has passed, there is the greatest proof of this saying.

As for reforming the deviant Awakening and the Takfīr it produced, if there is any advice that might benefit its adherents, it is that they repent to Allāh, engage in Jihād against the original kuffār and their apostate agents, and cease aggression against Muslims of all classes, from the common folk to the scholars of Islām. I ask Allāh to rectify them and take charge of the affairs of those who refuse.

As for the specific advice for the adherents of the non-political Awakening, it is that they focus on their very important role today in light of the cultural and methodological colonial onslaught. Focus on preserving the Dīn of the Ummah through da‘wah and education, and pay attention to safeguarding the Dīn – and they know better than us and are more experienced in the ways to do so.

As for the additional specific advice for the adherents of the political Awakening, it is that they work in the fields of civil resistance, political and media work, according to the two principles of resisting colonialism and not entering the structures of the ruler and the malicious triangle of power consisting of (the ruler, the elite, the aides, and the soothsayers).

Because by doing so, they will stand, whether they realize it or not, in confrontation with the Ummah.

I draw attention to an important truth, as frank and perhaps harsh as it is: the leaders of the September world have declared and made it known that there is no place for neutrality in the confrontation.

So, it is either with the Crusader campaigns – of colonialism, colonial deputies, and colonial agents – and consequently a fate, by Allāh's justice, to Hellfire, Inshā’Allāh, and what an evil destination.

Or it is in confronting them, and thus Jihād and armed or civil resistance with the hand; if not, then with the tongue; and if not, then with the heart, and that is the weakest of Īmān, and beyond that there is not a mustard seed's worth of Īmān. Let everyone seek for himself the highest ranks as much as he can...

As Allāh the Exalted said: {And whoever strives only strives for [the benefit of] himself. Indeed, Allāh is free from need of the worlds.} (Al-‘Ankabūt: 6).

And as he (peace and blessings be upon him) said: “So whoever is absolved is safe, but (as for) he who is pleased and follows...”

On the Day of Resurrection, one will realize, and one will regret, when regret is of no avail, that there are two paths and no neutrality: a party in Paradise and a party in the Blaze. And they are not equal.

And we ask Allāh for the stations of those upon whom Allāh has bestowed favor – of the prophets, the ṣiddīqīn, the shuhadā', and the ṣāliḥīn. And excellent are those as companions.

As for the two important pauses regarding the path of the political and non-political Awakenings, they are: a pause on the phenomenon of political Irjā' in the Awakening, and a pause on the phenomenon of democratic practices among Islamists. We will address the first here and leave the discussion of the second for the section on Thought and Methodology in Chapter One of the Eighth Part of the Second Volume, Inshā'Allāh.

A Pause on the Spread of the Creed of Political Irjā' in the Islamic Awakening

The emergence of the Murji'ah school of thought dates back to the appearance of the scholars of the ruler (palace scholars) with the rise of monarchy and the demise of the Rāshidūn Caliphate, when the separation of the Sultan and the Qur'ān began. The summary of that deviant creed is that al-Īmān is affirmation by the heart and declaration by the tongue, after the adherents of this school excluded action from the definition of al-Īmān. They said, "Al-Īmān is affirmation," and "Sin does not harm [one's] Īmān." And, "Whoever says Lā ilāha illā Allāh (There is no god but Allāh), we rule him to be a Muslim regardless of whatever sayings or actions he may subsequently commit." They invalidated all the detailed rules concerning the nullifiers of Īmān supported by evidence from the Qur'ān, the Sunnah, and the sayings of esteemed jurists.

Ibn 'Asākir narrated from al-Naḍr ibn Shumayl, who said: "I entered upon al-Ma'mūn, and he said: 'How are you this morning, O Naḍr?' I said, 'Well, O Amīr al-Mu'minīn.' He then asked: 'What is al-Irjā'?' I replied: 'A religion that suits kings; through it, they gain from their worldly life and diminish from their religion.' He said: 'You have spoken the truth.'"

The scholars of the sultans adopted this school of thought to the extent that the verifying scholars accurately labeled the school of al-Murji'ah as a religion that pleases kings. According to this school, they [the rulers] are Muslims and guardians to whom obedience is due, even if they take your wealth and flog your back. The Ummah said, "We are content." They are Muslims, and they have taken wealth and flogged backs. But the scholars of the sultans expanded it for them a little, so it became [permissible] even if your honor is violated! Even if your blood is shed! Even if he proclaims, by word and deed, as his predecessor proclaimed:

{And Fir'awn proclaimed among his people, saying, 'O my people, does not the kingdom of Egypt belong to me, and these rivers flowing beneath me? Then do you not see?'} (Al-Zukhruf: 51). Even if he declares the Shari'ah unfit for this age! Even if he allies with the enemies of Allāh! Even if he fights and dispatches armies to fight alongside Jews and Christians to shed the blood of Muslims! Even if... even if...

Does not the ruler pray the two 'Īds? And celebrate the Prophet's birthday (Mawlid al-Nabawī)? Does he not commit zinā under the pretext of nikāḥ al-mut'ah (temporary marriage), which some have permitted? When he strips free Muslim men and women of their clothes in detention centers and tortures them, does he not find justification in the saying of 'Alī (raḍiya Allāhu 'anhu) to the messenger of Ḥāṭib (raḍiya Allāhu 'anhu), "You will either produce the letter, or we will remove the clothes!"? Is it not permissible for the ruler to kill one-third of his subjects for the remaining two-thirds to be safe for him? Indeed, evidence for all of this has been cited, according to the deceivers among today's charlatan scholars. This religion, due to its excessive ease, has even accommodated Musaylimah!

Thus, the late, esteemed Imām, the Imām of scholars, Ibn 'Uthaymīn, came up with a development of the Murji'ah school, saying—and marvel as you wish at what he said concerning a statement that could almost cause the earth to split asunder and the mountains to fall down in devastation—he said: "And if we assume, as a remote possibility, that the ruler is a kāfir (disbeliever), does that mean we should incite people's hearts against him until rebellion, chaos, and fighting occur? There is no doubt that this is a mistake." Then he added a clarification, lest anyone should think he meant the rulers in his own country, for they, praise be to Allāh, rule by the Sharī'ah. He explained that his intention was that if a ruler in another country were to commit kufr, it would still not be permissible to revolt.

With this statement, he rejected the explicit Qur'ān, the authentic Sunnah, and the creed of the Ummah's consensus! All for the sake of the Āl Sa'ūd and their ilk! Then al-Albānī took charge of another contemporary school of Irjā' and said, "Revolting against the rulers in this era is a revolt against Islām itself!" And he testified that they [the rulers] are Muslims. Then the charlatan whom they call the Grand Muftī of Pakistan, Rafī' 'Uthmānī, stood up to say that those who are killed while defending themselves against the Pakistani army's raids are not martyrs! He thus rejected the ruling of the Ḥadīth of the Messenger of Allāh (ṣallā Allāhu 'alayhi wa sallam) that whoever is killed defending his wealth, his honor, his life, his rights against oppression, or his religion is a martyr. And [he said] that the Americans and their like are musta'minūn (granted security) and dhimmiyyūn (protected non-Muslims) against whom aggression is not permissible, not even in their own countries. He withdrew from the Dār al-Fatwā a previous permissibility for martyrdom operations. And he said, "We are not obligated to perform Jihād unless the ruler calls for it (Musharraf... just as was the case during the days of Ḍiyā' al-Ḥaqq when he called for Jihād against the Russians!!!). And he said that whoever fights with the Americans against Muslims is sinful but does not commit kufr, and that legislating without [reference to] Allāh is a sin and does not expel one from the religion, being minor kufr at the very most!!" etc.

And say the same about the imāms of da'wah and religious sciences from the contemporary Murji'ah of this era, those among them who have passed on—and their affair is with Allāh—and those who are still a slithering snake... What draws attention in the school of contemporary political Irjā' is that it tolerated deferring judgment and making excuses when dealing with kings, sultans, and their actions, but it could not tolerate deferring judgment regarding the actions of the Mujāhidīn. Instead, it ruled that they are the dogs of Hellfire! That they will not even smell the fragrance of Paradise! And that they should be killed, crucified, their limbs cut off on opposite sides, and exiled from the land in this world!

How can they kill a Christian occupier who came with the permission of the ruler, thus becoming a dhimmi, a musta'min, and a mu'āhad? Then came the criminals who claim to be waging Jihād and shed the blood of this "pure" Crusader! And they violated the protection of the "apostate" who granted him security?!

And stranger still regarding the school of political Irjā' in the Islamic Awakening is a peculiar observation! It is that its leading figures, from the extremists of Taṣawwuf (Sufism) to the extremists who claim Salafiyyah, declared takfīr upon one another over the understanding of the Divine Names and Attributes and the schools of Ash'ariyyah, Māturīdiyyah, Salafiyyah, and the Aṣḥāb al-Ḥadīth. They differed over the Essence of Allāh, the Blessed and Exalted, and His Names and Attributes! Yet they agreed—and glory be to the One Who unites hearts—on the Islamic status of the ruler and his names and attributes! This happened among them in Morocco, Pakistan, and wherever the two schools coexisted. Thus, they found more latitude concerning the kings of the earth than they did concerning the King of the heavens and the earth and all that is within them!

It seems that a researcher finds no justification for this school of thought except to justify to its adherents their entry into the components of the ruling establishment (al-mala') when they opted for politics and working within democracy. For they would enter parliament (an institution that legislates without [reference to] Allāh) and they would enter government (an institution that rules by other than what Allāh has revealed). So how could this be permissible if they were to declare the ruler a kāfir, while they themselves are part of his faction, his partners, and his establishment?! What, then, is the way out? Either they do not enter! Or they rule him to be a Muslim! So they chose the easier and more enjoyable path! And they ruled in favor of the Islām of an apostate who openly wages war and enmity against Allāh, and vies with Him in the most exclusive attributes of Divinity.

Here is a story I experienced myself, and it is quite significant! I relate it merely as an example; otherwise, the evidence these days is too numerous to count.

When I emigrated from Syria during the collapse of the Jihādī movement—and I had been affiliated with the Jihādī organization (al-Ṭalī‘ah al-Muqātilah)—my situation led me to become a member of the Muslim Brotherhood organization, then a member of the leadership of the Brotherhood's military apparatus in 1980. We were in Baghdad, and as military cadres, we were unaware of what our political leaders were planning. But we were surprised when they halted military operations, practically dissolved their structures, and announced the beginning of a phase of political Jihād. In March 1982 (after causing the destruction of Ḥamāh and the liquidation of Mujāhidīn throughout Syria), they announced the formation of a national alliance. This alliance included the Muslim Brotherhood, the Islamic Front, a group of independent Sufi scholars, the right-wing Ba‘ath Party affiliated with Iraq under Ṣaddām's patronage at the time, and subsidiary secular parties to confront the leftist Nuṣayrī Ba‘ath Party in Syria. For this, they wrote an "Islamic-secular" charter, reflecting the identity of those who formed the alliance. Then, the "National Alliance for the Liberation of Syria" was expanded to include Rif‘at al-Asad, the Nuṣayrī brother of Ḥāfiẓ al-Asad! Rif‘at! Who was responsible for the massacres and mass graves of the Muslim Brotherhood and other Muslims? Because he had become an opponent of the regime led by his brother in his power struggle with him. This orientation was followed by a new intellectual curriculum and a new fiqh that the Brotherhood's educational apparatus had to inculcate in the Mujāhidīn. Shaykh Munīr al-Ghaḍbān of the Syrian Muslim Brotherhood (and he later retracted what he wrote in subsequent writings—may Allāh forgive him) wrote the book "Political Alliance in Islām." Along with Shaykh Saʿīd Ḥawwā, Shaykh ʿAbd al-Fattāḥ Abū Ghuddah, and Syrian Brotherhood scholars, he undertook the task of presenting a new fiqh suitable for the stage, in which deductions from the treaties of the Messenger (ṣallā Allāhu ʿalayhi wa sallam) were distorted. This continued until one of the senior educators in the Brotherhood at the time confided in me, saying, "I have a crisis! How can I teach the youth these books that reconcile us with the secularists and explain to them the National Alliance charter, and then teach them Sayyid Quṭb's book 'Milestones'?"

For those who want more information and details on this issue, they can refer to my book "The Jihādī Revolution in Syria - Pains and Hopes," published in 1990.

During the same period, in 1989 in Amman, one of the mentors in the Jordanian Muslim Brotherhood told me that when the Jordanian Brotherhood decided to enter the Jordanian Parliament and ministries—that is, the legislative and executive authorities—under "His Majesty" King Ḥusayn "the Great," as Radio Amman would repeat! Our brother told me: "Listen to this marvel:

I joined the Brotherhood organization in the early seventies. I was asked to believe in the kufr of King Ḥusayn because he ruled by other than what Allāh revealed. Our primary book was 'Milestones.' I had read some books of tafsīr and came across the saying of some of the Tābiʿīn regarding this: 'kufr dūna kufr' (a lesser form of disbelief). I thought that Ḥusayn was a Muslim and not a kāfir, even if he was an unjust transgressor. After I voiced my 'knowledge' about the Islamic status of the unjust ruler, I was subjected to a Brotherhood tribunal where the organization gave me a period to adopt the belief in King Ḥusayn's kufr or be expelled from the organization! My membership was frozen during that time. I considered the matter, and Allāh guided me to what He guided them to, so I declared King Ḥusayn's kufr and returned as a member of the organization. After some years, I became a mentor in it, teaching the youth the evidence for King Ḥusayn's kufr from 'Milestones' and other sources. In this year (1989-1990), nearly twenty years after that incident, the Jordanian Brotherhood entered Parliament, and some of them joined the ministry. The Brotherhood wrote fiqh treatises testifying to Ḥusayn's Islām and the permissibility of entering Parliament. Some permitted taking ministerial positions but not parliamentary seats, based on the example of Prophet Yūsuf working for Pharaoh as a treasurer! Others held the opposite view, and a third group permitted both. However, they once again agreed on Ḥusayn's Islām to solve the problem of entering the government.'

My companion continued: 'But over twenty years in the Muslim Brotherhood, I had become fully convinced of King Ḥusayn's kufr; I studied it and taught it. So how could I now accept his Islām merely based on a statement from the organization?! I stood firm on my position. I was subjected to a new organizational trial during which I was given a deadline to be convinced of King Ḥusayn's Islām, or else I would be expelled from the organization!! And my membership was frozen during this period!' So I asked, 'What did you do?' He replied: 'I decided to "expel" the organization from my membership!! And I decided to "freeze" them from being Muslim Brothers. These people cannot be my brothers, and I don't know what is left of them as Muslims?!'

Thus, the principles of Irjā' entered the Islamic Awakening, so they followed the sunnah of the people of Nasī', making it lawful one year and unlawful another, to correspond with the period that Allāh had forbidden!!

This is the sole explanation for the phenomenon of political Irjā': the whims of politics and the art of the possible; the price of loitering at the gates of sultans and the confirmation of the Ḥadīth of the Messenger of Allāh (ṣallā Allāhu 'alayhi wa sallam): "Whoever frequents the gates of rulers is put to trial (uftutina)" and "A servant does not draw nearer to the Sultan except that he draws further from Allāh." This is the truth, quite simply: the political Murji'ah have been put to trial at the gates of sultans and have strayed far from the fundamentals of Allāh's Sharī'ah. And the Arabic language is clear: uftutina (he was put to trial/tempted) is from fatana (to tempt/test), yaftinu (he tempts/tests), so he is fattān (a tempter) and maftūn (one who is tempted/tested)...

As for the second reason, or the second explanation for the phenomenon of political Irjā', it is the whips of the torturer in prisons and the policy of the aforementioned "banana" sessions and "Cinderella" electricity. And preferring to belong to the current of Irjā' over entering a current of 220 volts!!

As for the third explanation, it is Satan and his deceptions. And so, between the deceptions of Iblīs, the whips of a despicable torturer, and the gains of a seat in the wretched parliament, this malicious fiqh was born. And the scholars of the sultans and the deviant du'āt (callers) sat inside the institutions of power.

Innā lillāhi wa innā ilayhi rāji'ūn (Indeed, to Allāh we belong, and indeed, to Him we shall return).

It goes without saying that there is another type of Irjā': the Irjā' of hypocritical scholars who knowingly concealed what Allāh revealed. They sold Allāh's Sharī'ah and altered it with understanding, due to the glitter of the Sultan's gold and greed for His saying: {Yes, and indeed, you will then be among those brought near [to me].} (Al-Shu'arā': 42). This is an Irjā' whose nature and causes are clear and require no discussion. Our Lord's Book has identified its adherents for us when He, the Exalted, said:

{The example of those who were entrusted with the Torah and then did not uphold it is like that of a donkey carrying volumes [of books]...} (Al-Jumu'ah: 5), and when He further elaborated on their conditions by saying: {And recite to them, [O Muḥammad], the news of him to whom We gave Our signs, but he detached himself from them; so Satan pursued him, and he became of the deviators. And if We had willed, we could have elevated him thereby, but he adhered [instead] to the earth and followed his own desire. So his example is like that of the dog: if you chase him, he pants, or if you leave him, he [still] pants. That is the example of the people who denied Our signs. So relate the stories that perhaps they will give thought.} [Al-A'raf: 175-176].

The Trajectory and Experiences of the Jihādī Current (1960 - 2001 CE)

Allāh the Exalted said:

{And those who strive for Us - We will surely guide them to Our ways. And indeed, Allāh is with the doers of good.} (Qur'ān, Al-ʿAnkabūt: 69)

The Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) said:

"Islām began as something strange and will return to being strange as it began, so glad tidings to the strangers."

He (peace and blessings be upon him) also said:

"A group of my Ummah will continue to fight for the truth, remaining dominant over those who oppose them, until the last of them fights the Antichrist (al-Masīḥ al-Dajjāl)."

And he (peace and blessings be upon him) informed about their steadfastness, saying:

"A group of my Ummah will continue to be manifest upon the truth, unharmed by those who oppose them, until the command of Allāh comes while they are dominant over the people."

First: Definition and Classification of the Jihādī Current

To begin with, the generally agreed-upon principle, as a general definition, states that Jihād in the path of Allāh is the effort expended to make the word of Allāh supreme. In its broadest sense, it signifies fighting in the path of Allāh and sacrificing one's life and wealth for the sake of upholding Allāh's religion and defending Muslims: their religion, blood, honor, wealth, and land. Accordingly, one who undertakes this action seeking the pleasure of Allāh and for His word to be supreme is a mujāhid in the path of Allāh. If a group or community of Muslims unites for this purpose, they are mujāhidīn in the path of Allāh.

However, this chapter pertains to a specific type of these mujāhidīn, whose adherents require a specific term and definition that encompasses them and applies to their various schools of thought, gatherings, or even their scholars, cadres, and individuals. This is what has come to be termed the "Jihādī current." In previous lectures and recordings, particularly in the lecture series titled "Jihād is the Solution: Why and How," as well as in video lectures which were among my latest productions and bore the title of this book, I had broadened the scope of this term when I reached this chapter. I stated therein that the Jihādī current "is a comprehensive term for any individual, group, or organization that bears arms to wage Jihād against the enemies of Islām under the banner of 'There is no god but Allāh, Muhammad is the Messenger of Allāh.'" At that time, I noted that this definition sets aside the issue of specific methodologies, means, and limited objectives, and bypasses their evaluation. I also said that the Jihādī current is a phase and a phenomenon that emerged from the Islāmic awakening during the past century.

Upon reviewing what I had written or said in my lessons under this expanded definition, I found that the Jihādī current whose trajectory I discussed in those lectures—and which I address here—does not apply to everyone who falls under that broad definition, which includes every mujāhid in the path of Allāh. This broader category, constituting the sum of their groups and individuals, can be termed the "armed Jihādī phenomenon." Therefore, I will rephrase the definition more precisely here:

The Jihādī Current:

It encompasses organizations, groups, gatherings, scholars, thinkers, prominent figures, and individuals who have adopted the concept of armed Jihād against the existing governments in Arab and Islāmic countries, considering them apostate ruling systems. This is due to their ruling by other than what Allāh has revealed, legislating without Allāh's authority, and their allegiance to the enemies of the Muslim nation (Ummah) from various disbelieving powers. They have also adopted the methodology of armed Jihād against colonial powers attacking Muslim lands, regarding those regimes—whose legitimacy they have nullified and against whom they have rebelled—as allies at war with Islām and Muslims.

Although groups and individuals of the Jihādī current share with other components of the Jihādī phenomenon the principle of armed Jihād against external aggressors attacking the people of Islām, their lands, and their sanctities—alongside groups and individuals who have undertaken Jihād against these enemies in places like Palestine, Chechnya, Bosnia, Kashmir, the Philippines, Eritrea, and elsewhere—they are distinguished by an ideology rooted in the principles of Divine Sovereignty (Ḥākimiyyah) and separation from the systems of ignorance (Jāhiliyyah), by the principles of loyalty and disavowal (al-walā' wa-l-barā'), and the believers' stance against false deities (ṭāghūt) and their allies, among other methodological details that we will discuss.

Therefore, I will term the second group, those who practice Jihād against original disbelievers—Jews, Christians, polytheists, and other enemies of Muslims—as "Mujāhid Groups." These are terms for academic classification and categorization, not a doctrinal division or an evaluative methodology.

The foundational doctrinal principle, as previously stated, is that a mujāhid in the path of Allāh is one who fights for the word of Allāh to be supreme. This was established by the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) in authentic and well-known Ḥadīth of the Sunnah: Abū Mūsā al-Ash'arī narrated that a Bedouin man came to the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) and said, "O Messenger of Allāh, one man fights for spoils, another fights to be mentioned, and another fights for his position to be seen. Who is in the path of Allāh?" The Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) replied:

"Whoever fights so that the word of Allāh is supreme is in the path of Allāh." (Narrated by Muslim).

Throughout this research, I may use the term "Jihādīs" in short to refer to those belonging to the Jihādī current—and this term has become well-known—and "mujāhidīn" to refer to individuals of the other category. It should also be kept in mind that this classification is based on the general majority. The Jihādī current may include individuals who do not fully subscribe to its detailed ideology and methodology, although this is rare. Conversely, individuals within mujāhid groups fighting original disbelievers—colonizers and external enemies—may adhere to the ideology of the Jihādī current, and this is common. This is particularly true for mujāhid groups that originated from the Muslim Brotherhood or Salafī current groups. However, the focus of these groups was on external enemies, and they did not adopt an overt methodology in this regard, mostly for operational and political reasons, or sometimes for methodological ones.

Therefore, after this detailed explanation, I return to summarize the definition: Jihādīs or the Jihādī current are the groups or individuals who espouse the idea of armed Jihād against existing governments in the Islāmic world or against external enemies, and adhere to a specific ideology based on the principles of Divine Sovereignty, the rules of loyalty and disavowal, and the fundamentals of contemporary Jihādī politico-legal thought, as detailed and known in their literature.

If we wish to classify the groups and individuals who practiced armed Jihād during the second half of the twentieth century up to the present day—who mostly constitute what is termed the "armed Jihādī phenomenon"—to gain a more specific understanding of the substance of the preceding definition, we find that two types of classification are possible:

First: according to their fields of Jihād and the enemy they targeted.

Second: according to their methodologies of thought, belief, and politico-legal approach.

However, before that, it is necessary to draw attention to the important distinction between mujāhid or Jihādī groups, and those organizations that bear arms against various forms of the Ummah's enemies, but not as Jihād in the path of Allāh, not to make the word of Allāh supreme, nor as the performance of the obligation of Jihād with the intention of religious duty as an act of worship. Rather, their motives are different, perhaps for national liberation, or for political reasons against dictatorial governments, to change the existing non-religious system and establish another non-religious system based on principles of nationalism, patriotism, democracy, socialism, communism, or other contemporary secular political and intellectual doctrines.

These latter are resistance or militant organizations, not mujāhid or Jihādī ones. Bearing arms may be for reasons of manliness, zeal, courage, ostentation, or vainglory, and so forth. Their actions, though perhaps commendable from a national, liberationist, or resistance perspective, are not considered an act of worship for which the perpetrator is rewarded, nor will they have recompense in the Hereafter. Their death is not martyrdom in the path of Allāh; rather, their emigration and death are according to their intention. Indeed, they may be sinful or even apostate depending on the objectives for which they fought. For Jihād is that which is in the path of Allāh and to make His word supreme. And the martyr (shahīd), as defined by the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him), is one who fights so that the word of Allāh is supreme; he is in the path of Allāh.

As for the mujāhidīn who constitute the individuals of the Jihādī phenomenon, they are those who fight in the path of Allāh as an act of devotion to Him and in fulfillment of an obligation He has enjoined upon Muslims in specific circumstances.

They undertake Jihād as a religious, devotional act. This must be clear. The classification of the types of mujāhidīn today, based on what has been mentioned, is as follows. This will help define the Jihādī current and distinguish it from other components of the "contemporary armed Jihādī phenomenon" in general.

Second: Classification of the Components of the Jihādī Phenomenon

Classification of the Components of the Jihādī Phenomenon According to Their Fields of Jihād and the Enemies They Fought:

1. The Jihādī Current (or Jihādī Groups/Organizations, or Jihādīs):

These are the groups and individuals who have adopted the idea of Jihād against the apostate, tyrannical governments in Arab and Islāmic countries, in order to overthrow them and establish the rule of Allāh's Sharī'ah upon their ruins, or to repel their oppression against Muslims, based on a specific Jihādī politico-legal ideology that will be explained, Allāh willing.

Members of these organizations and groups may participate, collectively or individually, in other types of Jihād, such as repelling an aggressor and Jihād against external enemies, as in Afghanistan, Bosnia, Chechnya, and elsewhere. However, the basis of their formation and their objectives generally make them organizations that are secretive in movement, national (or country-specific) in objectives, and hierarchical in organizational structure. Its members are bound to a leadership and a commander (amīr) through an oath of allegiance (bay'ah) for Jihād and to work towards achieving these goals.

2. Mujāhid Groups or Organizations:

These are organizations and groups that specialize in Jihād against aggressing enemies in Muslim lands, especially Jews (as in Palestine), occupying Crusaders like the Americans (as in the Arabian Peninsula, Iraq, and elsewhere currently), Westerners in general, atheists like the Russians or Chinese, or polytheists as in Chechnya, Bosnia, India, Kashmir, and Southeast Asia, or any type of external enemy.

Often, these organizations take the form of national liberation movements, but on an Islāmic and Jihādī basis, as mentioned earlier, with the aim of liberating those lands and then subjecting them to Islāmic rule, or in defense of religion, land, honor, life, and property, as an act of worship and a religious obligation.

3. Mujāhid Groups and Individuals Acting to Change Wrongdoing with Arms or to Repel Injustice:

This phenomenon is mostly based on individual Jihād and personal initiatives. Often, they lack defined groups or a commander (amīr); rather, they are individuals or small, scattered elements who undertake armed Jihādī actions with the intention of seeking reward from Allāh (iḥtisāb), enjoining good and forbidding evil, fulfilling a devotional obligation, and based on religious perceptions and motives, to remove some wrongdoing here or there. This can include actions such as destroying places of alcohol, fornication, debauchery, or corruption, or assassinating a prominent figure of disbelief, oppression, or aggression against Muslims, their religion, rituals, or sanctities, or to remove any manifestation they consider religiously reprehensible and believe must be removed by force after it became impossible to do so by word or in the heart.

I am not here to evaluate the correctness, error, or utility of these actions, nor whether they achieved the goal of removing wrongdoing or led to greater evils. Rather, I mention this category here as a type of mujāhidīn who undertook such actions as an act of worship and a religious duty, this being the basis of their intention.

Classification of the Components of the Jihādī Phenomenon According to Their Methodologies of Thought and Politico-Legal Approach:

They are primarily divided into two main types:

1. Methodological Groups:

These are groups that possess a specific and detailed intellectual, politico-legal methodology, and a defined stance based on Sharīʿah regarding general politico-legal, doctrinal, and intellectual issues.

2. Non-Methodological Groups:

These are groups whose members have united to perform the obligation of Jihād for a legally sanctioned objective—such as repelling an aggressor, removing wrongdoing, repelling injustice, fighting a government, or similar aims—and to bear arms, without having a detailed politico-legal methodology that defines their stance on political and other issues.

Methodological Jihādī groups are divided into three main categories:

1. Activist Jihādī Groups:

Most of these emerged from the Islāmic awakening in the early 1960s and carried influences from the thought of the Muslim Brotherhood, in addition to the ideology based on the principles of loyalty and disavowal, and Divine Sovereignty. Among the earliest and greatest proponents of this ideology were the martyr Sayyid Quṭb in Egypt and Professor Abū al-Aʿlā Mawdūdī in Pakistan.

2. Salafī Jihādī Groups:

These are Jihādī groups that, in addition to the aforementioned ideology, adopted a reliance on the doctrines of the Salaf (pious predecessors) according to the legal verdicts (fatāwā) of Imām Ibn Taymiyyah and similar leading figures of the Salafī school. They also adopted the jurisprudence of the Najdī mission and the ideas of Imām Muḥammad ibn ‘Abd al-Wahhāb (may Allāh have mercy on them), as well as the ideas of those who followed this path after them.

3. Reformist and Educational Mujāhid Groups (Sufi Jihādī groups, Jihādī scholars' groups, etc.):

These are groups founded on educational, scholarly, doctrinal (madhhabī), or Sufi order (ṭarīqah) principles, possessing an organizational structure whose members are bound by an oath of allegiance (bay‘ah) to their leader, shaykh, or commander. They then took up arms for Jihād, usually against external enemies, or sometimes in internal matters.

Non-methodological Jihādī groups are also divided into two types:

1. Organized Mujāhid Groups:

These are groups whose members are bound by an oath of allegiance (bay‘ah), a commander (amīr), and a leadership. They have administrative and organizational structures. Their members are united by the Jihādī cause for which they have gathered, such as repelling an aggressor, removing any wrongdoing, or confronting any form of enemy to Islām and Muslims. However, they lack a specific intellectual framework for doctrine and education.

2. Unorganized Mujāhid Blocs, Individuals, and Gatherings:

These are efforts by individuals, small blocs, or scattered mujāhid elements who have undertaken legitimate Jihādī actions in various places, but without any single individual or the collective group possessing a specific ideology, a methodology for doctrine and education, or a bond uniting their members.

This chapter specifically focuses on studying some features and experiences of the armed Jihādī current. It is the most prominent and significant component of the armed Jihādī phenomenon. It is the most impactful, indeed forming the basis of the phenomenon, and the most important aspect in terms of scale, impact, and the future of the confrontation between us and our enemies, and Allāh knows best.

Third: The Emergence of the Contemporary Jihādī Current and its Intellectual and Activist Stages of Development (1960 - 2001)

The birth of Jihādī current groups and organizations is considered a natural product of the political developments in the post-independence (albeit nominal) era from occupation in Arab and Islāmic countries. It is also considered a natural phased development and a spontaneous offshoot of the contemporary Islāmic awakening, which had begun around the fall of the Caliphate, i.e., the early 1930s, at least three decades before the birth of the Jihādī current, depending on the recency or antiquity of the Islāmic awakening's emergence and the conditions of each country, its occupation circumstances, and its general political situation.

As discussed in the previous two chapters, modern colonialism in Arab and Islāmic lands undertook the destruction of the Ummah's elements of resistance and renaissance after the fall of the Caliphate. It succeeded in dismantling the foundations of political, religious, and social authorities in most Arab and Islāmic countries. The qualitative shift in colonial methods, from old (direct military) colonialism in Muslim lands to modern (economic, political, and cultural) colonialism, and its installation of apostate governments comprised of secularist generations or treacherous, collaborationist factions to act as its proxies in achieving its objectives, led to the Ummah's withdrawal from the field of direct confrontation. This was due to the obscured role of the external colonizer and the assumption of power by local "national" governments. By the nature of things, these governments were bound to clash with the various components of the Islāmic awakening, which had primarily arisen to return Muslims—in one way or another, according to each school's leanings and methodologies—to a life based on the teachings of their religion and governance by its Sharī'ah.

All post-independence governments in the Arab and Islāmic world, without exception, were established on secular foundations that separated religion from the state. They all ruled by other than what Allāh revealed, and renegades from among their own people undertook the task of legislating without Allāh's authority, just as they undertook the task of collaborating with and showing allegiance to the Ummah's enemies, openly serving their objectives. This was in addition to the characteristics of oppression, tyranny, despotism, and various forms of administrative and behavioral corruption that all these governments, without exception, exhibited.

Colonialism implanted the Zionist entity in the heart of the Islāmic world in Palestine. The state of Israel was officially established in 1947 on most of Palestinian land, and then Israel completed its occupation, in addition to parts of Egypt, Syria, Jordan, and Lebanon, in 1967.

The Palestinian issue became a massive burden on the conscience of the Arab and Islāmic world. Western colonialism consolidated its economic occupation of the Arab and Islāmic world and plundered its resources, supporting and preserving the dictatorial governments it had established therein.

Thus, the grassroots and leadership of the Islāmic awakening found themselves facing this painful and strange reality that followed the colonial era. Various schools of thought and opinions emerged within the awakening itself to address this reality, leading to the differentiation of its schools and trends, as we saw in the fifth chapter.

While some believed the solution lay in education, reform, and withdrawal from politics, others saw the solution and reform in entering its arenas through legally permissible channels provided by those governments. A third group (the one we are concerned with in this chapter) believed that the breach had widened beyond repair and that it was necessary to take up arms to remedy these conditions. This was especially after those governments and their oppressive apparatuses proved ready to consistently clip the wings of the awakening by liquidating its leaders through assassination or imprisoning them for decades, persecuting their followers, and restricting all avenues of calling to Allāh, even peaceful ones. It was here, at the end of the 1950s and the beginning of the 1960s, that the initial ideas for the birth of the contemporary Jihādī current began to crystallize.

The Muslim Brotherhood movement (primarily) was the natural incubator where such ideas could be born and spread. The call of Ḥasan al-Bannā (may Allāh have mercy on him) had created a suitable climate for these developments. There is no clearer indication of this than its slogan, which summarized its methodology: "Allāh is our objective. The Messenger is our leader. The Qur'ān is our constitution. Jihād is our way. Death in the path of Allāh is our highest aspiration." This was despite its thought and practices carrying much intellectual and methodological intermingling from Sufī, Salafī, nationalist, democratic, and other influences. Its initial Jihādī practices also served as further proof of its suitability to be an incubator for the birth of the Jihādī current and thought within its fold.

The leaders and youth of the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt and Syria participated in the Palestine War of 1947-1948. Ḥasan al-Bannā formed his special secret apparatus, the military wing of the group, for Jihādī objectives. After Ḥasan al-Bannā's assassination in 1949 (may Allāh have mercy on him), members of this apparatus led and managed the secret resistance in the Suez Canal zone and its surroundings in the early 1950s. The apparatus participated in supporting the movement of ‘Abd al-Nāṣir and the Free Officers in overthrowing King Fārūq. However, this perished individual (Nāṣir) had arranged with the enemies of this Ummah a program that included the liquidation of the Islāmic movement in Egypt, spearheaded by the Muslim Brotherhood.

He imprisoned their leadership and thousands of their rank-and-file in 1954, expanded his campaign against them, and executed some of them in 1965, including some of its finest thinkers and leading figures. This was in Egypt. As for Syria, the other important incubator for the Muslim Brotherhood movement, military coups swept away the national democratic post-independence governments that had succeeded one another since 1946. From 1954 onwards, coups sponsored by American intelligence and its experiments in Syria followed one another until the atmosphere was prepared for the Arab Socialist Ba‘th Party to stage its coup in 1963. One of its top priorities was the liquidation of the Islāmic awakening, including the Muslim Brotherhood and others, and fighting Islām in all its components. Egypt and Syria constituted the early incubators for the birth and crystallization of Jihādī thought and its operational theories. This pattern was repeated in various Arab and Islāmic countries. These political, social, and cultural transformations, and the Westernization and secularization campaigns undertaken by various governments, raised important questions for the thought and methodology of the Islāmic awakening.

In Pakistan, during the 1950s, the writings of the brilliant and unique scholar Abū al-A‘lā Mawdūdī (may Allāh have mercy on him) formed essential material for the crystallization of Jihādī thought. He (may Allāh have mercy on him) criticized the stagnant state of traditional religious circles in Pakistan. Through his books, articles, and the newspaper of his movement, which he founded under the name "Jamā'at-e-Islāmī in Pakistan," he addressed many of the most important politico-legal issues based on Sharī'ah and presented the contemporary reality of Muslims through them. He wrote about the requisites of the testimony of Tawhīd, the foundations of loyalty and disavowal, defined Jihād, its purposes, and objectives. He wrote about the birth of the Islāmic state, its characteristics, its constitution, its specifications, and the path to its establishment. One of his most important books, "Four Basic Qur'ānic Terms" (Al-Muṣṭalaḥāt al-Arba'ah), contained many fundamentals of contemporary Jihādī thought.

However, the undisputed pioneer of Jihādī thought in the modern era, to whose ideas the birth of the thinking methodology and movement theories in the "contemporary Jihādī current" can be attributed, was undoubtedly the martyred teacher, Professor Sayyid Quṭb (may Allāh have mercy on him). He began his life as a man of letters, a poet, and a critical researcher simultaneously. He experienced intellectual maturation during the tumultuous and critical era of contemporary Egyptian history in the 1940s, 1950s, and 1960s, which saw the demise of the monarchy and the Free Officers' revolution, the occupation of Palestine, and the aggression against Egypt. He interacted closely with the Muslim Brotherhood and was influenced by their movement. His study trip to America had a profound impact on his discovery of the nature of the contemporary Crusader campaign against the Arab and Islāmic world, in addition to the penetrating insight Allāh endowed him with, a captivating pen, and a transparent spirit. The prison environment, where 'Abd al-Nāṣir incarcerated him with most of the Muslim Brotherhood leaders from the early 1950s to the mid-1960s, formed the general milieu in which he penned his brilliant writings, which are rightly considered the intellectual and methodological foundation of the contemporary Jihādī current in the Arab and Islāmic world. His unique book, "In the Shade of the Qur'ān" (Fī Zīlāl al-Qur'ān), an activist interpretation of the Qur'ānic verses in light of narrations transmitted by exegetes, contained the essence of the activist theories of contemporary Jihādī thought and the essence of the concepts Sayyid wished to propound. His book "Milestones" (Ma'ālim fī al-Ṭarīq), despite its small size, was the most important, containing the quintessence of that thought and its revolutionary, transformative Jihādī propositions. His extensive library of other books, such as "Characteristics of the Islāmic Conception" (Khaṣā'iṣ al-Taṣawwur al-Islāmī), "This Religion" (Hādhā al-Dīn), and "Jāhiliyyah of the Twentieth Century" (Jāhiliyyat al-Qarn al-ʿIshrīn), among others, constituted an integrated methodology for a contemporary activist Jihādī thought suitable for that era.

Sayyid's thought (may Allāh have mercy on him) represented a qualitative leap in the intellectual trajectory of the Islāmic awakening in general and the Muslim Brotherhood in particular. The "mother" movement, as they called it, had to define its position regarding these propositions.

The traditional leadership of the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt adopted a rejecting and oppositional stance towards Sayyid and his ideas. His theories on Divine Sovereignty, loyalty and disavowal, separation from Jāhiliyyah, and distinct identity and methodology represented a significant divergence. The Brotherhood had to decide whether to proceed with him towards development or to part ways in a reactionary move that would deviate them even from fundamental principles previously part of their methodology.

The Brotherhood chose the second path to avoid confrontation with the authorities, and the effects of imprisonment, oppression, and whippings became evident in their new intellectual features. The General Guide, Ḥasan al-Huḍaybī (may Allāh have mercy on him), wrote his famous book "Preachers, Not Judges" (Du'āh lā Quḍāh) in response to "Milestones" and the ideas of confrontation and clash with the Jāhiliyyah embodied by the existing political system, and the transformation it imposes on societies, as presented in "In the Shade of the Qur'ān." Here, the Muslim Brotherhood movement and the contemporary political awakening diverged into two distinct and contradictory schools. "Milestones" and Sayyid's thought in general embodied the ideology of Divine Sovereignty, distinctness, and separation, consequently leading to the judgment of disbelief and apostasy upon existing ruling systems and an explicit call for Jihād against them, outlining the path for this Jihād.

The book "Preachers, Not Judges," as its expressive title indicates, represented the new methodology of the Muslim Brotherhood and the beginning of the path of regression they embarked upon since then. The essence of its theory was that the pioneers of the Islāmic awakening are callers to Islām and reform, not judges over rulers and people and their conditions, to the extent of determining their affiliation with Islām or their departure from it. This book formed one of the most important pillars of contemporary political Murji'ism (deferral of judgment) in the burgeoning Islāmic movement, as its testimony included the apostate, disbelieving authorities and their pillars in Egypt and elsewhere as being within Islām.

These two books and these two lines of thought marked the beginning of the formation of the two main schools within the Islāmic awakening: the political school and the Jihādī school. This intellectual atmosphere, as previously explained, also led to the birth of the deviant school of excommunication (takfīr) in Egyptian prisons, on the margins of these intellectual conflicts, as has already been detailed.

I am not here to review the intellectual path of the political awakening. I return to tracing the Jihādī current and the beginning of the emergence of its methodologies and organizations.

Despite the importance of Sayyid's writings and their primacy in generating the intellectual identity of the Jihādī current, other important writings also emerged during that period in Egypt. Foremost among them are the writings of the martyred legal scholar Professor ‘Abd al-Qādir ‘ūdah (may Allāh have mercy on him), whom ‘Abd al-Nāṣir executed, as well as the writings of the Ḥadīth scholar Shaykh Aḥmad Shākir (may Allāh have mercy on him), and others. Sayyid Quṭb (may Allāh have mercy on him) attempted to put his ideas into practice and tried to form the first secret Jihādī organization embodying those ideas, composed of a group of mujāhid youth, most of whom were members of the Muslim Brotherhood. However, his nascent experiment was quickly aborted, and he was executed on charges related to it (may Allāh have mercy on him). Thus, a wonderful saying and a righteous, highly significant vision he had seen in prison came true for him. Some of his contemporaries in prison narrated that shortly before his execution, he saw in a dream his writing desk drawer, which contained the papers on which he had written his ideas, open, and sparrows came, took the papers, and flew with them in every direction. He interpreted this as the spread of his thought throughout the world. And the saying that also came true for his writings is:

The martyred teacher Sayyid Quṭb (may Allāh the Exalted have mercy on him) said: "Not every word reaches the hearts of others, moving them, uniting them, and propelling them. It is the words that drip blood because they feed on the heart of a living human being. Every word that has lived has fed on a human heart. As for the words born in mouths, uttered by tongues, and not connected to that living divine spring, they were born dead and have not pushed humanity forward even an inch. No one will adopt them because they were born dead, and people do not adopt the dead."

And so, Sayyid's thought spread throughout the world. I saw his book "Milestones" in Afghanistan translated into Pashto and Persian. Indeed, I was informed that one of the old mujāhidīn from the days of the Jihād against the Russians entered a school in Nuristan—very remote, extremely rugged mountainous areas in the midst of the Hindu Kush mountains on the northern border of Kashmir and China, near Badakhshan and the Wakhan Corridor, situated at an altitude of more than 5,000 meters above sea level—in an area untouched by any elements of civilization, neither water nor electricity nor anything else. He said he entered one of the schools and found Sayyid Quṭb's "Milestones" translated into the Nuristani language!

Glory be to Allāh! The migrating sparrows of truth had carried it and landed it there decades after his execution (may Allāh have mercy on him). Perhaps there is no living language of Muslims today into which many of Sayyid's books (may Allāh have mercy on him) have not been translated, let alone into global languages. This giant, whose intellectual impact the Crusaders and their leader America realize today in their campaign to combat terrorism, has become a primary target for their current intellectual and media campaign to fight, denigrate, and distort his legacy, and for their attack on educational curricula in our countries in general, and religious education curricula in particular.

As for Syria, the second important incubator for the emergence of the Islāmic awakening and the "contemporary Jihādī current," the martyred Shaykh Marwān Ḥadīd (may Allāh have mercy on him) appeared during the same period (1960-1965). He had gone to study in Egypt, embraced the thought of the Muslim Brotherhood, and returned as a member. The call was strong in Syria in the late 1950s. Shaykh Marwān Ḥadīd (may Allāh have mercy on him) became convinced that an affliction like the Baʿth Party, whose leadership was increasingly dominated by Nuṣayrī elements preparing to seize power, could only be confronted through Jihād. He held ideas similar to Sayyid's and was influenced by him. Shaykh Marwān was not a writer but a brilliant orator and an activist mujāhid poet. He founded the "Fighting Vanguard Organization of Hizb Allāh" (Tanẓīm al-Ṭalīʿah al-Muqātilah li-Hizb Allāh), as he initially named it, which later transformed into the "Fighting Vanguard of the Muslim Brotherhood" (al-Ṭalīʿah al-Muqātilah lil-Ikhwān al-Muslimīn). He made a Jihādī attempt that was crushed by the tanks of the Baʿthist authorities in 1965. He tried again in 1970, but was soon arrested and then executed in 1975 (may Allāh have mercy on him).

After him, his students undertook the mission of igniting the longest contemporary Jihādī revolution against a government in the Arab world (1975-1982). Shaykh Saʿīd Ḥawwā (may Allāh have mercy on him) emerged within the Muslim Brotherhood in Syria, and his books, which carried Jihādī thought and made important additions to it during the 1970s and 1980s, were published successively. Most of them bore the series title "In Construction" (Fī al-Bināʾ). Among them were books such as "Allāh," "The Messenger," "Islām," and "An Introduction to the Call of the Muslim Brotherhood." Some of his most important books that theorized Jihādī thought were "A Step Forward on the Path of Blessed Jihād" (Khuṭwah ilā al-Amām ʿalā Ṭarīq al-Jihād al-Mubārak), "Soldiers of Allāh: Culture and Ethics" (Jund Allāh Thaḳāfatan wa Akhlāqan), and "Soldiers of Allāh: Organization and Planning" (Jund Allāh Tanẓīman wa Takhtīṭan). These represented the peak of his Jihādī intellectual output. Thereafter, he suffered an intellectual decline as a result of the failed trajectory of Jihādī work in Syria, which eventually led him to democratic and Sufi aberrations that appeared in his later writings (may Allāh have mercy on him and forgive him).

I believe that from there—from Egypt and the Levant (al-Shām)—was the beginning. As for most other Arab countries, local political conditions and the colonial situation were similar, and this thought spread from Egypt and Syria to Sudan, Iraq, Lebanon, and Jordan due to proximity.

Due to the early independence of Syria and Egypt, and the advancement of their education systems compared to almost all other Arab countries, all the Arabian Peninsula states imported teachers from Egypt and Syria for primary, intermediate, and secondary education, and even for university education, especially in the faculties of Sharīʿah, arts, law, humanities, and others. Likewise, most North African countries, particularly Algeria during the "Arabization" revolution led by Algerian President Houari Boumédiène after independence to counter the Francization policy imposed by France over 130 years of colonialism, also imported teachers from Egypt and Syria.

Given that the call of the Muslim Brotherhood had spread widely among teachers and the educational sector in Egypt and Syria, many of those teachers were proponents of the Brotherhood or influenced by their call. This was one of the most important reasons for the transmission of the mother call—the fundamental pillar of the political and later Jihādī awakening—to those countries. This was in addition to the general spread of the local Islāmic awakening phenomenon in all those countries, the proliferation of Islāmic books and their trade, the abundance of printing presses and newspapers, and the active cultural movement in the Arab and Islāmic world during the post-independence era.

Thus, the winds of the Islāmic awakening and its schools blew across the Arab and Islāmic world, and its schools, organizations, and groups mutually influenced each other.

However, the activist thought of the Jihādī current, and its primary intellectual incubator—namely, the thought of the Muslim Brotherhood—swept across the Arab and Islāmic world mainly from Egypt and Syria (the Levant).

This activist thought, which formed within the Muslim Brotherhood movement, then developed, became independent, and distinguished itself in "Quṭbist" thought—named after Sayyid Quṭb (may Allāh have mercy on him)—was one of two components of contemporary Jihādī current ideology. The writings of his brother, Professor Muḥammad Quṭb, after him, and what was added to this school from the writings of Muslim Brotherhood authors from various countries in the 1970s, also contributed. Another important component that joined in its formation came from the Arabian Peninsula, from the lands of Najd and Ḥijāz, which were falsely named "Saudi Arabia."

The third Saudi state was established—as previously indicated—with British planning and support, and King ‘Abd al-‘Azīz Āl Sa‘ūd was crowned sultan over the lands of Najd and Ḥijāz and their annexes, forming the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia in 1935. The marketable commodity that ‘Abd al-‘Azīz seized upon, to be the substance of his propaganda and deception of the people, was his claim of reviving the call of Shaykh Muḥammad ibn ‘Abd al-Wahhāb (may Allāh have mercy on him). This call had been almost eradicated with the fall of the second Saudi state during its conflict with the Ottoman Caliphate, which had enlisted the ruler of Egypt at the time, Muḥammad ‘Alī Pasha, for this task.

‘Abd al-‘Azīz's sons inherited from him the business of trading in the Wahhābī call. And Allāh had a subtle plan concerning them and the enemies of Islām. The sons continued their father's trade in the Wahhābī call. They established numerous institutions and expended great efforts and vast sums of money for this purpose. Many sincere individuals dedicated to the call and religion worked in this field.

Thus, a generation of men of the Islāmic awakening was educated during the three decades of the 1960s, 1970s, and 1980s under senior scholars who inherited and carried the Wahhābī call.

With a suitable atmosphere and abundant funds due to the oil boom during that period, the Wahhābī call flourished with the support of successive Saudi governments.

The call of Shaykh Muḥammad ibn ‘Abd al-Wahhāb and the great imāms of the Najdī mission was revived, and their valuable books were published. The heritage of Shaykh Ibn Taymiyyah and his student Ibn al-Qayyim (may Allāh the Exalted have mercy on them) was also revived, as were the books of other proponents of the Salafī creed and the school of Ahl al-Ḥadīth. The Saudi government undertook the printing and distribution of millions of copies of these works over the years.

Governmental and private religious institutions and Saudi universities undertook their printing, publication, teaching, and dissemination throughout the Islāmic world. Many sincere and distinguished scholars from the Arabian Peninsula and those who studied under them carried out this work.

The focus of the Wahhābī call and the Salafī creed, as is known, was on reviving the jurisprudence of evidence (fiqh al-dalīl), the methodology of Ahl al-Ḥadīth, and the doctrines of Ahl al-Sunnah wa-l-Jamā‘ah. It concentrated on combating innovations and deviations that had infiltrated through many deviant Sufi orders and the stagnation, submission, and intellectual backwardness they had left behind. This call also focused on the issue of loyalty and disavowal, supporting the people of faith, and opposing disbelievers such as Jews, Christians, polytheists, and their allies among the hypocrites. This call, as is well-known, also emphasizes the purification of Tawhīd, singling out Allāh in His Lordship (rubūbiyyah) and Divinity (ulūhiyyah), and affirming His transcendence through His names and attributes. It stresses the excommunication of anyone who disputes Allāh's Lordship or Divinity through legislation, polytheism, or judgment contrary to His judgment, and so on.

It was part of Saudi policy, for the propagandistic purposes of the rulers which coincided with the aims of sincere callers, to bring hundreds of thousands of foreign students from various Islāmic countries as expatriates for study, and to open scholarships for them in Saudi universities specializing in religious education, such as Imām Muḥammad ibn Sa‘ūd Islāmic University and the Islāmic University of Madīnah, among others.

In these circles, hundreds of thousands of young Muslim students graduated, carrying these ideas back to their countries from the early 1960s until the present, though the Saudi government is now trying to change this approach in response to America's program to alter the intellectual and cultural structure of Muslims as part of the war of ideas within its comprehensive war on what it calls terrorism, extremism, and fundamentalism in the Arab and Islāmic world.

As I mentioned, thousands of teachers from Egypt and Syria had gone to Saudi Arabia during that period, many of whom were proponents of the Muslim Brotherhood and pioneers of the Islāmic awakening in general.

Saudi Arabia, especially during the reign of King Fayṣal, also became a natural refuge for persecuted and exiled Muslim Brotherhood leaders from Egypt under ʿAbd al-Nāṣir, as Fayṣal was in conflict with him. Many Muslim Brotherhood callers and shaykhs from Syria also fled there due to Baʿthist persecution since the mid-1960s. Most of these individuals worked as teachers in Islāmic universities in Saudi Arabia.

A very important amalgamation occurred there during the three crucial decades of the awakening (1960-1990) between the activist thought of the Muslim Brotherhood school, especially its Quṭbist branch, and the doctrinal thought and jurisprudential heritage of the Salafī call and the Wahhābī school. This amalgamation then returned to Egypt and the Levant, and subsequently to the rest of the Arab and Islāmic world.

This amalgamation gave birth to two very important schools within the Islāmic awakening since the mid-1970s:

- The Surūriyyah School:

(Named after one of its early proponents). Its methodology is based on a mixture of Muslim Brotherhood activism and Salafī-Wahhābī thought. It is a theoretical, intellectual, political, and daʿwah-oriented school, which practically had no movement whose operational experience could be recorded. We are not concerned with discussing it here.

● The Salafī Jihādiyyah School:

Its methodology consists of a mixture of Quṭbist activist Jihādī thought with the adoption of the Salafī creed and the methodology of the Wahhābī call. This is the primary intellectual and methodological identity that characterized the Jihādī current during the 1980s and 1990s, which is the current we are discussing in this chapter.

In short, I point to a matter of utmost importance in understanding the intellectual identity of the contemporary Jihādī current.

The Muslim Brotherhood methodology, with its political and educational character, and Quṭbist activism, with its distinct character of separation based on the principles of Divine Sovereignty, formed the politico-legal and activist dimension in the thinking methodology of the contemporary Jihādī current.

Similarly, the Salafī methodology and many influences from the Wahhābī call and its jurisprudential output formed the jurisprudential and doctrinal foundation that answered most of the pending politico-legal questions raised by the activist Jihādī methodology and its call for confrontation with the ruling systems of ignorance in the Islāmic world. This included:

Establishing Sharīʿah proof for the disbelief of rulers governing by other than what Allāh revealed and allying with the enemies of Muslims, then the sequence of Sharīʿah rulings that follow, such as rulings on rebelling against them, nullifying their legitimacy, and fighting their supporters, among dozens of other derivative Sharīʿah issues.

When most schools of the Islāmic awakening adopted the democratic path and proposed various conceptions to answer the question of the problem and solution in the contemporary reality of Muslims, and the different schools of the Islāmic awakening engaged in numerous intellectual and jurisprudential debates, the jurisprudence of Imām Ibn Taymiyyah, the Salafī methodology, and the heritage of the Wahhābī school formed the primary basis for the Jihādī current in navigating these contests.

Thus, we can summarize the intellectual structure of the contemporary Jihādī current with the following equation:

Fundamentals of Muslim Brotherhood thought + Activist methodology of the martyr Sayyid Quṭb + Politico-legal jurisprudence of Imām Ibn Taymiyyah and the Salafī school + Doctrinal and jurisprudential heritage of the Wahhābī call = The politico-legal activist methodology of the Jihādī current.

The primary arena for the maturation of these intellectual and methodological components during the 1970s and 1980s was in Egypt, the Levant, and the Arabian Peninsula, especially in the Land of the Two Holy Sanctuaries (Saudi Arabia). From there, it spread to other countries, as I will explain later, noting that each of these arenas in Arab and Muslim lands, the nature of its awakening components, and its stage of maturity had an impact on the nature of the Jihādī thought born there and the nature of the experience accordingly.

The impact was direct and rapid in Jordan, Lebanon, and Yemen. It was slow in countries like Iraq due to its strict security regime. The impact was limited in the Arab Gulf states and Saudi Arabia due to the nature of their oil-based societies, small populations, and the stagnation of intellectual and cultural life there at that time. As for Libya and the Maghreb countries, this was delayed due to the late emergence of the Islāmic awakening there until the early 1970s, owing to their independence circumstances, the nature of their regimes, and the deep Western influence of French colonialism. However, early Jihādī attempts were recorded in Morocco (1963) and Algeria (1973), without any influence from or connection to the intellectual wave of the Eastern-born Jihādī current that we are discussing. Similarly, the impact was limited in the Horn of Africa and Somalia due to their circumstances, as most influences of the awakening reached them late, through students who went to study in the West or in neighboring Arab countries like Saudi Arabia, Egypt, and Sudan, were influenced by the ideas of the awakening, and returned with them to their countries to merge with local awakening data and conditions.

This was also roughly the case in countries on the peripheries of the Islāmic world, such as Indonesia, the Philippines, East Asian countries, and Central Africa, as well as the Soviet republics in Central Asia and the Caucasus.

The Muslim countries most affected by and influential in the Islāmic awakening and its general schools in the Arab world were Pakistan and Turkey, due to proximity and overlap in more than one field.

As for the Jihādī current, in terms of the birth of its ideology and the transition of its adherents to the field of application and confrontation with governments, its emergence in different places was linked to several factors, such as political, social, cultural, and economic conditions in each country, in addition to the level and type of the Islāmic awakening and the arrival of the Jihādī current's intellectual influences to that place.

Then came the Afghan Jihād experience (1984-1992), leading to the formation of the Jihādī school whose members were called "Arab Afghans," ushering the Jihādī current into a phase of globalization, as we shall see in the following section, Allāh willing.

Several Jihādī attempts were made by various groups of the Jihādī current against some existing regimes in the Arab and Islāmīc world, at different levels and scales, from the early 1960s to the end of the twentieth century. The most important of these, according to their chronological order and as far as I recall, are as follows:

Most Important Armed Attempts and Experiences of the Jihādī Current (1960 - 2000)

1. The Moroccan Youth Movement (Ḥarakat al-Shabībah al-Maghribiyyah) in Morocco (Marrakesh), led by Shaykh ‘Abd al-Karīm Muṭī‘, against the government of the late King Ḥasan II, who met his demise (1963).
2. The attempt by the martyred Shaykh Sayyid Quṭb (may Allāh have mercy on him) and the Jihād Organization against the rule of ‘Abd al-Nāṣir in Egypt (1965).
3. The movement of the martyred Shaykh Marwān Ḥadīd (may Allāh have mercy on him) against Ba‘thist rule in Syria (1965).
4. Jihād movements against communist regimes in Afghanistan before the Soviet occupation (1965-1975).
5. The experience of the Vanguard Organization (EkiNGiLAR) in Turkey during the civil war (1972).
6. The Islāmīc State movement led by the martyred Shaykh Muṣṭafā Būya‘lī (may Allāh have mercy on him) in Algeria (1973-1976).
7. The Islāmīc Jihādī Revolution in Syria led by the Fighting Vanguard, students of Shaykh Marwān Ḥadīd (1975-1982).
8. The Jihād Organization and al-Jamā‘ah al-Islāmiyyah movement in Egypt against Anwar Sādāt, then against his successor Ḥusnī Mubārak (1981-1997).
9. The Jihādī attempt against Gaddafi's rule in Libya (1986).
10. Some limited Jihādī attempts and the coup attempt by the military wing of the Islāmīc Tendency Movement (Ḥarakat al-Ittijāh al-Islāmī) in Tunisia (1986).

11. Jihādī experiences of various groups in Algeria starting from (1991).
12. Jihādī confrontations against the communist regime in Tajikistan since (1992).
13. Limited Jihādī attempts in the Land of the Two Holy Sanctuaries (Saudi Arabia) since (1994).
14. Jihādī confrontations in Libya (1994-1996) and the experience of the Libyan Islāmic Fighting Group (al-Jamā'ah al-Islāmiyyah al-Muqātilah).
15. The armed uprising of the Movement for the Enforcement of Sharī'ah (Ḥarakat Nafādh Sharī'at) in northwestern Pakistan (1996).
16. Attempts to form Jihādī groups in Morocco since (1996).
17. The Jihādī attempt against the pro-American communist regime of Karimov in Uzbekistan, and the formation of the Islāmic Movement of Uzbekistan (1998).
18. The Jihādī experience of the Aden-Abyan Army in Yemen since (1999).
19. The Jihādī attempt in the Nabaṭiyyah mountains in Lebanon (2000).

During the same period, numerous Jihādī movements and confrontations against various forms of foreign occupation and aggression on Muslim countries also took place. I have classified these under the heading of Mujāhid Movements and Organizations to distinguish them—for academic classification purposes—from the Jihādī current that we are concerned with, which together with them forms what I have termed the contemporary Jihādī phenomenon during the second half of the twentieth century. Among the most important of these experiences and movements are the following:

Some Experiences of Mujāhid Confrontations and Movements against Foreign Occupation and Aggression:

1. Jihād and resistance movements against Indian occupation in Kashmir and the Indian state of Assam.
2. Jihād movements against Pagans in Burma and Arakan.

3. Mujāhid liberation movements in the Philippines, such as the Moro National Liberation Front (MNLF) and the Abū Sayyāf Group.
4. Groups that waged Jihād in Eritrea against Ethiopian occupation.
5. Mujāhid groups against Ethiopian occupation in the Horn of Africa (Ogaden, Afar, etc.).
6. The Islāmīc Party of Turkistan (Ḥizb al-Islāmī al-Turkistānī), which fights against Chinese occupation of East Turkistan.
7. The Tawhīd Group (Jamā'at al-Tawhīd), formed by Sunni mujāhidīn during the Lebanese civil war, confronting the Christian alliance and Nuṣayrī sectarian forces supported by the Syrian regime (1975-1982).
8. Jihād against Soviet occupation in Afghanistan (1979-1992).
9. The Islāmīc Resistance Movement (Ḥamās) confronting Israeli occupation in Palestine since (1987).
10. The Islāmīc Jihād Movement confronting Israeli occupation in Palestine since (1989).
11. Confrontations of Kurdish Islāmīc groups against Saddam Hussein's regime in Iraq, then against the aggression of secular Kurdish parties in Iraqi Kurdistan, since (1990).
12. The Jihādī experience in Bosnia against Serbian aggression (1994-1996).
13. The Jihādī experience against Russian occupation in Chechnya and the Caucasus since (1995).
14. Jihādī confrontations against Christian aggression in Indonesia since (1998).

Fourth: The Major Turning Point in the History of the Jihādī Current:

The Afghan Jihād against the Russians and the Gathering of Mujāhidīn (Arab Afghans) (1984 - 1992)

The armies of the defunct Russian Soviet Union openly occupied Afghanistan in 1979, after having done so indirectly through several communist military coups since 1965. The invaders' entry led the entire Afghan populace—its tribes, scholars, and various classes—to engage in Jihād and resistance.

As I previously indicated in the course of this research, no one expected this poor, destitute, and underdeveloped nation to withstand such a formidable invasion. It seemed as though America had acquiesced to the annexation of this territory into the colonial inventory of the Russians, just as they had annexed Central Asia, the Caucasus, and other regions. However, the valiant resistance of the Afghan people between 1979 and 1982 caught the attention of the American administration and its senior strategic thinkers, such as former President Nixon, who personally made a field visit at that time to Afghan refugee camps on the Pakistani border.

Consequently, Congress decided to adopt the Afghan Jihād issue as an arena where America could repay the Russians for the Vietnam blow manifold, and even make it the final battleground of the Cold War where that conflict would be decisively settled by a knockout blow, as indeed happened within ten years.

America oversaw the formation of a global alliance to confront the Russians and the Warsaw Pact in Afghanistan. It drew behind it the entire NATO alliance and its member states, Western European countries, as well as its major economic allies like Canada, Australia, and Japan, to form a political, media, and economic alliance supporting it in this war. A financial policy was established, stipulating a share of financial aid, amounting to millions of dollars, from each of these countries, and everyone contributed.

However, the most important part of the alliance America formed to support the Afghan Jihād came from Arab and Islāmic countries, foremost among which, and most significant in their role, were Saudi Arabia, Pakistan, and Egypt, along with the Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC) states. Saudi Arabia and the Gulf states contributed the largest share of financial support for that war, whether officially at the governmental level or through encouraging and permitting the flow of private donations for Jihād in Afghanistan to reach the Afghan mujāhidīn. Saudi Arabia, with its religious authority stemming from its control over the Two Holy Sanctuaries and its religious and academic institutions, also played a prominent media role. Its intelligence chief at the time, Prince Turkī ibn ‘Abd al-‘Azīz, supervised and managed its program.

Pakistan played the main role on the ground. Its border with Afghanistan stretched for more than 2,200 kilometers and contained dozens of major crossings for the delivery of supplies and various forms of support for the Afghan Jihād. Its military intelligence (ISI), headed at the time by General Ḥamīd Gul, played a key role in organizing the Jihādī parties, overseeing the formation and distribution of financial aid and weapons among them, and providing logistical services and various types of field support. This sometimes extended to the Pakistani army's practical participation in combat and support with heavy weapons in border battles; I witnessed this firsthand in the battles of Jalālābād (1989). As for Egypt, its most notable participation was an agreement with the Americans to repay part of its debts to them in the form of arms deals sent to Afghanistan via Pakistan. I also witnessed this; it was common for us to open ammunition and weapon crates bearing the insignia of the Egyptian army. This was because Anwar Sādāt had decided to adopt American armament for the Egyptian army and began to dismantle the Russian presence in Egypt in what became known as the "Open Door" policy (Infitāḥ). Thus, it was beneficial for him to reduce his stockpile of weapons and ammunition that were no longer needed in the late 1970s.

These countries, in addition to most Arab, Islāmic, and even Western countries and their followers, played a highly significant media role in supporting the Afghan Jihād, promoting it, and urging everyone who wished, and even some who did not, to contribute.

As for the third ally that America brought in—or rather, allowed to enter—the line of support for the Afghan Jihād, it was the Islāmic awakening in its entirety and all its movements. Emotions surged spontaneously among the leadership and grassroots of the awakening, driven by religious sympathy for their brethren in faith and creed who were subjected to a war of annihilation and brutal occupation by a power representing the pinnacle of disbelief and atheism from the perspective of Islām and Muslims. Thus, the green light passed from America to its lackeys—the rulers and governments of the Arab and Islāmic world—who in turn signaled it to the Islāmic movements to participate in this broad, indirect alliance where purposes and interests converged. The Arab and Islāmic states had their own interests in this green light in response to their American master: to burnish their reputation by helping Muslims, and to open a door for emigration for the awakening and its cadres, especially its political and Jihādī elements, to vent their fundamentalist desires and feelings far away, thousands of kilometers distant. Perhaps they would find their desired martyrdom in the path of Allāh, and the rulers would be relieved of their clamor in their own countries.

Thus, with the green light flashing for the awakening, Friday sermons, lectures, conferences, festivals, publications, books, newspapers, and all means of expression and propaganda within the awakening ignited, promoting the Afghan Jihād and calling out, "O steeds of Allāh, mount up!" And tens of thousands, for whom happiness in participation was decreed, mounted up.

[I draw attention to the fact that I am writing this paragraph as an eyewitness and participant during that period, having experienced it from 1987 to 1992. I then continued to follow it closely until 1996, when I returned to be present on the ground in its second phase, completely different from the first, during the period extending from mid-1996 to its end in December 2001.]

Thus, at that time, various segments, groups, and organizations of the Islāmic awakening and its different schools found an opportunity to support and benefit from that thriving market, where everyone had their own goal and desire from that participation. This is not the place to review the objectives of each group, what they gained, or what they achieved. Rather, I mention it because of the importance of this blessed juncture for the contemporary Jihādī current during that phase and what followed, up to this day, and indeed for the future, I believe.

Thus, an indirect alliance was formed among all those united by enmity towards communism and the Soviet Union, or who had an interest in confronting and eliminating it. This ranged from America and its allies in the Western bloc, to their enemies in the Jihādī current, passing through their allies, the rulers of the Arab and Islāmic world, as well as various circles of the Islāmic awakening, despite the differing perspectives of its schools towards America, the West, and these governments.

Here, I wish to address two problematic issues, or, if you will, two enormous lies propagated by Western, especially American, media, and the media subservient to them in Arab and Islāmic countries. Their truth must be clarified to the general public, and specifically to Islamists, Jihādīs, and their audiences. They are:

1. America's role in the victory of the Afghan Jihād.
2. The suspicion of collusion between Arab mujāhidīn and Islamists who participated in the Afghan Jihād with America, and their connection to the CIA during that affair, as Western media and their followers claim today.

I reiterate that the value of this testimony comes from my firsthand participation and proximity to sources of information and those who managed events during that period among Arab and Afghan Jihādīs and Islamists.

1. America's Role in the Victory of the Afghan Jihād

The American media, with its various outlets controlled by Zionized Jews and Crusaders, has sought to portray the victory of the Afghan Jihād as merely a success of American policy and CIA programs in Afghanistan. America has largely succeeded in spreading this false propaganda. They worked on this through various means of propaganda, starting from Rambo films and his "blessed" incursions into Afghanistan, where he shot down planes, destroyed forts, and freed Afghan and American "mujāhidīn" hostages with them. He rode horses, drove armored vehicles, and flew through the sky in Russian helicopters! He was wounded repeatedly but did not die, and was fused inside a destroyed armored vehicle, yet his bulging muscles did not melt! He managed to shower his American-muscle-admiring viewers with a torrent of trite wisdom and ridiculous propaganda from his drooping, half-paralyzed lip. In the end, he delivered the message about America's mercy for the oppressed, its support for the wronged, its eagerness to help Muslims, and its primary role in the victory of the Afghans, whom the fictional film depicted as admiring and loving America! Thus, his muscles returned safely to their base in Hollywood to continue parties and debauched dancing with its beautiful starlets, a truly expressive symbol of America, its bulging muscles, small brain, and half-paralyzed lip feigning wisdom!

The American media, underestimating the intelligence of those who believed it, also focused on the role of Stinger missiles in the victory of the Afghan Jihād, and how they supposedly turned the tide of battle when Russian aircraft began to fall to them, leading to a shift in the course of battles from the defeat of the mujāhidīn to their victory! This lie was spread through various media and propaganda channels, from documentaries to books to newspapers, to the memoirs of intelligence officers, and so on.

It should be known that the limited number of American Stinger missiles entered Afghanistan ten years after the Russian invasion, shortly before their withdrawal. They were rarely used in the final decisive battles, and only a limited number of aircraft were shot down by them. Only a very few among hundreds of thousands of mujāhidīn ever saw them. Pakistani intelligence stole its share of them, as was its habit of stealing its share of all financial and material aid that came for the Afghan mujāhidīn, from vehicles and various relief materials to equipment, weapons, and ammunition, which were forcibly routed through Pakistan on their way to them.

So, I truly do not know how minds could swallow this massive lie about the role of this Stinger missile in the victory of the Afghan Jihād, in which millions of Afghans participated and over a million armed mujāhidīn were organized in the ranks of Jihādī parties. The Afghan people offered over two million martyrs and five million refugees, from a population that did not exceed 16 million. I do not know what role the Stinger played in destroying over fifty thousand Russian military vehicles, killing over 30,000 Russian soldiers on the ground, and over 150,000 Afghan communist militiamen, not to mention hundreds of thousands of operations during a Jihād that lasted for more than fifteen years, began five years before the Russian invasion, and continued for three years after it, until Kabul fell into the hands of the mujāhidīn—that is, from 1973 to 1992. Despite the absurdity of this "Stinger" lie and its flimsiness in the face of the simplest information about the course of the Afghan Jihād, it found its way into the minds of millions of naive viewers of small and large screens. This is the magic of American media, and the field of victory for these cowardly deceivers, who belittled the minds of most of humanity, and unfortunately, they obeyed them!

2. The Suspicion of Collusion between Arab Mujāhidīn and America, and their Connection to the CIA during the Afghan Jihād

It is astonishing today how global and Arab media programs—films, interviews, analyses, newspapers, books, and so on—pass over this "lie" with utmost nonchalance, moving on to other topics as if it were a self-evident, well-known fact!

They present to people a massive lie as if it were a truth, stating that:

American intelligence (CIA) created the "Arab Afghans" and their leaders, such as Shaykh Usāmah ibn Lādin and Shaykh ‘Abdullāh ‘Azzām, in order to destroy the Soviet Union. And that these creations have turned against America today, some of them destroying its towers in New York and Washington, while most of them returned to their countries to strike its interests, kill its citizens, and fight its allies among the rulers of Arab and Muslim countries. And that the phenomenon of armed Jihād in Arab countries is an offshoot of the Afghan Jihād, and therefore a creation of American intelligence that has gone rogue. They say that America has fallen into the situation described by their common proverb: "He who creates ghosts will have them turn on him."

So, what is the truth of this extremely dangerous fabrication against the reputation of Jihād and Jihādīs in this era?

I will clarify this through the following concise points, with Allāh's help:

- As for the claim that the phenomenon of armed Jihād in Arab and Muslim countries is an offshoot of the gathering of Arab Afghans in the Afghan Jihād, the truth is precisely the opposite.

The truth is that the Arab Jihād in Afghanistan was a result of the Arab Jihād that preceded it; it is one of the achievements of the Arab Jihādī current in Arab lands, one of its offshoots, and one of its stages of development, as mentioned earlier.

The contemporary Jihādī current is a product of the Islāmic awakening that emerged in the early 1930s, and it separated from it in the early 1960s. Many Jihādī experiences took place between the early 1960s and the early 1980s, i.e., twenty years before the Afghan Jihād. Indeed, the leaders, cadres, prominent figures, and pillars of the Arab Jihād in Afghanistan are remnants, cadres, figures, and shaykhs of the Arab Jihādī current.

Shaykh ‘Abdullāh ‘Azzām was one of the prominent figures and veterans of the Jihād in Palestine, and the Jordanian regime exiled him from Amman for his Jihādī propositions and opposition to the regime. Shaykh Usāmah ibn Lādin was raised in the Islāmic awakening, supported more than one Jihād movement in Arab countries, and contributed to supporting the Jihād in Syria in the early 1980s, before heading to Afghanistan.

Similarly, many cadres, who are difficult to enumerate here—early trainers and field commanders who undertook the task of establishing camps and building the infrastructure for the Arab Jihād in Afghanistan—were cadres of Arab Jihād organizations, especially from Egypt, Palestine, Syria, Lebanon, Yemen, and elsewhere. They were the nucleus of the Arab gathering that undertook work in training, media, military operations, field relief work, and other activities, until mujāhidīn flocked from Arab and Islāmic countries, and the gathering, which began as a small contingent in 1984, grew from 1987 to 1991 to reach about forty thousand Arab mujāhidīn by the early 1990s.

- As for the alleged relationship of the Arab Jihād in Afghanistan with the Americans and their wretched organization (CIA), if these villains had any role, it was in the authorization and green light they gave to their henchmen—the rulers of Arab and Muslim countries—to allow the mujāhid youth to exercise their natural right and the commands of their religion to go to Afghanistan. And that the intelligence agencies of those criminal countries should leave them alone and not obstruct them as they went to perform their religious obligation. It was also in the limited role of the media outlets of those Arab and Islāmic countries in promoting the Afghan Jihād. And in America's role in instructing Saudi Arabia to have its paid religious establishment issue a fatwa that Jihād was an individual obligation (farḍ 'ayn) in Afghanistan—which is true—and to allow righteous callers from the imāms of da'wah and reform in Saudi Arabia to proclaim this Sharī'ah truth. And to allow the people in the Land of the Two Holy Sanctuaries to perform the obligation of Jihād with their wealth to support their brethren in creed and religion. And to encourage young men who wished to go there, to the extent that the Saudi airline company reduced the price of a plane ticket from Saudi Arabia to Pakistan by 75% for anyone wanting to go for Jihād in Afghanistan, making it cheaper than a domestic flight. Undoubtedly, the Āl Sa'ūd had their propagandistic and other interests in these facilitations. America also contributed by instructing Pakistan to open its embassies to issue entry visas for Arab and Muslim youth from everywhere to travel through its territory to Afghanistan, and to allow Arabs freedom of movement, which reached the point of opening training camps on Pakistani territory near Afghanistan and providing logistical services for the Afghan Jihād. Undoubtedly, Pakistan had its regional and national interests in this, and this is not the place to investigate these details. Indeed, there were also personal interests for war millionaires among officers in the Pakistani army, intelligence, and police from the movement of this volume of people and money between the outside world and Afghanistan through their territory. So, if American authorizations to their petty agents are considered a contribution to the making of the Arab Jihād in Afghanistan, it is that and no more. And their petty agents among the rulers in Saudi Arabia, Pakistan, Egypt, and elsewhere had their own interests in that.

- As for what is claimed about Americans training Arabs, arranging their programs, assisting them in military operations, or any practical relationship on the ground, this is pure falsehood and fabrication.

I personally worked in military training and as a lecturer in intellectual and methodological fields. I was in contact with the leaders of the Arab Jihād in Afghanistan. Through this, I can testify and affirm that this claim has no basis in truth. I am not here to chronicle the Arab Jihād in Afghanistan to narrate training events and operational mechanisms. In short, it was the sum of sincere individual efforts, which began with old Jihādī cadres and some professional military cadres—retirees or those dismissed from service in the armies of several Arab and Islāmic countries—whose contributions played a very useful role. Then, the experiences of emerging cadres in the arena began to accumulate and gather.

Anyone familiar with the intellectual, psychological, and methodological situation, and with the feelings towards Americans, the West, and disbelievers in general, and even towards our rulers and their petty assistants, among the Arab Jihādī leadership and its youth base in Afghanistan and elsewhere, knows that this claim is implausible and impossible.

- As for the fact that the interests and objectives of all parties to the indirect alliance I mentioned—to fight the Soviet Union, each separately in practice, but united on a single goal—is an actual reality, it has often been repeated in the world of politics and the intersection of interests throughout history. It continues to be repeated here and there, and this is in the nature of things. America wanted to defeat the Soviet Union and win the Cold War, after the Soviet Union and the Warsaw Pact had dealt it painful blows in more than one field. The Afghan issue was a golden opportunity for the Americans, and they exploited it correctly and obtained what Nixon called in his famous book "Victory Without War," achieving it with an enviable mastery.

Western Europe and NATO countries wanted to achieve gains and establish a foothold there, so they participated in that endeavor for their own interests as European countries, and each for its individual interests. Each country achieved what it wanted to a relative extent. Today, various European institutions are spreading under the banner of humanitarian services to carve out lucrative gains from the Afghan arena, each according to its past and present presence.

Pakistan wanted to achieve national and regional interests that are too numerous to detail here; indeed, recounting what Pakistan achieved would require a separate book. It provided America with the services it wanted in the Afghan arena: first, to support the Afghan Jihād; second, to tear apart its gains; third, to destroy Afghanistan in a civil war; fourth, to confront the Taliban and overthrow their state; fifth, to kill Arab mujāhidīn and hand them over to their enemies; sixth, it is now proceeding to sell out the Kashmir issue; and seventh, to destroy the infrastructure of Islamists within Pakistan itself. And the list goes on. Thus, Pakistani governments have always implemented what America wanted. May Allāh's curse be upon the oppressors and hypocrites.

The same can be said about the other roles in Afghanistan played by Saudi Arabia, Egypt, and others, and about India, Central Asian countries, Iran, and China from neighboring countries, which also played their game, extending to the Islāmic and Jihādī awakening movements and everyone who entered the Afghan game, whether they won or lost.

This applies to the various Arab and Islāmic organizations that were present in Afghanistan.

In short, the Afghan Jihād issue became an area of intersecting global and regional interests, the likes of which rarely recur. Everyone united against the Soviet Union, and each had their own intentions and objectives.

- As for the interests of non-Jihādī Islāmic movements, they were diverse, ranging from good intentions to serve brethren in creed and religion, to the self-interests of each movement, including da‘wah, organizational, and material gains, down to the personal self-interests of some individuals.

So, what was the Jihādīs' objective in coming to Afghanistan?!

Their objective, after the intention of Jihād, performing the obligation, and seeking martyrdom in the path of Allāh on the part of most of their leaders and members, was twofold and strategic. I mention them according to their importance and based on what I personally witnessed due to my direct, indeed organic, involvement in the Jihādī current, and subsequently this gathering to which they gave the beautiful, "dramatic" name that I love and to which I belong: the "Arab Afghans":

1. The primary objective for most Jihādī entities, organizations, and cadres was preparation and training.

This involved organizing ranks, gathering cadres, recruiting members, establishing public relations, attracting donations, and training a B.C. organization's members for their specific cause in their own countries. This objective dominated the thinking of most, if not all, Arab Jihādī organizations, as well as non-Arab ones. It was: "to overthrow the apostate governments in their respective countries and establish Islāmic governments ruling by the Sharī‘ah of Allāh."

2. Working to liberate Afghanistan.

And to establish legitimate Islāmic governments therein, which would be a launching pad for establishing the Sharī'ah of Allāh on earth, a safe haven, and a rear base for Jihād against various enemies of Allāh and in all Muslim causes, starting from Palestine and extending to every cause in which Islām has a share and identity.

Everyone varied in their intention between these two goals, to a greater or lesser extent, according to their differing orientations.

Even for me personally, my goal that brought me to Afghanistan, which I failed to achieve there during its first phase (1987-1992), was to rebuild a Jihādī organization to continue the Jihādī project that had taken place in Syria (1975-1982) and collapsed for reasons I detailed along with its history in my comprehensive book "The Islāmic Jihādī Revolution in Syria: Pains and Hopes" (Al-Thawrah al-Islāmiyyah al-Jihādiyyah fī Sūriyā - Ālām wa Āmāl), the first edition of which was published in Peshawar (1990). This was in addition to my conviction in the second goal and my contribution to it, and I ask Allāh for acceptance. Then, Afghanistan and other experiences after that influenced me towards a global, internationalist Jihādī orientation later on. Otherwise, I initially came to Afghanistan, like others, for that specific reason related to my country and its particular calamity.

Did the Arab Jihādī gathering achieve its objectives there, amidst the conflicting rush of those gathered to defeat the stubborn Russian bear?

I believe a large portion of those objectives was achieved. This is not the place to narrate the details, which I may record if Allāh facilitates my writing on the history and lessons of our experiences during the two Jihādī phases of the Arab Afghans in Afghanistan (1984-1992 / 1996-2001).

I will suffice here by saying that the greatest gain for the Jihādī current from that experience was the globalization of the Jihādī current intellectually and operationally, the exchange of ideas and experiences, and the acquaintance among its cadres from different countries, then its spread to various parts of the world. This was the greatest gain.

This was in addition to achieving the greatest military victory for Muslims in their modern history, proving the ability of Islām and Muslims to defeat superpowers despite disparities in capabilities, and instilling this conviction in an Ummah that was on the verge of accepting defeat as destiny.

The gains are many, in addition to the personal gains achieved by those whose deeds Allāh accepted, after He honored them with presence and participation, both those who met their end and those who await.

As for the primary loss, in my view, it was that circumstances on one hand, and the heterogeneous gathering on the other, as well as the leadership that managed that Jihādī gathering lacking the ability to generate an organized global Jihādī gathering or current that could impose its presence and contribution in the Ummah's issues and the arena of the Islāmic awakening. International conditions, I believe, were favorable, and there was an abundance of youth, cadres, prominent figures, callers, and veteran mujāhidīn from multiple countries, as well as available funds and other factors, which could have enabled that, in a rarely occurring opportunity. But Allāh decreed, and He does what He wills, and I am not here to discuss the reasons for that.

As for those to whom the media attributes the accusation of their relationship with the CIA, claiming it created them to destroy the Soviet Union, this is also false talk. For example, among the most famous individuals targeted by this accusation is:

● Shaykh ‘Abdullāh ‘Azzām (may Allāh have mercy on him):

I knew him and frequented him often. I worked with him for a short period;

most of my work in those days was with Shaykh Usāmah (may Allāh protect him). Shaykh ‘Abdullāh's objective was concise, and he often spoke about it himself and recorded it in his tapes and lectures. It was:

1. To establish the Islāmic state in Afghanistan.

And to launch geographically from there in a process of liberation to whatever lands Allāh willed, and primarily to Palestine and Jerusalem. He used to speak of conquering Moscow, Beijing, and Jerusalem from Afghanistan. These were his hopes and his disposition (may Allāh have mercy on him). As the poet said:

*Ambitions arise according to the determination of the resolute,
And noble deeds come according to the generosity of the noble.
Small things seem great in the eyes of the small,
And great things seem small in the eyes of the great.
The intelligent one suffers in comfort due to his intellect,
While the ignorant one enjoys bliss in misery.*

And for those dwarves today who deny such hopes, especially those who attribute themselves to the Islāmic awakening, al-Mutanabbī—may Allāh reward him—the author of these verses, did not forget to add:

*And it is a calamity to advise one who does not heed,
His error, and to address one who does not understand.*

2. The "Militarization of Muslim Youth":

This was the second objective of Shaykh ‘Abdullāh (may Allāh have mercy on him and honor his resting place). In short, it was to spread practical training—training and participation in combat. We ask Allāh to grant him the equivalent of all the rewards of the Arab Afghans, without diminishing their rewards in any way, Allāh willing, because the Shaykh was the founder, the educator, and the wronged one whose true worth and the worth of his legacy the Ummah has not recognized to this day, thanks to the beneficiaries among the leaders of the Islāmic awakening, and the efforts of the enemies of Islām who know the value of men like him and work to bury their traces (may Allāh have mercy on him).

He used to say: "I want from every Arab country, even if only forty mujāhidīn, for half of them to be martyred and half to return to their country to carry the call of Jihād." And he (may Allāh have mercy on him) achieved more than he desired.

More than 40,000 non-Afghan Arab and Muslim youth came to Afghanistan. More than half of them received military training, and more than half of those trained participated in combat. The number of martyrs did not exceed much more than the percentage of zakāt on wealth (2.5%). They were (over eight years) about a thousand martyrs (may Allāh the Exalted have mercy on them).

This gathering had a historical role, some aspects of which I will mention after refuting this strange fabrication: the claim that the CIA and America manufactured the Arab Jihādī gathering in Afghanistan, which then turned against them.

Anyone who looks at the tapes, books, sermons, and legacy of the martyred Shaykh ‘Abdullāh ‘Azzām—Abū Muḥammad—(may Allāh have mercy on him) will see the vast area of sacred hatred and animosity towards America and its collaborators, and towards apostates and their henchmen, that he cultivated in the hearts of his followers and readers. How could it be otherwise? He was one of their victims in Palestine, then Jordan, then Pakistan, where they killed him on American orders during the era of Benazir Bhutto and her interior minister, Naseerullah Babar, whose punishment remains a trust upon the necks of generations of mujāhidīn. May Allāh destroy the criminals and accept him among the martyrs.

As for his fatwā in his valuable book, The Defense of Muslim Lands: The Most Important of Individual Obligations, permitting the acceptance of aid from the Americans for Jihād against the aggressing Russians, or vice versa, this is correct. This pertains to a state of necessity to which Muslims resort when an assailant attacks them and they are on the brink of destruction. This is a well-known matter, assessed by jurists according to its specific conditions. The Sheikh issued a fatwā for the Afghans to accept aid from America, from apostate Arab rulers, and from others. However, the Arab Jihādī contingent was a giving, not a receiving, entity. Hundreds of millions of dollars in donations poured in from Muslims' obligatory alms and charitable contributions. The contingent took what it needed for Jihād expenses, preparation, and the support of the families of Arab mujāhidīn and martyrs, and spent most of the money on the Afghan Jihād itself. The Arab mujāhidīn also faithfully delivered endowments specifically designated for the Afghan Jihād to their rightful recipients among the mujāhidīn and emigrants, including orphans, widows, and the needy. This summarizes the role of Sheikh Abdullah Azzam.

Regarding Sheikh Osama bin Laden—may Allāh protect him:

He bore a greater share of this accusation, and the media pursued various lines of attack in leveling charges against him. Many books and studies by Arab and foreign Crusader writers have addressed him with this slander, going to great lengths. They spoke of close ties of the bin Laden family, petroleum trade between President Bush Sr. and one of Sheikh Osama's brothers, and bin Laden's work with Saudi intelligence in Peshawar arranging the Arab Jihād in Afghanistan. The truth is that Saudi intelligence supervised Saudi contributions, and its elements became involved through Saudi Islamists due to the volume of aid coming from Saudi Arabia. Cooperation with official Saudi authorities was indeed ongoing. Media accusations and speculations speak of Saudi intelligence linking bin Laden to American intelligence. Some went even further, portraying him as an official, salaried CIA agent! They claimed he turned against them after they invaded Saudi Arabia and established a presence there following the so-called "Kuwait Liberation War," and that he did so in response to religious and national sentiments. Others went even further, considering him still an agent working for them, alleging he attacked New York for their benefit, whether he realized it or not. They suggested that American intelligence deliberately overlooked available information about the plot and did not prevent the attack, to provide America with a pretext to invade Arab and Muslim countries, destroy Afghanistan, and occupy Iraq. They cited as evidence the fact that he has not been found to date, implying this is deliberate. This is the extent of the deliberate and unintentional fictions, myths, and absurdities.

The reality is simpler than that and does not require all these complexities. If Allāh decrees and I address these events in a separate book, chronicling that period, I would write, if Allāh wills, what would suffice regarding the field realities of events I personally experienced and whose protagonists I lived alongside and worked with, or near, throughout the Jihādī current's trajectory, and still do, praise be to Allāh.

In brief, I say the following:

Sheikh Osama bin Laden—may Allāh relieve his distress and protect him—began his journey to Afghanistan shortly after the Russian occupation, initially providing financial donations. According to reliable sources who lived through that period, he decided to settle there and dedicate himself to field Jihād alongside the Afghans in early 1986. This was after Sheikh Abdullah Azzam established the Services Bureau in 1984. Bin Laden worked with him for a time, then decided to become independent and founded the Al-Qā'idah organization in early 1988, following an increase in the arrival of Arab mujāhidīn in Afghanistan, particularly from Saudi Arabia and Yemen—areas where he had connections and acquaintances.

His activities originating from Saudi Arabia were public and legitimate, not conflicting with the government's policies; in fact, they aligned with its American-backed orientation of supporting the Afghan Jihād. This situation continued until 1990, when the Kuwait War posed a Sharī'ah-based and doctrinal problem for all Arab Afghan mujāhidīn formations, including Al-Qā'idah elements. Within Al-Qā'idah, individuals from the Jihādī current in Egypt, Syria, and elsewhere undertook training, guidance, and ideological education, influencing its intellectual identity.

Sheikh Osama formed Al-Qā'idah for Jihādī objectives both within and outside Afghanistan, aiming to support Jihād causes and their organizations in various places. He had his own Jihādī project in South Yemen against the former communist government. The aspirations of his project later expanded to encompass a unified Yemen. Thus, he was like other Jihādī organizations with their own specific projects. Hence, like other Arab Afghans, he used participation in the Afghan Jihād as a field for preparing and training elements for his project. Like others, he also worked towards the general goal of establishing an Islamic state in Afghanistan after its liberation.

I myself worked intermittently in military training at Al-Qā'idah camps between early 1988 and 1991. I also lectured on methodology, Sharī'ah-based politics, and guerrilla warfare tactics in Al-Qā'idah camps and other organizations' training facilities. I interacted with most of the founding structure and working cadres within the Arab Afghan Jihād framework. At that time, Al-Qā'idah had no other field operations outside Afghanistan, and Sheikh Osama's only direct project was Yemen.

This was in addition to providing material support to Jihādī causes and groups in many places. This is based on my knowledge, which I believe was very close to the reality of the situation due to my proximity to the Sheikh at that time, as I was one of the first-tier members around him.

In 1991, I left Afghanistan, returning to my residence in Spain, and my practical contact with them ceased until 1996, when we met again under the hospitality of the Taliban.

Sheikh Osama, most of his administration, and his remaining cadres also left for Sudan, and they had not yet shown any other operational orientation.

The arena of Arab Jihād in Afghanistan during the Jihād against the Soviets was highly interconnected. Saudi Arabia, its relief organizations, and its intelligence and military agencies played a significant role. Many of their officials had direct working relationships with the Arab Jihād administration, headed by Sheikh Abdullah Azzam and Sheikh Osama. They and other leaders saw this as beneficial for supporting the Afghan Jihād, which concealed no secret that needed to be protected from individuals providing support from Saudi or Pakistani intelligence. However, those with private Jihādī projects held the opposite conviction. They did not have contact with these intelligence-linked individuals nor did they view them favorably. I belonged to this group, despite my proximity to Sheikh Osama's inner circle at that time, until 1991.

As for the claim that Americans trained Arab mujāhidīn from Al-Qā'idah or other groups, or provided them with any support, it is merely a baseless lie. This would not have been acceptable, not even as a joke. The Arab Jihādī milieu, dominated by the concepts of loyalty and disavowal (al-walā' wa-l-barā') and the Jihādī school advocating adherence to the practice of the early generations of Muslims, was tense even towards some Saudi government figures who came to offer support and perhaps entered some guesthouses or open public camps—such as the Saudi military attaché, Abū Māzin. How then could such ideas about foreigners or Americans be entertained?

However, what I have not seen the media or books discussing Sheikh Mujāhid Osama bin Laden—may Allāh protect him—address, despite its importance in explaining what occurred during that period and afterwards, is the timing of the intellectual and methodological shift in Sheikh Osama, which was subsequently reflected in his and Al-Qā'idah's stance and orientation against America.

Two primary factors caused this, in order of importance:

1. Sheikh Osama primarily built Al-Qā'idah on the efforts of cadres from the Egyptian Jihād organization, along with some Jihādī current cadres from other regions who contributed to training. Most of them were not members of Al-Qā'idah but collaborated on the basis of cooperation and mutual benefit. These Jihādīs—and I was among them for a period—disseminated their Jihādī ideas concerning loyalty and disavowal (al-walā' wa-l-barā'), God's sovereignty (al-ḥākimiyyah), and other matters of Shari'ah-based politics and the understanding of contemporary reality (fiqh al-wāqi') in those camps. Their methods went as far as training Saudis in target practice using pictures of King Fahd and senior Saudi princes. Over time, through their books, lectures, methods, and discussions, they influenced Al-Qā'idah's youth base. This same influence eventually extended to Sheikh Osama, who had come to Afghanistan like most Saudi youth joining the Jihād at that time, carrying the methodology and imprints of the Islamic Awakening (al-Ṣaḥwah al-Islāmiyyah) ideology in Saudi Arabia. This ideology was a mixture of Muslim Brotherhood thought, Surūrī ideas, and the teachings of official advocates of the school of thought associated with Muhammad ibn Abd al-Wahhāb. I write this from my knowledge, due to my closeness to him during that period and our numerous discussions on the matter. He and most Saudi mujāhidīn considered the Saudi government legitimate, and King Fahd and the House of Saud to be Muslims and legitimate rulers (ūlī al-amr), despite their corruption and injustices. They held deep respect for the official scholars in the Council of Senior Scholars and adhered to their fatwās. At that time, there were no common grounds between us as Jihādīs and those brothers—including Sheikh Osama himself, who held this ideology—except for the generally agreed-upon principles of Islām and the work to support the Afghan Jihād. However, the methodological contradictions and differences in Jihādī thought, understanding of reality, and the foundations of Shari‘ah-based politics were clear between us Jihādīs and them. What happened over time is that Sheikh Osama—may Allāh protect him—gradually became convinced of, assimilated, accepted, and then adopted Jihādī ideology, eventually becoming one of its symbols. I believe that, in addition to the influence and interaction between him and the Jihādīs, the second factor that contributed to this was:

2. The stance of Saudi Arabia, its ruling institutions, and its official scholars regarding the repercussions of the Kuwait War and the presence of American forces in Saudi Arabia. The ensuing transformations revealed to him the magnitude of the catastrophe, the significant role of ruling unbelief in the Arabian Peninsula, and the profound hypocrisy of official religious institutions. Due to his astuteness, perception of reality, and sharp intelligence, he understood the dimensions and objectives of the American presence in the region. His stay in Sudan (1992-1996) provided him with sufficient time for reflection. During this period, he shifted from a mild media opposition to the Al Saud government while still acknowledging its legitimacy (see his statements issued under the name of the Advice and Reformation Committee, statements 1-10), to strongly and seriously calling for reform by directing harsh and severe discourse towards the ruling authority and its hypocritical official religious establishment. Refer to statements 11-17. I have included excerpts from these statements in Chapter Four, under the section: "The Saudi Religious Establishment and its Role in Supporting the Third Crusader Campaigns." See also the author's book, Testimony of the Leaders of Jihād and Reform in the Land of the Two Holy Sanctuaries.

Then, the Americans began pressuring Sudan to expel Sheikh Osama, after their interests started facing some attacks from certain Saudi Jihādī youth who had assimilated Jihādī ideology in Afghanistan and moved to practical application. These youth, such as those who bombed the American residential compound in Olaya, Riyadh, or carried out other limited operations, had no significant operational connection to Sheikh Osama or Al-Qā'idah. The Americans and the Saudi government knew this. When Sudan expelled Sheikh Osama and he returned to Afghanistan under Taliban rule in 1996, he was surrounded by a group of individuals who held the ideology of international confrontation with America and its allies. Through his personal reflection, influenced by the Jihādī current's methodology, and his understanding of reality, Sheikh Osama had concluded that the path to Jihād against apostate regimes, including the one in Saudi Arabia, inevitably involved confronting America. With Allāh's guidance, he arrived at the correct political equation: (1) The scholars bestow legitimacy upon the Al Saud. (2) And the Al Saud bestow legitimacy upon America's presence in the Peninsula.

There were two ways to confront Al Saud and this situation:

1. Either confront Al Saud, which would necessitate confronting the scholars to expose their hypocrisy and thereby delegitimize Al Saud—a losing battle in public perception, given the size and influence of the religious establishment and the legitimacy and awe it had instilled in people's minds over more than seventy years.

2. Or a safer path: strike the American presence. This would compel Al Saud to defend it, causing their legitimacy to fall in the eyes of Muslims in the Land of the Two Holy Sanctuaries. The religious establishment would then defend them, and its legitimacy would fall along with theirs. The battle would then unfold with greater clarity before the people.

Sheikh Osama chose the second option, and I believe he was largely correct. Those who understand the religious, social, and political conditions and components in Saudi Arabia can appreciate this.

Sheikh Osama had also become convinced after the lesson of the Soviet Union's collapse. He saw how all dictatorial governments in the Warsaw Pact countries fell with it, as happened in East Germany, Romania, Poland, and elsewhere. He became convinced that with America's fall, all components of the existing Arab order, and other such orders in the Islamic world, would also collapse. For these reasons, he became convinced of focusing efforts on Jihād against America. He began to advocate to those around him the idea of war with the "head of the snake," as he called it, rather than its many tails.

I visited him in Afghanistan about four or five months after his arrival there in late 1996 to conduct an interview for a BBC documentary on the Saudi opposition. Similarly, a few months later, in May 1997, I interviewed him for a CNN television broadcast. At the time, I had established a media and studies center in London specializing in conflicts in the Islamic world. In the course of that work, I sat with him several times, and this, in brief, was his conviction.

When I returned to reside permanently in Afghanistan under the Taliban, a little over a year later, I had numerous opportunities over the four years we lived under the Emirate to pay fraternal visits to him and to several of my other friends working with him. What I have mentioned was the essence of his call to all who visited him, Arabs and non-Arabs, from the leaders and youth of the Awakening.

I believe that the idea he chose—Jihād against the Americans as the key to solving all problems in the Arabian Peninsula and the entire region—was correct, regardless of my opinion on the details of his methods and his organization's performance in achieving those goals at that time.

Then Sheikh Osama—may Allāh protect him—became more deeply entrenched in this conviction, gathering justifications for this battle and choosing the necessary tactics according to his perspectives.

Thus, the claim by those who slander him, alleging he worked with the Americans during the Jihād against the Russians and then turned against them, is a false assertion. It is based on malice, hatred, or ignorance, fueled by the propaganda of hostile media.

The story, in short, is that he and all Muslims at that time shared a common interest with the Americans in striking the Russians for their aggression against Afghanistan. When the battle ended, everyone realized that the next enemy was the sole power that had unilaterally taken control of world affairs, established the new world order, invaded the Land of the Two Holy Sanctuaries, and begun preparing Crusader campaigns against the Middle East. So, bin Laden fulfilled his duty and, in turn, declared Jihād against the power that had itself become an aggressor. Most of those who wished to wage Jihād with him, or independently of him, as was my situation and that of others like me, did likewise.

To make the picture clear: for example, if the French or other Europeans, or the Russians, or China were to help us today in our Jihād against America—as I think they might one day—there would be a common interest between us. If we were victorious over America, and they, in turn, invaded our lands—as I believe they would if they took the prior step—we would shift the Jihād against them. If we found them inclined towards peace, beneficial cooperation, and good neighborliness, they would find that our religion has the capacity for us to reciprocate. However, I believe they would only do so as part of tactical, interim measures.

Although I feel I have elaborated at length in refuting these two allegations, it is because I have found the media, whether deliberately or out of ignorance, disseminating these slanders in a manner extremely harmful to the mujāhidīn and Muslims. I believe there is benefit in this presentation, as a living testimony, for those who seek the truth.

Just as I concluded the section on Sheikh Abdullah Azzam—may Allāh have mercy on him—with beautiful verses by al-Mutanabbī, I see it fitting to also conclude with what befits Sheikh Osama's current orientation towards war with America, using other beautiful verses by the same "Sultan of Poets." I see in Sheikh Osama's choice of battle against America, the head of unbelief and tyranny, a reflection of what al-Mutanabbī said in his verses:

If you venture for a noble, sought-after aim, be not content with less than the stars.
For the taste of death in a trivial matter is like the taste of death in a great one.
The cowardly believe that inaction is wisdom; that is the deceit of a base nature.
How many criticize a sound statement, their flaw being a deficient understanding.
Every virtue in a man is hoped for, but nothing compares to courage in the wise.

May Allāh have mercy on Sheikh Abdullah Azzam among those who have fulfilled their vow, and may Allāh protect Sheikh Osama. May He make us and him among those who await, having not altered their commitment in the least. May He forgive them, us, and all Muslims.

After this digression, which I hope is beneficial, I return to the topic of the section, which is:

The Impact of the Afghan Jihād (1984-1992) on the Contemporary Jihādī Current: Methodologically and Operationally

Peshawar, the border city, warm in winter and scorching in summer, which Sultan Mahmud Ghaznavi—may Allāh have mercy on him—had taken as his winter capital during his glorious campaigns in the conquests of India in the fourth century Hijrī, transformed into a veritable university for almost all schools, currents, organizations, and groups of the Arab and Islamic Awakening. During the flourishing years of that gathering, between 1986 and 1992, it became an arena for the confluence of all ideas, methodologies, and propositions that prevailed in the Islamic Awakening—proselytizing, reformist, political, and Jihādī, and even ideologically deviant factions. Hundreds of Arab, Islamic, and foreign humanitarian charitable institutions flocked there, ostensibly for various purposes under the guise of providing services to more than three million Afghan refugees who poured into Pakistan. Perhaps more than two million of them settled in and around Peshawar. During that period, hundreds of Islamic personalities visited Peshawar: scholars, sheikhs, writers, poets, symbols, and leaders of movements, to offer some effort, or to observe, for publicity, for ostentation and reputation, for gain, or for any other intention, good or bad.

From Peshawar, financial, material, military, and other forms of aid flowed across the Afghan border, finding its way, for better or worse, to its intended or unintended destinations.

The Afghan Jihād and the role of Arabs in it is a matter worthy of historical documentation, analysis, and learning. It is a subject that requires separate books.

However, I am here concerned with the impact of that gathering on the contemporary Arab Jihādī current.

A few individuals, perhaps not exceeding ten, had headed to Pakistan to support the Afghan mujāhidīn shortly after the declared Russian invasion between 1979 and 1982. Three or four of them actually entered Afghanistan to participate in the Jihād. Some individual Muslim benefactors also arrived during that period to provide some material aid to the Afghan mujāhidīn.

However, the history of the Arab Jihād in Afghanistan practically begins in 1984, when Sheikh Abdullah Azzam fully dedicated himself to the Afghan Jihād in the field. He had previously worked as a lecturer at the Faculty of Sharī'ah in the Islamic University in Islamabad. According to what I heard from some witnesses of that period, he had left Jordan due to harassment by the authorities in Amman.

Sheikh Abdullah Azzam worked on several fronts to support the Afghan Jihād, the most important of which were:

1. Establishing the Services Bureau (Maktab al-Khidmāt), which undertook the provision and transfer of aid and donations to Afghan mujāhidīn and emigrants.
2. Founding Al-Jihād Magazine, which was his main platform for propagating the Afghan Jihād.
3. Establishing the Sada camp near the Afghan border, within Pakistani territory in the tribal areas, to train the Arab youth whose vanguards began arriving in small numbers since 1984.
4. Undertaking promotional journeys and trips during which he delivered dozens of sermons in several countries to mobilize support for the Afghan Jihād, urging youth to travel there, benefit from it, and perform the obligation of Jihād. The first of his books was Verses of the Merciful in the Afghan Jihād

(Āyāt al-Raḥmān fī Jihād al-Afghān), which gained wide fame and also widespread controversy. Then came the book The Defense of Muslim Lands: The Most Important of Individual Obligations (Al-Difāʿ ʿan Arādī al-Muslimīn Aḥamm Furūd al-Aʿyān). In it, he issued a fatwā making it an individual obligation for all Muslims without valid excuse to go for Jihād in Afghanistan. He managed to obtain more than eighty signatures from senior scholars and preachers in the Islamic world, headed by senior scholars in Saudi Arabia, chief among them Sheikh Ibn Baz, as well as from some Azhar sheikhs and some prominent scholars and preachers of the Muslim Brotherhood from various countries, in addition to some scholars from Pakistan and elsewhere. This book and that fatwā played an important role, along with Al-Jihād Magazine, whose standard quickly improved, becoming an illustrated magazine that conveyed vivid images of the Jihād and suffering in Afghanistan. It soon had distribution offices in Europe, America, and some Arab countries. All of this played a prominent role in the process of incitement.

I have heard in some of Sheikh Abdullah Azzam's tapes that the number of youth who remained steadfast with him in the Sada camp in 1984 reached twelve mujāhidīn, and this number only doubled during 1985 to reach twenty-five mujāhidīn. By mid-1986, it reached just under two hundred mujāhidīn of various nationalities, perhaps most of them from Saudi Arabia, Egypt, and Palestine.

At the end of 1985 or early 1986, Sheikh Osama bin Laden arrived—according to what I was told—to participate personally in the field Jihād, after his previous visits had been for providing material support.

In cooperation with some cadres from the Egyptian Jihād organization, who were among the first to come to Afghanistan, Sheikh Osama opened an advanced military center at one of the important supply crossings for the mujāhidīn in the rugged, forested mountainous region of Jaji. Allāh decreed that the Russians would launch a major offensive to close that crossing in Ramadan 1986. The group of youth who were with Sheikh Osama and Sheikh Abdullah Azzam participated in that fierce battle, which lasted about a month. The Afghan mujāhidīn achieved a sweeping victory over the Russian forces, including commando vanguards airlifted into the area. That small band of Arab mujāhidīn played a prominent role in that battle. The extensive publicity campaign conducted by Sheikh Abdullah Azzam through his media outlets, as well as the important promotional tour undertaken by Sheikh Osama in Saudi Arabia, led to the influx of Arab mujāhidīn in large numbers, reaching several thousand by early 1987, most of whom were from Saudi Arabia and Yemen. From there, it practically began, as the numbers increased, reaching their peak in late 1989-1990, exceeding forty thousand Arab and Muslim mujāhidīn from all countries of the Islamic world.

The Jihādī movement in Egypt, and its two main wings, the Islamic Group (al-Jamā'ah al-Islāmiyyah) and the Jihād Group (Jamā'at al-Jihād), had entered into conflict with the government of Hosni Mubarak, Sadat's successor, following Sadat's assassination in 1981. Many of its most prominent leaders and numerous members were forced to leave Egypt under pressure from security campaigns in neighboring countries. With the flourishing news of the Afghan Jihād, many of them began to head to Peshawar. Similarly, the Jihādī revolution that erupted in Syria between 1975 and 1982 had been practically destroyed. Those of its elements who remained were scattered across the earth. A very limited number of them also turned towards Afghanistan and settled in Peshawar; I and some of my close friends were among these, and all praise and grace are due to Allāh. Some Jihādī cadres from Palestine, who were students and friends of Sheikh Abdullah Azzam, had also joined him. Individual Jihādī and military cadres from various places began to head to that attractive arena, which was under the spotlight of all publicity. In 1986, following a Jihādī attempt that ended with its suppression by the Libyan government, some Jihādī cadres also went there. The civil war in Lebanon had ended, and Sunni Islamic movements in northern Lebanon had suffered security blows at the hands of Syrian intelligence, so some of them also migrated to that arena. Some brothers from the Islamists of Iraqi Kurdistan also came. This was the beginning of the gathering of cadres from the Arab Jihādī current, forming the first nucleus of Jihādīs within the Arab mujāhidīn assembly in Afghanistan, which was rapidly expanding.

The intellectual and methodological presence of the Egyptian Jihād organization was prominent and distinctive in the Arab arena, as was the presence of the Islamic Group of Egypt. Regardless of the known differences in the methodology of the two groups, they played an influential role, especially in the common aspects of their Jihādī ideas. The presence of some students of knowledge, some Salafī preachers, and some Surūrīs from Saudi Arabia and elsewhere also played a role in promoting the ideology of God's sovereignty (al-ḥākimiyyah), loyalty and disavowal (al-walā' wa-l-barā'), and the generalities of Jihādī thought in Arab circles, and even among non-Arabs who came to the Afghan Jihād. The presence of some of the heritage of the Jihādī experience in Syria in the arena—including my book on the history and lessons of our experience, praise be to Allāh—also played an intellectual role that contributed to the ideological engagement of the Jihādī current, which began to leave its mark on the Arab gathering. Since the presence of other schools of the Islamic Awakening was also strong in the arena, through their control over medical and educational institutions and their work in other relief fields—especially traditional Salafīs, the Muslim Brotherhood, and similar organizations, as well as the Tablighi Jamaat and others—in addition to the significant presence of Saudi governmental and semi-governmental Islamic institutions and the imprints they brought with them.

The official religious establishment also brought all their books, publications, magazines, lectures, and their intellectual and proselytizing heritage. Given that the late seventies and early eighties were a period of brilliance and interaction between the schools of the Islamic Awakening, Peshawar, its guesthouses, training camps in Pakistan and Afghanistan, and its gatherings became centers for communication, dialogue, intellectual contact, and often conflict between these various propositions. Thus, the Jihādī current, and those who represented it in the Arab Jihād arena in Peshawar and the Afghan camps, found themselves clashing with two main fronts:

- The front of the Muslim Brotherhood and democratic political thought, whose proponents promoted it through research, studies, and lectures they organized, even in some camps where they could operate.
- The front of the official Saudi school of jurisprudence, which called for rejecting the ideology of God's sovereignty (al-ḥākimiyyah) and for considering rulers as legitimate authorities (ūlī al-amr). It also called for respecting official scholars, especially in Saudi Arabia and the Gulf states, which is known as the Jāmī school, and later the Madkhalī school.

Gradually, considering the Jihādī atmosphere on the one hand, and the brilliance and breadth of Jihādī thought on the other, as well as the clarity of truth and the prevalence of the methodology of following evidence, Jihādī thought began to dominate the Arab gathering's arena. It started to win over the majority of the arena, as thousands of youth coming from most countries of the Islamic world became convinced of Jihādī ideology. A new Jihādī school within the Jihādī current began to crystallize and integrate, the sum of whose components later became known as the "Arab Afghans" phenomenon.

The fusion of Salafī jurisprudence and creed with Qutbist Muslim Brotherhood activist thought—to which I referred earlier—had begun to ferment in Egypt during the seventies and early eighties. The book The Neglected Obligation (Al-Farīdah al-Ghā'ibah), written by the martyr Abd al-Salām Faraj of the Islamic Group, who participated in Sadat's assassination and was subsequently executed—may Allāh have mercy on him and reward him and his brothers well on behalf of Muslims—played an important role. Despite its simple content, style, and small size, the significant new addition it made to Jihādī thought was the presentation of Ibn Taymiyyah's fatwās concerning the Tatar rulers who governed Muslim lands, including Syria, when they invaded and claimed to be Muslims, despite changing the Shari‘ah and ruling by other than what Allāh revealed. It also raised the issue of comparing contemporary Muslim rulers, their aides, and soldiers with those Tatars, and the scholars' fatwās on their unbelief and the obligation to fight them, along with those who fought with them, including the ignorant and coerced among them. It applied these rulings to the reality of Arab governments in Muslim countries, and to their police, intelligence, and security personnel. These comparisons addressed major problems and provided answers to pressing questions posed by Jihād against the government and its auxiliaries.

The Jihād Group had other works carrying the same foundations of that ideology, and these books were printed and distributed in Peshawar. The intellectual clash between Islamic democratic thought, adopted by the Muslim Brotherhood and similar groups, and Salafī thought—before the democratic contagion spread to it—was also intense in the general Awakening arena, and it likewise moved to its most important arena at that time, in that gathering.

The Egyptian Jihād Group issued a number of important research papers, culminating in the valuable book The Mainstay in Preparing the Equipment (Al-‘Umdah fī I’ḍād al-‘Uddah) by its sheikh, Abd al-Qādir ibn Abd al-Azīz—may Allāh release him. This book was perhaps one of the most important books of the "Arab Afghans." It filled a major educational gap in the Arab camps at the time and remained one of the most important books of the Jihādī current. In the context of Jihādī activity in writing and publishing, my book The Islamic Jihādī Revolution in Syria: Pains and Hopes (Al-Thawrah al-Islāmiyyah al-Jihādiyyah fī Sūriyā: Ālām wa Āmāl), which I completed in 1987, was printed in Peshawar in 1990. This book conveyed to the Arab Afghan circles the summary of the history and lessons of the longest and most important contemporary Jihādī experiences against apostate governments.

Sheikh Abū Ḥudhayfah al-Miṣrī, one of the cadres of the Jihād Group—may Allāh relieve his distress—opened the Al-Noor Media Center in Peshawar, where a number of Jihādī preachers and lecturers organized a series of lessons, lectures, and Friday sermons.

Some emerging Jihādī gatherings began to contribute, and many intellectual, methodological, and educational courses were held. Veteran cadres of the Jihādī current were attracted to teach and lecture. Then, these gatherings became self-sufficient with their own cadres and began to crystallize and produce.

It became evident with this intellectual ferment, collision, and friction between the various intellectual currents constituting the spectrum of the Islamic Awakening that activist Jihādī thought, mixed with the new Salafī influences I mentioned earlier, had begun to dominate the arena and sweep the bases of thousands of Arab youth who came to the Afghan Jihād. This was despite the fact that the majority of them did not join the dozens of old and new Jihādī organizations, which had their guesthouses and camps in Pakistan and the border areas of Afghanistan, and had formed structures, administrations, cadres, and emirs. Many of them were busy on the sidelines of the Afghan Jihād, in a phase of preparation and diligent activity to carry the torch of Jihād and revolution to the countries from which they came. This was from Allāh's generosity, which those who planned to open the doors of facilitation for these masses to serve their grand objectives had not anticipated.

These intellectual fermentations were not devoid of the birth of some deviant phenomena, such as some takfīrī (excommunicating) and extremist offshoots. These resulted from the revolutionary interactions of Jihādī thought and the atmosphere of enthusiasm, alongside the presence of political schools and their excessively fluid democratic propositions in that arena. This occurred in an atmosphere where the circumstances of the new world order imposed major issues on the Arab and Islamic world, such as the overt American presence in the Gulf after its covert presence, the plague of normalization with the Jews and peace treaties, and the intellectual, cultural, political, and social invasion of the features of the new world order. These great calamities created positions to defend them among the scholars of the sultans and some leaders of the Awakening itself. This, in turn, caused reactions among a few young people who lacked neither enthusiasm nor, unfortunately, knowledge. However, this remained within limited frameworks.

But importantly, in that atmosphere, the experience of veteran Jihādīs matured, and nuclei of new Jihādī organizations were formed from countries where such organizations had not yet crystallized, such as Libya, Algeria, Tunisia, Morocco, Jordan, Iraq, and Lebanon, as well as from some Islamic countries like the Philippines, Indonesia, Turkey, and others.

In short, it can be said that a distinct Jihādī generation—intellectually, methodologically, and operationally—was born there, in the atmosphere of the Arab Jihād in Afghanistan. They were given the beautiful and expressive name "Arab Afghans." What distinguished them, beyond their clarity of methodology and soundness of creed, was that they derived their zeal for Jihād from their faith in Allāh's company and their conviction in their ability to topple superpowers. They no longer feared them, nor, naturally, did they fear the lesser, subservient powers ruling in our countries. This was one of the most beautiful fruits of that great historical victory. Indeed, it is fitting for those to whom Allāh granted the honor of that presence to say what the Arab poet said about the Day of Dhū Qār, the day of Arab glory after long humiliation before the superpowers of that time: "Had every Ma'add participated with us on the Day of Dhū Qār, honor would not have eluded them." So, we can say: "Had every monotheist participated with us on the Day of Afghan, honor would not have eluded them." For we, with our Afghan brothers, brought down the Soviet Union, the leader of the Eastern Bloc. And I believe that our followers, and those of us whose lives are extended, along with whomever Allāh wills of His servants, will bring down America, the leader of the new Western Crusader Bloc, if Allāh Almighty wills. And that is the grace of Allāh, which He bestows upon whom He wills.

Fifth: The Jihādī Current and the Phase of Havens and Dispersion (1991-1996)

While the Afghan mujāhidīn were knocking on the gates of Kabul and major cities began to fall into their hands, the American-Western plan for Afghanistan took two directions concerning that arena: one Afghan, the other Arab.

In the Afghan direction, the program of the Americans and their allies, chiefly the government of Pakistan, was to prevent the establishment of a mujāhidīn government that would declare an Islamic state, rule by Sharī'ah, and undertake the reconstruction of Afghanistan. The planned program was to instigate a phase of civil war that would consume the strategic stockpile of weapons and hundreds of thousands of fighting cadres from the leaders and members of Jihādī organizations in Afghanistan. This is what they implemented during 1992-1996.

As for what concerns us in this research, their efforts were focused on dismantling the Arab Jihādī gathering, dispersing it, and pursuing its elements and cadres in their home countries and around the world. Thus, the Jihādī current entered a new phase that lasted from 1992 to 1996, which can be called the "phase of dispersion and temporary safe havens."

Those thousands of mujāhidīn mostly returned to their countries. Instead of being welcomed as heroes and mujāhidīn who had worked towards the common goal of those allies—from America down to its subservient governments that had facilitated and supported their Jihād—those young men found themselves strangers in their own homelands, which opened for them the doors of detention centers, interrogation sessions, and prisons for indefinite periods, and leveled accusations against them. Only some countries, which did not treat these mujāhidīn in this heinous manner, were exceptions. This generated various reactions and pushed some segments of Jihādīs into counter-productive practices. Furthermore, the return of these Jihādī segments to their countries from an atmosphere of honor, dignity, Jihād, and bearing arms, to clash in their homelands—after having aspired to those lofty meanings—with a reality that can, at best, be described as distant from Allāh's Shari'ah and lost in an atmosphere of servility, betrayal, and humiliation. Consequently, numerous attempts were made to form secret organizations that entered phases of preparation for confrontation with their governments, hoping to overthrow them and establish legitimate Islamic governments. However, all these attempts collided with an extremely difficult reality, disproportionate to the goals they aspired to. They entered into confrontations with the security services in their countries, which ultimately led to their destruction and the dispersal of their elements, and to an escalation of the security confrontation between Jihādī and Islamic movements in those countries and their misguided, renegade governments.

Among the most important of these attempts following the Afghan Jihād was the establishment of the Armed Islamic Group (GIA) by some Arab Afghans from Algeria in cooperation with local Jihādī currents, following the overthrow of the historic achievement of the Islamic Salvation Front (FIS) through a military coup in 1991. Similarly, there was the attempt by the Libyan Islamic Fighting Group (LIFG) in Libya in 1994. These were the most extensive attempts in that phase, in addition to some limited attempts, as occurred in Yemen, Lebanon, and elsewhere, some details of which concerning the most important Jihādī attempts of this era we will address in a subsequent section within this chapter, if Allāh wills.

There is another group of Arab Afghans: veteran Jihādīs who had originally left their countries due to security problems and were wanted by their governments either before or during the Afghan Jihād. Most of these were from previous Jihādī organizations, such as some members of the Jihād Organization and the Islamic Group from Egypt, and some Jihādīs from Syria, Libya, and Tunisia, along with limited numbers from other nationalities.

These individuals were unable to return to their countries, unlike the thousands of Arab Afghans from countries like Saudi Arabia, the Gulf states, Yemen, Mauritania, Jordan, and others. These security fugitives dispersed to various safe havens, utilizing some of the remaining political margins and security gaps before the global anti-terrorism policy solidified after the establishment of the new world order. Among the most important of these havens were:

1. Europe and Western Countries: This was through opportunities for political asylum. The most important of these countries was Britain, which attracted a large bloc comprising key cadres of Arab Afghans and the Jihādī current from various nationalities, followed by the Scandinavian countries, then the rest of Western and some Eastern European countries, Australia, and Canada.
2. Sudan: The government of al-Bashir and his ally al-Turabi had seized power, bringing the main Islamic movement there to authority. Their policy during 1991-1995 was to open the door for Jihādī organizations to move to Sudan. An important number of Jihādīs relocated there, led by the leadership of the Jihād Organization and the Islamic Group in Egypt, Sheikh Osama and the leaders of Al-Qā'idah, in addition to the main bloc of the Libyan Islamic Fighting Group leadership, and Jihādīs of other nationalities.

3. Other Countries: These did not pose a security risk to citizens of other Arab countries who were Jihādīs, even if they were wanted in their own countries at the time, before Arab, regional, and international security coordination was tightened later. The most important of these countries were Yemen, which attracted a diverse group of Jihādīs and Arab Afghans of various nationalities; then Turkey, and also Syria, which sheltered a segment of young mujāhidīn from North African countries and Libya. This was primarily the case, while individual Jihādīs, with their families and children, spread to other places, with some of these expatriate fugitives, fleeing with their religion and clinging to hot coals in this era, reaching the farthest corners of the globe—from the Philippines to Indonesia, to Thailand, to South America, even to some remote parts of Africa.
4. Bosnia and Chechnya: The closure of Jihād fronts in Afghanistan coincided with the eruption of Jihād in Bosnia between 1993 and 1995, while Muslims were being subjected to massacres by Serbs and Croats. This created a new Jihādī arena that attracted thousands of young mujāhidīn from Arab and some Islamic countries. Among their vanguards were some Jihādīs who left the Afghan arena to join the Bosnian one. Likewise, some Arab Afghans, led by the martyred commander Khattab and some of his Arab Afghan comrades, went to Chechnya to establish a Jihādī nucleus that carried the torch of Jihād and added shining pages to the Jihādīs' record in the last quarter of the twentieth century, supplementing those glorious pages witnessed in different regions before that.

The years 1992-1995 were relatively comfortable for these displaced expatriates. These four years enabled Jihādīs scattered across the world to work on spreading Jihādī ideology and its call. Although many shortcomings can be mentioned regarding the experiences of this phase, some of which I will address at the end of this chapter, if Allāh wills, these were years of propagation and expansion.

Although America had practically ignited anti-terrorism campaigns since 1990, which escalated over time to reach their peak since December 2001, these campaigns did not enter a phase of severity until late 1995 in practice. At that point, America, as part of its counter-terrorism program (as discussed in Chapter Five), included a plan to eliminate safe havens, in addition to other security practices.

Among the most important segments that worked positively in spreading Jihādī thought and its call were those concentrated in the West, especially Europe, foremost among them the Scandinavian countries and Britain. Jihādīs, exploiting the relatively comfortable conditions, financial capabilities, and margin of freedom—before it was closed off—that were available in those countries, worked on issuing newsletters and research, rebroadcasting what had been produced during the Afghan Jihād phase or throughout previous Jihādī experiences. They held seminars and lectures, frequented mosques, and interacted with Muslim communities that were witnessing an Islamic awakening no less, and perhaps more, flourishing than that occurring in the Arab and Islamic world. Some Arab governments even protested and complained about the freedom enjoyed by Islamists and Jihādīs there, and dozens of conferences were held to combat the phenomenon of Islamic fundamentalism in its various fields, including that margin in Western countries, until they managed to practically shut all of it down between 1995 and 2000.

I personally witnessed a unique experience of Jihādī propagation during my stay in Britain (1994-1997). Through that atmosphere, as an example, I was able to write for several Jihādī newsletters and magazines published in Britain, such as Al-Fajr (The Dawn), issued by the Libyan Islamic Fighting Group; Al-Mujāhidūn (The Mujāhidīn), issued by the Jihād Group in Egypt; and Al-Anṣār (The Supporters), which was close at that time to the Islamic Group and the Armed Islamic Group in Algeria before the latter deviated from the right path. London witnessed many seminars, lessons, and meetings that were recorded and disseminated to various countries around the world where the Jihādī awakening was spreading.

This continued until the omens of security storms began to blow over those havens one after another. Waves of restrictions, then arrests or deportations and expulsions, began to affect all the aforementioned havens without exception. Some reference to this was made in Chapter Five. Sudan and Yemen expelled those within their borders. Turkey, Syria, and Jordan arrested those they could reach and handed them over to their home countries. All European countries, without exception, began the season with restrictions and ended by throwing hundreds of Jihādīs into their prisons, where many of them remain to this day under administrative detention without trial or law, their situation similar to that of their brothers detained by police and dictatorial regimes in the Arab and Islamic world and Third World countries.

Thus, Jihādīs entered a new phase of ordeal in which they needed a new haven and outlet, and that outlet was what Allāh Almighty facilitated in Afghanistan for a second time.

Sixth: The Second Round for Arab Afghans under the Taliban in Afghanistan (1996-2001)

This title is for one of the most important chapters in the history of the contemporary Islamic and Jihādī Awakening, representing its most delicate and dangerous phase. It is the subject of a separate book I intend to write, if Allāh wills, immediately after finishing this current book. I feel a historical responsibility and a great trust, being one of the few remaining living witnesses who can write this living testimony about those great experiences and their protagonists, and convey those precious lessons to the generations after us, especially those determined to carry the banner of Jihād and the trust of calling to Allāh, in a time of arrogant falsehood and the displacement of the people of truth.

However, in this brief account, I will address the most prominent effects of this phase on the contemporary Jihādī current, whose stages we are reviewing in this chapter, omitting many highly important details for fear of excessive length and of raising sensitivities that would require elaboration and explanation beyond the scope of this book.

The summary of this is in concise key points as follows:

- The Taliban emerged from Kandahar province in southeastern Afghanistan in late 1993. They managed to advance and quickly gain control over central, southern, and eastern Afghanistan, subsequently entering Kabul in 1996, declaring the Islamic Emirate of Afghanistan, and proclaiming their leader, Mullah Muhammad Omar—may Allāh protect him—as the Commander of the Faithful therein. (I have written a separate study on the emergence of the Taliban and their trajectory during the period 1993-1998, titled Afghanistan, the Taliban, and the Battle of Islām Today, for those who wish for more detail).
- The persecuted and displaced cadres and members of the Jihādī current soon found a safe, and perhaps mandatory, haven in Afghanistan as the campaigns of pursuit, or what was called the "international war on terror" led by America, intensified after its launch in the early nineties and escalated post-1995. These individuals began to infiltrate Afghanistan individually and in groups, initiating the Arabs' second round in Afghanistan in the latter half of 1996.
- With the welcome and good neighborliness shown by the Taliban to these arriving vanguards, foremost among them Sheikh Osama and a group of Al-Qā'idah elements, along with some symbols and Jihādīs from the veteran Arab Afghans, the arena began to attract Jihādīs in general and those aspiring to resume their path there.

- With the declaration of the application of Sharī‘ah and the Taliban's control over about 94% of Afghan territory, the nascent and sole Abode of Islām (Dār al-Islām) on earth, from the perspective of Jihādīs and Islamists in general, began to attract many who were not persecuted or forced to seek havens, but rather desired legitimate emigration to this new Abode of Islām.
- By 2000, Arab camps and guesthouses had spread in major Afghan cities, especially the capital Kabul, the Taliban's spiritual capital Kandahar, and eastern cities like Khost and Jalalabad. New emigrants and old warriors from the Arab Afghans launched a media and communications campaign to receive more emigrants. The influx of arrivals became active despite the political and economic siege and the international media campaign that surrounded the nascent Islamic Emirate from all sides. I believe the number of men who came and left Afghanistan during this phase (1996-2001) reached several thousand. However, those who settled in Afghanistan numbered close to 350 families and about 1,400 Arab mujāhidīn and emigrants of various nationalities, in addition to several hundred heads of families, mujāhidīn, and emigrants from Central Asia, especially from Uzbekistan and Tajikistan, where Islamic movements face the tyranny of the last bastions of communism in the world, as well as from East Turkestan, which is occupied by China and where Muslims suffer various forms of torment and humiliation.
- Within this atmosphere, the main Arab Jihādī organizations were present. The hopes of their old leaderships were revived to resume their path of preparation and building, and to pursue their old objectives of reviving Jihād in their home countries against the tyrants of those lands, in order to establish Islamic governments on their ruins according to their conceptions.

- I am here only to record a summary of the history of that path, not to evaluate these masses and blocs, their objectives, and their methods of operation in this brief space. I will leave that general detail to the book I referred to, and I ask Allāh for help and success in completing it in a way that pleases Him.

New masses and blocs also arrived from various Arab countries, seeking to establish themselves. New Jihādī blocs and quasi-organizations were born, whose proponents tried to carve out their path through those circumstances.

It can be said that all who were present during this period can be considered Jihādīs, although the majority were not part of the main organizations. Afghanistan in this phase, unlike the first, did not attract other types from the spectrum of the Islamic Awakening, as international conditions towards this phenomenon had changed and become the opposite. While the first gathering grew amidst global blessing, support, and authorization—as I mentioned earlier—this gathering, its land, its rulers, and those who migrated to it, were subject to global war and pursuit.

Although the vast majority, if not all of them, were Jihādīs in thought and orientation, they can be classified into the following main formations, regardless here of tracking numbers or engaging in evaluation. This gathering included the following spectrum, by size:

1. Trainees: Those who came to receive training and then leave. These stayed only for the duration of the training, which ranged from a few months to a year.
2. Emigrants (Muhājirūn): Those who came with their families or by themselves for the purpose of emigration and settlement in the nascent Abode of Islām, to build it and wage Jihād with it, without having Jihādī objectives outside Afghanistan, nor against their home governments, nor against other internal or external enemies.

3. Jihādī Organizations: Those who came to pursue their old objectives and programs related to Jihād in their home countries, and to continue building their organizations anew in the traditional old manner of (regional-secret-hierarchical) organizations, whether from Arab or some Islamic countries.
4. Sheikh Osama bin Laden and the Al-Qā'idah Organization's leadership: And those who followed their call, whose goal was to advocate and work towards confronting the United States of America from this impregnable fortress (Afghanistan), seeking protection under its new government (the Taliban) and its steadfast Emir (Mullah Muhammad Omar)—may Allāh relieve his distress.
5. Organizations and Groups of Non-Arab Central Asians: Their objectives varied between emigration, supporting the Abode of Islām and waging Jihād with it, and preparing for Jihād in their home countries. The most important and largest of these groups were the mujāhidīn from Uzbekistan and the mujāhidīn from East Turkestan, occupied by China, in addition to some other groups.
6. Mujāhidīn from Pakistan: They were a mixture of students of scholars and religious schools in Pakistan, an extension of the Taliban in thought and methodology, in addition to members of various Jihādī organizations operating on the Kashmir front, who saw Afghanistan as a good rear preparation line to continue their activities. This was in addition to individual mujāhidīn not affiliated with groups and organizations. Due to proximity and intertwining with the Afghan issue, the Pakistani presence constituted a volume equal to or greater than the total volume of the types mentioned above.

This period constituted an advanced stage in the growth and development of the Jihādī current in a new dimension.

The media campaigns launched by Sheikh Osama bin Laden against America and its aggression against Muslims, and his calls to liberate the Two Holy Sanctuaries from American and Western occupation, then his introduction of a new dimension to his call, namely the adoption of the Palestinian cause, linking American aggression against Muslims worldwide to the Israeli Zionist aggression against Muslims in Palestine, and incorporating the issue of the third holy sanctuary in Jerusalem and its Al-Aqsa Mosque into the issue of the Two Holy Sanctuaries—these focused and organized campaigns, and the enormous reactions from American media to this campaign, and the entry of these directives into American, global, and Arab satellite channels, especially Qatar's Al Jazeera, which played a pivotal role in conveying this media conflict to hundreds of millions of Muslim viewers worldwide—led the Jihādī current to take on a new dimension towards global engagement. This was despite the fact that most, if not all, Arab organizations did not change any of their (regional-secret-hierarchical) objectives or programs, nor did they shift towards Sheikh Osama's call until the final moments of 2001, when America forcibly pushed them in this direction.

This phase coincided with global events of great importance and impact on the Islamic world. Foremost among these was the eruption of the Palestinian Intifada and its transition from the stone-throwing revolution that began years earlier to a phase of armed action and martyrdom operations since 2000. The situation in the entire Arab region deteriorated as a result of this escalation, in addition to the increasing effects of the deadly and destructive American siege on Iraq since 1991, and its consequences. This was compounded by the ignition of security pursuit campaigns and the global war on terror led by America, in which all countries of the world, especially the governments of Arab and Islamic countries, participated.

Soon, the Arab gathering in Afghanistan, as well as its symbol Sheikh Osama bin Laden, became a constant star in Arab and international media, a source of inspiration and mobilization for the Islamic Awakening, and a great horizontal extension for the Jihādī current and its supporters worldwide.

Arab Jihādī organizations, cells, and gatherings began to establish themselves in Afghanistan. By 2000, the number of Jihādī groups, camps, gatherings, or projects had reached fourteen, officially recognized by the Taliban, with programs of control, coordination, and cooperation linking them to the Ministries of Defense, Interior, and Intelligence, whether in coordinating their support and Jihād alongside the Taliban or in their own programs. This was aside from the Pakistani groups, which also had their own, numerous arrangements.

These gatherings, which were completely independent of each other, are:

Non-Arab Groups:

1. Uzbek Mujāhidīn: This was a large group relative to others. Their program aimed to transfer Jihād to Uzbekistan and overthrow the communist-American regime of Karimov, once the situation in Afghanistan had stabilized for the Taliban, and through complete programming with them. Their program at that time was recruitment, preparation, and training. It was a group linked to the Taliban. Their emir, Muhammad Tahir Jan, pledged allegiance (bay‘ah) to Mullah Muhammad Omar as a general Imam, as did his deputy, the famous military commander Juma Bai—may Allāh have mercy on him. They had a very ambitious program for recruitment and propagation among Afghan Uzbeks, a community of over five million, many of whom were immigrants from Uzbekistan since the days of Tsarist occupation and the subsequent massacres by Stalin and Lenin. It was a well-organized group with high capabilities and financial resources, supported by Uzbek immigrant communities scattered in many countries.

2. Mujāhidīn from East Turkestan (occupied by China): This was a limited group, most of whom had secretly emigrated to escape Chinese rule. Their program was comprehensive and long-term educational, given the difficult conditions faced by Muslims in East Turkestan after successive Chinese governments implemented a policy of Chinese migration to their lands and succeeded in changing its demographic map, reducing the number of Turkestani Muslims from an overwhelming majority to about half the population, renaming it "Xinjiang" (New Territory). This was in addition to fierce measures since the communist rule of Mao Zedong. Part of this group's program was to send some of them into their homeland to bring out more emigrants and prepare them, in anticipation of military action they intended against China. Their emir, the martyred Sheikh Abū Muḥammad al-Turkistānī, was an exceptional and active man, one of the finest examples of mujāhidīn fleeing with their religion—and we do not praise him above Allāh. The Pakistani army killed him in Waziristan in November 2003—may Allāh fight them, and may He have vast mercy on him. The group also pledged general allegiance to Mullah Muhammad Omar. He asked them to halt their practical program against China and suffice with educating those who joined them, due to the Taliban's need for good relations with China to counterbalance American pressure, and they complied.
3. Turkish Mujāhidīn: This was a small group of Kurds and Turks. They operated very secretly, and their program was training. I do not know if they had a practical program in their homeland at that time.

Arab Groups:

1. Al-Qā'idah Organization: Led by Sheikh Osama bin Laden—may Allāh Almighty protect him. Their program is well-known, and Sheikh Osama pledged allegiance of imamate to the Commander of the Faithful, as we mentioned earlier.

2. Libyan Islamic Fighting Group (LIFG): Their emir was Abū ‘Abd Allāh al-Ṣādiq—may Allāh release him. Their main program was preparation for Jihād against the Gaddafi regime in Libya, participation in supporting Jihādī causes in general, and contributing to supporting the Taliban. They made a good contribution in that regard.
3. Moroccan Islamic Combatant Group (GICM): Their program was preparation and training of their elements, most of whom would arrive and then depart. Their goal was Jihād against the ruling regime in Morocco. Their emir was called Abū ‘Abd Allāh al-Sharīf.
4. Egyptian Jihād Group: It had shrunk considerably. Their goal was to rebuild the group and gather its dispersed members. Their objective was well-known: Jihād against the ruling regime in Egypt. Their emir was Sheikh Dr. Ayman al-Zawahiri—may Allāh Almighty protect him.
5. Egyptian Islamic Group (al-Jamā‘ah al-Islāmiyyah): This was a very small group. Their presence was limited to emigration status, and they had no significant activity after adopting the initiative to stop Jihād against the Egyptian regime, known as the "Initiative to Halt Violence." Most of their important symbols resided in Iran, as is known, and some moved to Afghanistan in the last days of the Taliban.
6. Gathering of Algerian Mujāhidīn: Their goal was to gather whomever they could of their brothers to reorganize the Jihād in Algeria after the setbacks it had suffered.
7. Gathering of Mujāhidīn from Tunisia: Their goal was preparation, training, and gathering Tunisian youth for Jihād in Tunisia. Their camp made training contributions, and they included cadres who had previously fought in Bosnia.

8. Gathering of Mujāhidīn from Jordan and Palestine: Their program was preparation and training for Jihād in Jordan and Palestine. Their emir was brother Abū Muṣ‘ab al-Zarqāwī.
9. Khalden Camp (General Training Camp): This is one of the oldest Arab camps, its establishment dating back to the days of the Services Bureau and Sheikh Abdullah Azzam. Its emir was the well-known mujāhid Sheikh known as Ibn al-Shaykh (Ṣāliḥ al-Lībī)—may Allāh release him—assisted by brother Abū Zubaydah—may Allāh release him. The camp's objectives were purely training to support Jihād everywhere. It had a good output over the years; perhaps the number of those trained there since its establishment in 1989 exceeded twenty thousand.
10. Sheikh Abū Khabbāb al-Miṣrī Camp (General Training Camp): This was a specialized training camp for instruction in the manufacture and use of explosives and chemicals.
11. Al-Ghurabā’ Camp Group (our group): It was linked to the Taliban and also had a general training camp, a studies and research center, and lectures. I founded it in 2000 to establish a training school based on comprehensive intellectual, methodological, Sharī‘ah-political, and military-educational preparation, which I saw the Arab Afghan arena had lacked in both its rounds. The other goal of its establishment was to launch the call for Global Islamic Resistance (which I detailed in this book), in addition to organic linkage with the Islamic Emirate, contributing to its construction and defense, and working in Afghanistan through direct arrangement with the Commander of the Faithful. I briefly explained the group's objectives to Mullah Muhammad Omar and pledged allegiance to him on Muharram 15, 2001. Our group was linked from then on to the Commander of the Faithful and operated through the Ministry of Defense of the Islamic Emirate.

Then, the American and Western war, with the participation of Islamic countries, escalated against the Taliban and Afghanistan, especially against Sheikh Osama and Al-Qā'idah, who carried out two attacks on the American embassies in Nairobi and Dar es Salaam, followed by another martyrdom attack on the American destroyer USS Cole in the port of Aden, Yemen, during this period (1997-2000). This was in addition to the media escalation launched by Sheikh Osama from Afghanistan since his arrival there, through a series of press and television interviews in which he incited Muslims to war against America and Jihād.

American and global pressure, serious threats, and the economic and media siege on Afghanistan intensified. America began to warn of war against the terrorists there, especially its stubborn adversary, Sheikh Osama. Then, the decisive event occurred on September 11, 2001.

A group of Al-Qā'idah members carried out the famous historic martyrdom attack on the New York towers and the Pentagon on the morning of September 11, 2001.

Although Al-Qā'idah did not claim responsibility for the operations, the fingers of accusation and the evidence held by the Americans were clear.

America decided to invade Afghanistan, overthrow the Taliban, install a client government there, and eliminate as many Taliban and Arab Jihādī gatherings present under the cloak of the Commander of the Faithful as it could.

I am not here to delve into the history of extremely important events that I witnessed myself, indeed, was part of in Afghanistan. As I mentioned, I intend to do so, if Allāh wills and assists. But I will limit myself here to what relates to this chapter, which is the impact of that event on the trajectory of the Jihādī current.

That impact, according to my belief, led to a tragic end for the Jihādī current and terminated its phase that extended from the early sixties of the last century until September 2001. The Jihādī current entered the ordeal of the contemporary "trench" (ukhdūd) that swallowed most of its cadres during the following three years (2001-2004).

Thereafter, and after the occupation of Iraq which occurred two years later, a new historical phase began in the history of the Jihādī current, indeed, of the Islamic Awakening, the Arab and Islamic world, and even the entire world.

Some Repercussions and Consequences of the Event:

The enemy's losses in the September attacks were enormous by any measure. I hope they have marked the beginning of the true downfall, if Allāh wills, of this barbaric, savage state called the United States of America, which embodied the peak brutality of contemporary Western civilization, initiated by European colonial powers and contributed to by Russia, with America then inheriting all its satanic attributes and establishing upon them the contemporary Judeo-Crusader system of arrogance.

Al-Qā'idah was a major part of the bloc of Arab Afghan mujāhidīn in Afghanistan, who in turn were an important part of the general Jihādī current. This current consists of the sum of organizations, groups, and gatherings spread across most Muslim countries and even in many diaspora countries. It also includes many Jihādī individuals and cadres—scholars, thinkers, preachers, and writers—who all carried the Jihādī ideology that adopts a specific methodology and armed action as an indispensable means to establish Allāh's Sharī'ah and repel injustice from Islām and Muslims, as the only solution to the accumulated problems of this Ummah.

The American machine merged this entire current, its components, and even its supporters—indeed, everyone it wished to eliminate from the entire spectrum of the Islamic Awakening across its different schools—under the label of "Al-Qā'idah," making them all a target for its war under the banner of combating terrorism. This is a topic worthy of research but not for this book, because America achieved extremely malicious and dangerous objectives through this unrealistic generalization.

The collapse of the towers in New York and the crumbling of the Pentagon wall on the heads of America's generals were followed by many collapses in the Islamic ranks. Many parties suffered heavy losses. Among those who suffered greatly were all parties and schools of the Islamic Awakening, with the Jihādī current, its various organizations, and entities being the most affected at the level of individuals, leaders, and groups everywhere. Indeed, the repercussions and reactions from the enemy affected every Muslim everywhere. This was a reason why many circles within the Islamic Awakening, and even some Jihādī ones, did not view this glorious act with satisfaction.

Many sincere Muslims criticized it, convinced that:

- It had brought calamity upon Muslims and placed them in an unequal battle where they would be the certain losers.
- It justified the American onslaught and gave it pretext to reoccupy the Islamic world and inflict the heaviest losses on Muslims.
- It practically nullified most of the specific programs of many regional and national Jihād projects, making them automatically subservient.
- Indeed, it caused the removal of the nascent Islamic Emirate in Afghanistan, eliminating the sole base to which most Jihād projects, groups, and leaders had sought refuge, and so on.

Many of these criticisms are supported by what we observe and experience. From this perspective, these viewpoints perhaps have their justifications.

However, on the other hand, and to grasp the full picture, anyone following American policies concerning the Islamic world, indeed, the entire Third World, especially the Middle East—through their practices and the declared writings of their senior thinkers, theorists, and political strategists in published books, reports, and studies prepared by major think tanks and reviewed by leading thinkers like Kissinger, Nixon, and Huntington—finds that they have expressed and declared American policy objectives for the twenty-first century and the unbridled desire for sole global dominance. This was a program set for implementation regardless of whether the September events occurred or not.

Nixon, in his book Victory Without War, stated that America must work to make the 21st century an American century and must work to dismantle the Soviet Union, prevent China's rise and fragment it into warring nationalities, obstruct European unity, curb the industrial progress of Southeast Asia and control it, and plan to control the "Muslim giant" stirring to rise, as he put it. America also formed Rapid Deployment Forces (Marines) to occupy oil sources since Carter's days in the early seventies. This is in addition to the policy based on the beliefs of extremist Crusaders who built their evangelical-biblical perceptions according to Zionist interpretations as a basis for the doctrine of fanatical American Christianity, which relies on the idea of supporting Israel and the Jews in anticipation of the devastating battle of Armageddon in northern Palestine as a prelude to the descent of Christ to save the Christians. This is in addition to evil philosophies they developed based on theories of the clash of civilizations and white racial supremacy. This information has become openly discussed in international media, concerning the phenomenon of the "neoconservatives," the Christian-Zionist faction to which Bush and his aides belong.

There is abundant evidence that America has been moving against us since the collapse of the Soviet Union, inaugurating this with the Gulf War, then with a series of security conferences against what they termed Islamic fundamentalism. This followed the important meeting that brought together Reagan, Thatcher, and Gorbachev, in which they openly declared Islām a civilizational adversary to Western civilization after the end of the Cold War and decided to incorporate Warsaw Pact components into NATO, which would lead the Crusader war against Muslims.

Many documents prove this, which we do not cite here for fear of length. This information is well-known among Arab and Muslim intellectuals and in the media.

All of this indicates that America, Israel, and Western Europe were heading towards us before what happened in September, and that America was not incapable of finding any pretext had Al-Qā'idah not existed and the September 11 attacks not occurred, just as it used Iraq as a pretext to occupy the Gulf in the Kuwait War, and as they use pretexts today to occupy Iraq and expand towards the Levant and the Arabian Peninsula. Thus, all evidence from logic and reality proves that the September events are not the cause of this onslaught, although they may have hastened an inevitable confrontation and made it more dramatic.

Even America's attack on Afghanistan is acknowledged in all global media and by many politicians as an attack motivated by American interests in Central Asian oil and its need for a regime that secures its transport to the Gulf from Afghanistan, completes the American encirclement of China, besieges Iran from the east, and eliminates any possibility of Muslims ruling by Sharī'ah in Afghanistan so that it does not become a precedent to be emulated. Neither Sheikh Osama, nor the Arab Afghans, nor the Central Asian mujāhidīn residing under Taliban protection were the reason for the attack on Afghanistan. Rather, the reason was the Taliban's implementation of Sharī'ah and their regime's rebellion against America's law in international politics, in addition to America's imperial ambitions in the region. And Allāh Almighty knows best.

Regardless of differing viewpoints on the event and its repercussions, it imposed a reality that Muslims, leaders of the Islamic Awakening, and Jihādī leaderships must now confront. They must know that America had decided upon and imposed its aggression on Muslims with this momentum, arranging it with the Jews, its European allies, and Russia since the collapse of the Soviet Union and the removal of the Berlin Wall between the Warsaw Pact and NATO. Roles were distributed, a large part of which was assigned and entrusted to apostate governments in the Arab and Islamic world. This ongoing war was imposed by the enemy and implemented by them before September 2001; its events did not create it. It is a war imposed by economic interests and geopolitical considerations, a result of historical roots and the religious perceptions of Jews and Americans regarding the conflict with Muslims.

The details of the September events are well-known, too famous to repeat here where there is no room for elaboration. Therefore, I will skip over their details to the repercussions of the event on the Jihādī current in Afghanistan, where its elite—in terms of leaders, symbols, cadres, and the leaderships of major Jihādī organizations, groups, and blocs from the Arab world, Central Asia, and Pakistan—were present at that time.

Repercussions of the September 2001 Events on the Jihādī Current in Afghanistan:

The Americans began the war with waves of concentrated aerial bombardment from early October to mid-November. Vanguards of the Northern Alliance advanced to conduct the ground war on behalf of the Americans from three axes: from the north towards Kabul, from the Pakistani border in the southeast towards Kandahar, and from the northeast towards Jalalabad. Mazar-i-Sharif fell, then Kabul, into the hands of the Northern Alliance in December 2001.

Marauders, highway robbers, thieves, and tribes that worked in the American program seized cities one after another. Taliban resistance crumbled, and their garrisons and leaderships surrendered in a manner surprising to everyone.

Within less than a week after the fall of Kabul, the fall of the Taliban was announced, and Karzai was handed the reins of power. Then, America's agents on the ground continued to carry out their tasks, in which millions of dollars played an important role in their performance with utmost filthiness and ugliness.

Then America, under the leadership of Bush, launched what it called the "Global War on Terrorism," in which Pakistan played the main role. Pakistan undertook the liquidation and arrest of those who headed towards the only haven on its territory. Various Arab and Islamic countries then followed suit by participating, in addition to what America's major allies did, which led to the extensive destruction of what remained of the Jihādī current.

As for what concerns us regarding the Arab contingent of Jihādīs and emigrants in Afghanistan, the summary of what happened was a historical massacre of the Jihādī current, the worst in its entire history. And Allāh's command was a decreed destiny. The following is a summary, without delving into specifics, of the losses and calamities from the onset of the catastrophic events until September 2004, the time of writing these lines—a period of three harsh years:

- The martyrdom of approximately 400 Arab mujāhidīn during the battles to defend Afghanistan. They fought valiantly defending various front lines or fell due to intense bombing during the withdrawal of vehicle convoys from major cities towards the Pakistani border.
- Due to the treachery of some Pakistani border tribesmen, Pakistan captured approximately 150 mujāhidīn who had emerged from the battles of Tora Bora immediately after the war, during the first month of 2002. They were handed over to the Americans, who transferred them to the notorious Guantanamo Bay detention camp in Cuba.

- Approximately 100 mujāhidīn were martyred in sporadic clashes with the Pakistani army in the border regions, on travel routes, or inside some Pakistani cities during the following two years, from early 2002 until September 2004.
- During that period, Pakistani forces captured over 600 Arab mujāhidīn who were fleeing with their families and hiding on its territory. They handed them over directly to America to be incarcerated in Guantanamo Bay or its brutal detention centers in Afghanistan.
- Iran detained more than 400 Arab mujāhidīn on its territory. It handed most of them over to their home countries, as its government officially admitted. Nearly one hundred of them remain prisoners in Iran, subject, according to Iranian government sources, to imprisonment and political bargaining with America.

If we consider that the total number of Arab mujāhidīn present in Afghanistan at the time of this event was approximately 1,900, including heads of families among residents and emigrants, the losses in terms of martyrs and captives exceeded 1,600 out of 1,900. This accounts for about 75% of the human resource base of the Arab Afghans present in Afghanistan during that period. Furthermore, the campaigns of pursuit and arrest launched by America and its collaborating security agencies in Europe, the Arab and Islāmic world, and indeed globally, led to the arrest and capture of hundreds of Jihādīs—members of groups, sympathizers with the Jihādī current, or even wronged individuals close to them who were captured without any involvement whatsoever in this conflict.

This is in addition to the heavy losses among Jihādīs from Central Asia, especially Uzbek mujāhidīn and their associates from Central Asian countries, most of whose military cadres were martyred. This figure perhaps exceeded 500 martyrs, not counting prisoners. Most were martyred in Afghanistan, and some in battles with the Pakistani army, supported by American forces, in the Waziristan region.

Similarly, heavy losses were inflicted upon the mujāhidīn from East Turkestan. The latest of these losses was the martyrdom of their emir, Hassan Abu Muhammad al-Turkistani, along with some of his brethren, may Allāh Almighty have mercy upon them and grant them noble hospitality among the emigrant strangers fleeing for their faith. The Pakistani army—may Allāh destroy them—killed him in November 2003 during pursuit operations in the سرحد (Sarhad) province.

By mid-2003, US Secretary of Defense Rumsfeld declared that their security and military campaign against terrorism had enabled them to kill or capture over 3,000 "terrorists," in his terms. I believe this figure is close to reality. Losses in Afghanistan, Pakistan, and Iran accounted for more than half of this number, while the number of Jihādīs and their sympathizers imprisoned in Britain alone reached about 300, as official statistics indicated, not to mention the dozens announced as arrested in other European countries. In Arab countries, Yemen launched a campaign against Jihādīs, returnees from Afghanistan, and their sympathizers, in which dozens were killed and hundreds captured. Saudi Arabia announced the arrest of more than 220 individuals officially accused of affiliation with al-Qaeda. The number of those arrested, detained, and interrogated in Saudi Arabia is in the thousands; hundreds were imprisoned without charge or trial. This is because Saudi Arabia and Yemen were among the countries from which the largest percentage of Arab youth came to Afghanistan and were also among the countries most intensely pursuing them. These campaigns also affected hundreds here and there, everywhere, culminating in the events in Morocco since November 2003, where hundreds were also arrested. Dozens of death sentences, life imprisonments, and long-term sentences were issued against them. The affliction extended to hundreds of innocents who held Jihādī thought or sympathized with it but had no connection to any actions. The circles of accusation and tribulation expanded to include most Jihādīs and their sympathizers worldwide, from the Horn of Africa to the Philippines, Indonesia, Southeast Asia, Turkey, and every corner of the globe.

The calamity was catastrophic and immense, in every sense of the word, for three reasons:

1. The figure, ranging between 3,000 and 4,000 Jihādī elements, their supporters, and sympathizers, according to what was announced—though the reality is far greater—actually represents most of the active segment of Jihādīs in this era. It even includes many from the core circle of their sympathizers in the Arab and Islāmic world and in Muslim communities in the West. This epic represented an eradication of the fundamental human base of the Jihādī current in this age.
2. The devastating blow that befell the Arab and Central Asian mujāhidīn in Afghanistan and Pakistan decimated the core elite of cadres and veterans of the Jihādī current. It struck the cream of their leadership and symbols who remained active from the first generation of Arab Afghans—approximately 150 mujāhid cadres, the very essence of the remaining symbols and operatives in the Jihādī current over the last quarter of the twentieth century. Killing and capture crushed most of this prime group. I may not be exaggerating if I state for the historical record a piece of information known to the enemy, which no one has yet had the respite from the shock to enumerate: perhaps only a very, very small number of these individuals remain alive and uncaptured. I ask Allāh to protect them and aid them in rebuilding.
3. The catastrophe extended further, with the great chasm devouring even some of those nurtured by these individuals from the vanguard cadres of the third Jihādī generation—the youth who came to the new Jihād arena in Afghanistan during the second wave of Arab Afghans (1996–2001). Praise be to Allāh, a considerable number of these individuals survived and dispersed throughout the earth, praise be to Allāh.

Returning to the focus of this section of the chapter after this tragic digression, I say: The Jihādī current, which began its course in the early sixties, flourished in the late seventies and early eighties, and whose hopes soared in Afghanistan with the establishment of the Islāmic Emirate, witnessed a great chasm that marked the end of its previous era after the events of September 2001.

This was to begin a new phase in the path of the Jihādī current in confronting the contemporary Crusader-Jewish campaigns, by Allāh's permission.

It is for the sake of contributing to the launch of these hopes that I write this book. This period begins with confronting the American-led "global war on terror" and its direct military invasions in Afghanistan, Iraq, and the Middle East. New arenas of conflict and new realities are appearing on the horizon, leaving their mark on the triumphant path of Jihād, by Allāh's permission—a path whose continuation and survival were heralded by the noblest of creation, Muhammad, peace and blessings be upon him.

Seventh: The Most Significant Armed Jihādī Experiences in the Second Half of the Twentieth Century

Unfortunately, the fundamental problem within the sphere of Islāmic work in general, and Jihādī work in particular, is the scarcity of those active in writing and the scarcity of writers among those active in the field.

Therefore, most of the important Jihādī experiences of the Jihādī current, and indeed most experiences of the Jihādī phenomenon, have vanished without their participants writing about them. I mean those who carried them out, witnessed them firsthand, or had genuine, organic contact with them. To the best of my knowledge, out of dozens of long-term or limited experiences, none of the participants have written anything significant, or at least nothing that has achieved widespread dissemination. Consequently, the Ummah and its future generations have missed out on extremely important lessons, and stories and details of events of profound magnificence and significance from those epics undertaken by the first and second generations of this Jihādī current, from its inception until the end of the twentieth century and the beginning of the twenty-first.

Meanwhile, some adversaries, some journalist-merchants, or some sedentary Don Quixotes of the Islāmic Awakening—owners of paunches grown soft under the coolness of air conditioners—have intruded upon writing on behalf of those who had the actual experiences.

I have tried to break this rule, being one of the few field operatives who worked within this current through some of its experiences and interacted with many figures from other experiences. I will provide a summary of this, Allāh Almighty willing, in this chapter.

- I wrote the book The Jihādī Islāmic Revolution in Syria: Pains and Hopes, which included a summary of the history of that Jihād, many of its documents, and its lessons. The book is about 900 pages and was published in 1990.
- I also wrote the book My Testimony on the Jihād in Algeria (1989–1996). Its final drafts, around 200 pages, were lost along with my belongings left in Kabul during its fall in December 2001. I rewrote it during our ordeal here in Pakistan and will publish it with this book, Allāh willing.
- I also wrote a documented book about the ordeal of the Arab Afghan mujāhidīn and Islamists in general in Pakistan during these three years after September 2001, and I will also publish it soon, Allāh willing.

- I have now prepared outlines and some drafts for a very important book to cover the history and lessons of what I believe to be the most significant experiences of the last century: The Experience of the Jihādī Current under the Taliban from the Establishment of the Emirate in 1996 until its Fall after the September 2001 Events, and its Repercussions. I ask Allāh to help me complete it after finishing this important book, to enable me to bear a testimony that pleases Him, to aid me with its consequences, and to reward me for it.

Therefore, to maximize the benefit of this chapter, I will provide here a summary of the most important Jihādī experiences that occurred during the second half of the last century, based on what I heard directly from their participants through my involvement with the Jihādī current. Perhaps this will motivate the living participants of those experiences to write about them.

I will list them in historical chronological order of their inception, Allāh willing. The most important of these experiences are:

1. The Moroccan Youth Movement Experience (1963)

This movement was founded by Sheikh Abd al-Karim Mutiʿ, may Allāh protect him. He sought to establish an armed Jihādī organization to revolt against the regime of King Hassan II in Morocco. The organization's cells were arrested, and many of its members were imprisoned. Those who survived, including Sheikh Abd al-Karim, emigrated from Morocco, and the movement's activity ceased.

I found writings by Sheikh Abd al-Karim Mutiʿ that generally contained mature and distinguished Jihādī thought. I also found a book chronicling that attempt, which I later lost with my library in London after my hasty departure in 1997. That book did not contain significant historical or methodological material. I also met an old member of that organization during my stay in London (1994–1997), and he told me about important historical episodes in their experience, but I do not recall them now.

2. The Egyptian Jihād Organization Experience (1965–2000)

The martyr Sayyid Qutb, may Allāh have mercy on him, attempted to put his call and ideas into practice. An organization was founded upon a group of elite Jihādī youth in Egypt who were his contemporaries, most of whom were cadres of the Muslim Brotherhood at the time. A historical document titled "Why They Executed Me" was published, attributed to the late martyr Sayyid Qutb; its context and the testimony of some of its members indicate its authenticity. According to that document, Sayyid Qutb, may Allāh have mercy on him, mentioned that an elite group of Jihādī youth had formed some secret cells to confront Gamal Abdel Nasser's regime following the brutal attack by Egyptian security and judicial apparatuses under the deceased Abdel Nasser on the Muslim Brotherhood in 1965, and before that in 1954, when some of their cadres were executed and tens of thousands imprisoned in horrific historical prisons. He mentioned in that document that those youths had approached him to be the emir of that organization, and he had accepted to be their guide and spiritual father, and that he had developed some military plans with them. He stated that he was arrested with those youths following that attempt. Sayyid Qutb, may Allāh have mercy on him, was sentenced to death and killed along with a number of those young men, and that attempt was nipped in the bud.

I heard from Dr. Ayman al-Zawahiri in some of his recordings, and perhaps also in some direct sessions, that some of Sayyid's students and contemporary youth who were influenced by his thought continued clandestine activity and propagated his ideas. These activities later transformed into the initial cells of the Egyptian Jihād Organization, some of whose cadres and leaders were arrested following the assassination of Anwar Sadat (1981) and remain imprisoned to this day.

It appears that several Jihādī attempts occurred in Egypt thereafter, one of the most prominent being the attempt known as the "Military Technical College" incident—a limited and failed coup attempt led by the martyr Salih Sirriyyah, may Allāh have mercy on him, in which a number of Jihādī cadres were tried and executed. However, the Jihād Organization resumed its activity and crystallized well during the era of openness under Sadat in the second half of the seventies. This was followed by the departure of a number of its leaders and cadres, headed by Dr. Ayman al-Zawahiri, to Afghanistan in 1986. I experienced this period up close through my strong relationship with its key figures during both phases of the Arab Afghan experience in Afghanistan. Although I believe that the Jihādī experiences in Egypt are among the most mature Jihādī experiences in the Arab and Islāmic world in terms of intellectual and methodological aspects, and the most productive and firmly rooted, as well as being among the most important organizationally and operationally, I learned from Dr. Ayman that no one had dedicated themselves to writing its history, the documents of which lie in the torture chambers and investigation files of the Egyptian government's investigative and security services. I reviewed drafts of a book on this subject that Dr. Ayman sent me for review in early 2001 in Kabul, which was good but very limited considering the length and scale of those experiences. I discussed this with Dr. Ayman and urged him to expand on it, as he is the best living, informed, and field-experienced witness, whose duty it is to write that history. However, he apologized, as operational concerns kept him busy day and night in Afghanistan in those days. I ask Allāh to prolong his life and the lives of our remaining brothers from that generation so that these experiences may be written.

Dr. Ayman al-Zawahiri and a number of Jihād Organization cadres, after arriving in Afghanistan, endeavored to establish a significant Jihādī experience within the contemporary Jihādī current. This was through the two phases of the Arab Afghan experience (1986–1991) and (1996–2001). I will summarize the most prominent aspects of that experience that I recall from close association with its pioneers and its inception in the following points:

- Dr. Ayman, along with a group of Jihād Organization cadres from Egypt, arrived in Peshawar in 1986 and subsequent years, after having been imprisoned for three years in connection with the Jihād Organization case and its role in Sadat's assassination. They had a prominent presence and activity among the Arab Afghans during the 1986–1991 phase.
- Cooperation occurred on multiple levels between them and Sheikh Usama bin Laden, who was then intending to establish his own organization, known at that time as Al-Qaeda, formally founded in early 1988. It was built on the efforts of a number of cadres and trainers, among whom Jihād Organization cadres were prominent. Notable among them were the martyr Abu Ubaydah al-Banshiri, may Allāh have mercy on him, who died in a ferry accident on Lake Victoria while managing Al-Qaeda's operations in Kenya during its stay in Sudan (1992–1996), and the martyr Abu Hafs al-Masri (Muhammad Atef), who was martyred in the battles during the fall of the Emirate in November 2001 in an American bombing of his headquarters in Kandahar, where he was Al-Qaeda's military commander. The Jihād Organization benefited from this cooperation, which provided it with significant material support, enabling it to establish its independent camps in Afghanistan, manage the movement, and continue its activities in Egypt.
- The core strategic program of the Egyptian Jihād Organization was to rely on instigating a military coup carried out by officers who were members of the organization, whom it had planted in the Egyptian army since Anwar Sadat's days. Its cells continued until they were eliminated during the intensive arrest campaigns the organization later faced. Their general idea, as I understood it directly from Dr. Ayman in several private sessions, was to carry out a coup supported by guerilla cells that were being prepared during that period.

- After Sadat's assassination, and due to the intertwined relationships between members of Al-Jamā'ah al-Islāmiyyah who carried out the operation and members of the Jihād Organization who participated in it, a number of the Jihād Organization's military cadres were arrested, most notably the martyr Major Essam al-Qamari, may Allāh have mercy on him. However, this security blow did not affect the progress of their clandestine work, neither in the army cells nor in the civilian secret cells.
- Following the policy of liquidation pursued by the Egyptian Ministry of Interior, especially during the tenure of its criminal minister Zaki Badr, against the semi-overt Al-Jamā'ah al-Islāmiyyah, which had adopted a strategy of open da'wah and popular revolution influenced by the Iranian revolution model, Al-Jamā'ah al-Islāmiyyah decided to respond to state provocations and the policy of "striking at the core," as Zaki Badr termed it. This response took the form of assassinating regime figures in retaliation for the state's assassination of the group's figures. The Jihād Organization, whose leadership, along with that of Al-Jamā'ah al-Islāmiyyah, was present in Peshawar (Pakistan) and the border provinces of Afghanistan during that period of Afghan Jihād, decided to contribute to the confrontation in support of them, thereby deviating from its secret program of preparing and planning for a military coup. They believed it was possible for this tactical program to run parallel to that strategic program.
- The arrest of a civilian member of the clandestine Jihād Organization led to the arrest of an officer from the military wing of the organization. This arrest gradually led to most of the organization's military cadres. The collapse of the internal organization (in Egypt) began, as I recall, in late 1989 or early 1990.
- The disaster continued, and the organization suffered two subsequent security blows, one of which resulted in about 900 detainees from the civilian clandestine organization, and the next in about 600 detainees. These individuals constituted most of the organization's youth base inside Egypt, which had been prepared at the highest levels during the Afghan Jihād phase.

- The leadership of the Jihād Organization departed for Sudan, accompanying Sheikh Usama bin Laden and his elite leadership and cadres. This followed the success of the Islamists in the coup that brought Al-Turabi and Al-Bashir to power. The Jihād Organization began to operate anew in very favorable conditions due to their presence on Egypt's long southern border with Sudan. This was with the support and arrangement of the new government in Sudan and its intelligence agencies. Al-Jamā'ah al-Islāmiyyah did likewise. The organization opened a camp and a number of bases for itself in Khartoum and began reorganizing, with support and funding from Sheikh Usama, as became known and famous later. The goal was to overthrow Hosni Mubarak's regime and establish an Islāmic government in Egypt—a government that would alter the strategic balance with all types of enemies in the Middle East region.
- Political storms buffeted this program. The Sudanese leadership turned its back on the Jihādīs there, starting with the Libyan brothers, then the Egyptians, then the rest, including Sheikh Usama, who had stood with them heroically and boldly from their inception, helping them rearm the army and build the economy. But they betrayed their loyalty and broke their covenants.
- This blow destroyed what had been newly built of their program in Egypt. The Sudanese government forced Sheikh Usama to stop funding the work program in Egypt, then pressured everyone, eventually expelling them.
- Dr. Ayman and his remaining cadres joined Sheikh Usama in Afghanistan under the Taliban after several journeys of displacement in a number of countries during 1996–1998. Another number of the remaining cadres and cells chose to wait in various diaspora countries.
- The Jihād Organization and Al-Qaeda resumed their experiment of cooperation and building in the fields of funding and training. However,

Sheikh Usama had reached a firm conviction to unify the direction towards confronting America, while the Jihād Organization, like other organizations, maintained its "national aspirations, clandestine methods, and Jihādī intellectual methodology."

- Dr. Ayman signed Sheikh Usama's declaration of the "World Islamic Front for Jihād Against Jews and Crusaders" in late 1997, while Al-Jamā'ah al-Islāmiyyah distanced itself from it. Soon, the Jihād Organization began to pay the price for that signature in confrontations with American global security campaigns against terrorism. Its scattered cadres and elements in various countries began to fall. Many were abducted from different countries and handed over to Egypt—from Thailand, Albania, Azerbaijan, the United Arab Emirates, and others. Meanwhile, some of their members were arrested in other countries that did not extradite them and were imprisoned there, as in Britain.
- Dr. Ayman, with his unique determination and relentless patience, continued the attempt with the remaining cadres, not surrendering to the reality imposed by the new world order, which had practically rendered hierarchical, clandestine, national Jihādī attempts obsolete.
- The organization opened its own special camp, attracted its remaining cadres, and tried to resume. However, the general circumstances and realities, especially security-related ones—as arrests swept through the organization abroad—convinced Sheikh Dr. Ayman al-Zawahiri of the available path for Jihād and work in Afghanistan with Sheikh Usama bin Laden in his war against America, for realistic reasons stemming from political and field convictions that began to form in his mind. I personally followed this transformation with him and spoke with him at length about its circumstances shortly before the September events. Perhaps I will present some details of this in the book I will dedicate to the history of the Arab Afghans in the Taliban era, Allāh willing, as this is not the place for these details.

- Dr. Ayman officially announced his pledge of allegiance to Sheikh Usama bin Laden and the merging of the Jihād Organization with Al-Qaeda in mid-2001. This led to a split among the handful of men who remained with him from the cadres in Afghanistan into two factions: one group agreed with this direction, and another insisted on continuing efforts in programs to establish an Islāmic government in Egypt on the ruins of Hosni Mubarak's government through Jihād in the old style. They considered his dissolution of the organization illegitimate, arguing that the emir's task is to manage the organization, not dissolve it and merge it with another. This faction was led by Brother Abu al-Samh (Tharwat Salah Shihata), a lawyer and one of the organization's veteran cadres, also an old Arab Afghan.
- The September events did not give either wing much time to proceed far with their programs and ambitions. Soon, all remaining Arab Afghans gathered in the battle of destiny, defending themselves and the Emirate whose fall fate had decreed. Most of the remaining cadres were martyred in those battles. Dr. Ayman al-Zawahiri moved on after exerting his utmost effort; his wife, his only son Muhammad, and his infant daughter were martyred, may Allāh have mercy on them, during the brutal bombing raids by American aircraft. He settled with Sheikh Usama in their mobile hideout—may Allāh protect them—to continue the path of Jihād and incitement, as is well-known. Another group went with Professor Tharwat Shihata on the paths of migration and displacement once again, eventually settling in Iranian prisons, as media outlets announced.
- This was the summary of the operational path of the Jihād Organization that Dr. Ayman pursued outside Egypt. I do not know if there are any new shoots for it that Allāh may decree to grow and resume the path and extend it in Egypt with those who are marching on.

- As for the intellectual identity of the Egyptian Jihād Organization, based on the preceding presentation, it can perhaps be said that the organization has operationally ended. It was born in the mid-sixties and ended in the chasm of September 2001.

However, it is crucial to mention that the intellectual school of the Jihād Organization remains the most prominent, important, and deeply rooted in this last century. It began with the library of Sayyid Qutb, may Allāh have mercy on him, which contains the fundamentals of contemporary Jihādī thought. Then, during the Afghan Jihād phase, while active in Peshawar, the Jihād Organization produced a rich and important literary output. Among the most important were the book Al-‘Umdah fi I’dād al-‘Uddah (The Mainstay in Preparing Equipment) by Sheikh Abd al-Qadir ibn Abd al-Aziz, and his other valuable book Al-Jāmi‘ fi Talab al-‘Ilm al-Sharīf (The Compendium in Seeking Noble Knowledge), of which the organization released a revised version titled Al-Hādi ila Sabīl al-Rashād (The Guide to the Path of Righteousness), as well as a series of important newsletters it published successively in Peshawar during the period 1988–1992. This was in addition to a number of audio and video recordings by Dr. Ayman al-Zawahiri, may Allāh protect him. The importance of the intellectual and methodological role of the Egyptian Jihād Organization stems not only from the significance of its library but also from the fact that it became an intellectual and methodological foundation for the majority of organizations, gatherings, and most individuals in the Jihādī current from the early nineties to the present day. All subsequent intellectual and media productions by various segments of the Jihādī current and the Arab Afghans have revolved around it, as has what became known as Jihādī Salafism or other Jihādī schools in the modern era. So, may Allāh reward them with all good and accept from them by His grace and generosity. Similarly, the early military cadres of the Egyptian Jihād Organization in the Afghan Jihād arena and the group of outstanding military cadres and trainers who worked in the Arab Jihād arena in Afghanistan in its first phase (1986–1992) and second phase (1996–2001) played a role that left its important marks within the sum of military and field efforts of Arab Jihād cadres in Afghanistan, whether through the written heritage they left in military and operational training manuals, or through practical efforts in training Jihādīs of other nationalities and the many cadres who graduated at their hands and the hands of their peers, and then continued to contribute after them. So, may Allāh reward them on behalf of Islām and the Muslims with the best reward, and accept from them the best of their deeds. He is All-Hearing, All-Responsive.

On a personal level, I knew the experience of the Jihād group closely, and I was bound by ties of brotherhood and intimate friendship with most of its leaders who were present in Afghanistan, in addition to working relationships and cooperation in many fields, starting with Dr. Ayman al-Zawahiri and extending to most of them. I saw in them outstanding examples of ideological, patient mujāhidīn, fleeing for their faith. May Allāh have mercy on them and grant them abundant reward. On the intellectual level, I am very grateful for the great benefit I gained intellectually from my interaction and acquaintance with them. I must not forget to record my thanks and greetings to Sheikh Dr. Abd al-Qadir ibn Abd al-Aziz (Sayyid Imam al-Sharif), the mufti, scholar, and emir of the Jihād group during the Afghanistan phase. His books, knowledge, and my discussions with him left a profound impact on my soul and thought; may Allāh grant him relief. Likewise, the mujāhid and outstanding model, Sheikh Ayman al-Zawahiri, may Allāh protect him; he influenced me as a thinker, writer, and a wonderful role model, may Allāh protect him, and many others. Most of them have met their fate; we ask Allāh to gather me with them in the highest companionship.

3. The Jihādī Experience in Syria (1965–1983)

The Jihādī experience in Syria dates back to Sheikh Marwan Hadid, may Allāh have mercy on him, who was raised in the Muslim Brotherhood. During his agricultural engineering studies in Egypt, he was influenced by the ideas of Sayyid Qutb, may Allāh have mercy on him. He returned to Syria full of enthusiasm at a time when the secular, nationalist, socialist Ba‘th party had seized power. He became active in the mosques of Hama, delivering sermons, enjoining good and forbidding evil, and calling for the implementation of Sharī‘ah. He was arrested multiple times. In 1965, government forces raided a mosque where he and a number of his students were, leading to an armed clash with the authorities. Several of them were martyred, and the Sheikh and others were arrested and sentenced to death. The head of state at the time, President Amin al-Hafiz, was then forced to release them under pressure from scholars in Syria, led by Sheikh Muhammad al-Hamid, may Allāh have mercy on him.

Sheikh Marwan had realized that a major confrontation with the Ba‘thist regime was inevitable and warned early of an upcoming sectarian Nusayri project. When he could not convince the Muslim Brotherhood to prepare for confrontation, he and his students took it upon themselves to prepare through armed action with the Palestine Liberation Organization, via its Islāmīc faction. He managed to prepare the first Jihādī elite for his Jihādī organization.

In 1970, Hafez al-Assad and the Nusayri Alawite group within the army and Ba‘th party staged a "white coup" called the "Corrective Movement." Thus, the Nusayri sect, extremists among the esoteric Shia, jumped to the forefront to openly assume power and rule over Muslims in Syria, exactly as Sheikh Marwan, may Allāh have mercy on him, had warned.

Sheikh Marwan Hadid, may Allāh have mercy on him, returned to mobilize for confrontation anew. He sought to unite the two factions of the Muslim Brotherhood organization in Syria, which had split during that period, on a project to confront the regime. However, both wings—the one affiliated with the international organization headed by Sheikh Abd al-Fattah Abu Ghuddah, may Allāh have mercy on him, and his deputy Adnan Saʿid al-Din, as well as the other wing led by Issam al-Attar—agreed, despite their significant differences, to reject the project of preparing for confrontation and preferred to continue their peaceful daʿwah approach.

When Sheikh Marwan Hadid, may Allāh have mercy on him, became convinced that it was impossible to persuade the Muslim Brotherhood to confront the regime, he formed his own organization, which he named "The Fighting Vanguard of Hizb Allāh." He established three main cells for it in his hometown of Hama, his main field of activity, in Aleppo, Syria's second most important city, and in the capital, Damascus, where he moved in hiding to prepare for the confrontation with the Nusayris.

The Muslim Brotherhood expelled Marwan from their organization along with a group of those influenced by his revolutionary Jihādī ideas and tried to restrain him. But he continued to recruit supporters, most of whom were young Muslim Brotherhood members, and uttered his famous saying: "If the Brotherhood expels me through the door, I will enter upon them through the window, and I will drag them to Jihād." And this is indeed what happened.

Sheikh Marwan Hadid was arrested in 1970 after an armed clash with intelligence services at his hideout in Damascus. He remained in prison until 1975, during which he lost half his weight under torture. He was then executed by a lethal injection in prison, as was rumored at the time. He was buried, may Allāh have mercy on him, his grave concealed, and his family was not allowed to announce a funeral for him.

The leadership of the Fighting Vanguard organization passed to his students. The emirate was taken over after him by the martyr Abd al-Sattar al-Za'im, may Allāh have mercy on him. The Vanguard adopted a secret plan for confrontation through targeted assassinations of senior Nusayri state officials. They carried this out during the years 1975–1979, and the state was unable to identify them until the end of that period, with the cooperation of Jordanian intelligence.

The Vanguard declared Jihād against the regime in Syria in the summer of 1979, in the month of Sha'ban 1399 AH, and announced itself under its new name, "The Fighting Vanguard of the Muslim Brotherhood." Urban guerrilla warfare began throughout Syria.

The Muslim Brotherhood (the main wing linked to the international organization) initially declared its dissociation from that confrontation and demanded investigation committees to prove their non-involvement in the events. Meanwhile, Issam al-Attar embraced the confrontation and attributed it to himself, publishing his bank account numbers to collect donations for the Jihād, of course, from Germany!

Hafez al-Assad's regime was destabilized by the military strikes of the mujāhidīn from the Vanguard. He decided to confront and liquidate all factions of the Muslim Brotherhood, then expanded the confrontation to include the entire spectrum of the Islāmic Awakening, and even the entire religious segment of the country. The confrontation took the form of a war between the Sunnis, who are the majority of Muslims in Syria, and the Nusayri minority, called the Alawite sect, as the French named them during the occupation to confuse people about their true nature.

As a result of the mujāhidīn's victories on one hand, and the desire to reap the fruits of Hafez al-Assad's campaign against them on the other, the Muslim Brotherhood announced their entry into the war against the regime in late 1979, several months after it erupted. They adopted the confrontation and began working to seize its leadership and wrest control from the Vanguard. Their policies played a major role—though not the only one—in aborting the armed Jihād against the regime in Syria.

Due to internal reasons, the policies of the Muslim Brotherhood, and government security strikes that succeeded in regaining the initiative, the Fighting Vanguard retreated. Most of its cadres were liquidated through killing and imprisonment. Those who remained were forced to leave for neighboring countries, where the Iraqi and Jordanian governments, then opposed to the Syrian regime, opened their doors to Syrian opposition members from all parts of the political spectrum.

The Muslim Brotherhood, led by Adnan Saʿid al-Din, managed to gain control of the leadership of the Jihādī revolution in Syria, drawing in the remnants of the Vanguard, Issam al-Attar's organization, and a large segment of scholarly groups in Syria under their leadership from 1980 onwards.

The Muslim Brotherhood led the Jihādī revolution in Syria on a path of comprehensive political and military failure until it was aborted in the bloody Hama confrontations of 1982. The military structures of all factions were destroyed, and Muslims suffered losses exceeding 50,000 deaths in one of the most extensive genocidal operations committed by an Arab government in the twentieth century.

Thus ended the Syrian Jihādī experience, which represents the most important and longest confrontational experience of the armed Jihādī current against apostate governments in the Arab and Islāmic world.

Allāh enabled this humble servant, the author of this book, to chronicle that important phase, during the period 1975–1985, in the book titled The Jihādī Islāmic Revolution in Syria: Pains and Hopes, which I wrote between 1985 and 1987, and was published in Peshawar in late 1990. It contains a comprehensive record of that experience.

Allāh facilitated my accompaniment of that phase, as I had joined the Fighting Vanguard organization in early 1980. Then, after leaving Syria at the end of that year, I joined the Muslim Brotherhood organization in Syria, which had settled in Jordan, and worked in the organization's military apparatus. During the Hama uprising events of 1982, I was a member of the military command of the Muslim Brotherhood organization formed in Baghdad, composed of cadres from the military apparatus—of whom I was one—and the supreme political leadership of the Syrian Brotherhood. This enabled me to learn the hidden details of those events and the reasons for our defeat, which I recorded, along with a summary of its lessons, in my aforementioned book.

4. The Islamic International Movement in Algeria (1973–1976)

This was an armed Jihād movement founded and led in Algeria by the martyr Mustafa Bouyali. May Allāh have mercy on him, he was one of the mujāhidīn who participated in the Algerian revolution of liberation in 1954. When it led to independence in 1963, he found that secularists, communists, and socialists had dominated it and reaped the fruits of the Jihād of the Algerian people, which had lasted for more than a century. So, he founded that movement to resume the revolution and Jihād for the sake of implementing Allāh's Sharī'ah in Algeria. He launched his movement during the era of President Chadli Bendjedid in 1973. I heard a recorded statement of his addressed to the head of state, commanding and prohibiting him, and threatening him with Jihād if he did not implement the Sharī'ah in Algeria. I also heard some tapes of him speaking about his Jihādī principles and warning the scholars of the regime. His movement did not last long, as he fell into an ambush by Algerian intelligence during an appointment with some arms dealers and was killed, may Allāh have mercy on him, in 1976. Some of his aides were martyred, and others were arrested, tried, and imprisoned.

Some of his students tried to revive the movement after the Jihād against the government was launched following the military coup against the democratic process in 1991. They became a party in the attempt to unify the Armed Islāmic Group in 1993, before its schism and takeover by Takfiris, as will be indicated later, Allāh willing.

5. The Al-Jamā‘ah al-Islāmiyyah of Egypt Experience (1975–2001)

I will summarize its experience based on the information I gathered about it by reviewing its literary heritage and my interaction with many of its pioneers and founders through the stages of Jihād in Afghanistan and during my stay in Europe. Al-Jamā‘ah al-Islāmiyyah was founded and became active in a number of Egyptian universities starting in 1975, following Sadat's policy of openness and allowing Islāmic groups space to operate, in order to limit the activity of leftist political currents that were growing at that time. Al-Jamā‘ah al-Islāmiyyah emerged with a methodology that bridged Qutbist thought and Salafi principles, making the application of Sharī‘ah in Egypt the goal of its project. The group adopted a populist approach through its leadership's embrace of public da‘wah, enjoining good and forbidding evil, and applying some aspects of hisbah (moral policing) in certain areas. Its cells spread through mosques in Egypt. Its origin was primarily in Upper Egypt, where most of its leaders hailed from, but it extended to universities in Lower Egypt (the Nile Delta). Its leadership took Sheikh Dr. Umar Abd al-Rahman as its general emir, due to his known resolute stances—may Allāh relieve his distress—since the demise of Abdel Nasser, when he issued a fatwa against praying over Nasser upon his death, followed by several other stances during Sadat's era.

Following Sadat's treacherous visit to Israel and his announcement of the Camp David Accords and the program of peace and normalization with the Jews, Al-Jamā‘ah al-Islāmiyyah adopted a Jihādī intellectual orientation. One of its prominent figures, the martyr Abd al-Salam Faraj, produced one of the most important Jihādī treatises of the modern era, the essay Al-Farīdah al-Ghā'ibah (The Neglected Duty). Its significance stemmed from its inclusion of the most important contemporary fatwas on Jihād against the existing governments in Arab and Islāmic countries, including Egypt, ruling them as apostate and issuing fatwas for Jihād against them, fighting their soldiers and security men, and analogizing their situations to Ibn Taymiyyah's fatwas on fighting the Tatars and their Muslim collaborators, whether coerced or ignorant. This treatise was one of the most important early works that launched the contemporary Jihādī Salafi school of thought.

Then, Al-Jamā'ah al-Islāmiyyah soon succeeded in carrying out the heroic operation and executed the treacherous President Anwar Sadat in the famous reviewing stand incident during the annual military parade in 1981, when Sadat came out to his people in his finery, and Allāh caused the earth to swallow him and his stand, leaving him dead. The operation was led by the martyr of Al-Jamā'ah al-Islāmiyyah and the martyr of Egypt and the contemporary Jihādī current, the heroic martyr Khalid al-Islambouli, may Allāh have mercy on him. This was part of a coup program against the government in Egypt, of which only the assassination of Sadat was successfully accomplished.

Following Hosni Mubarak's assumption of power after his deceased predecessor Anwar Sadat, Al-Jamā'ah al-Islāmiyyah entered a war of attrition with the Egyptian government, which had laid out a plan to liquidate it by arresting its cadres and assassinating its leaders. It began this by assassinating one of its most prominent preachers, the martyr Alaa Mohieddin, and continued this policy, especially during the tenure of the notorious criminal Minister of Interior, Zaki Badr. Thus, the leadership of Al-Jamā'ah al-Islāmiyyah decided to enter a war of attrition, liquidations, and assassinations with the government, which had begun arrest campaigns within its ranks.

The leadership of Al-Jamā'ah al-Islāmiyyah in Egypt found in the Afghan Jihād against the Russians an excellent arena and an opportune chance to train its cadres, expand, and organize. It had a prominent presence in Peshawar, Pakistan, and in the Arab camps and fronts in Afghanistan. Among its prominent leaders present in Afghanistan were Sheikh Umar Abd al-Rahman, Sheikh Rifa'i Taha, Brother Tal'at Fuad Qasim—may Allāh grant them all relief—Brother Muhammad al-Islambouli (brother of the martyr Khalid, the killer of Egypt's Pharaoh), and Brother Mustafa Hamza, among others. Al-Jamā'ah al-Islāmiyyah of Egypt offered a constellation of its finest sons and cadres as martyrs in the battle of Islām through the Arab Jihād in Afghanistan.

Following the security storms that swept Afghanistan and Pakistan at America's instigation after the fall of the communist regime in Kabul, Egyptian intelligence participated significantly in the security campaign against the Arab Afghans in cooperation with Pakistani intelligence. Most of the leaders and rank-and-file of the Egyptian Al-Jamā'ah al-Islāmiyyah moved to Sudan based on an invitation and facilitation from the Salvation Government headed by Omar al-Bashir and Dr. Hassan al-Turabi's group, which opened the way and sought to accommodate Arabs in Sudan. Foremost among them were Sheikh Usama bin Laden and the two Egyptian armed groups: the Jihād Organization and Al-Jamā'ah al-Islāmiyyah. They were promised an open field to operate from Sudan's northern borders with Egypt. Indeed, Al-Jamā'ah began field operations from there. Then, what happened to the Jihād Organization and others happened to them: they were asked to leave under threat of arms by Sudanese security when the "valiant men" decided to change their policy and bow to American policy and its Egyptian follower. The leaders of Al-Jamā'ah al-Islāmiyyah dispersed to several countries, most of them heading to Yemen. Under pursuit and campaigns to eliminate safe havens, their prominent figures headed to Iran, while some sought safe havens under the cover of political asylum in Europe. Among the most prominent who went to Iran were Sheikh Rifa'i Taha, Sheikh Mustafa Hamza, Sheikh Muhammad Shawqi al-Islambouli, and others. Meanwhile, among the most prominent who went to Europe were Abu Talal (Tal'at Fuad Qasim), who settled in Denmark, and Osama Rushdi, a member of Al-Jamā'ah's Shura Council. This was in late 1995.

Al-Jamā'ah al-Islāmiyyah of Egypt had good relations with the Khomeini current in the Iranian government due to its distinct position regarding the Iranian government, which differed from that of the entire Jihādī spectrum. It praised Iran's (Islāmic) revolutionary experience and lauded it in some of its literature. Some of its officials, including Dr. Umar Abd al-Rahman—may Allāh grant him relief—used to attend conferences organized by the Iranian government here and there. This provided them a bridge to a safe haven there during that period of fierce storms.

Although most, if not all, prominent leaders, symbols, and cadres of the Jihādī current, and many of its human base, began a semi-collective migration to Afghanistan during what I have termed the "second phase of the Arab Afghans" (1996–2001), the prominent leaders of Al-Jamā'ah al-Islāmiyyah who had settled in Iran preferred to stay there. They maintained a distinct, clear position that differed from the general orientation of the Jihādī current regarding Afghanistan. The most prominent features of this position were:

1. Not explicitly supporting the Taliban and not engaging in supporting them against the Northern Alliance, which consisted of former Afghan Jihād leaders. Indeed, they were wary of being drawn towards Afghanistan.
2. Al-Jamā'ah al-Islāmiyyah clearly distanced itself, through its media outlets, especially its active website, from Bin Laden's orientations in his declared war against the Americans, unlike what the Jihād Organization, led by Dr. Ayman al-Zawahiri, did. When Al-Qaeda mentioned Al-Jamā'ah's cooperation with it, Al-Jamā'ah denied this in a statement refuting that claim.

3. Al-Jamā‘ah adopted the principle of ceasing the call for armed confrontation with governments and announced a "unilateral initiative to stop violence in Egypt against the Egyptian government." This issue deserves attention because it steered Al-Jamā‘ah in a different direction, taking it out of the entire Jihādī current's path, and left effects on it that transcend Al-Jamā‘ah's specifics.

Al-Jamā‘ah al-Islāmiyyah of Egypt and its Unilateral Initiative to Stop Violence with the Egyptian Government:

Al-Jamā‘ah al-Islāmiyyah of Egypt was distinguished from the general Jihādī current by important intellectual differences that later reflected on its course. Among the most important of these differences were:

- Its adoption of an ideology that can be considered intermediate between the thought of the general "Islāmic Awakening" and the thought of the "Jihādī current" regarding issues of governance (ḥākimiyyah). They declared their conviction of the apostasy of the supreme ruler in Muslim countries that govern by other than what Allāh revealed, including Egypt, but they limited the ruling of apostasy to his person and did not extend it to his regime. Consequently, they did not deem fighting against his aides permissible under Sharī‘ah except in self-defense.
- Al-Jamā‘ah adopted the principle of binding consultation (shūrā) and collective leadership, taking Dr. Umar Abd al-Rahman as a nominal emir and symbol for the group.
- They also bypassed a Sharī‘ah problematic concerning the conditions of "legitimate emirate," which opened a door for lengthy and wide-ranging debate between them, the Jihād Organization in Egypt, and other segments of the Jihādī current since the early nineties in Afghanistan. This was their adoption of the principle of the "validity of the leadership of a prisoner," as was the case with the esteemed mujāhid Sheikh Dr. Umar Abd al-Rahman in America—may Allāh grant him relief. They also considered their historical leaders imprisoned in Egypt as active leaders participating in decisions based on the principle of binding consultation. I am not here to discuss the Sharī'ah legitimacy of the principle, but rather history records the role of these intellectual and methodological foundations in Al-Jamā'ah's subsequent path since the mid-nineties.

Excluding these two problematics, I can hardly find other major methodological differences (from a theoretical standpoint) in the methodology of Al-Jamā'ah al-Islāmiyyah of Egypt compared to other schools of the Jihādī current, in terms of their Jihādī Salafi thought and their rejection, even takfīr (declaration of apostasy), of the "democratic methodology" in Islāmic work, while excusing Islamists who practiced it due to interpretation or otherwise, and so on regarding the components of contemporary Jihādī thought.

However, these methodological problematics placed Al-Jamā'ah, which had already entered into actual conflict with the Egyptian government, into practical difficulties. The members of its military apparatus found themselves facing the jurisprudential requirements of an offensive-defensive war of attrition in the arena of confrontation with the Egyptian regime and its security and intelligence men. This was on one hand. On another important hand, they found their leadership practically consisting of three main wings:

1. The imprisoned leaders in Egypt, whom they termed the "historical leadership."
2. The pursued political leaders abroad in exiles and safe havens.
3. The leaders of Al-Jamā'ah's military apparatus, whether inside or outside Egypt, who were waging a bloody military confrontation with Hosni Mubarak's regime. These methodological contradictions with practical dimensions quickly affected Al-Jamā'ah's path in the second half of the nineties and after the September events, as we shall see. To make matters worse, the military wing, led by Brother Abu Hazim (Mustafa Hamza), planned an operation that nearly assassinated President Hosni Mubarak in Addis Ababa during an African conference. The operation failed, some members of the group were captured, and they recorded their confessions before being executed, may Allāh have mercy on them. This operation caused tremendous embarrassment for the Sudanese government, which had orchestrated the plans and logistically supported the operation from its territory, as well as for the leadership of Al-Jamā'ah al-Islāmiyyah. It further complicated matters.

The arrest of Dr. Umar Abd al-Rahman in the United States of America, where he had made a mistaken decision to reside with the aim of da'wah, activism, and providing media and material support for Al-Jamā'ah, further exacerbated the situation. False charges were fabricated against him there following the first attack on the World Trade Center tower in New York, and he was sentenced to two hundred years in prison! All attempts to mitigate the sentence and defend him failed. There was a semi-official announcement by Al-Jamā'ah al-Islāmiyyah's leadership that their de facto emir was Sheikh Abu Talal (Tal'at Fuad Qasim), who had settled as a political refugee in Denmark and adopted the principle of confrontation, alongside others from the hawkish wing within Al-Jamā'ah who supported the military apparatus led by Mustafa Hamza. This group included politicians like Sheikh Rifa'i Taha and Sheikh Muhammad al-Islambouli, as well as some who had taken up the banner of fieldwork in the Jihād in Bosnia (1994–1995). They played an honorable role for Al-Jamā'ah al-Islāmiyyah of Egypt, which is considered one of the achievements of the contemporary Jihādī current.

This wing, committed to confrontation, clashed with an opposing wing that began to advocate for truce and an end to confrontation with the Egyptian government. This latter wing was represented by the imprisoned (historical) leaders and some of their leaders in Europe, most prominently Brother Osama Rushdi. This contradiction became public when this latter wing refused to acknowledge the legitimacy of the Luxor incident, where an active cell of Al-Jamā'ah al-Islāmiyyah in Egypt attacked a group of foreign tourists, killing and injuring dozens. The "imprisoned historical leaders" and some European leaders, notably Osama Rushdi, rushed to condemn this act and its perpetrators, deeming it a mistake. Osama Rushdi even went as far as to launch a blatant attack on the act and those behind it from Al-Jamā'ah's political and military leadership! He engaged in a literary confrontation even with senior figures among them, his own teachers, such as Sheikh Rifa'i Taha, may Allāh grant him relief.

As I recall, the historical leaders in Egyptian prisons surprised the entire world with their project, known as the "unilateral initiative to stop violence" in Egypt, calling on the Egyptian government to reciprocate with measures to end the confrontation. The طرح (proposal/launch) of this initiative coincided with our early days in Afghanistan at the beginning of the "second phase of the Arab Afghans" there, under the Taliban, perhaps in late 1997.

I personally followed the stages and developments of this initiative with the most prominent leaders of Al-Jamā'ah al-Islāmiyyah present in Afghanistan, and with some of its senior figures who visited us from Iran, some of whom leaned towards residing in Afghanistan in mid-2000, as well as with the most prominent Jihādī symbols present there. This allows me to summarize the stages of that initiative in key points:

1. Some leaders of Al-Jamā'ah al-Islāmiyyah, imprisoned in Egypt since the events of Sadat's assassination, proposed, through their famous lawyer Mr.

Montasser al-Zayyat, an initiative memorandum declaring a unilateral cessation of armed action in Egypt, calling on the government to respond positively. The wing inclined towards this direction among Al-Jamā'ah's leaders in Europe, headed by Brother Osama Rushdi, quickly supported them.

2. The political and military leadership of Al-Jamā'ah al-Islāmiyyah of Egypt abroad, especially the key figures in Iran and some in Afghanistan, were thrown into confusion. There was ambiguity regarding the position of the pursued field military command inside Egypt, which was directly engaged in military action, as well as the position of Dr. Umar Abd al-Rahman in his prison in America. However, Al-Jamā'ah's leaders in various factions, especially those opposing the initiative abroad, considered the unity of Al-Jamā'ah and the indivisibility of its stance above all other considerations, including methodological and principled ones. Nevertheless, signs of rejection of the initiative appeared among a number of Al-Jamā'ah's symbols, most prominently Sheikh Rifa'i Taha, Brother Muhammad al-Islambouli, and Mustafa Hamza. Yet, everyone demonstrated unity of ranks and commitment to the majority opinion as a unified decision after consultations at all levels. However, some announced the freezing of their membership in Al-Jamā'ah's Shura Council due to their lack of conviction in this matter, as Sheikh Muhammad Shawqi al-Islambouli did.
3. The Egyptian government rewarded this initiative with rejection and a determination to continue the security confrontation. The prominent leader Sheikh Abu Talal (Tal'at Fuad Qasim) was abducted from Croatia while on his way to visit Al-Jamā'ah's leaders working in Bosnia. Some pursued individuals hiding inside Cairo were assassinated in their apartment under mysterious circumstances. Egyptian security services, media, and the Ministry of Interior announced the continuation of the pursuit of Al-Jamā'ah and their non-reciprocation of the initiative. This remained their declared position until late 2003, when they partially responded to it, as will be discussed.

4. A collective decision crystallized within Al-Jamā'ah al-Islāmiyyah, at the level of internal and external leadership, to adopt the initiative. The government's intransigence only made Al-Jamā'ah's leadership, whose emirate had apparently passed to Brother Abu Hazim (Mustafa Hamza), more insistent on the initiative! The historical (imprisoned) leaders and those of like mind among the external leaders supporting the initiative developed their position to a dangerous methodological level. They began issuing Shari'ah research and intellectual studies to frame and theorize what they called "renouncing violence"! They started criticizing and finding fault with the principles upon which the foundations of Jihādī confrontation with apostate governments were built—principles they had previously filled the arena of Islāmic work with valuable Jihādī literature to establish. This literature, such as the treatise Al-Farīdah al-Ghā'ibah (The Neglected Duty), Al-Jamā'ah's constitution and program Mithāq al-'Amal al-Islāmī (Charter of Islāmic Action), Al-I'tisām (The Adherence), and Ḥatmiyyat al-Muwājahah (The Inevitability of Confrontation), and hundreds of articles that filled their famous newsletters like Al-Murābiṭūn, had occupied a fundamental part of Jihādī current's thought.

Thus, books were issued by Al-Jamā'ah al-Islāmiyyah under the banner of "Intellectual Revisions," which gradually degenerated in their intellectual and methodological retreats to enter the realm of doctrinal collapse in the fundamentals of the legitimate political principles of Jihādī and even Islāmic thought upon which the Awakening was based. They began by talking about the sanctity of the blood and property of non-Muslims in their lands, to their security in our lands, eventually reaching the call for cooperation with rulers in the battle against Israel and in the battle for economic development. Then came flirtation and talk about returning to the field of peaceful da‘wah and perhaps legitimate political participation. It reached the point of declaring the deceased Sadat—whom the heroes of Al-Jamā‘ah al-Islāmiyyah had the honor of assassinating on behalf of the Islāmic Ummah—a martyr killed unjustly; one of them even called him the "martyr of fitnah (sedition)!!" I have seen some of what was written in those books through excerpts promoted by the media, some mentioned by the lawyer Montasser al-Zayyat himself, through those governmental media platforms.

Regardless of commenting on the reasons, causes, and excuses that can be sought for the imprisoned leadership (lacking legitimacy and capacity in their prisons anyway), or for that pursued leadership, besieged in a circle of practical helplessness—disregarding all that for now—it can be said that Al-Jamā‘ah al-Islāmiyyah of Egypt has definitively deviated from its intellectual identity and its methodology as a group within the Jihādī current.

I will leave the discussion of this matter (the principle of the initiative) from my perspective and the perspective of all Jihādīs. I will mention that during that period, we were able to meet in the shadow of the Taliban, study the matter, and hear the excuses and justifications from their proponents.

Everyone rejected this initiative in its entirety, while maintaining full affection and respect for our brothers, their precedence, and their merit.

5. The Egyptian Jihād Organization, as previously mentioned, and the entire spectrum of the Jihādī current explicitly rejected the initiative and expressed this through the limited media means available during the period of residence with the Taliban, which was characterized by practical isolation from the world due to the siege on the Taliban and due to the Taliban's underdeveloped media policy.
6. The leaders of Al-Jamā‘ah al-Islāmiyyah abroad were embarrassed by the successive collapses resulting from the initiative, but none of them could do more than express their personal disagreement and their commitment to unity of ranks and the opinion of their historical leadership! This historical leadership constituted the main weight in the Shura Council, which decides by majority in a group that practically has no emir, whose members are scattered across the earth, and whose decisions are controlled by prisoners in Egypt and semi-free prisoners in political asylum havens in Europe!

7. Then the September events occurred! Those cadres of Al-Jamā'ah who remained and survived in Afghanistan departed to wherever they could. Perhaps Al-Jamā'ah's declared position, distant from the Taliban and Bin Laden, made it one of the least affected by the fierce storms that destroyed Al-Qaeda, the Arab Afghans, and most of the remaining bloc of the Jihādī current, as we mentioned earlier.
8. Then, in mid-2003, the Egyptian government surprised the world by partially responding to the initiative, six years after its launch. It began releasing batches of Al-Jamā'ah al-Islāmiyyah detainees. Several hundred were released, including Sheikh Karam Zuhdi, one of its historical leaders. Then other leaders were released. Those released from prison augmented their initiative with more books and methodological justifications to unravel their previous strong stance, like a woman who untwists her yarn after it has been spun strong. I heard from some media outlets about a book in which they evaluate their past experiences, titled Nahr al-Dhikrayāt (River of Memories). I have not been able to see it, but I read in the press about some of the calamities they are involved in. This group has practically joined Rumsfeld's program in the war of ideas and has become part of America's and the apostates' campaign to combat terrorism! Our repentant brothers, who turned from worshipping Allāh through Jihād against His enemies, did not forget to record their criticisms of the September events and their perpetrators. Al-Jamā'ah al-Islāmiyyah's initiative became a subject of praise in the intellectual counter-terrorism programs teeming in Arab media these days, and a point of reference and an example cited by Saudi scholars and others in combating the growing Jihādī manifestations in Saudi Arabia and elsewhere due to the recent American Crusader campaigns.

There is periodic talk about its leaders paving the way to propose the idea of resuming public da‘wah, whether as social institutions or as political parties that might obtain government licenses in the future.

9. In early 2004, the Egyptian President met the Iranian President on the sidelines of an international conference in Europe. Observers considered this a key to a new phase between the two countries. The two presidents declared their intention to normalize relations, which had deteriorated since the days of the Khomeini revolution when the Shah had sought refuge in Egypt, and subsequently Iran's reception of Al-Jamā‘ah al-Islāmiyyah leaders and naming one of Tehran's main streets after the martyr Khalid al-Islambouli. After Khatami's return to his country, the Iranian government complied with Egypt's repeated request to cancel the naming of that street after al-Islambouli. Then, media outlets reported Iran's intention to hand over Egyptian detainees from among the Arab Afghans and Al-Qaeda members to the Egyptian government. Subsequently, it was mentioned that some Egyptian opposition figures residing in Iran had indeed been handed over to Egypt, and that others had fled to Afghanistan. I do not know the veracity of this news, nor if this affected the remaining leaders of Al-Jamā‘ah there, and I have not been able to verify it.

This was a summary of the experience and conditions of that rich experience of Al-Jamā‘ah al-Islāmiyyah, up to the date of writing these lines in late 2004, based on my practical knowledge of it and my interactions and friendships with many of its leaders. If I were to summarize my opinion on that experience, I would do so in four points:

(1) Fairness, (2) Justification, (3) Advice, (4) Hope.

As for fairness:

- I say that Al-Jamā‘ah al-Islāmiyyah of Egypt, which I knew up close, came to an end by the close of the twentieth century, like most Jihādī groups and organizations belonging to the era of 1960–2001. They operated during that period, then faded, dissolved, were destroyed, or disintegrated from a practical standpoint. Then, the repercussions of the September events finished off what remained of them. Al-Jamā‘ah al-Islāmiyyah of Egypt, born in the mid-seventies, had practically dissolved and ended with the passing of the twentieth century and the beginning of the post-September world. Indeed, it preceded other groups in dissolving with its launch and pursuit of the initiative in that manner. This is from a practical perspective. As for the intellectual perspective, those who speak in its name today proclaim an ideology that I would not only say is different, but is contrary to and at war with the ideology they articulated in their books, which enriched their experience in Egypt and indeed enriched the entire Jihādī current. For the sake of honesty and history, it must be said explicitly: today, they condemn their path, apologize for their glories, consider them mistakes, and thereby chart a new course and methodology for themselves. As for the organizational aspect, the organization has vanished and fragmented. Most of its leaders have been killed, may Allāh have mercy on them, or captured, and news of them has ceased, may Allāh grant them relief. As for their human base, it has dissolved and ended. The only thing remaining is some cadres and historical leaders who are released from small prisons into the large prison fenced by the borders of Egypt, drawn by Sykes-Picot. There, they propose—we wish them guidance and success—new ideas and projects that are linked to the Al-Jamā‘ah al-Islāmiyyah we know only by name, if they even keep the name, which I doubt they will. For one of the conditions of the tyrants, according to our experience as an Islāmic Awakening, for anyone who wants to continue, is to dissociate from everything, even their name, and they demand it be changed, as happened in the experiences of Turkey, Tunisia, Algeria, and elsewhere. This is the first point of fairness.

- The second point is my great appreciation and respect for their experience. I knew many leaders and cadres of this organization. Truth be told, they are among the best Jihādī organizations in terms of piety, character, conduct, preparation, and upbringing; they are among the organizations that diligently nurtured their members. As for their methodology before the initiative, despite my disagreement with them on some Sharī‘ah-political choices, it is one of the best methodologies presented in the Jihādī current and one of the most well-grounded. I recorded no fault against them in their past experience except their deviation in some cases from the foundational principles of their methodology due to certain organizational calculations and partisan interests, which they, like other organizations at the time, presumed to be beneficial. This occurred, for example, with some of them regarding the issue of Jihād in Algeria and their support for democracy, and the issue of not standing by the Taliban until a very late stage, when September 2001 caught everyone by surprise.

As for their da‘wah, organizational, and military experience in Egypt, as well as their heritage and media production, these too were among the most magnificent, longest, and richest experiences of the contemporary Jihādī current, both inside and outside Egypt. Likewise, their role and valuable, qualitative contributions in Afghanistan against communism, and in Bosnia in repelling the aggressor from the Muslims.

On a personal level, I was connected to many of their leaders and members by ties of brotherhood, friendship, and a shared path of Jihād, migration, and neighborhood. They were an example of loyal brothers, friends, and neighbors. Indeed, as Imam Ibn al-Qayyim said when refuting some opinions of Imam Abu Isma‘il al-Harawi in the book Madārij al-Sālikīn (The Ranks of the Wayfarers), I say: "Were it not that the right of Truth is more binding than the right of creation, there would have been scope and latitude for silence." I ask Allāh to accept from them the best of what they did and to overlook any shortcomings, flaws, and slips, which are inherent in the actions of the children of Adam. He is indeed the Forgiving, the Merciful.

As for justification for what they brought about with the initiative, without my agreeing to it:

I say that the sacrifices made by this group throughout its history are immense by any measure, in terms of martyrs, detainees, and the pursued, and those who tasted affliction for the sake of Allāh, and Allāh is their reckoner. Most of the organization's leaders and rank-and-file were imprisoned. More than 90% of their prominent front-line leaders were arrested, with only a few escaping abroad as emigrants. Tens of thousands of their members and supporters were arrested, with only a small group escaping abroad as well. The organization practically transformed into an imprisoned organization, with most of its leadership and base captive. The detainees endured for two full decades, from Sadat's assassination (1981) to the end of the twentieth century, perhaps hoping their internal military apparatus or those who escaped abroad could achieve something. However, the general circumstances surrounding the confrontations of the Jihādī current with apostate regimes and the international powers behind them, led by America and its NATO allies, in what became known as the global war on terror, did not allow them or others to achieve qualitative results or any victory.

Furthermore, the Egyptian street, like the general Arab and Islāmic street, let them down, just as it let down the Jihādī current in most places. This was due to many factors, stemming from general corruption, the impotence and confusion of the Islāmic Awakening in the paths of politics, the aversion of its leaders to Jihād, and the appalling decline of Muslim scholars in this era towards paths of hypocrisy or burrows of helplessness!

The Egyptian street, like others, did not respond in this confrontation; rather, it was practically drawn either to stand with the state or to sink into indifference. The mujāhidīn stood alone in the arena, for hundreds to be killed, tens of thousands to be imprisoned, and those who emigrated to be pursued. Homes were destroyed, women widowed, children displaced, and families disintegrated under the weight of poverty, destitution, need, and dispersion.

I believe that the physical and psychological torture endured by Al-Jamā‘ah's leaders and members in Egypt's prisons—which have a long, dark history of confronting the Awakening through security, intellectual, and media means—in addition to the malicious role played by regime scholars in their debates with them under the supervision of state security agencies, had a profound impact on their catastrophic decision, called the "initiative to stop violence."

It is, in reality, an initiative and a decision by a group of captive prisoners, devoid of free will. Their decisions, opinions, and fatwas have no standing, neither according to Sharī‘ah nor reason.

The proponent of such initiatives may be excused for what he misguides himself or others with, if the conditions of coercion are met. Our criticism is of the principle of the initiative and its content, not of all the imprisoned proponents. The principle is rejected entirely. The brothers are generally excused, and Allāh knows best, unlike those among them who were not imprisoned and who took on the primary responsibility for this deviation from their havens in Europe. Even what they produced after their release from prison, I view with the same perspective and method: rejection of the deviation and excusing the genuinely coerced deviant among them. They are still prisoners within the large prison (Egypt) within its walled borders, which, along with others, is now surrounded by an even larger prison in the post-September world, across the entire globe, under American supervision. We ask Allāh for steadfastness on the truth and resolve for righteousness.

As for hope:

It lies in the emergence from the remnants of this group, from the loins of these mujāhidīn, and from their followers, those who will complete the path—the path of Jihād and resistance in the days to come—to carry the banner, and those who will complete the journey in the land of Kinanah (Egypt), the most important fortress of confrontation in Muslim lands against these advancing Crusader-Jewish campaigns.

As for advice:

To these brothers of ours, and to everyone who is swept away to fall into such pitfalls and abysses set by tyrants, their aides, and their jurists on the path of those journeying to Allāh today, I will be brief.

Allāh Almighty says:

{And fitnah is worse than killing. And they will not cease fighting you until they turn you back from your religion if they are able. And whoever of you reverts from his religion [to disbelief] and dies while he is a disbeliever – for those, their deeds have become worthless in this world and the Hereafter, and those are the companions of the Fire, they will abide therein eternally.} (Al-Baqarah 2:217).

And He, the Mighty and Majestic, says:

*{Muhammad is not but a messenger. [Other] messengers have passed on before him. So if he was to die or be killed, would you turn back on your heels [to unbelief]? And he who turns back on his heels will never harm Allāh at all; but Allāh will reward the grateful. * And it is not [possible] for one to die except by permission of Allāh at a decree determined. And whoever desires the reward of this world – We will give him* *thereof; and whoever desires the reward of the Hereafter – We will give him thereof. And We will reward the grateful. * And how many a prophet [fought and] with him fought many religious scholars. But they never lost assurance due to what afflicted them in the cause of Allāh, nor did they weaken or submit. And Allāh loves the steadfast. * And their words were not but that they said, "Our Lord, forgive us our sins and the excess [committed] in our affairs and plant firmly our feet and give us victory over the disbelieving people." * So Allāh gave them the reward of this world and the good reward of the Hereafter. And Allāh loves the doers of good. * O you who have believed, if you obey those who disbelieve, they will turn you back on your heels, and you will become losers. * But Allāh is your protector, and He is the best of helpers.} (Āl ‘Imrān 3:144-150).*

Glory be to Allāh the Almighty! This Qur’ān was revealed for us and among us. And the Prophet, peace and blessings be upon him, said, as narrated by Al-Bukhari: "Khabbab ibn al-Aratt said: We complained to the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, while he was reclining on his cloak in the shade of the Ka‘bah. We said to him, 'Will you not seek help for us? Will you not pray to Allāh for us?' He said, 'Among those before you, a man would be taken, a pit would be dug for him in the earth, and he would be placed in it. Then a saw would be brought and placed on his head, and he would be sawn in two, yet that would not deter him from his religion. And he would be combed with iron combs between his flesh and bones or nerves, yet that would not deter him from his religion. By Allāh, this matter will be completed until a rider travels from Sana'a to Hadhramaut fearing none but Allāh, or a wolf for his sheep, but you are too hasty.'"

The Messenger of Allāh spoke the truth. It is as if the Ḥadīth speaks of some mujāhidīn of this age. We ask Allāh for well-being.

I believe that in the words of Allāh, and the saying of His Prophet, peace and blessings be upon him, there is sufficient admonition and advice.

It would have been acceptable for these brothers of ours, if they felt they were besieged and had no strength to continue, to surrender and raise the white flag, to announce a halt to their confrontation with the Egyptian regime, and to seek a truce or reconciliation on terms suiting their situation. But it is not their right, nor anyone's right, to invalidate the methodology itself, and to untwist the strong yarn after it has been spun. It is not their yarn, nor the yarn of their father and mother! Rather, it is the yarn of the Muslims, the yarn of the entire ancient Jihādī current, and the heritage of thousands upon thousands of martyrs and patient ones who met their Lord while steadfast upon it, in Egypt and outside Egypt.

As was narrated from the Imam of Ahl al-Sunnah, Ahmad ibn Hanbal, when some well-wishers approached him to persuade him to answer Al-Mu‘tasim under duress during the tribulation (miḥnah) to spare himself affliction, reminding him of his dependents, he said: "If this is your intellect, O so-and-so, then I am relieved." He then pointed to a crowd of people and students of knowledge waiting at the door of his prison to write down his fatwa, and said to him: "Shall I save myself and misguide these people?!" He, may Allāh have mercy on him, did not permit dissimulation (taqiyyah) for one who was a leading figure followed in religion, and he used to say: "There is no taqiyyah except under the sword."

As for one who surrenders—under any interpretation or pretext, we ask Allāh for well-being—to become a tool in the hands of tyrants and the media apparatuses of enemies at home and abroad to discourage those still treading the path of Jihād and resistance, and even to insult them and critique their methodology by distorting the Qur’ān and Sunnah, then no, by Allāh, and there is no dignity here for anyone.

The least required of these brothers of ours, and of anyone forced into a similar situation, if they withdraw from the caravan, is to hold their tongues, let their homes suffice them, weep over their sins, and ask Allāh for steadfastness for those who remain firm, and for themselves a second chance to compensate for what was lost. We ask Allāh to forgive them, make them firm on the truth, and raise from among them, their followers, and their brothers those who will raise the banner of truth and restore the banner to its honor and status.

Regarding my experience and companionship with the brethren from this group during my Jihād phase in Afghanistan, and in London in between, it enabled me to become acquainted with remarkable examples of mujāhidīn in this era. I developed bonds of brotherhood and friendship with many of them from various levels; they were indeed sincere brethren and loyal neighbors.

As I previously noted, a characteristic of this group's cadres is the excellent upbringing and training of its members, and the strength of brotherhood and a bond among them based on truth—and sometimes even on falsehood! I had the opportunity to meet many of this group's sheikhs and cadres, such as the mujāhid, scholar, and role model Sheikh Omar Abdel Rahman—may Allāh relieve his distress and grant him release. Also Sheikh Abu Yasir (Rifa'i Taha)—may Allāh grant him release; Sheikh Mustafa Hamza; Sheikh Ahmed Shawqi al-Islambouli, and others—may Allāh Almighty protect them. It was an opportunity to know exemplary, active mujāhidīn. May Allāh have mercy on those who have met Him and gather us with them in the highest Paradise, and may He protect those who remain and benefit His religion and His obedient servants through them.

6. Jihādī Attempts in Tunisia from the Mid-1980s

The contemporary form of the Islamic awakening in Tunisia dates back to the mid-1970s, when Sheikh Rachid Ghannouchi and a number of his fellow Islamists founded a movement known as the Islamic Tendency Movement in Tunisia. Like other phenomena of the Islamic awakening during that period, it began on foundations very similar to the ideology of the Muslim Brotherhood, with an added Tunisian characteristic owing to the roots of the Islamic awakening in Tunisia.

The Islamic Tendency Movement in Tunisia encompassed multiple intellectual dimensions: some were focused on proselytization, some political, some educational, and some Jihādī, the latter represented by Sheikh Dr. Salih Karkar—may Allāh protect him, relieve his suffering, and accept his deeds.

The Islamic Tendency Movement engaged in numerous political confrontations with the regime of its former president, Habib Bourguiba. Its leaders were imprisoned, its newspapers shut down, and its activities banned more than once. In its later days, it leaned towards the democratic option and engaging with the authorities through elections. Meanwhile, its secret military apparatus, composed of a number of officers from various branches of the Tunisian army, had a program to prepare for a military coup that would, as they envisioned, bring the Islamists to power. This program represents the most significant attempt at a serious Jihādī endeavor in Tunisia to overthrow the existing regime. Although this attempt cannot be considered one of the Jihādī current's experiences due to the intellectual identity of Ghannouchi's group, I will provide an overview of it in this section, considering that the officers who undertook it held Jihādī views closer to the Jihādī current's ideology than to the movement's general mixed political character. This became clear to me after getting to know some of them personally.

Alongside the Islamic Tendency Movement, there were some small cells, not exceeding a few individuals to my knowledge, of youth who embraced Salafī Jihādī thought. They carried out a number of primitive, simple, and inexperienced operations, which led to the martyrdom of some, the arrest of others, and the flight of a few individuals out of Tunisia. Among them was Sheikh Ali al-Azraq—may Allāh have mercy upon him—who issued them a fatwa on Jihād and the legitimacy of targeting the state and all its structures. Following the failure of that attempt, the Sheikh fled to Saudi Arabia, which extradited him to Tunisia in the mid-1980s. There, he was executed, may Allāh have mercy upon him, having surpassed seventy years of age, while reciting the two testimonies of faith and proclaiming Allāh's greatness in a Tunisian prison, as related to me by some Tunisian brethren who lived through that period.

As for the coup attempt by the Islamic Tendency Movement, or what later became known as the Ennahda Party under the leadership of Sheikh Rachid Ghannouchi, its summary, as conveyed to me orally by some of the officers who planned and supervised it, is as follows:

- Despite the methodological confusion and disarray that characterized the Islamic Tendency Movement and its first tier of leadership since its inception, its beginnings were marked by revolutionary, coup-oriented thought, boldness, and a broad political vision, reflecting the intellectual and psychological makeup of Sheikh Rachid Ghannouchi.
- The movement had an ambitious institutional vision, concerned with establishing cadres and organizational structures for an organization aspiring to overthrow a regime and inherit it at all levels. Therefore, the movement had programs in various fields: political, educational, economic, media, etc. Among the apparatuses it established was the movement's military wing.
- The military apparatus's plan was primarily based on embedding a number of volunteer officers within the Tunisian army across its three branches: land, air, and naval forces. It also involved recruiting officers with Islamic inclinations within the army. Regardless of the minor details, the organization was well-structured and extremely clandestine within a secular army that prohibited its members from religious observance, monitored even the whispers of worshippers and the praises of believers, and considered such acts grounds for suspicion leading at least to dismissal from the army.

- The young officers, members of this apparatus, adhered to utmost secrecy based on fatwas obtained from the organization's jurists and those they consulted, adopting behavior that concealed any indication of their religious commitment. They prayed secretly; indeed, if prayer time coincided with lessons or training, they would pray by gesturing. They fasted only if they could do so secretly. The level of concealment even reached the point where their wives wore modest clothing but were permitted to uncover their heads due to the necessity of their situation.

Then, the organization proceeded for about ten years according to its plan, which was primarily based on the idea of a military coup to overthrow the authorities.

- According to one of my officer friends who supervised the coup preparations, the program was meticulous and ambitious (its detailed specifics are now with the enemies, allowing some to be mentioned for informational purposes). It managed to establish connections with neighboring countries and coordinate its program at a high level. If my memory serves me correctly, the execution time was set for 1986, after Bourguiba's government had overturned the Islamic Tendency's victory by rigging the elections after their initial-stage win had astonished observers, given Tunisian society's known disengagement from religious commitment and the prevalence of secularist doctrines and adherents of Frenchification and Westernization. However, it became apparent in Tunisia as well that a spirit of authenticity, sympathy for the Islamic faith, and trust in its political project characterized, and still characterizes, all Arab and Islamic societies without exception.

- According to relevant narrators, the weakness and hesitation of a university professor from the civilian section of the organization, who was in contact with the leadership of the coup-plotting officers, led to the discovery of the attempt shortly before its planned execution. The Minister of Interior at the time, who is the current president, Zine El Abidine Ben Ali, swiftly launched a "white" coup in cooperation with American intelligence, the security services administration, and some political figures within the regime. Bourguiba was then isolated under the pretext of senility and ill health and moved to an isolated palace to live out the rest of his delirium and senility until he perished. Most of the coup plotters had been arrested, and those who could, fled.
- Because Zine El Abidine Ben Ali had hastily arranged his alternative coup, he feared the deep roots of the Islamist coup attempt. He was compelled to strike a deal with Rachid Ghannouchi and his political leaders, under which it was agreed to release the detained officers in exchange for the group's recognition of the new regime and its cessation of efforts to overthrow the authorities.
- Thus, about two hundred Islamist coup-plotting officers were released. Most of them went into voluntary exile in several European countries, seeking political asylum. Similarly, most of the civilian leadership of the organization, headed by Sheikh Rachid Ghannouchi, left for Western countries.
- After that failure, the Ennahda group and Sheikh Rachid himself veered to the opposite extreme in political methodology, adopting democratic proposals, or what they call the renunciation of violence. Sheikh Rachid made London his base for activities across Europe, adopting an ideology and conduct consistent with Western standards of Islamic moderation, which is not the subject of discussion here. He began this by publishing his book "Political Freedoms in Islām," in which he violated many established tenets of the Islamic faith under the pretext of an innovative approach of openness and moderation, reaching the point of denying and annulling information necessarily known from the religion.

- Thus, the only serious contemporary attempt to establish Islamic rule in Tunisia faded away.
- Sheikh Salih Karkar was arrested in France and has been under house arrest for approximately fifteen years, and remains so, for fear that he would continue his Jihādī activities and aspirations, as he represented a serious Jihādī current within the Islamic Tendency Movement in Tunisia. May Allāh grant him release.
- As for the Jihādī current and its cells in Tunisia, the arrival of some Tunisian Jihādī youth in the Afghan arena in the late 1980s and early 1990s led some of them to try to form nuclei for Jihādī gatherings. Repeated, unsuccessful attempts were made to merge these small groups into a unified organization, similar to what the Libyans and Algerians among the Arab Afghans had done. All these attempts failed due to the lack of qualified cadres among those sincere young men who could undertake such a task.
- When the Arab Afghans dispersed in 1992, some Tunisian mujāhidīn traveled to Sudan, attempting this unification once again, but to no avail. Others journeyed to political asylum havens in Europe, leaving fragmentation as a persistent characteristic of the Jihādīs among the Tunisian brethren, despite the presence of sincere and good elements among them.

As for the Islamist officers in Europe, they were worn down by the demands of life under siege and pursuit by the Tunisian regime, and by the assimilation attempts practiced upon them by the Ennahda Party abroad, led by Ghannouchi, which reached the extent of material and moral blockade. Some were eventually forced to submit and join Ghannouchi's organization for material and psychological reasons. Some of the steadfast, estranged individuals among them remained withdrawn, unable to find a way out or a path forward, like many of the oppressed and displaced Jihādīs and Islamists in Europe at the end of the twentieth century.

- With the beginning of the second phase for the Arab Afghans in Afghanistan during the Taliban era, among the Arab mujāhidīn who turned towards the Islamic Emirate was a group of Tunisian mujāhidīn. Some of them had earned the honor of participating in the Jihād in Bosnia against Serbian attacks and the war of extermination in the mid-1990s. They initiated a new attempt to establish a Jihādī gathering specific to them. Some signs of success appeared in this endeavor despite stumbling, fragmentation, and the virus of extremism and takfīr that afflicted some Tunisian mujāhidīn brethren and hampered these promising attempts. Some of the mature individuals among them managed to establish an independent camp for themselves and an administration of a decent standard, cooperating with cadres from other groups. They provided valuable training services to the Arab contingent during the Taliban era.
- However, while the brethren were preoccupied with their endeavor, destiny had other plans. The September 11th explosions in New York and Washington reverberated, their shrapnel reaching Afghanistan, as we have discussed. The American "crusade" arrived in December 2001, leading the Tunisian mujāhidīn to take up their positions on a distinguished front in the peaks of Tora Bora in the Sulaiman Mountains, west of Jalalabad, alongside their brethren, as the entire Arab presence in Afghanistan was targeted by the offensive. News arrived of their heroic steadfastness in their positions alongside their brethren in the battle of self-defense and defense of the Islamic Emirate.

- Although the Tunisian brethren's goal was to bring Jihād back to Tunisia and establish a Jihādī organization to unite them, and their attention was focused on reviving their connections with their brethren in exile and securing the requirements for advancing this gathering; and although they did not pay much attention to the Taliban's battle and the Islamic Emirate, and were hesitant to engage with it as a legitimate Sharī'ah imamate in Afghanistan due to some reservations they had and their focus on their own project; and although they were not convinced by the attempts of Bin Laden and al-Qā'idah and their uni-directional military orientations, as was the case with most Arab organizations and gatherings in Afghanistan; nevertheless, the American onslaught imposed itself on everyone.
- Thus, the mujāhidīn of Tunisia fulfilled their duty, stood firm like heroes, and dozens among them fell as martyrs and prisoners, like others. Given their originally small number, and the few I believe survived the September chasm, I think those Tunisian attempts have faded, awaiting Allāh to prepare a new generation of mujāhidīn for Tunisia. Allāh's mercy is vast, and the womb of this Ummah is still fruitful.

- On a personal level, I knew many of those brethren, the Arab Afghans from Tunisia. I also became acquainted in Europe with many of the officer brethren whose experience I briefly mentioned. I also had bonds of friendship with many of them. Cooperation also developed between me and the Tunisians who came to Afghanistan during the Taliban era.
- I still carry fond memories from those bonds. May Allāh have mercy on their martyrs and relieve their prisoners. May their living be remembered well and protected. They were an example of kindness, sincerity, pure innate nature, and diligence in their work, despite their recent experience and limited resources.

7. The Experience of the Libyan Islamic Fighting Group (LIFG): (1990 - 2001)

According to my information, there was an early Jihādī attempt by the initial cells of the Jihādī current in Libya against Muammar Gaddafi's regime during the latter half of the 1980s. The discovery and pursuit of these cells led to the departure of their main cadres to Afghanistan, where the Arab Jihādī gathering during the Afghan Jihād had begun to reach its peak. There, in the training camps scattered across Afghanistan and on the Pakistani border, this constellation of young Libyans spared no effort in training their initial cadres in various fields of instruction and re-establishing their connections with Libya and some diaspora countries. They mobilized those of their brethren whom they could to come for preparation and training to continue the path of Jihād in Libya. Those young men were known to be among the Arab mujāhidīn present in that arena who made the most of their time and patiently endured the long-term military and educational training courses they subjected themselves and their brethren to. During the last three years (1989-1992), those young men managed to organize themselves and establish the organization known as the Libyan Islamic Fighting Group. They laid out a program for preparation and the resumption of the Jihādī march in their country, based on the ideas, principles, and methods prevalent at that time within the Jihādī current and the Arab Afghans. They were able to absorb most of the Libyan mujāhidīn who were present in the Arab Afghan arena.

- The Libyan mujāhidīn efficiently participated in the activities of the Arab Jihād in Afghanistan alongside their brethren from other countries. Cadres soon emerged from among them in the fields of training and on the front lines. Then, the youth of the Libyan Islamic Fighting Group established their own guesthouses and a special camp, like most of the established or emerging Arab Jihādī groups. They then pledged allegiance to an amīr for the organization, and their administrative structure began to form as a Jihādī organization that started to take its place among the prominent Arab Jihādī organizations.
- The intellectual methodology of the Libyan Islamic Fighting Group was based on the principles of prevailing Jihādī thought. They were influenced by the methodologies of the Egyptian Islamic Group and the Egyptian Jihād Organization, and can be considered a model of Salafī Jihādī groups. This became evident when they published their intellectual methodology in a book titled "The Broad Outlines of the Libyan Islamic Fighting Group." It was also manifested later through their monthly newsletter, "Al-Fajr," as well as in a number of intellectual, political, and Sharī'ah-based research papers they issued.
- With the security storm brewing against Arabs in Pakistan under the American program, and with most Arab mujāhidīn returning to their home countries, members of the Libyan Islamic Fighting Group were among those who could not return to their country, similar to wanted Jihādīs from Syria, Egypt, Tunisia, Iraq, and some other countries. Consequently, most of the youth from the Libyan Islamic Fighting Group relocated to Sudan after the Bashir regime and its ally Turabi opened Sudan's doors to Islamists and Jihādīs following their assumption of power in 1990, as mentioned earlier. Meanwhile, a few of them headed towards political asylum havens in some European and Western countries.

- The period of residence in Sudan (1991-1995) is considered an important foundational stage for the Libyan Islamic Fighting Group. It enabled them to re-establish their connections with Libya. The group also developed an ambitious program for training cadres in various fields, especially in seeking Shari'ah knowledge. Many of them went to seek knowledge in the Land of the Two Holy Sanctuaries (Saudi Arabia), while others headed towards Mauritania. Indeed, by the time the second phase of the Arab Afghans in Afghanistan began (1996-2000), the Libyan Islamic Fighting Group had cultivated a number of the finest Shari'ah-trained scholarly cadres to emerge from the Jihādī current and the Arab Afghans.
- A number of Libyan Arab Afghan cadres who had not joined the Fighting Group were working in al-Qā'idah's training camps. They had moved to Sudan, continuing their work with Sheikh Osama bin Laden in the agricultural and economic ventures he had initiated there. However, the activities of the Fighting Group and other Islamists and Jihādīs inside Libya against Gaddafi's regime, especially their movements in Sudan close to Libya, alarmed Colonel Gaddafi's regime. This pushed him to conclude an extradition treaty and establish a program to combat Islamist elements with Bashir's (Islamist) regime. Soon, Bashir's regime turned its back on all Arab Afghans, beginning with the Libyans. The Sudanese government requested the Fighting Group organization to leave Sudan. It also asked Sheikh Osama to remove the Libyans in his employ from his fields of work due to Libyan pressure and new agreements with them. There was no alternative, and this led to the beginning of the Libyans' departure from Sudan, forcing them to redeploy in the region anew. The deportation of those among them who were with al-Qā'idah led to their joining the Fighting Group organization, thereby adding important cadres to it, as the Fighting Group was keen on being the sole Jihādī organization in Libya and made diligent efforts towards this, both inside and outside Libya.

- As I mentioned, the cadres and members of the Fighting Group dispersed across several countries in the region. Some returned to Pakistan, while others spread out in Yemen, Saudi Arabia, Turkey, Syria, Jordan, the Gulf, and some North African countries. Others headed to political asylum havens in some Western countries, where the environment and the availability of information and communication helped them in the field of propaganda and media.
- With the spark of Jihād igniting in Algeria from 1993, the Fighting Group hastened to be present in this important arena, both for its own sake and due to its proximity to Libya. It dispatched a few dozen of its mujāhidīn to be present there and participate with their brethren in the Armed Islamic Group (GIA) in the Jihād against the Algerian regime. However, it was an exceedingly bitter experience. Intelligence penetrations, the dominance of ignorant and takfirī elements, and their manipulation by intelligence services led to deviants gaining control over the GIA leadership in Algeria. This pushed the GIA into the labyrinths of deviation and fragmentation, as we will discuss in the following overview when addressing the Algerian experience, Allāh willing. What concerns us here is that the criminal administration of the GIA, under the leadership of Abu Abd al-Rahman Amin from 1995 onwards, added to its list of crimes the assassination of most of these foreign mujāhidīn from the Libyan Islamic Fighting Group—may Allāh have mercy on them. This was done under the pretext that they held the ideology of innovators and were not upon the correct Salafī creed. Only a very few of them survived, those who managed to flee to the areas of other organizations, to emerge as witnesses to that dangerous deviation that occurred in Algeria. And to Allāh belongs the command, before and after.

- In 1994, the Fighting Group began its military activity in Libya across three fronts:

1. Urban guerrilla warfare within Libya against key figures of the Libyan government.
2. Positioning of some wanted elements in the Jebel Akhdar (Green Mountain) region in eastern Libya to conduct mountain and rural guerrilla warfare in its vicinity.
3. Attempted assassination of Colonel Muammar Gaddafi.

However, the strategic realities of a country like Libya were not conducive to such a movement. The population is small, Libya is a vast, sprawling desert country with major cities scattered over great distances and concentrated in a narrow coastal strip. Additionally, the timing of this attempt was unfavorable, as Arab, regional, and international coordination to combat Jihādī groups had already begun. This made coordination between operations management inside and outside Libya impossible, and the movement of elements to and from Libya became fraught with danger and almost unfeasible. The tyrant's regime in Libya quickly inflicted heavy losses on the mujāhidīn, despite the exceptional and heroic operations carried out by their members during that period against security services, army elements, and government militias.

Thus, its cells in Jebel Akhdar were eliminated, and the martyred leader, brother Abd al-Rahman Hattab, was killed. A number of martyrs fell in various cities, and others were arrested. The Fighting Group was forced to announce a change in its military program, declaring in its statements what it termed a program of "strategic offensive and tactical retreat." Thereafter, its activity was practically limited to the last front only: repeated attempts to assassinate Colonel Gaddafi, though fate did not decree the end of that vile tyrant. Many attempts failed, and Gaddafi miraculously survived time after time. The group was forced to effectively end its activity in Libya.

- Since 1995, the storms of the "global war on terror," as they called it, were rapidly escalating to hunt down all Jihādīs everywhere. Regional, Arab, and international security cooperation and coordination caused many cadres of the Jihādī current to fall victim to these unjust security campaigns, which aimed to close safe havens, dry up financial sources, and pursue key elements for assassination, capture, or extradition to their home countries. The Fighting Group's share of tribulation during this phase was also not insignificant. Authorities in Turkey, Syria, Jordan, Yemen, and Sudan pursued a number of cells belonging to this organization. Some were arrested and handed over to Libya, as happened in Sudan, Jordan, Syria, and Turkey. Others were arrested in those countries, deported, or disappeared under extreme duress in their locations or elsewhere. Refugees among them in Western countries, like other Islamists in general and Jihādīs in particular, faced siege and restrictions.

- With the Taliban movement succeeding in controlling Afghanistan and declaring the Islamic Emirate in the spring of 1996, cadres of Arab Afghans began to journey to the new haven. Despite the arrival of many vanguards of Jihādī and Arab organizations and cadres in Afghanistan, especially former Arab Afghans, the leadership of the Fighting Group appeared hesitant to join this new sanctuary and cautious about the idea of re-gathering all the Jihādī current's assets in one basket in Afghanistan a second time. I was among the first to go to Afghanistan during that phase, and among those who urged them and everyone else to come, to consolidate forces, and to launch anew from there. Those who hesitated were considered mistaken in their reluctance. However, what happened in September and its subsequent repercussions on the Jihādī current now make me think that their hesitation and caution might have been well-placed at the time. But destiny had another path and will. They were threatened in their havens, and no one could have imagined September and its consequences. The Taliban's success in extending its control over most of Afghanistan, and the new honor met by the Arab Afghans who came under their protection on one hand, and the security crackdowns that swept through the cells of the Fighting Group and other Jihādīs in more than one place as I mentioned, forced the hesitant to join Afghanistan out of fear and aspiration: fear of the blaze of security storms in various parts of the world, and aspiration to benefit from the realities of the new arena and sanctuary. Prominent cadres from the leadership of the Libyan Islamic Fighting Group organization successively arrived in the Islamic Emirate in Afghanistan, like others.
- Initially, the Fighting Group hesitated to involve its cadres in the Taliban's lengthy battles with the Northern Alliance, fearing entry into a war of attrition that was not part of its program on one hand, and perhaps due to its conviction not yet having crystallized at that stage to engage in the Taliban's battle, and its uncertainty regarding the legitimacy of the Amir al-Mu'minin as a possible legitimate Imām under whose authority it is permissible to enter. However, after studying the situation in early 1999, they gradually began to align themselves with the Taliban government. It was not long before they played an important role in supporting them in various fields, especially in the military and media spheres.

- During the second phase of the Arab Afghans in Afghanistan, the Fighting Group was one of the best Arab groups in terms of organization and performance among the Arab Afghans and their gatherings and groups, which numbered around fourteen organized entities, independent camps, and assemblies. They had an independent camp and more than one guesthouse and activity center.
- During that period, it seemed that the shadows of the globalized world, which had begun to seep into the thinking of Jihādīs as well, had found their way to the Fighting Group in terms of non-Libyan elements and attention to more than one cause and arena. This was despite their Libyan national focus remaining clear and inherent in all their activities, administrative structure, and media production.
- Sheikh Osama's and al-Qā'idah's attempts to sway the Libyan Islamic Fighting Group towards their orientations of unifying the front of confrontation against America did not succeed. Nor could they absorb them into their alliance, which they named the "World Islamic Front for Jihād Against Jews and Crusaders." This front, in the end, over five years, only attracted the Egyptian Jihād Organization led by Sheikh Dr. Ayman al-Zawahiri. It seems the main reasons for this were related to methodological issues, administrative matters, and reasons connected to the nature of the orientation, strategic goal, and practical effort focus of each group. Thus, the Fighting Group organization remained independent in its programs and activities in the Arab Afghan arena until their final days.

- Then came September 11th. The Fighting Group, like other Arab Jihādī gatherings, was immersed in its activities and tireless movement; indeed, it was perhaps the most prominent in activity and performance.

The fierce American onslaught by air, advancing by land in cooperation with traitors from the Northerners, riffraff from various parties, and highway robbers, forced all Arab Afghans to enter a battle of self-defense and defense of the Islamic Emirate, and of the Amir al-Mu'minin and his government, which was beginning to crumble on more than one front.

- The mujāhidīn from the Libyan Islamic Fighting Group took their positions in that battle and fought valiantly in the defense of the lines north of Kabul. Another faction of theirs was stationed in the southern region in Kandahar and Helmand. Many among them fell as martyrs, and their leaders and senior cadres were at the forefront of the fighters. Some of their leaders and cadres also played a prominent role later in successive battles in more than one location. Eventually, those who survived the shelling and those battles were forced to withdraw towards Pakistan. One of their leaders, Sheikh Abu al-Layth, took command of groups resisting the Americans on the Pakistani border with Afghanistan from that time until now—may Allāh protect him. Then, the Fighting Group's share of affliction, like that of other Arab Afghan mujāhidīn, was also considerable. Many of its members and cadres were taken prisoner due to the betrayals of the Pakistani government, army, and security forces—may they receive from Allāh what they deserve. Some were killed, and others were handed over as prisoners to America, the leader of the Crusader campaigns.

- The losses of the Fighting Group, like those of other components of the Arab Jihādī current and the Arab Afghans, were devastating: killed, captured, and displaced. Their surviving cadres returned, along with other surviving cadres of the Jihādī current, as the strangers of the modern era who escaped the September chasm, to be dispersed and hidden in the lands of the earth once more. May Allāh have mercy on the martyrs, grant relief to the prisoners, and deliver His oppressed servants on earth everywhere, and realize for them His certain promise of victory, relief, and empowerment.

I was connected to the brethren in the Fighting Group by bonds of friendship, brotherhood, and relations of cooperation and work on several occasions and in various fields. The most important of these was during my stay in London, where I wrote a number of Jihādī intellectual articles for their magazine, Al-Fajr. There was also fruitful cooperation between us in exposing the deviation of the Armed Islamic Group in Algeria starting from late 1995. This cooperation with them and with the Egyptian Jihād Organization led to the declaration of disavowal of its actions by most Jihādī blocs at the time, as will be detailed later, Allāh willing. Good cooperation also took place between us during the "second phase of the Arab Afghans" in the days of the Taliban. Then, our paths converged in an attempt to repel the calamity that descended after the September events, before leaving Afghanistan. Indeed, I believe that the Fighting Group constituted a fundamental pillar in the Jihādī current and had a distinguished presence in terms of production and impact. I believe that its leaders and students of knowledge, as well as its cadres and members, were among the most competent and dedicated men of the Jihādī current, and among the most well-educated and qualified.

May Allāh accept from them, grant them the best reward, and gather us and them in the abode of His mercy with the Prophets, the truthful, the martyrs, and the righteous, and excellent are those as companions.

8. Contemporary Jihādī Experiences in Algeria from (1991)

I have previously explained that an early Jihādī experience was undertaken by the martyred mujāhid Sheikh Mustafa Bouyali—may Allāh have mercy on him—in the first half of the 1970s. The martyr Bouyali was among the mujāhidīn who fought against French colonialism in Algeria. Like hundreds of thousands of mujāhidīn at the time, he aspired to liberation from colonialism under the banner of Jihād, so that Islamic rule would subsequently be established in Algeria. However, the French, who mastered the game of independence as they had mastered the game of colonialism, ensured that power would pass after them to secularists and socialists from among the sons of Algeria who had been raised on the ideas of Islām's enemies! This was a reason for the accumulation of disbelief and injustice that prompted our martyr Mustafa Bouyali to revolt against it.

However, that experience was quickly suppressed, its leader was martyred, and the remaining dozens of its affiliates were imprisoned for several years.

In the late 1980s, after economic problems in Algeria worsened due to rampant corruption that had spread throughout all joints of the system and its administration, the "bread riots," as they were known at the time, erupted, and the situation was on the verge of explosion. The Algerian President at the time, Chadli Bendjedid, resorted to remedying the situation by proposing a policy of openness, announcing the licensing of political party formation, and calling for free democratic elections in 1989.

Some proponents of the Islamic awakening, which had been severely suppressed since independence in 1963 under President Houari Boumediene, seized this initiative. Sheikh Abbasi Madani and a group of those who responded to the call announced the formation of the Islamic Salvation Front (FIS) to create a broad coalition encompassing all those striving for the Islamic political project. The Front managed to include most circles of the Islamic awakening, and millions of people joined its open membership, regardless of their conditions or inclinations, as they united in support of the political Islamic project.

- With the conclusion of the municipal elections, it became clear that the Islamic Salvation Front had crushed the most powerful secular political parties in Algeria, namely the ruling party, the National Liberation Front (FLN), thereby taking control of most of Algeria's municipalities. The Salvation Front leveraged this to prepare for victory in the legislative (parliamentary) elections held in 1990. The first round resulted in the Front winning a sweeping majority that would have enabled it, during the second round of the supplementary elections, to secure the overwhelming majority qualifying it to form the government and nominate for the presidency.
- Alarm bells rang in the East and West of the earth. The major Crusader states announced their readiness to intervene to block the Islamists from reaching power. Indeed, François Mitterrand, the French President at the time, stated that France was prepared for military intervention to prevent the Islamists from coming to power. The only solution before them was to instigate a military coup supported by the West, especially France.

- The coup occurred. The Front's leaders were arrested, demonstrations were violently suppressed, and the military regime that seized power and crushed democracy with the support of the hypocritical West opened desert prisons for tens of thousands of Islamist detainees. This was the cause of the beginning of the contemporary Jihādī uprising in Algeria, which is considered one of the most important Jihādī experiences worthy of study, and the last of the Jihādīs' confrontations with regimes, and the last of them in the twentieth century. From the beginning of that experience in 1989 until 1996, I had direct contact and a relationship with some of its developments, the most important of which I will refer to at the end of this section, Allāh willing. It was a bitter personal experience, yet rich in benefit. I recorded this, as I mentioned, in a manuscript that was ready but lost during our hasty withdrawal from Kabul during the American attack on Afghanistan after the September events. I have rewritten a summary of it and will publish it soon, Allāh willing. Here, however, I present the most important aspects of those experiences that I lived through closely, through brief main points.

The Experience of the Armed Islamic Group (GIA) and Other Groups in Algeria (1991-2000)

- Several hundred young Algerians, perhaps numbering around two thousand, had gone for Jihād in Afghanistan. They quickly proved, as is known about them, to be among the most formidable and courageous mujāhidīn. With the beginning of the 1990s, mujāhidīn from each country began to gather themselves and become independent in their entities regarding services, guesthouses, and training camps, despite the fighting fronts remaining shared among everyone under the general Arab coordination. Thus, the Algerians among the Arab Afghans sought to organize themselves.

- "Qari Sa'id," as he was called, emerged as one of the most prominent leaders of the Algerian brethren and began organizing what later became known as the "Algerian Afghans." During that period and afterwards, I had a friendship with the man, and we were neighbors in Peshawar, which enabled me to learn about that experience. He spoke to me on several occasions—may Allāh have mercy on him—about his ambitions to form a Jihādī organization to operate in Algeria after the completion of the Afghan Jihād. The project was not rushed; rather, its objectives were within the framework of organizational training and preparation.

The events of the elections, what happened to the Salvation Front, and the military coup in 1990 spurred the Algerian brethren to return to their country to confront the tyrannical military junta.

- Qari Sa'id went to Algeria for reconnaissance, returning with the decision to transfer his men there in stages. He then returned to Algeria after appointing some brethren in Peshawar to continue intensive training and organize the process of transferring personnel to Algeria.
- The natural reaction of more than 3.5 million voters who chose the Islamic project in the elections and won, only to have their victory snatched away and tens of thousands of them herded into prisons, was that most of them would welcome calls for Jihād against the military authorities who had blocked their path to reaping the results of their victory, with the support and guidance of the West, especially France.

- The arena of the Islamic awakening in Algeria at that time was teeming with all the components of the Arab Islamic awakening, knowledge of which is important for understanding this complex experience. The most important of these blocs, according to their size and influence, were as follows:

First: The Islamic Salvation Front (FIS):

It consisted of a mixture of awakening schools, their leaders, Islamist organizations, independent preachers, in addition to broad bases of common Muslims who believed in the generalities of the political Islamic project without a specific methodology, other than the general slogan. Its most important main components were:

1. The Students' Group (Jama'at al-Talaba): Headed by Sheikh Muhammad Sa'id—may Allāh have mercy on him. Its foundation goes back to a group of Islamist students at the University of Algiers who were disciples of the famous Islamic thinker Malek Bennabi. Its general ideology was a mixture of Muslim Brotherhood ideas with the heritage of the Islamic awakening in Algeria from the legacy of the Association of Muslim Ulama, in addition to the ideas of Malek Bennabi—may Allāh have mercy on him.
2. The Movement of the Islamic State (Harakat al-Dawla al-Islamiyya): These were the remnants of the movement of the martyr Sheikh Mustafa Bouyali—may Allāh have mercy on him. They were led and represented in the Salvation Front by Sheikh Sa'id Makhoulfi—may Allāh have mercy on him. It was a Jihādī group with Salafī beliefs.
3. A Broad Segment of Followers of the Salafī Dawah: They were led and represented in the Front by its second-in-command and famous orator Sheikh Ali Belhadj—may Allāh protect him.

4. A number of independent figures of the Islamic Dawah.
5. A broad base of common Muslims sympathetic to the Islamic project.

● Second: The Muslim Brotherhood - International Organization Branch in Algeria:

Headed by Mahfouz Nahnah, who named his party the "Movement of Society for Peace" (Hamas). Nahnah refused to come under the umbrella of the Salvation Front and remained opposed to it throughout the rest of his life, despite its ordeal. He launched a fierce attack on the mujāhidīn.

Third: The Local Muslim Brotherhood - The Islamic Renaissance Party (Hizb al-Nahda al-Islamiyya):

Headed by Abdallah Djaballah. Their ideology was a mixture of Muslim Brotherhood thought and the thought of the local Algerian Islamic awakening.

Fourth: The Salafis:

A large segment of whom were based on the principles of "Jami-Madkhali thought," which derives its deviations from official Saudi scholars. Many of them supported the Algerian authorities.

Fifth: The Hardline Salafī Youth:

Some of them—as I was informed—formed a movement called Salafiyyat al-‘Asima (Algiers Salafism). They called themselves the "Group for Commanding Good and Forbidding Evil." From the beginning, ideas ranging from bigotry, takfīr, and ignorance of religion and worldly affairs spread among them.

Sixth: A Wing of the Movement of the Islamic State:

Those who were with Sheikh Mustafa Bouyali and did not agree to join the Salvation Front due to its democratic methodology. They held Salafī Jihādī thought.

Seventh: The "Algerian Arab Afghans":

As they were later called, these were the Jihādīs moving between Algeria and the Afghan arena.

These were the most important components of the Islamic scene in Algeria at that time, in addition to marginal movements with little influence on their surroundings, such as the Tablighi Jamaat and various Sufi movements.

- Shortly after the military coup, dozens of young men took refuge in the mountains, began searching for weapons, and prepared to confront the military government. Then, very quickly, they began armed clashes with the government.
- The large sit-in in Algiers, called for by the Salvation Front, led to the surprise arrest of the Front's two main leaders and esteemed sheikhs, Abbasi Madani and Ali Belhadj, without any resistance, while they were leading a sit-in that had gathered hundreds of thousands of demonstrators! I later heard, while investigating this matter, that some members of the Salvation Front's Shura Council had betrayed them and did not carry out orders for confrontation—and Allāh knows best. I used to keep some details and names related to that period in my currently lost files, but I do not have them now. The Salvation Front was left without a head, and its basic components returned to operating in a decentralized manner. Sheikhs Abd al-Qadir Shabbouti, Abd al-Razzaq Rajjam, Muhammad Saʿid Makhloufi, and Muhammad Saʿid—may Allāh have mercy on them all—emerged as heads of armed resistance blocs against the government in the capital and the surrounding mountains. Armed political chaos engulfed the country, and the omens of a devastating civil war appeared, which soon erupted fiercely. The mujāhidīn assassinated the new president, Boudiaf, who had been brought in by the coup plotters, causing armed clashes to reach their peak.

- Qari Saʿid, as mentioned, went down to Algeria for a month. He himself told me after his return about strenuous efforts made to unite the Arab Afghans with remnants of Mustafa Bouyali's group branch and some Salafī Jihādī cells there into a single Jihādī group. Then Qari Saʿid returned and telephoned his deputy in Peshawar to inform him of the formation of that group, which they named the Armed Islamic Group (GIA). This was in late 1990 or early 1991.
- A large part of the Salvation Front's Shura Council defected and formed a leadership that negotiated and cooperated with the military government. Others, led by Muhammad Saʿid, Abd al-Qadir Shabbouti, Abd al-Razzaq Rajjam, and Saʿid Makhoulfi, refused conciliation and began confrontation in the name of the Salvation Front. Their meeting soon resulted in the formation of what became known as the Islamic Salvation Army (AIS), headed by Madani Merzag, one of the Front's cadres who had taken to the mountains. The founding statement of the Islamic Salvation Army included most components of Salafī Jihādī thought and focused on the principle of rejecting a return to democracy.
- The military government quickly suppressed civil disobedience movements and banned political parties, foremost among them the Salvation Front, the Renaissance Movement, Nahnah's Muslim Brotherhood movement, the Movement for Culture and Democracy (an Amazigh party headed by Ait Ahmed), and the National Liberation Front party, represented by the last civilian prime minister, Abdelhamid Mehri, as well as other small secular, socialist, and communist parties. They continued in opposition, then were suppressed, and many of their leaders left Algeria. The number of Islamist detainees reached over 50,000, filling the desert prisons. This led to an increase in the number of armed resisters in the mountains, said to have reached tens of thousands, and their operations numbered in the dozens daily.

- News of the Jihād in Algeria dominated headlines and media outlets during that period. The name of the Armed Islamic Group (GIA) emerged as the most important and prominent group operating militarily against the military government. The name of its first amīr, Abd al-Haqq al-‘Ayyayda, became prominent. He was soon arrested by Moroccan authorities while attempting to purchase weapons and handed over to Algeria. He was succeeded by another brother (whose name I do not recall accurately now, perhaps Ja‘far al-Afghani), who was then killed—may Allāh have mercy on him. He was then succeeded in early 1993 by its amīr Abu Abd Allāh Ahmad, under whose command great achievements were made.
- The intensity of military operations escalated. Qari Sa‘id was arrested in one of the major attacks on the naval forces command in Algiers. He then escaped with more than 700 prisoners from Algiers Central Prison after several months. He then exerted his utmost effort to unify the fighting factions from all sides. Later, he was killed under mysterious circumstances in late 1994—may Allāh have mercy on him. During this period, state violence was immense, reaching the point of assassinating hundreds of political prisoners in Serkadji prison, one of Algiers' prisons, in a single incident.

- By early 1993, all voices supporting Jihād in Algeria were calling on the mujāhidīn to unite their ranks. Indeed, significant efforts by many mujāhid leaders in the Armed Islamic Group (GIA), mujāhid leaders of the Islamic Salvation Army (AIS), and many local Jihādī cells led to the achievement of that unity for which the second amīr of the GIA had worked, though he did not live to see it as he was killed shortly before—may Allāh have mercy on him. Abu Abd Allāh Ahmad assumed leadership of the group after him, and this unity was achieved during his tenure. A highly influential video was released, delighting Jihād circles, showing the scene of the sheikhs of the Front from the leadership of the Islamic Salvation Army (Muhammad Saʿid, Abd al-Razzaq Rajjam, Abd al-Qadir Shabbouti, and Saʿid Makhoulfi) pledging allegiance to a young man, the age of some of their sons, as the amīr of the unified Jihād under the name of the Armed Islamic Group: Abu Abd Allāh Ahmad. This unity led to a flourishing of hopes for imminent comprehensive victory.
- The amīr of the Islamic Salvation Army (AIS), Madani Merzag, rejected and opposed the unity, criticized those who joined it, and refused to recognize anything but the decisions of the two imprisoned sheikhs, Abbasi Madani and Ali Belhadj, when they were released from prison. He insisted on remaining outside the unity. However, dozens of secondary factions and groups from eastern and western Algeria and the central provinces joined the unity, and the Armed Islamic Group (GIA) came to represent more than 95% of the armed mujāhidīn, whose numbers reached tens of thousands by 1994.
- Abu Abd Allāh Ahmad was also killed under mysterious circumstances. A statement was issued by some members of the GIA Shura Council announcing that Abu Abd al-Rahman Amin had assumed leadership of the group, followed by successive pledges of allegiance to him from faction leaders. Supporters of Jihād in Algeria abroad had no choice but to support them and pray for them. This was in late 1994 or early 1995.

- With Abu Abd al-Rahman Amin assuming leadership of the group, signs of a change in the direction of policies, statements, and operations within the Armed Islamic Group (GIA) began to appear, including:
- An increase in statements issued by the group, and an escalation of confrontation with civilian and social segments remotely connected to the state structure or authority, threatening them with death. This included media outlets, from the minister down to newspaper vendors in the street, as well as the education sector, extending to professors, schools, and students. Similarly, the Ministry of Oil, down to the workers who fill cars with petroleum. And so on.
- The audacity to issue fatwas declaring permissible the killing of women and children from the families of those working in state agencies.
- Escalation of confrontation with civilian militias associated with the government, making them a primary target.
- A rise in the tone of takfīr in public discourse, and other such misguided tendencies.
- During 1995, exiled leaders of the Islamic Salvation Front and leaders of Islamic, secular, and even communist political parties convened for a conference under the auspices of the Vatican in Rome to form a political alliance that would offer a political solution to the Algerian crisis. However, the intransigence of the military government thwarted this strange and suspicious initiative, given its composition and venue.

- In late 1995, Abu Abd al-Rahman Amin and his deviant, criminal leadership dared to assassinate Sheikh Muhammad Saʿid, the mujāhid Abd al-Wahhab al-ʿAmmara, and other mujāhidīn belonging to the Students' Group who had joined the GIA under the unity agreement. They used to call them the "Algerianization Group" (Jamaʿat al-Jazʿara), a name Mahfouz Nahnah had coined to criticize their methodology. They killed them under the pretext that they were preparing to overthrow his leadership and, as they claimed, to preserve the Salafi identity of the group. From there, the reality of the deviations from the group's path began to be exposed.
- This leadership then followed that crime by issuing a book titled "Guidance of the Lord of the Worlds" (Hidayat Rabb al-ʿAlamin), signed by Abu Abd al-Rahman Amin, purporting it to be the methodology of the Armed Islamic Group. The book contained such varieties of ignorance, shades of extremism, takfīr, and deviation that it definitively established the new, deviant identity of the group under this amīr, and the dimensions of the catastrophe that had befallen the leadership of the GIA became clear. Abd al-Rahman Amin then followed this by directing his fighters to commit mass massacres of civilians in the villages neighboring them, under the pretext that they had joined government militias, thus declaring them apostates and deeming their killing and the enslavement of their women permissible, considering them renegades.

- The Algerian intelligence services exploited this atmosphere, which it later became clear they had sought and created. They infiltrated agents into the GIA leadership, of whom Amin may have been one. The government then followed this, as revealed by some who fled from the army and special forces—who were either forced to do so or witnessed it by chance, lest the story of that tragedy be lost—by organizing a series of horrific massacres of civilians, sparing neither old person, woman, child, nor even animal in those brutal massacres that took place during 1996-1997. Algeria witnessed horrors and seas of blood, reaching the point of killing worshippers in Ramadan as they left mosque doors, under the pretext that they had participated in elections and thereby apostatized! The largest massacres took place in areas known for the Salvation Front's success in the previous elections. This was tantamount to the government settling scores with those who had chosen the Islamic project, as these witnesses revealed with confirming documents through various media outlets years later. Al Jazeera channel broadcast some extremely important interviews in this regard, and some of those military personnel published their testimonies in books printed in France, and the matter is now clear.
- With the truth and the criminal, deviant orientation of the new leadership of the Armed Islamic Group (GIA) becoming exposed, supporters both at home and abroad abandoned it. Prominent Jihādī figures and groups that had supported the GIA during its course issued numerous statements of denunciation from various Jihādī groups and personalities; I was among the first to take that stance, as I detailed in my testimony in a separate book. Jihādī battalions and factions within Algeria also began to defect from it, only for it to become more and more mired in horrific and shameful bloodbaths. Then, fighting erupted between the GIA and some of these breakaway

- The mujāhidīn from the "Jabal al-Arbaʿa' group," as they were called, who belonged to Sheikh Muhammad Saʿid's group—may Allāh have mercy on him—killed Abu Abd al-Rahman Amin, ridding the world of his evils. He was succeeded in leading the Armed Islamic Group by a butcher even more criminal than him, a man called Antar Zouabri, who continued the series of crimes, but after the group had weakened and its capabilities diminished. It persisted in its methodology after being isolated in limited areas until this latter individual was killed later in 2003 in Algeria.
- With the fragmentation and division of the mujāhidīn, and after people abandoned them and lost interest in the Jihādī, and even the Islamic, project, the schemes of Algerian and foreign intelligence reached their desired outcome from the massacre scenario they had planned. They launched a surrender program, claiming amnesty for armed men who laid down their weapons. The Islamic Salvation Army (AIS), led by Madani Merzag, was the first to respond to what became known as the "National Concord" appeal. A number of Muslim scholars abroad, such as Ibn Baz, Ibn Uthaymin, and Al-Albani, volunteered to support the state's call for surrender. Al-Albani issued his last fatwa before his death in 2000, declaring that the events in Algeria were the greatest proof of his assertion that "revolting against rulers in this era is, in reality, revolting against Islām itself!" Confusion reigned throughout the entire Islamic awakening scene because of the Algerian Jihādī experience, making it a testament for anyone wishing to prove their opinion on the failure of the Jihād option, and a lesson for those who would take heed. This came after Algerian intelligence, with the help of Arab and foreign intelligence services and the active participation of Arab media, succeeded in demolishing the barrier between the concepts of Jihād and the ideas of takfīr, criminality, massacres, and bloodbaths.

- During 1998 and thereafter, events in Algeria continued to unfold. I had left London for Afghanistan, where it was impossible to keep up with news and events as one should, given the almost complete isolation from media, in addition to my disengagement from that issue's file and its labyrinths since early 1996 due to the profound disorientation it had caused me.

However, from the information that reached me from some esteemed Algerian mujāhidīn who sought refuge in Afghanistan during the Taliban era, and through my follow-up as much as possible of media outlets, some individuals interested in this issue, and some statements that were issued afterwards and reached us, it appeared that the overwhelming majority of armed men and mujāhidīn had come down from the mountains due to what was called the National Concord project. Small groups remained here and there in Algeria wanting to continue the confrontation with the regime, which emerged boasting of a resounding victory over the Islamists and Jihādīs.

Then, a group calling itself the Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat (GSPC), led by its amīr Hassan Hattab, came to public attention. It appeared from its statements that it had learned some lessons from that harsh experience, as it focused in its communiqués on refuting ideas of takfīr and extremism, concentrating confrontation on the military and security apparatuses of the authorities, and highlighting the general objectives of establishing a legitimate state. However, most Jihādī circles seemed wary of this, as the shock of what had happened was enormous. The media has reported, and continues to report, some news of this group's operations, most notably some kidnappings of foreigners and their ransoming for large sums.

Furthermore, the Algerian mujāhidīn who came to Afghanistan, in turn, tried to gather themselves and organize their affairs to resume work on their cause. They formed a semi-cohesive group that was struggling against difficult circumstances to revive such a cause. Some signs of success and guidance appeared among some of the mature individuals. However, the September events overtook them, as they overtook everyone, with known consequences. They took their positions in the battle of self-defense and defense of the Emirate. They received—may Allāh accept from them—a plentiful share of affliction, and many of them registered their names in the list of martyrs and prisoners, victims of the September chasm at the beginning of the twenty-first century.

(I have recorded my testimony about the Jihād experience in Algeria in a separate book due to the importance of that experience, titled "Summary of My Testimony on Jihād in Algeria 1989-1996." I advise the brethren to refer to it for the important lessons from that bitter experience.)

9. Jihādī Experiences in Yemen (1990-1998)

- a. The experience of Sheikh Osama bin Laden—may Allāh protect him (1990-2001).
- b. The Jihādī experience of the martyr Abu al-Hasan al-Mihdhar - Army of Aden-Abyan (since 1998).

I have long believed that Yemen is one of the Arab world's regions most prepared for a Jihādī movement possessing most elements of causal success, especially after unification. I wrote a special research paper on this of about 40 pages, titled "The Responsibility of the People of Yemen for the Sanctities and Wealth of Muslims," in which I proved this and incited towards it.

Its vast area of approximately 400,000 square kilometers, its long coastlines exceeding 2,500 kilometers, its control over the Bab al-Mandab Strait, and its openness to Saudi Arabia and the Gulf states on one side, and to the Horn of Africa and the ammunition and weapons it provides in East Africa on the other. Its population density, which constitutes about 70% of the Arabian Peninsula's population, i.e., approximately 25 million out of about 40 million, and its diverse and rugged geographical nature, with widespread mountains, making it one of the most suitable regions for Jihādī guerrilla warfare. Also, the conservative, religious nature of its population and its tribal structure, sound and unspoiled by the destruction of modern civilization and the negatives of an urban, industrial character. The prevalence of weapons and their connection to social life traditions, where official statistics indicate the presence of more than 70 million firearms in the hands of tribesmen and the population, excluding what the government possesses, i.e., an average of more than 3 firearms per citizen, including women, the elderly, and infants! Furthermore, the Islamic awakening there is old and deep-rooted, dating back to the early 1950s, and it is diverse, encompassing most known schools of the awakening, from the Muslim Brotherhood to Salafism, Sururism, Tabligh and Dawah, to Sufism, and so on. This is in addition to the nature of the population, distinguished by their resolve and combat capabilities, as Yemen resisted various forms of colonialism for a long time, and colonial powers were unable to establish themselves there, as happened to the Portuguese, then the British, then the Ottomans, then the Egyptian army during Nasser's era.

In our long-standing Jihādī experience in Afghanistan (1984-1992), Yemeni mujāhid youth constituted the second-highest statistic among Arab youth who came for the Afghan Jihād, and likewise in their second phase (1996-2001). They were an example of bravery, courage, chivalric qualities, and Arab authenticity. It has amazed me, and still amazes me, that a widespread Jihādī movement has not arisen there.

Economically, more than 70% of the population lives below the poverty line and under the yoke of oppression, while most of the remaining inhabitants of the Arabian Peninsula nearby revel in the blessings Allāh has bestowed upon that peninsula from its wealth, which is the property of Muslims in general and the people of the Peninsula in particular, they being its vast majority.

So, as you can see, the Shari‘ah, economic, demographic, political, and geographical factors, and everything that usually contributes to the eruption of successful revolutions, are available there. Herein lies the wonder that such a Jihādī movement does not arise, despite a dilapidated government led by an ignorant tyrant for many long years, who even tries to install his son after him as king over the formerly socialist, now American-democratic republic! I am not here to research that, as I have researched it in a separate study, as mentioned before. The fundamental reason for this is that most leaders of the Islamic awakening are among those who abstain from Jihād, having vested interests, and that most Dawah sheikhs are opportunists and scholars of the sultans who have become accustomed to parliamentary seats and relaxation in the tyrant's embrace. This is in addition to the dominance of the authority of clan and tribal leaders, many of whom have, for decades and perhaps centuries, habitually sold their religion for their worldly life and the worldly life of others. This has been proven most clearly by the leaders of the Islamic awakening and tribal chiefs—who form the main weight gathered in what was called the Islah Party—foiling the Islamic street uprising in what was known as the constitution events of 1993, and combating all subsequent Jihādī attempts.

This has rendered the emerging young Jihādī leadership incapable of producing field commanders able to draw the bases of the Islamic awakening and the large, million-strong segment in Yemen behind them.

The problem of Yemen, like the problem of the Arab and Islamic world, in short, is two things: the cowardice and incompetence of the scholars, and the ignorance and loss of the common people, and the overwhelming love of this world and hatred of death that has gripped everyone, until Allāh permits relief. Let us return to the subject:

After the return of the Yemeni mujāhid youth from Afghanistan in the early 1990s, and over the last decade of the twentieth century, numerous Jihādī attempts were made in Yemen, all of which failed for the reasons I have summarized. The most prominent and serious of these attempts were Sheikh Osama bin Laden's effort since 1990 to establish a Jihādī foundation in Yemen, and the movement known as the Army of Aden-Abyan, led by the martyr Abu al-Hasan al-Mihdhar—may Allāh have mercy on him—around mid-1998.

a. A Brief Overview of Sheikh Osama bin Laden's Jihādī Attempts in Yemen

- Sheikh Osama bin Laden—may Allāh protect him—hails from a South Yemeni origin in Hadhramaut. He is one of the sons of Muhammad bin Laden, who migrated from Yemen to Saudi Arabia at the beginning of King Abdulaziz's reign. He settled there, forming a family close to the Al Saud, and enjoyed extensive financial and political influence there from that time until today.
- During the Afghan Jihād against the Russians, Sheikh Osama was keen on forming an organized group around him, focusing on Jihādī elements from the Arabian Peninsula, especially from Saudi Arabia and Yemen. In the 1990s, the conditions for a Jihādī movement against the communist rule in South Yemen, before unification, were ripe. Many North Yemeni Islamists and tribes supported this, and it also received significant support from wealthy Hadhrami merchants with substantial economic capabilities in Saudi Arabia, and from the Islamic awakening in general, which harbored animosity towards communism in general, and particularly in neighboring Yemen. This coincided with the arrival of a number of Yemeni mujāhidīn of southern origin during the Arab Jihād in Afghanistan.

- Sheikh Osama's specific and primary Jihādī project was to create a Jihādī movement in South Yemen. He initiated this in 1989-1990 and continued his attempt until the unification. Although a number of Jihādīs close to Sheikh Osama at the time—and I was among them—urged him to commence that Jihād directly, he hesitated, waiting to convince the leaders of the awakening in Yemen, especially Muslim Brotherhood figures like the then-prominent Sheikh Abd al-Majid al-Zindani, to join. Those individuals were not going to do so, and a golden opportunity was lost, in my belief.
- Since unification, Sheikh Osama's project had shifted to an attempt at the level of a unified Yemen. The problem of the conflict over the constitution of unified Yemen, and the contradiction between Islamists and secularists, presented an opportunity to declare Jihād against Ali Abdullah Saleh and the newly established government of unified Yemen. Sheikh Osama moved to exploit this opportunity. A number of Yemeni sheikhs approached him, led by the well-known Sheikh Omar Saif, whose name was put on a book—written by some of Sheikh Osama's associates—that proved the kufr (disbelief) of the constitution. They also proved in it the kufr of the government based on it and the legitimacy of Jihād against it.
- Sheikh Osama approached the sheikhs of Yemen and its senior preachers from the Salafī movement, headed by Sheikh Muqbil bin Hadi al-Wadi'i, and the Muslim Brotherhood and their leaders. He spent vast sums of money to win them over, and some tribes, to the project. However, all of them let him down. Ali Abdullah Saleh managed to sway them, assigning them positions and granting them endowments, influence, and facilities.

As for Sheikh al-Zindani, he aborted the million-strong armed demonstration that headed to the gate of the Republican Palace, which he led along with other Muslim Brotherhood leaders and others. He entered the palace with some others to negotiate with the president. He then emerged to the armed demonstrators, who were demanding the fall of the constitution and the government and the implementation of Sharī'ah, to tell them, "Whoever believes in Allāh and the Last Day, let him return to his home." The crowd dispersed, only for the esteemed Sheikh Abd al-Majid al-Zindani to become, the very next day, one of the vice presidents and one of the five rulers of Yemen who formed the Presidential Council headed by Ali Abdullah Saleh! This council included atheist socialists, according to the Sheikh's old doctrine! His senior colleagues in Islah were distributed between ministerial posts and parliamentary seats, under the tyrannical constitution legislated without Allāh's permission, which stated at its head that the state's religion is Islām and Sharī'ah is the source of the constitution and laws.

As for Sheikh Muqbil bin Hadi al-Wadi'i, his position was even more detrimental and fierce. He wrote a book in which he described Sheikh Osama as the head of sedition (fitna) in Yemen. His audio tapes were extremely hostile in their attacks on him, and his efforts to dissuade people from Sheikh Osama's project were sold on sidewalks after Friday sermons, where he would say that Bin Laden had sent him money under the pretext of Jihād, seeking to create sedition, so he used it to marry off young men and buy books for mosques!

Young mujāhidīn from Yemen also related that al-Wadi'i, the Sheikh of Salafism, spared none of the symbols of the awakening from his harm at that time. He attacked the leaders of the Muslim Brotherhood, the Sururis, the Sufis, and the Jihādīs, while praising Ali Abdullah Saleh, always referring to him as "Brother President," and emphasizing obedience to him as a Muslim ruler! I once heard Sheikh Osama say in front of some of his guests that if he were to forgive everyone who had harmed him in his life, he would not forgive al-Wadi'i. Anyone who knows the magnanimity of Sheikh Bin Laden, even towards those who harmed him, can understand the extent of his pain from that man, who has now met his Lord.

As for most of the young Jihādī leaders whom Sheikh Osama recruited and trained in Afghanistan, Ali Abdullah Saleh won them over by giving them ranks in the Yemeni army and admitting those who wished into the military and civil service. So they rode cars and assumed positions. The most prominent among them, such as al-Fadhli and al-Nahdi, even went on to work in the intelligence services and the Republican Guard as some of Ali Abdullah Saleh's closest associates!

These three examples—the Muslim Brotherhood, Salafī, and Jihādī figures in Yemen—epitomize the fundamental problem in Yemen: their leaders lacked a Jihādī methodological upbringing during their preparatory periods, which focused on military training but lacked any ideology or methodology to shield them from such enticements.

- Unity was established. The government (and its five-member Presidential Council) and parliament were formed from supporters of Ali Abdullah Saleh and his party (the People's Congress), and from Islamists, primarily leaders of the Muslim Brotherhood and some tribal chiefs who formed the Yemeni Congregation for Reform (Islah), headed by Hussein al-Ahmar and al-Zindani, and from the Socialist Party (Southerners).

Ali Abdullah Saleh attempted, and succeeded, in pitting the two sides against each other and strengthening his own influence, then he strengthened himself with the Islamists against the Southern socialists. During that period, some Jihādīs assassinated some socialist leaders who had planned a coup against unity. However, Ali Abdullah Saleh and the Islamists marched on Aden in what became known as the War of Unity, crushed their attempts, and imposed unity by force.

Sheikh Osama had ordered his supporters and followers in Yemen, the Jihādīs who had returned from Afghanistan, to enter the battle alongside the North Yemeni army, as all Islamists in the North had done, on the understanding that this would lead to gaining a stage by overthrowing communism. Indeed, the mujāhidīn from Jihādī and Islamist ranks played a decisive role, and the resistance of the Southerners quickly collapsed, in a haste that did not allow for international intervention, nor could Saudi Arabia and the Gulf Cooperation Council states save the communists in Yemen! This was despite the fatwas of Ibn Baz and the Council of Senior Scholars calling for an end to the sedition and reconciliation between the Northern Muslims, led by Saleh, and the "Muslim" communists in the South!

In my belief, and the opinion of many Yemeni Jihādīs I met, the Islamists could have returned to the North to impose Sharī'ah rule or isolate Saleh and establish an Islamic state. However, what happened was their return to parliament and ministerial seats in Ali Abdullah Saleh's government, with its secular constitution and apostate rule. The Jihādīs remained isolated, as most of them followed the leaders of the "Awakening!!" from Salafī, Muslim Brotherhood, and Sururi backgrounds! Meanwhile, many of them preferred military ranks, government positions, and personal benefits, as "Sergeant Ali Saleh" succeeded in luring them with worldly gains.

- Sheikh Osama had moved to Sudan. Al-Qā'idah became engrossed in its investment and economic activities in what they believed to be an Islamic state that deserved support, led by President Bashir and "Imam" Hassan al-Turabi, according to the belief of some members of al-Qā'idah's Sharī'ah committee at the time! Some of its members also participated in the Jihād in Somalia alongside Islamist factions and actively contributed to convincing the Americans to withdraw from its desert quicksands.

- Sheikh Osama's followers and some Jihādīs also carried out limited operations against initial American attempts to establish a military base in Aden. A number of Katyusha rockets they fired at the preliminary construction works for the base convinced the Americans to abandon the project.

No significant Jihādī attempt by Sheikh Osama's followers has taken place in Yemen since 1994, as he later shifted to Jihād against America.

- When the Sheikh returned to Afghanistan in mid-1996, young mujāhidīn from Yemen began to join the second wave of Arab Afghans in Afghanistan, including supporters of Sheikh Osama.
- Sheikh Osama stated to the Al-Quds Al-Arabi newspaper in 1997 that his next station would be the mountains of Yemen, and his project in Yemen was revived, but through his new strategy: fighting the head of the serpent, America, and refraining from entering into confrontations with its tails, including the small, dwarf tail of Abdullah Saleh in the important region of Yemen.
- In 1999, as I recall, an al-Qā'idah cell carried out a martyrdom attack on the American destroyer USS Cole, which was refueling in Yemeni ports. This escalated the confrontation with Yemeni intelligence, which entered the "war on terror" alongside America. Many Jihādīs were arrested, including some of Bin Laden's supporters, and the war intensified.

It is said that Ali Abdullah Saleh's government was forced to release some of Bin Laden's followers after a threatening letter from him to Saleh, reminding him that al-Qā'idah's battle was not with the Yemeni government, but that it could make it so.

- In late 2001, shortly before September, Bin Laden gathered his senior supporters in Kandahar to tell them to pack their bags, as the time had come to depart for Yemen. While rumors, astonishment, and hope circulated in the Arab Afghan arena about this move, the September 2001 explosions occurred, to be followed by:
A strike that removes the head from its resting place, and makes the intimate friend forget his companion.

This was followed by the pursuit of Jihādīs in Yemen, under the pretext that the entire Ummah of Muhammad, peace and blessings be upon him, and all of America's enemies among creatures, belonged to al-Qā'idah, according to American media and counter-terrorism programs.

The Jihādīs in Yemen received a large share of this persecution. Many brethren from al-Qā'idah and others fell as martyrs or were taken prisoner in the "war on terror" battles in Yemen, led by America and executed by its apostate slaves from the Yemeni army and intelligence elements. An American drone, with the approval and cooperation of Yemeni intelligence and its collaborator spies, managed to destroy a car with an air-to-ground missile, killing the martyred brother Abu Ali al-Harithi and five of his brethren in a Yemeni village—may Allāh have mercy on him. Reports of pursuits continued, sometimes escalating to fierce battles, bringing news of a brother martyred here and another arrested there, under the claim that they were from al-Qā'idah.

b. The Experience of the Army of Aden-Abyan led by Abu al-Hasan al-Mihdhar—may Allāh have mercy on him—since (1998)

The martyr Abu al-Hasan al-Mihdhar Zayn al-Abidin—who was from the Ashraf (descendants of the Prophet) of Yemen—possessed a fervent Jihādī spirit and a high degree of magnanimity and integrity that prevented him from tolerating the conditions in Yemen during the last decade of the past century. I have heard some accounts from Yemeni brethren that he had met Sheikh Osama to convince him to ignite the spark of Jihād in Yemen, but they did not reach an agreement on the method and timing of that.

Then, in the mid-1990s, he visited some prominent scholars of the awakening in Saudi Arabia to incite them to support him in a Jihād project in Yemen, but no one responded to him.

Indeed, senior supervisors of creed instruction and heads of its departments in Saudi universities, who had filled book pages and scholarly lesson tapes with the characteristics of the pure creed and the methodology of Sheikh Muhammad ibn Abd al-Wahhab's Dawah, went so far in their lectures and stances as to declare that the best means of Dawah in Yemen was the democratic option! They also supported the democratic path in Turkey, North Africa, and elsewhere. This is one of the calamities for those who lived in these times and witnessed wonders.

However, the resolve of that valiant mujāhid prevented him from remaining inactive. He had numerous engagements and confrontations with the Yemeni government and its security apparatus. A notable instance was his renowned and witnessed stance when the security services arrested the wives of the Arab Afghan mujāhidīn who had sought refuge in Yemen. The authorities refused to release these women unless their husbands, who were fugitives within Yemen, were deported. He played a role in gathering scholars, preachers, and tribal leaders, urging them to act upon their religious zeal and tribal honor. He did not rest until he was the primary reason for their release and the alleviation of their distress.

He spent considerable sums of his own money on this and incurred large debts to support his movement, his call, and his activities.

In late 1997, he began to form an armed group and an independent organization called the Aden-Abyan Army, named in auspicious reference to the noble Ḥadīth narrated from the Messenger of Allāh, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace, in which he says: "Twelve thousand will emerge from Aden-Abyan; they are the best between me and them."

When a number of men, said to be around two hundred, had gathered with him, he took up arms and proceeded with his men to a rugged mountainous area. There, he established a camp for himself and his group to begin mobilizing for Jihād against the Yemeni government. News of this reached us in Afghanistan in the spring of 1998, and we anticipated that this would be the spark for the Jihād we had long awaited in Yemen—a Yemen that was once happy before being ruled by the likes of Abdullah Saleh and before the call to Islām was led by the contemporary leaders of its Awakening.

However, senior preachers and sheikhs of the so-called Awakening focused significant efforts on persuading him to abandon his armed struggle. They promised him positions and money from the government if he desisted, but he refused. Preachers from various schools of the Awakening played a significant role in letting him down, dissuading as many of his supporters as they could, and convincing them that the attempt was futile. The young men began to disperse from him.

The greatest act of betrayal, which significantly contributed to the desertion of many of them, came from some Jihādīs and some veteran Arab Afghans among the Yemeni brothers. They claimed it was a hasty and immature movement, lacking a program.

Instead of these Islamist and Jihādī advisors joining their efforts with his to guide his movement, their stance was negative, as I was told by several narrators. I believe his emergence was an opportunity for them and for the cause of Jihād in Yemen, but it was lost.

In the summer of 1998, the Yemeni government arrested a number of Jihādīs from among Yemeni youth, in addition to several Arab Jihādī brothers who had sought refuge there. In response, Abū al-Ḥasan al-Miḥḍār kidnapped several foreign tourists to pressure the government to release them. However, the government, contrary to its usual practice of negotiating with tribal figures who often kidnapped tourists to achieve their demands, seized this as an opportunity to eliminate the nascent movement. It besieged the area and escalated the situation until it led to clashes. It deployed, at the forefront of its units, those preachers and brothers it could muster to bring down whomever they could from the mountain and persuade them to surrender. Allāh is sufficient for us, and He is the best disposer of affairs.

When the assault on them began, only a few dozen men remained with him. Some of them were killed, and some of the hostages were killed. Some reports reached us in Afghanistan – and Allāh knows best their veracity – that those with him refused to execute the hostages when the government began its attack, so only one or two of them were killed. Abū al-Ḥasan al-Miḥḍār was captured. Britain and some Western countries exerted intense pressure on the Yemeni government to execute Abū al-Ḥasan al-Miḥḍār, whose execution was subsequently announced in the summer of 2000. May Allāh Almighty have mercy on him and his brothers and grant them spacious dwellings in His Paradise, and may He compensate Yemen for their loss with righteous men who will raise the banner of Jihād therein until those foretold by the Messenger of Allāh, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace, emerge from among them.

My Relationship with the Yemeni Brothers and My Observations on the Jihād Experience There

As I mentioned earlier, I became convinced of the viability of Jihād in Yemen as early as 1989. At that time, I was close to Sheikh Osama, who informed me then of some aspects of his Jihād project in Yemen. After the Desert Storm war, known as the war for the liberation of Kuwait, I made efforts and sought to persuade Sheikh Osama of the feasibility and necessity of moving to Yemen. The atmosphere was very conducive after the American presence in the Arabian Peninsula, followed by the events surrounding the constitution. However, he believed that this was not possible without the assistance of the other figures of the Awakening.

I have known many Yemeni brothers since the first Afghan Jihād. When I returned to Afghanistan for the second phase, I took an interest in the experiences that had occurred in Yemen and endeavored to write their history with one of the most prominent Jihādī youths from Yemen (the martyr Muhannad ‘Atash). But martyrdom reached him first, may Allāh have mercy on him.

During the spring of 1998, after Abū al-Ḥasan’s emergence, one of his friends spoke to me about al-Miḥḍār’s movement, the hopes pinned on it, and the necessity of assisting him with advice, support, and backing. He informed me that al-Miḥḍār was using some of my lectures from the Afghan Jihād era and my book, The Jihād Experience in Syria, to give educational lessons to his followers, and that such advice would have a positive impact on him. Indeed, I entrusted the man with a letter and a recorded tape containing a summary of my thoughts and advice on Jihād in Yemen. The man went and delivered the message, and he informed me by phone of its arrival to al-Miḥḍār. I waited for news that might open a Jihādī path for us, bringing us closer to the center of the conflict in the Middle East, along the sacred line extending from Yemen to the Hijaz and the Levant. I hoped to join him and support him. However, the media soon brought us news of the disaster, the summary of which I recounted earlier.

Later, some of the brothers who had witnessed that tragedy with Abū al-Ḥasan arrived in Kabul, and I obtained from many of them a summary of what had transpired. Then I read in some Saudi newspapers about that experience, that they had confiscated from Abū al-Ḥasan's camp some books and tapes carrying our "subversive" ideology – subversive to those governments and those behind them. Among these were tapes by Sheikh Khālīd Zayn al-ʿĀbidīn, which was the pseudonym I adopted for publishing my lecture tapes on the Afghanistan experience. They linked that name to the kunya of the martyr Abū al-Ḥasan al-Miḥḍār Zayn al-ʿĀbidīn, an unintended coincidence. They also mentioned finding copies of my book, The Syrian Experience, there. I prayed for mercy upon him and was pleased that this was the case. I asked the Almighty, may He be glorified and exalted, to include me in the reward with them and that we meet them at His noble Basin among the band of strangers, those fleeing with their religion. Indeed, He is All-Hearing, Near, Most Generous.

During our experience in the second phase of the Arab Afghans in Afghanistan in the time of the Taliban, some mujāhidīn from Yemen frequented the camp I established near Kabul for preparation and dissemination of the ideology of global resistance, the methodology of the Jihādī current, and its heritage. I was keen to give them special attention due to the status this corner of the Islāmic world held for me and its importance in my hopes for Jihād and resistance. I wrote a research paper titled "The People of Yemen and Their Responsibility for the Sanctuaries and Wealth of Muslims" and recorded several tapes on the subject of Jihād in Yemen. I learned that they reached the arena there and were circulated among Jihādīs and Islamists. One day, the news of the execution of the martyr Abū al-Ḥasan al-Miḥḍār reached us, and I was deeply affected. In recognition of the Jihād of that valiant, courageous mujāhid – who had a rightful claim upon many Jihādīs in Yemen and elsewhere – there was nothing we could do but call for a memorial service in our camp on the occasion of his execution. His virtues were mentioned, and everyone prayed for mercy upon him. May Allāh have mercy on a man with whom we developed a bond of love from afar without ever meeting him, and may He grant him spacious dwellings in His Paradise. We ask Allāh to send to Yemen those who will establish therein and work towards the glad tidings of the emergence of the righteous ones, as foretold by the truthful, confirmed Messenger, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace.

10. Attempts to Build Jihādī Groups in Morocco Since 1995 and the Experience of the Jihādī Islāmic Group in Morocco

As I mentioned earlier, the armed Jihādī experience in Morocco against Hassan II, undertaken by the Moroccan Youth Organization under the leadership of Sheikh Abd al-Karim Muti', was one of the very early attempts in the Arab world. Indeed, it preceded the nascent intellectual stirrings of the contemporary Jihādī current. As I have stated in some of my previous writings, Morocco is among the few countries in the Arab and Islāmic world, like Central Asia, Yemen, Algeria, and Turkey, where the conditions for a Jihādī revolution exist in terms of causes and prerequisites.

The Maghreb al-Aqsa (Morocco) is a vast country with rugged terrain, possessing several rural areas and difficult mountain ranges. Its coastline extends for more than 3,000 km, and it controls the Strait of Gibraltar. Its people languish under severe poverty, deprivation, and tyrannical rule. They also have a glorious history of Jihād, combat, and a shining record of valor and courage. It is a religious populace, regardless of the corruption that has infiltrated some of its major cities through government policies of openness and the promotion of prostitution under the guise of tourism. Islām still maintains its presence and sanctity. It has an Islāmic Awakening dating back to the early 1960s, also composed of most of the components and schools of the contemporary Islāmic Awakening, from Salafism to the Muslim Brotherhood, to activist Sufism, to Jihādīs. A considerable number of Moroccan youth participated in the Jihād in Afghanistan and returned to their country without major problems, as the policy of the cunning, deceased Hassan II was to co-opt the Awakening rather than provoke it. His policy proved highly successful in hollowing out the Awakening from within and also pushing it into the arenas of Morocco's nascent pseudo-democracy, causing senior preachers there to oscillate between disciplinary imprisonment, house arrest, and parliamentary seats. Shortly after the outbreak of the contemporary Jihādī revolution in Algeria, following the abortion of the Islamic Salvation Front's successes, Morocco became the main transit point from which most Algerian Arab Afghans entered their country.

Initially, Morocco turned a blind eye to this as a reaction to the Algerian government's support for the separatist Polisario Front, which advocated for the independence of Western Sahara from Morocco. Consequently, a number of cells formed in eastern Morocco and the Rif region, providing significant assistance for transit, weapons transfer from Europe, and logistical services to the mujāhidīn in western Algeria. This was before the criminal leadership of the Armed Islāmic Group (GIA) took over that cause, as we have narrated.

Thus, due to the experience of the Moroccan Arab Afghan mujāhidīn on one hand, and the winds of influence from Algeria on the other, the beginnings of Jihādī nuclei formation started in Morocco. Strategic studies centers in Europe, particularly in France, that monitor Islāmic affairs in North Africa, had predicted that the Islāmic revolution in North Africa would first erupt in Morocco. I have read some reports issued in France expressing surprise that it began in Algeria before Morocco.

Some immature Jihādī attempts were made by certain individuals, targeting some Western tourists and carrying out rare operations against some members of the Jewish community in Morocco, which controls centers of political, economic, and media influence there and pushes the country in a frenzied manner towards normalization with Israel.

Since the mid-1990s, serious attempts began to form Jihādī cells and organizational nuclei inside and outside Morocco. The winds of the Jihādī current reached Morocco strongly on the sidelines of the Jihād in Algeria. Moreover, the steps towards Jewish normalization and Crusader Westernization took a serious and overt form with the accession to power of King Mohammed VI, his father's crown prince, after his father's demise.

In the mid-1990s, a number of young Moroccans from the Jihādī current managed to form the nucleus of a Jihādī organization to operate in Morocco. It appears its initial seeds were sown among Moroccan immigrants in some European countries, including some Moroccan Arab Afghans. It then spread to several other countries where the Moroccan immigrant community in Europe forms a huge segment, perhaps nearing five million, with most residing primarily in France, Belgium, Holland, and Central European countries, while not insignificant communities exist in other European nations. The group issued a methodology and a number of writings, mostly in a clandestine manner, and disseminated them among Moroccan communities in Europe, distributing them on a limited scale within Morocco. I have reviewed some of these writings; in their entirety, they follow the same methodology of the Jihādī current prevalent during that period.

When the Islāmic Emirate was established in Afghanistan during the Taliban era, and many Jihādīs moved there from European havens, this group opened a camp and several guesthouses for themselves in Afghanistan. They began a comprehensive military and educational preparation program, as well as training cadres arriving from Europe or from Morocco itself. It was a promising movement. These Moroccan mujāhidīn, like others, participated in supporting the Islāmic Emirate. When September [2001] came, they joined the ranks of those who engaged in the battle of self-defense and defense of the Islāmic Emirate, where they endured their share of tribulation. Some were martyred, others were captured, and the remainder dispersed with the few who survived that ordeal. I ask Allāh to protect and guide them, for there were remarkable individuals among them.

In late 2003, media outlets reported news of massive explosions targeting some Western interests in Casablanca, carried out by martyrdom operatives. News agencies, quoting Moroccan government sources, provided the sole narrative of the event, attributing it to what they termed "Salafi Jihādism." It was also reported that those responsible were individuals described as "takfiris" (those who excommunicate Muslims), according to the claims of those media outlets. I was unable to ascertain more about this.

However, it is important and noteworthy that on the sidelines of these events, about which I have not obtained reliable accounts, the Moroccan security services arrested hundreds of young men in what became known as the "Salafi Jihādī current." Moroccan courts issued numerous death sentences and long prison terms. Also arrested in this crackdown were a number of prominent Salafi and Jihādī preachers in Morocco who had no connection to these events. This appeared to be an early pre-emptive strike against any potential formation of a Jihādī phenomenon, for which all conditions were ripe in that country, afflicted by a tyrannical government, one of the most oppressive, despotic, and collaborationist with the enemies of Islām – Jews and Crusaders – among Arab and Islāmic regimes.

On a personal level, I have had fraternal and friendly relations with many Moroccan brothers since my time in France, then Spain, then Britain, due to the large presence of Moroccans in those countries and within Islāmic Awakening circles in the West. I knew many remarkable cadres among them, distinguished by their sincerity, purity, and fervent enthusiasm. The effects of their people's suffering under that deceased pharaoh, King Hassan II, then his decadent son, the current King Mohammed V (sic:

should be Mohammed VI), their family, and their regime, which oppressed the believers in Morocco, were evident in them and in their desire for action and Jihād.

In the second phase of the Arab Afghans in Afghanistan, I got to know many of them, especially the youth of the nascent group, the Jihādī Group in Morocco. They were a model of sincere youth, burning with enthusiasm and a desire for productivity and contribution. I had high hopes for their promising experience, had not Allāh's decree overtaken them in Afghanistan, as the chasm of September consumed many of their cadres. Those who refused [to surrender] dispersed across the land, joining the caravan of those fleeing with their religion. May Allāh accept from them and all their brothers.

I cannot forget to record, with all respect and appreciation, the magnificent contribution and outstanding performance of some Moroccan mujāhidīn in the heroic operation that resulted in the withdrawal of the Spanish army from the Iraq war – during the government of the right-wing party led by Aznar – which constituted the third side of the allied triangle, alongside America and Britain. Although I could not identify the group to which those exceptional individuals belonged, the entire Muslim ummah is indebted to that constellation of martyrdom operatives to whom belongs the honor of initiating the fracturing of the American-Crusader alliance. One who contemplates that operation to its heroic end discovers the extent of the creative energies within that noble Moroccan Muslim people, proving they are worthy successors to their great ancestors who carried the mission of Jihād in the western lands of the Islāmic ummah throughout glorious Islāmic history.

11. The Experience of the Lebanese Arab Afghans in the Nabatieh Mountains Led by the Martyr Abū ‘Ā’ishah al-Lubnānī – May Allāh Have Mercy on Him – (1999)

The Lebanese mujāhidīn from the Arab Afghans were among the nationalities from which small numbers came to Afghanistan. In addition to their participation in the field, they were distinguished by their courtesy and good morals. They were among the nationalities whose members were able to return to their countries without significant problems. Some of them were subjected to arrest, interrogation, and imprisonment after a small group among them assassinated one of the leaders of a deviant religious movement in Lebanon, attributed to its founder (the Ahbash movement). The victim was a member of the Lebanese parliament. According to the accounts of the Lebanese brothers, that movement was providing significant services to Syrian intelligence in Lebanon and harming Muslim youth. It was also characterized by aggression, and it pursued Sunni and Jihādī youth in their mosques and harassed them. This group was then arrested, and the death penalty was carried out on them, after its members displayed rare heroism and steadfastness in their statements in court, before the press, and during the execution. The Sunni community mourned their pure bodies in a solemn procession that embodied a scene of unity among its diverse movements in Lebanon.

Then, some members of that group continued to propagate its Salafi Jihādī ideas in various Lebanese regions, especially in northern Lebanon near the city of Tripoli and the Nabatieh mountains. Their goal, according to the vision drawn by their amīr (leader), brother Abū ‘Ā’ishah al-Lubnānī, was to establish a Jihādī movement for Sunni youth that would work to establish an Islāmic revolution aimed at implementing Sharī‘ah in Lebanon, or at least to create a force for the Sunnis in Lebanon.

Brother Abū ‘Ā’ishah al-Lubnānī, may Allāh have mercy on him, was one of the veteran Arab Afghans from the days of the Afghan Jihād. He had immigrated to the United States and came from there to Afghanistan. After the end of the Afghan Jihād, he returned to America and from there to Lebanon, carrying in his heart ideas and hopes for establishing a local Jihādī movement for the Sunnis in Lebanon.

Due to a friendship and cooperative relationship I had with him and some of his brothers during the Afghan Jihād, I maintained some intermittent contact with some of them in subsequent periods, which enabled me to learn about their objectives. I sent him a message with one of my friends who met him, conveying my conviction that his idea ran contrary to geography, politics, history, and the realities on the ground, and that it would be better for them to try to return and benefit from the atmosphere in Afghanistan during the Taliban era to continue establishing and preparing themselves gradually. I also conveyed my viewpoint that Lebanon's political, demographic, and regional conditions did not permit his ideas, which seemed unrealistic to me. I advised him to try to develop his Jihādī project into a broader regional concept that takes into account the stage reached in the global confrontation between Muslims and the New World Order. However, he – may Allāh have mercy on him – seemed insistent and convinced of his program, and he sent me a concise reply: "You tried in Syria, and our brothers tried in Egypt, Libya, and Algeria. Let us try in Lebanon."

After a short period, it seems that the increased activity of his supporters, who grew from individuals to dozens, boosted their self-confidence and prompted them to move with some degree of openness. Some locals in the area reported that they were aware of their presence in the mountains, and that some of them moved about almost openly. It was not long before the Lebanese army surrounded the area, and battles ensued for several days. It was said that some Syrian army units participated in them. This resulted in the martyrdom of about fifty brothers, including Abū ‘Ā’ishah, may Allāh have mercy on him, and some prominent figures among his brothers, veteran Arab Afghans. Some who had connections with them from various Lebanese regions were arrested, according to what I was informed by some brothers and the media. May Allāh grant them relief, and may Allāh have mercy on the righteous martyrs.

Prominent Contemporary Jihādī Experiences in Central Asia

12. The Jihādī Experience in Tajikistan (1992 - 2000)

With the victories of Jihād against the Soviets in Afghanistan, the hopes of Muslims in Central Asia to rid themselves of the yoke of Russian occupation, which had oppressed them and even denied them their religion, were revived. The Farsiwani or Tajik minority, as they are called in northern Afghanistan, played a role during their confrontation with the Soviets in transmitting the seeds of revolution and the flame of Jihād beyond the Amu Darya River. Several Afghan Jihādī parties, notably the Jamiat-e Islami and Hezb-e Islami led by Hekmatyar, also sought to do so by sending copies of the Qur’ān and translated religious books to secret cells of the nascent Islāmic movement in Tajikistan to incite them to Jihād.

With the collapse of the Soviet Union, the great dream of sincere Afghan mujāhidīn and Arab Afghans was to cross the Amu Darya River to continue Jihād against Moscow. This is what some did following the withdrawal of the Red Army, during which some Afghan party leaders, particularly Rabbani and Massoud, played a shameful role in ensuring its safe passage after it had inflicted upon the Afghans the calamities of killing and the complete destruction of their country. However, a number of Arab, Afghan, and Tajik mujāhidīn crossed the river to become the vanguards of a rich Jihādī experience that lasted from the early 1990s to the end of the twentieth century. I do not possess many details about that experience, other than what I learned from some of those interested in it.

In summary, the mujāhidīn managed to liberate vast areas of Tajikistan, extending from its borders with Afghanistan to its borders with Uzbekistan. In the late 1990s, they were able to threaten the capital, Dushanbe, itself, where the Russian-backed communist regime was genuinely threatened with collapse. According to the testimony of those mujāhidīn involved in that cause, Russian intelligence (KGB) intervened at the last moments and persuaded the famous Afghan commander Massoud and President Rabbani to betray the rear bases of those mujāhidīn in northern Afghanistan, forcing them to withdraw from the capital, allowing the regime to regain its breath. The next stab came from the Tajik Islāmic movement itself and its leader, Professor Nuri, who met Yeltsin in Moscow; television cameras pictured him shaking Yeltsin's hand warmly. An agreement was reached under Moscow's supervision between the Tajik government and the Islāmic Renaissance Party led by Nuri, for a settlement under which the Renaissance Party would receive some ministries and parliamentary seats. Thus, the Renaissance Party demobilized its military wing, which had been participating in the siege of the capital. This created a rift in the Jihādī movement, composed of Tajiks and Uzbeks, in addition to some mujāhidīn from Central Asia, led by the great mujāhid Juma Bai al-Uzbeki. He retreated to the mountains with his men and continued fighting until he was forced to sign a settlement that guaranteed him withdrawal to Afghanistan and asylum under the Taliban regime with his weapons and remaining soldiers. This occurred in 2000, when he came to Afghanistan and joined the Uzbek mujāhidīn and their movement, which they had established in 1998 and named the Islāmic Party of Uzbekistan, under the leadership of Muhammad Tahir Jan. Thus, the curtain fell on a unique Jihādī movement, the detailed recording of which remains a trust upon the necks of those who lived through it closely during that period.

13. The Jihādī Experience in Uzbekistan (1998 - 2001)

Uzbekistan is considered the beating heart of Islām in Central Asia. Muslims there managed to preserve their religion and the religion of their forefathers through a system of secret hujras (rooms/cells) that taught Islām clandestinely, from which thousands of huffaz (memorizers of the Qur’ān) and students of knowledge graduated from Uzbekistan and neighboring Soviet republics. The population of Uzbekistan exceeds 25 million. It is home to major historical Islāmic centers such as Bukhara, Tashkent, Samarkand, and Termez.

The Islāmic Awakening there remained a clandestine movement until the collapse of the Soviet Union and the advent of what was called the era of openness. The communists there donned the garb of democracy, as claimed by its president, Karimov, a former member of the Communist Party who became president of the country and of a democratic party therein, replacing loyalty to the Russians with loyalty to the Americans.

Karimov suppressed the Islāmic Awakening that had emerged since 1990 and entered into conflict with it, leading to the migration of thousands to neighboring countries. After 1995, a number of young Jihādī emigrants turned towards Chechnya, where the mujāhid martyr Ibn al-Khattab was preparing a long-term project to fan the flames of Jihād in the Caucasus, Central Asia, and the Soviet republics. Meanwhile, a large group of them went to Afghanistan during the Taliban era, and others joined the Tajik mujāhidīn and their Uzbek commander Juma Bai, may Allāh have mercy on him. Other groups remained hidden inside Uzbekistan, preparing for a Jihādī uprising.

The group that settled near the Taliban was led by a young preacher from Jamaat-ut-Tabligh, who was enthusiastic about a broad Jihādī project for an uprising against Karimov's regime. His star had risen as a result of his confrontation with President Karimov during a mass rally. He then fled to Afghanistan and pledged allegiance to the Commander of the Faithful, Mullah Muhammad Omar, who adopted their project and considered it an important support in northern Afghanistan, where a large Uzbek and Turkmen community of about 5 million people resides.

In cooperation with some Arab Afghans who were enthusiastic about the Uzbek Jihādī project, and with generous support from the Taliban, the Uzbek project under the leadership of Muhammad Tahir Jan grew rapidly. Hundreds of strong young fighters gathered under his command, initially trained by some Arab Afghan instructors. They then developed their capabilities and became one of the most well-trained and well-armed groups supporting the Taliban.

After leaving Tajikistan, Juma Bai joined Muhammad Tahir Jan, pledged allegiance to him for Jihād in Uzbekistan, and became his deputy, military commander, and right-hand man. He later returned to organize the presence of Uzbek mujāhidīn on the borders of Uzbekistan and entered Tajikistan again. However, his attempt was discovered, and he and all his men were nearly killed by the Kyrgyz army. But they managed to kidnap a group of Japanese and foreign experts, and negotiations led to them receiving a ransom of about $5 million and returning to Afghanistan, which raised the movement's standing with the Taliban.

In late 1999, a number of Uzbek mujāhidīn came from Chechnya and, in cooperation with secret groups there, carried out several bombing operations targeting government installations in Uzbekistan. The government responded with a campaign of arrests, as a result of which more Jihādīs and emigrant families fled to Afghanistan. A number of Uzbek Jihādīs were arrested in several Central Asian countries and Turkey, handed over to Uzbekistan, and some were sentenced to prison and others to death. Those who survived flocked to Afghanistan, and these cadres gathered around Tahir Jan, forming a well-organized, disciplined, and well-equipped force. They named their movement the Islāmic Party of Uzbekistan.

Due to the large Uzbek diaspora that had emigrated since the days of Soviet occupation to countries like Turkey, Central Asian nations, Europe, Pakistan, and some Arab countries, especially Saudi Arabia, many of them were able to become merchants and hold positions after their ancestors obtained Saudi citizenship during King Faisal's era. These communities provided material and human support, as well as communication and public relations capabilities, to this nascent group, which prepared several hundred trained fighters.

In mid-2001, the Commander of the Faithful, Mullah Muhammad Omar, decided, based on a study project I had submitted to him, to form a brigade comprising all Arab and Muslim mujāhidīn who were not Afghans (from Pakistan, Arabs, and Central Asian mujāhidīn). He chose Juma Bai, the Uzbek military commander, to lead and manage this project, which they named Brigade 21 and linked it to the military command of the Taliban army (Qol Ordu). Naturally, Juma Bai utilized his Uzbek military administration to manage this brigade, along with an elite group of commanders from Arabs, Pakistanis, and Turkestanis.

The standing of the Uzbeks with the Taliban grew very strong. Muhammad Tahir Jan developed an ambitious project to cultivate a generation of Uzbek preachers and students of knowledge to work within the large Afghan Uzbek and Turkmen community in northwestern Afghanistan. The program aimed to prepare hundreds of preachers within two years to undertake daʿwah (Islāmic call) and then form Uzbek mujāhid militias whose goal would be to fight alongside the Taliban and subsequently prepare for Jihād in Transoxiana (the lands beyond the Oxus River). This was the great dream of the Afghans since the departure of the Red Army from Afghanistan across the Amu Darya River into the Soviet Union.

The Commander of the Faithful pinned great hopes on this project and supported it with all available resources. Thus, with the beginning of the fighting season in the summer of 2001, the Commander of the Faithful assigned Brigade 21, under the command of Juma Bai, combat missions in northern Afghanistan in Kunduz and Takhar provinces. While the joint brigade, whose fighters numbered over three thousand mujāhidīn from Pakistan, Uzbekistan, Arabia, and Turkestan, was preparing to take up its positions and move to the battlefield, the events of September occurred, and the American attack on Afghanistan began. Allāh decreed that an aerial bomb would fall in an area near Mazar-i-Sharif on a gathering point for mujāhidīn from that brigade, leading to the martyrdom of Juma Bai along with 12 of the brigade's leaders, among its most prominent Arab and Uzbek commanders, before the fall of Mazar-i-Sharif.

Disasters followed one after another. After the fall of Mazar-i-Sharif, the treachery in Kunduz, and the betrayal of a group of Arab and Uzbek mujāhidīn in the Qala-i-Jangi fortress in Mazar-i-Sharif in the infamous incident, hundreds of Uzbek mujāhidīn were killed in the north. Others fell in the battles defending the Emirate on the Kabul front, then in the famous battle of Shah-i-Kot near the city of Zormat in Paktia, where hundreds of Americans were killed in the operation codenamed "Anaconda." The survivors then dispersed to Pakistan, where many of them were killed in joint campaigns by the Pakistani army and American forces, and others were captured. Still others scattered in a new phase of diaspora, in the post-September chasm in which the remnants of the Jihādī current continue to struggle, until Allāh grants relief. Thus was turned a page of Jihād, one of the brightest and most hopeful for reviving Jihād in the lands of Transoxiana, where the Messenger of Allāh, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace, foretold the emergence of black banners from there, to carry the banners of the Mahdi to fill the earth with equity and justice after it had been filled with tyranny and oppression, as events these days seem to be heading in that direction.

I personally accompanied the Uzbek experience during the Taliban era from its early stages. Friendship, brotherhood, and working relationships bound me to them. I participated in the preparation program for some cadres for their major project and used to frequent their center to deliver some lectures. Several members of their administration attended a series of qualifying lessons at my home. This enabled me to learn about aspects of their promising major project and also allowed me to get to know some of the finest mujāhidīn in terms of worship, purity, excellent character, discipline, obedience, and strength in adversity and steadfastness. May Allāh have mercy on their martyrs, release their prisoners, protect their displaced, and grant the mujāhidīn in Uzbekistan an opportunity to carry the triumphant banners of Jihād. Indeed, He is powerful over what He wills.

14. The Jihādī Experience of the Mujāhidīn of the Islāmic Party of East Turkestan

Shortly after the Taliban movement announced the Islāmic Emirate, a number of young Turkestani Muslims arrived in Afghanistan. They had fled from Chinese rule, which occupies the land of East Turkestan and persecutes committed youth, continuing China's attempts to erase the identity of that Uyghur Muslim people.

Like other immigrant and mujāhid groups that settled in the vicinity of the Taliban, they began to gather. Their amīr, the martyr brother Abū Muḥammad al-Turkistānī (Hasan Mahsum), may Allāh have mercy on him, emerged as their leader. He had left China as a fugitive after being imprisoned there for five years.

After Sheikh Abū Muḥammad al-Turkistānī pledged allegiance to the Commander of the Faithful, Mullah Muhammad Omar, this group received support and respect from him. However, he ordered them to be cautious in their movement and to maintain as low a profile as possible because China was on the verge of establishing balanced relations with the Taliban and was considering implementing several projects there. This would create a balance in the struggle for interests in Afghanistan and Central Asia between China and the United States. China was close to reopening its embassy in Kabul during the Taliban era. This group grew rapidly because the number of East Turkestani immigrants scattered in other Central Asian countries, Turkey, Saudi Arabia, and Pakistan was also not insignificant.

Soon, the group, in cooperation with some Arab Afghan trainers, prepared a number of cadres and trainers who quickly established their own independent camp and participated effectively in fighting alongside the Taliban.

Their amīr, Abū Muḥammad, may Allāh have mercy on him, was a beacon of activity, sincerity, and good character. This was reflected in the rapid growth of their group. The East Turkestani youth were among the most compliant, sincere, self-sacrificing mujāhidīn, and eager to seek various types of religious and military knowledge.

Some Turkestani mujāhidīn who graduated from the camps of this movement, which bore the same name as the group that made the last attempts and most of whose members perished (the Islāmic Party of East Turkestan), went to China to carry out mobilization and propaganda activities among those who could not leave due to the travel risks imposed by the Chinese government on Turkestani Muslims.

The East Turkestanis' project was promising, especially in the context of the New World Order. The US Congress had adopted a project in 1995 to dismantle China by exploiting ethnic and religious tensions within it, primarily targeting Tibet and the Uyghur Muslims in northwestern China, in Turkestan, which China occupied and renamed Xinjiang (meaning New Territory). Thus, the Jihād project in China was the only one that had a hope of not encountering resistance from the counter-terrorism onslaught. Furthermore, groups of Uyghur Muslims from nationalist and liberal currents had settled in America, Europe, Turkey, and some Arab countries, and some of them began to court this nascent armed group in Afghanistan. However, the Turkestani mujāhidīn's closeness to the Arab Afghans, their allegiance to the Commander of the Faithful, their witnessing of combat alongside the Taliban, and the capture of some of them by coalition forces nearly branded them as fugitives sought by America. A portion of the Turkestani mujāhidīn joined Brigade 21 of non-Afghan mujāhidīn and took their positions alongside mujāhidīn of other nationalities in the Jihād with the Taliban. While the Turkestani mujāhidīn's project was also making headway, the September explosions occurred, and the Turkestani mujāhidīn took their positions alongside their Afghan and non-Afghan brothers.

Thus, the Turkestani mujāhidīn also had their share of martyrs, prisoners, and displaced persons. May Allāh accept from them. Their remnants emerged to continue their journey in the caravan of those fleeing with their religion, strangers on Pakistani soil.

Although the opportunity to leave was available to their amīr, Sheikh Abū Muḥammad al-Turkistānī, he remained loyal to the Commander of the Faithful and Afghanistan, and loyal to Turkestan, insisting on remaining close to it. He stayed in the tribal region of Sarhad in northwestern Pakistan. A month before writing these lines, in November, the Pakistani army, supported by American units, launched a combing and search operation for Arab mujāhidīn, Taliban, and those with them. One of the criminal groups clashed with a group of mujāhidīn that included Abū Muḥammad and his brothers. He fell as a martyr, a stranger, along with a group of his guards and closest brothers. May Allāh have mercy on them, accept them, and grant them spacious dwellings in His Paradise.

I personally accompanied the East Turkestan project from its inception. Their amīr, Abū Muḥammad, was my neighbor in Khost, may Allāh have mercy on him. He invited me to deliver some lessons at their center several times. When I decided to start the project of establishing a camp in Kabul, he received me in Qargha at his camp, which was affiliated with the camp of the Taliban commander Saif al-Rahman Mansur. There, I began my camp project alongside theirs before our camp (the Strangers' Camp) developed and became independent next to their camp.

More than one bond united me and the Strangers' Camp group with the Turkestani mujāhidīn. We witnessed some field scenes alongside the Taliban together. I remember them today, and my pen is truly incapable of doing them justice for the noble qualities they possessed. Today, my heart aches with pain and sorrow for those luminous faces and pure hearts, and I am unable to describe them adequately, for they were worthy of all good. I consider them as such, and I do not sanctify them before Allāh. How well did the poet say, addressing the soil of the martyrs' graves:

In you, beloved ones reside, O beloved place,
And residence may cause pain, or it may grace.
Suns at midday, extinguished by a drunken hand,
Gathered up by the sunset, across the land.
Faces that mingled with my heart and disappeared in you,
So how can they from my heart be gone from view?
Shall I follow them, washed in light so pure,
While my heart, after, by sins is still obscured?

May Allāh have mercy on those who met Him as martyrs and accept them among the righteous. May He protect the displaced and remaining among them, grant them victory, and help them carry the torches of light and Islām, so that the call to prayer may return, melodious and free, in the lands of Kashgar and all cities of Turkestan. May Allāh have mercy on them, like breezes carrying the fragrance of the banners of Qutaybah ibn Muslim, who brought the light of Islām to their lands, and the breaths of thousands of righteous successors and those who followed them in excellence, who carried the torch of Islām to those regions.

O Allāh, do not deprive us of their company in Paradise, nor deprive us of their reward, nor test us after them, and have mercy on us when we come to You like them, O Lord of the worlds.

15. The Experience of Sheikh Osama and the Al-Qaeda Organization in Confronting America Since 1996

As is well known, this title deserves a separate book due to its numerous details and historical importance, and this general chapter on the experiences of the Jihādī current during the second half of the twentieth century is not the place for it.

However, for this chapter to be complete and to include the most important of these experiences, I must, albeit briefly, address this experience, which concluded the file of those experiences in the twentieth century and opened the file of conflict in the twenty-first century in a way that changed the face of history and the world, and altered the dimensions, data, and methods of the battle. I will present this experience through concise main paragraphs, and Allāh is the one whose help is sought, and He guides to the right path. Perhaps Allāh will make it easy for me to elaborate on the details if He decrees that I should chronicle the experience of the second phase of the Arab Afghans with the Taliban (1996 - 2001).

Before I begin, I should point out that I have thought a great deal about the issue of classifying the Al-Qaeda experience within the experiences of the Jihādī current, or classifying it as a type of Jihādī phenomenon against external aggression. I almost leaned towards considering it a third category of Jihādī phenomena due to its differences in formation, methodology, and style. After long reflection, I decided to include it within the experiences of the Jihādī current for several important considerations, among them:

- The methodology that Sheikh Osama bin Laden and most of his followers ultimately adopted and declared. It is a methodology that can be considered based on the principles and foundations of the Jihādī current's methodology.
- Another matter is that most of Al-Qaeda's cadres, founders, trainers, and key personnel are from the Jihādī current who joined Al-Qaeda organically, or Al-Qaeda relied on them in forming its elements.

- The third matter is that Sheikh Osama made confronting the Saudi regime one of the two prongs of his direction and objectives, in addition to confronting America. This aligns with the orientation of Jihādī current organizations in confronting the tyrants ruling Arab and Islāmīc countries, whom they considered apostates from the religion of Islām, basing this on the principles of the doctrine of God's sovereignty (ḥākimiyyah) and the creeds of Salafi Jihādism.
- The fourth matter is that Sheikh Osama managed to draw the entire Jihādī current into the arena he chose and the idea he advocated for confrontation, which is the shift from confronting regimes and governments to confronting those who support them within the New World Order, namely America and its major allies.
- The final matter is that America, for its own purposes, knowingly and deliberately, imposed upon the entire Jihādī current and many components of the current Jihādī phenomenon the label of Al-Qaeda, generalizing it to them whether they liked it or not, and made it a comprehensive name for all components of the Jihādī current, dragging them into its war as well, willingly or unwillingly.

After long reflection, consultation, and seeking divine guidance (istikhārah),

I decided to remove this section from the book for three reasons:

First: The Al-Qaeda organization is still engaged in an open war with the enemies of Islām, led by America, as are all Arab Afghans, the Jihādī current, and every sincere person in this ummah.

Some may think that discussing its experience and characteristics now might benefit the enemy. Although I do not believe so, because the section is a general critical study for deriving lessons from past experiences and does not contain any information considered secret – especially since a large number of Al-Qaeda prisoners are in enemy hands, may Allāh help us to alleviate their suffering – and I believe there is benefit for Muslims and mujāhidīn in presenting it. However, this was one of the reasons for deleting the section, to avoid disagreement on this point.

Second: The experience is still ongoing and thus differs from the previous organizational experiences I have discussed, which have practically ended. Delaying writing about an ongoing experience is beneficial for studying it later, as the study will be more comprehensive and profound.

I hope that we will have achieved the promised victory by then, by Allāh's permission.

Third: The experience is extensive and, to do it justice, requires a separate book, which perhaps Allāh will make it easy for me to produce later. Especially since I prefer to have some senior brothers and sheikhs review it and take their recommendations into account before its publication, which I hope will be soon, and after the comprehensive victory is achieved, Allāh willing.

I apologize to the readers eager to learn about the unique experience of magnificent heroes and beloved ones whose loss is a great tragedy. Most of them, I hope and believe, Allāh willing, have inscribed their names in the register of immortal martyrs.

Eighth: Summary of the Doctrinal and Intellectual Foundations of the Jihādī Current (1960 - 2001)

The Jihādī current formed an independent, self-contained school within the contemporary Islāmic Awakening. Most of its organizations and members shared common elements of Jihādī thought, doctrine, and religio-political methodology. I will briefly outline its most important features, regardless of my personal opinion on some details and ideas, as this section is for presentation, not discussion. This is also irrespective of some secondary ideas held by certain Jihādīs that were not a common characteristic of the current, its main organizations, or its key figures. Among the most important intellectual features of the Jihādīs are:

Ruling on Regimes:

Jihādīs considered all existing regimes in Arab and Islāmic countries to be apostate regimes because they legislate without Allāh's permission, rule by other than what Allāh has revealed, and ally themselves with the disbelievers, enemies of Islām and Muslims. Consequently, they considered all rulers in the Arab and Islāmic world to be disbelievers, apostates, and outside the fold of Islām.

They also considered the three branches of government – if they exist – or their equivalents in dictatorial regimes, to be infidel institutions. These branches are: the legislative authority, the executive authority, and the judicial authority. They considered senior officials in these branches to be disbelievers and apostates.

The limits of specific excommunication (takfīr ‘aynī) for Jihādīs stop at this level.

They consider those below this level, such as their assistants, deputies, and employees, to be collaborators who are not judged as specific disbelievers for their work in these institutions, and they consider them to have potential excuses.

In this, they align with the general thought of the Islāmic Awakening during the 1960s, 1970s, and 1980s, before Islāmic organizations took a democratic turn and were compelled to rule that these institutions were Islāmic. It is worth noting that these truths, which Jihādīs proclaimed and for which they endured tragedies, were the same beliefs held by most figures of the Islāmic Awakening, including the Muslim Brotherhood, Salafists, Sururists, and Awakening preachers from the scholars of the Arabian Peninsula and elsewhere.

Ruling on Auxiliaries:

Jihādīs considered those who fight in defense of these regimes and combat Islamists and Jihādīs – such as members of the army, police, and security forces – to be a generally apostate faction fighting under the banner of general apostasy of their leader and commander, whose orders they obey and whom they defend. However, Jihādīs do not rule on the specific disbelief of individuals among them unless an act that nullifies faith is committed.

The Issue of Takfīr (Excommunication):

They adhere to the creed of Ahl al-Sunnah wa al-Jamā‘ah (the People of the Sunnah and the Community) and consider everyone who testifies that there is no god but Allāh and Muhammad is the Messenger of Allāh to be a Muslim, unless they commit a clear act that nullifies Islām. They apply the conditions for excommunicating a specific individual, which include the fulfillment of conditions and the absence of impediments, such as ignorance, coercion, misinterpretation, and lack of intent. In this, they differ from extremist takfīr groups and the outliers among some who have associated themselves with Jihādīs.

Scholars of the Sultan (State Scholars):

Jihādīs consider any Muslim scholar who sides with these governments, defends them, bestows upon them the attribute of Islām, and considers those who rebel against them from the men and movements of the Awakening, especially Jihādīs, to be Kharijites, as hypocrites. Jihādīs have engaged in lengthy debates with them. Jihādīs are divided into two groups regarding the level of hypocrisy of state scholars. The majority asserts their Islām and considers their hypocrisy to be within the bounds of hypocrisy of action. Some, however, consider some of these scholars to be disbelievers and apostates like their rulers, because they believe these scholars have no excuse of ignorance, misinterpretation, or coercion, as they willingly engage in this hypocrisy, which has reached the point of endorsing the invasion of Muslim lands, permitting peace with the Jews, and selling off the holiest Muslim sanctities. It has also reached the point of issuing fatwas to kill those who take up arms against those rulers and their Crusader invader allies.

The Issue of Democracy:

Jihādīs consider democracy, as a philosophy and a system, to be a system of disbelief that contradicts the religion of Islām in its entirety. Some go as far as to consider it a modern religion, like all ancient and modern religions of disbelief. The majority of Jihādīs consider Islamists who participate in democracy by entering parliament and taking part in the legislative authority or ministries and governments (executive authorities) to be engaged in an act of disbelief. However, they do not rule on their specific disbelief, considering them excused by misinterpretation or even sometimes by ignorance of the disbelieving nature of these institutions, due to the state of weakness of the Awakening and Muslims, and their intention to achieve whatever justice and cooperation in righteousness and goodness they can. A minority of Jihādīs excommunicate these Islamist parliamentarians and ministers based on their affiliation with these institutions, not considering their ignorance plausible as scholars or preachers, nor their misinterpretation acceptable after the establishment of proof and extensive dialogue.

The Issue of Shi‘a and Non-Sunni Sects:

Jihādīs consider all these sects to be part of the Islāmic ummah or what is called Ahl al-Qiblah (People of the Qibla). They consider them to be among the sects mentioned in the noble Ḥadīth about the nation splitting into 73 sects, one of which is saved (Ahl al-Sunnah wa al-Jamā‘ah) and the rest are in the Fire. Thus, they consider them sects of misguidance, deviation, caprice, and error. As is the general

Sunni position, they classify them into three categories:

Extreme Shi'a (Ghulāt): Such as Isma'ilis, Nusayris, and similar groups, whom they consider disbelievers.

Zaydi Shi'a: Such as the majority of Shi'a in Yemen. They consider them close to Sunnis, despite disagreements.

Ja'fari (Imami) Shi'a: These constitute the majority of Shi'a in Iran, and minorities in Lebanon, Pakistan, Afghanistan, and the Middle East.

The majority of Jihādīs consider them misguided people of innovation (bid'ah). A minority of Jihādīs, for political reasons, did not give this issue importance. Some Jihādīs, however, openly declared the disbelief of the Shi'a. Nevertheless, the majority of Jihādīs consider them Muslims from Ahl al-Qiblah, who are misguided innovators.

Political issues have intertwined with doctrinal ones in this matter for the Sunni Islāmic Awakening in general, including the Jihādī current, but this is not the place to elaborate.

The Issue of Salafism and Madhhabism (Adherence to Schools of Law):

Since the late 1980s, the Salafi school of thought has predominated among Jihādīs, as I explained earlier. The majority of them hold a moderate position on the issue of madhhabism, respecting the imams of the four schools of law and their scholars. They are moderate in taqlīd (following a school of law), neither fanatically adhering to one madhhab, nor strictly committing to it, nor disparaging the status of the imams or the scholarly value of the madhhab heritage. The extremist Salafi current influenced the emergence of some "ignorant extremist Jihādīs" among the later generations who went to the extreme of combating taqlīd and madhhabs, but they are a minority among Jihādīs.

The Issue of Sufism:

The majority of Jihādīs were influenced by the methodology of Ibn Taymiyyah and the Salafi school in combating deviant Sufi schools, considering them methodologies of innovation and misguidance. Some were very strict on this issue, while a minority among them adopted a moderate approach to the school of Sufism and Sufis.

Position on Non-Jihādī Islāmic Awakening Schools:

The majority of veteran Jihādīs respect other Awakening schools and their leaderships and adhere to the etiquette of disagreement with them, despite the wide gap in thought and application. The majority of later Jihādīs are in a state of animosity, hostility, and conflict with them, as a result of feelings of oppression and betrayal, as previously indicated.

The Issue of Secularism:

All Jihādīs excommunicate secular ideologies, considering them doctrines of atheism, as do most leaders, scholars, and groups of the Islāmic Awakening, before the recent American wave and the fashion of artificial moderation. However, the majority of Jihādīs consider followers of secular thought from the general Muslim populace to be excused by their ignorance, while they excommunicate the leaders of secular currents in the Arab and Islāmic world, considering them imams of disbelief who revile the religion of Allāh.

The Issue of Arab Nationalism:

All Jihādīs consider the call to nationalism and fanaticism for it to be among the calls of Jāhiliyyah (pre-Islāmic ignorance). Jihādīs are internationalist, calling for the unity of Muslims and their comprehensive system. Consequently, many of them reject the methodologies of nationalist parties, especially since all or most of them combine the idea of secularism with nationalism. Jihādīs consider nationalist calls to be among the causes of the ummah's fragmentation.

The Issue of Patriotism:

As with nationalism, Jihādīs reject the idea of regionalism, patriotism, and working within the framework of nationalistic fanaticism, especially since it has been mixed with nationalism and secularism. Therefore, they oppose its advocates and consider it a doctrine of disbelief and misguidance.

In the previous two points, there is some contradiction in the reality of Jihādīs, as most of their organizations have operated on a local, country-specific basis and have sometimes been characterized by extremism in this regard, even though their ideology is based on the internationalism of Islām and the call to Jihād.

The Palestinian Cause:

All Jihādīs, and indeed the generality of the Islāmic Awakening, believe that Palestine, from the river to the sea and from north to south, is part of the Islāmic world and an obligatory right upon the generations of the ummah. They believe Jihād is an obligation to reclaim it. Thus, they reject all principles of conciliation, normalization, and peace with the Jews. They consider the majority of Israelis, with the exception of a few thousand original Jews and their descendants, to be foreign invaders who must leave. They consider the Palestinian Authority under Yasser Arafat to be like other apostate governments in the Arab and Islāmic world, for the same reasons, in addition to treason.

The Issue of Religious Minorities in the Arab and Islāmic World:

Jihādīs believe that these minorities, mostly Christians, should be treated, in the event of the establishment of an Islāmic state, according to the rulings pertaining to Ahl al-Dhimma (protected non-Muslims) as found in Sunni jurisprudence books.

They do not consider the concept of citizenship as the basis for dealing with them or with those in similar situations.

The Issue of Confrontation with America and Conflict with the West:

Not all Jihādī organizations, from their inception in the 1960s until the start of the military campaign against Afghanistan in November 2001, had proposed or adopted the issue of military confrontation with the United States of America. Almost without exception, all of them were focused on their specific goals of confronting the governments of their own countries.

Although most Jihādī literature had devoted space to the issue of confrontation with America, especially after the Gulf War (Desert Storm), the launch of the New World Order, and the beginning of the American-led international campaign against terrorism, as well as America's support for regimes that suppress Islamists and Jihādīs, this did not translate from literature into a practical operational orientation. Sheikh Osama bin Laden tried extensively during the second phase of the Arab Afghans to persuade Jihādīs to shift their work towards America (the "head of the snake," as he described it), but to no avail. They were methodologically dominated by the idea of conflict with the apostates, who represented the closest and most dangerous enemy, an obstacle to any Jihād against external enemies. They were also dominated by the idea of Jihād to establish Islāmic rule as the key to resolving all crises.

However, the events of September [2001] and their repercussions on the ground, the American branding of the entire Jihādī current under the label of Al-Qaeda, the pursuit of Jihādīs of all nationalities in the context of what it called the "war on terror," the destruction of most of the Jihādī current's infrastructure, and the subsequent occupation of Iraq from 2001 to the present, the successive repercussions of the uprising, Bush's declaration of "crusades," etc., made the sole practical orientation for Jihādīs the confrontation of America and its Western allies.

Thus, America succeeded in compelling Jihādīs towards the "correct" direction in a short time, so that the orientation of all its factions, remnants, and nascent offshoots became confined to this direction.

{And they plan, and Allāh plans, and Allāh is the best of planners.} (Al-Anfāl: 30).

Ninth: The Jihādī Current and the Depth of the Crisis at the End of the Twentieth Century (1995 - 2000)

The Jihādī Awakening had engaged in real and extensive confrontations with some governments during the 1970s and 1980s, suffering many casualties, expanding its popular base, and becoming subject to intelligence-style security pursuits.

The Afghan gateway, opened for Jihād since 1984 to the Islāmic Awakening in general and the Jihādī current in particular, had lured most of its leaders to Afghanistan, where they underwent a unique experience during 1984-1992. The security storm orchestrated by America, executed by Pakistan, and followed up by Arab and European countries after the fall of the Soviet Union and the end of America's need for Islāmic support against the Russians, led to consequences.

Most Jihādī cadres and those wanted by security services in their home countries due to clashes with their governments dispersed to political asylum havens that opened up in Western Europe and similar places like Canada and Australia, or to other Arab countries where their governments' reach could not extend due to the lack of security cooperation agreements between those countries at the time.

However, successive American administrations after the Second Gulf War (Desert Storm) developed a comprehensive plan to confront the Jihādī current, termed the "international confrontation against terrorism," which Bush Jr. later escalated into a genuine world war after September [2001], as we shall see, Allāh willing.

Thus, regional and international security conferences followed one after another during that decade, at a rate of no less than one or more every six months. The Madrid Peace Conference between Arabs and Jews for normalization in 1991 touched upon the issue of terrorism, and the Sharm El-Sheikh Summit in 1994 was dedicated to it. Dozens of global conferences followed thereafter up to the present. The United States of America attended all these conferences, including those specific to Mediterranean countries (!), as did Israel and most Arab states. Conferences of Arab Interior Ministers continued in Tunis, and Saudi Arabia and its minister, Nayef bin Abdulaziz, who was fiercely enthusiastic about combating terrorism, played a prominent role. The global counter-terrorism program during this decade can be summarized by the following points:

Broad Outlines of Global Counter-Terrorism Programs (1990 - 2000):

1. Drying Up Financial Sources:

This plan included imposing strict control over the financial resources of Jihādī and "fundamentalist" movements, which America and its subservient Muslim rulers label as "terrorist." Decisions and measures were taken to review bank balances, monitor bank transfers, zakat disbursements, charitable committee activities, and Islāmic humanitarian institutions. Decisions were made to confiscate funds, monitor accounts, and freeze assets, plunging most Jihādī movements into severe financial distress and significantly reducing their resources.

2. Targeting Jihādī Leaders and Cadres through Killing and Capture:

America initiated this policy with the assassination of Sheikh Abdullah Azzam, may Allāh have mercy on him, using the intelligence services of Benazir Bhutto and her interior minister, Naseerullah Babar. This was shortly preceded by the mysterious death of Sheikh Tamim al-Adnani in America.

Then, a number of leaders of the Egyptian Jihād and the Islamic Group were assassinated or kidnapped from various countries. Anwar Shaaban, the amīr of Arab mujāhidīn in Bosnia, was assassinated, and the amīr of the Islamic Group, Talaat Fouad Qassem, who was a refugee in Denmark, was kidnapped from Croatia and transported by an American helicopter to a ship in the Mediterranean, then abducted to Egypt. Dr. Omar Abdel Rahman was arrested in America, and ludicrous charges were fabricated against him, leading to a sentence of over 200 years in prison. The campaign reached Jihādī cadres in France, Italy, Britain, and elsewhere. Imprisonment even affected scholars and figures whose preaching indirectly revived Jihād in Arab countries. Ali Belhadj was arrested in Algeria, Sheikh Safar al-Hawali, Sheikh Salman al-Ouda, and about ten other senior Awakening scholars were arrested in Saudi Arabia. Jihādīs were kidnapped from multiple countries, including Azerbaijan, Thailand, the Philippines, some Arab countries, and Pakistan, and were thrown into prisons or faced an unknown fate. It seemed that matters were heading towards a real security storm.

3. Extradition Agreements and Exchange of "Terrorists" (Jihādīs) Between Different Countries:

Considering that Arab and most Islāmic countries have no regard for human rights or legal legitimacy, the plan to extradite every wanted security individual to their home country was the most effective way to dismantle Jihādī groups and exhaust their cadres and members. Thus, Arab and Islāmic countries exchanged many Jihādī detainees, who were handed over to an unknown fate in their homelands. Some Western countries, which claim to respect such laws and rights, even committed such acts, and innocent brothers and sometimes their families were handed over to their countries.

4. Eliminating Safe Havens:

President Clinton was the first to announce this measure in this صيغة (form/wording) in 1995. A campaign of security pursuits against Jihādīs began in Europe and various parts of the world. Most cadres of the Arab Afghans and the Jihādī current had dispersed to some European countries as refugees or had settled in Sudan, Yemen, Iran, or Turkey. Some Jihādīs from North Africa settled in Syria and Jordan, while some remained in Pakistan and a few in Afghanistan. The American pressure campaign began under Clinton under this banner. Sheikh Osama bin Laden and the Egyptian and Libyan Jihādīs, along with most of those remaining, were expelled from Sudan. The Sudanese "Islāmic" government, led by Bashir and Turabi, handed over Libyan brothers to their country to be executed! Yemen expelled Jihādīs under the threat of arresting their women; Islāmic and tribal leaders mediated and agreed with the Yemeni government to expel the brothers with their women and children. Syria, Jordan, and Turkey arrested Jihādī brothers and handed them over to their countries; the rest fled. The Americans undertook the removal of Arab mujāhidīn from Bosnia and the disarmament of those who remained after they had shed their blood for their brothers in faith and religion. The Bosnian government itself assassinated their leaders! Thus, the earth, despite its vastness, became constricted for the mujāhidīn from 1995 and in the following years.

5. Shifting Security Cooperation from Regional to International:

International security agreements with complex operational details were concluded, and programs for monitoring routine communications were established. Intelligence agencies were linked at the information and communication levels through highly efficient cooperation plans.

6. Expansion of Counter-Terrorism Legislation:

Western countries and America amended much of their legislation and enacted laws worse than the customary laws applied in the Third World to eliminate avenues for political asylum and foreigners' rights. They expanded counter-terrorism laws to such an extent that in Britain, France, and Scandinavian countries – home to the oldest Western democracies – writing, criticism, and Friday sermons inciting against dictatorial rulers were considered crimes! This was done through vaguely worded legal margins and texts, open to interpretations and reinterpretations according to the whims of intelligence agencies and hateful Crusader leaderships.

7. Media War to Discredit and Isolate the Mujāhidīn:

From the moment the security and military campaign to combat what they called "terrorism" was launched, a parallel media and propaganda campaign began to tarnish the Jihādīs, their principles, and their practices, portraying them as mere bloodthirsty killers and religious extremists who do not carry a message of tolerance and dialogue, among other accusations. The media campaign between Jihādīs and those accusing them of takfīr aimed to isolate them from their popular base. Official religious institutions allied with governments in Arab and Muslim countries played the most malicious roles and supplied this global campaign with its deadliest weapons. Parasites from within the "democratic" Islāmic Awakening, who during that decade became part of the elite and the entourage of sultans, and consequently part of the components of the New World Order, also played an exceedingly detrimental role, as we will detail somewhat in the chapter on the Jihādī Awakening, Allāh willing.

Thus, this American-led global campaign to combat terrorism resulted in transforming the leaders, cadres, and members of Jihādī movements into elements living under the specter of "fear and hunger." The pursuits, assassinations, kidnappings, imprisonments, and closure of safe havens plunged individuals of the Jihādī Awakening into anxieties of fear and pursuit. The plans to dry up financial sources took care of cutting off their livelihoods and the sustenance of their families and children, who had journeyed with them to the easts and wests of the earth, scattered and seared by the fires of this contemporary ordeal for believers.

Then Allāh granted that small group of believers a temporary reprieve with the establishment of the Islāmic Emirate in Afghanistan, which became a sanctuary where the elite of the Jihādī current, both leadership and rank-and-file, gathered during the period 1996-2001. Therefore, the counter-terrorism program focused on striking and destroying it, and destroying the ground that sheltered it, represented by the Taliban movement and the Commander of the Faithful, Mullah Muhammad Omar. This is what they executed in September 2001, to begin the next stage in the path of the Awakening in the post-September world, as we shall see, Allāh willing.

These external conditions and crises surrounding the Jihādī current exacerbated its internal crises, both at the general current level and specific to each experience in its respective region. These crises began to become increasingly clear to everyone, after their harbingers had appeared to some since the early 1990s and since the launch of the New World Order. These crises can be summarized as follows:

1. Security Crises:

The escalation of counter-Jihādī group efforts from the national to the regional, then to the Arab, and finally to the international level, led to the encirclement of these organizations, inflicting heavy losses on them, and neutralizing most of their operational methods, communications, and funding. Previously, when most leaders of Jihādī organizations operating in their country found themselves in a tight security situation due to arrests, torture, and the failure of hierarchical organizations to withstand the brutal methods of security agencies in arrests, investigations, and the local quashing of groups, they would move to neighboring countries, benefiting from the margins of disagreement between the ruling regimes in those states. Many of them managed to secure for themselves and their leaderships a margin of safe haven, and sometimes even bases for movement and support for their cause from neighboring countries. This characterized the period 1975-1995. For instance, the Fighting Vanguard in Syria, as well as the Muslim Brotherhood organization, during their confrontation with Hafez al-Assad's Nusayri regime, sought refuge in Iraq from an early stage, then Jordan. There, they received significant support from the governments of both countries, reaching the extent of training, armament, material support, and facilitation of border crossings. Turkey also turned a blind eye to them, and they used its territory for movement and communications. Some, albeit to a much lesser extent, managed to gain a foothold in Lebanon, though limited due to Syrian control. Support for Jihād in Syria even reached the point where Egypt, in the last days of Anwar Sadat, supported it and provided training services that would have developed further had Sadat not been assassinated by Jihādīs in 1981.

Conversely, Iraqi opposition organizations, mostly Shi'a, received similar support in Syria.

Jihādīs from Egypt were able to move freely in most countries of the region and use them as bases for communication and support, starting from the Gulf states and passing through Syria, Jordan, Yemen, and others, without facing any pursuit.

Similarly, fugitives from Libya moved in neighboring countries. Jihādīs in Morocco received support in Libya and moved freely in the region. Jihādīs in Algeria transited through Morocco, using it as a conduit for weapons and fighters, and as rest areas for the wounded and combatants. The Egyptian Jihād organization operated from Sudan between 1990-1997 and established footholds in Yemen along with other Jihādī organizations. Some of its members received training in Lebanon in Hezbollah camps, and leaders of the Islamic Group were able to find refuge and sanctuary in Iran, among other examples.

These margins were not limited to Jihādīs and Islamists. Most political oppositions during that period benefited from these margins, as did Palestinian nationalist, patriotic, and Islāmic organizations. However, after the fall of the old world order, the collapse of the Soviet Union, and the Warsaw Pact, there were no longer conflicting blocs. The commanding master of these regimes became one: America. There was no longer a margin between an Eastern and a Western master. Orders came from the new master, the sole superpower, to these regimes to close those havens. They began to close gradually. Prince Nayef bin Abdulaziz, the Saudi Minister of Interior, took charge of Arab security coordination and established the Conference of Arab Interior Ministers, headquartered in Tunis. The ministers of "war against Allāh, His Messenger, and the believers" (i.e., Interior Ministers) began meeting every six months. Their deputies held permanent meetings, and their intelligence chiefs had open red telephone lines. The level of coordination rose to linking information archives via computer, and the pursuit of Jihādīs became regional among some states, then soon transformed to the Arab level. Jihādī leaders and pursued cadres moved their centers of operation to the global level after the collapse of Jihād in Afghanistan. These various organizations adopted a developed method of operating through distant safe havens, especially from political asylum areas in the West and some European countries, where personal freedom laws formed a protective shield for Islamist and Jihādī activists.

However, American pressure, demands from Arab and Islāmic governments, and the entry of most European and other countries into the American campaign, which acted like the maestro of a grand symphony orchestra in combating the Islāmic Awakening and its Jihādī vanguard, caused these margins to be eliminated one after another. The security agencies of these countries also joined the pursuit, leading to many figures falling captive and detained. Some were handed over to their home countries, and those who survived fled to Afghanistan towards the end of 1996.

The security crisis did not end, because Afghanistan, which had formed a sanctuary, also became a new problem – an area of restricted movement and activity due to the Taliban's policy of limiting their activities to avoid increased pressure. It became a place of de facto house arrest, where people around it were snatched at every attempt to move, and few of the fugitives escaped those traps.

The issue of eliminating margins in the New World Order was not limited to Jihādīs and their organizations. It extended to all organizations engaged in clandestine guerrilla warfare worldwide. Thus, Abdullah Öcalan, leader of the Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK), was handed over to the Ankara government, and the curtain fell on a guerrilla war that had lasted more than twenty years against Turkey, because the global system closed off their havens in Syria, Iraq, and Lebanon. Their leader was forced to wander and was then arrested through international efforts in which even Greece, Turkey's enemy, participated.

Similarly, the Irish Republican Army (IRA) found itself forced into a political settlement and to lay down its arms.

The Basque separatist group ETA retreated after France closed off its narrow havens. Its leaders were pursued in Europe, Latin America, and elsewhere.

Thus, experienced Jihādīs began to discover that the world of the New World Order, which began after the fall of the Soviet Union, had eliminated the possibility of country-specific revolutions and operating through margins. The new world had become unipolar, with a single master imposing on states the closure of margins, especially against "fundamentalist Islamic extremists" or "terrorists," as they became known in the media. The insightful among them realized that the theory of movement upon which they had based their actions had shattered against the realities of this world. Furthermore, these ten years had proven the failure of country-specific revolutions managed by non-field leaders from exile, due to the impossibility of managing them on the ground because of the brutal oppression, arrests, and torture perpetrated by governments without accountability or oversight.

2. Financial Crises:

The policy of "drying up the sources," imposed by America and implemented by all countries worldwide, led by the existing regimes in the Arab and Islāmic world, halted most channels of financial support from donations, which had been the sole lifeline for the continuation of these organizations' work. This was especially true when Gulf states, upon their masters' orders, imposed policies of surveillance on Zakat channels, charitable donations, and the activities of charitable associations. They imposed strict controls on banks and money transfer systems, similar to what was done with international banks. America and Western countries applied strict policies to prevent any funds from reaching Jihādī organizations or associations accused of supporting "extremism," as they termed it. Thus, most Jihādī leaders were confined in Afghanistan, leaving behind hundreds or thousands of families whose breadwinners had been arrested, with no one left to care for them.

The remaining cells in those countries also found themselves in a financial predicament, cut off from their dispersed leadership not only organizationally and administratively but also financially, crippling their ability to move and grow.

3. Internal Organizational Crises:

As a result of the security and financial crises, most Jihādī leaders transformed into exiled, dispersed figures, cut off from their operational arenas. This generated numerous organizational crises, causing paralysis in administration and a lack of dynamism in movement. This problem, combined with the internal and external security issues and the financial crisis due to the drying up of resources, led to the cessation of human growth for most Jihādī organizations within their fields of operation. Their numbers became limited, and they began to expend their human losses, both internally and externally, from a finite reserve, thus heading towards extinction. Security conditions and the disappearance of those remaining inside, along with the flight of most cadres and leaders capable of guidance, also led to the suspension of education and training programs for the remaining or newly recruited elements. There was virtually no recruitment, no educational programs, and no preparation for recruits. Because crises and defeats usually generate situations where:

{So they turned to one another, blaming each other} (Al-Qalam: 30). And as ‘Umar, may Allāh be pleased with him, said: "These hands were created to work; if they do not find work in good, they will find work in evil." The phenomenon of schisms began to spread.

Some youths and some first or second-tier leaders in the organizations believed that the cause of stagnation and incapacity was the incompetence of the existing leadership. They did not realize that their leaders' problem was their misfortune in leading "country-specific, clandestine, hierarchical" organizations in the era of the New World Order, out of historical context and geographical reality of the ummah. The New World Order imposed its realities, and the crises became too large to solve. The system of operation itself had collapsed and was no longer viable. But those dissidents thought their "perfumer" could fix what time had ruined. Numerous schisms occurred, and what I have called in some lectures the phenomenon of "amoebic organizations" appeared, due to the excessive division and fragmentation. This even affected nascent organizations and groups that were splitting and splintering from their earliest stages! These schisms occurred internally in the original arenas of confrontation for the organizations, as well as in external arenas. Thus, since the early 1990s, and especially since 1995, most of these renowned organizations lost their capabilities.

However, some low-quality, limited-circulation publications did emerge from various quarters. These often transformed into media organizations that, for the most part, performed poorly. Practically, nothing was advancing in the Jihād arena except for the horrific events in Algeria, which caused immeasurable harm to the obligation of Jihād and the Jihādī current. This experience became a testing ground for Algerian, Arab, and Western intelligence agencies, as I detailed in my book, My Testimony on Jihād in Algeria 1989-1996.

4. Intellectual Crises

As previously mentioned, the intellectual foundations of the Jihādī current were laid in the mid-1960s by Sheikh Sayyid Qutb, may Allāh have mercy on him. The various additions written within the framework of the Muslim Brotherhood's literature offered practically nothing new, being mere repetitions, interpretations, and rephrasing. Most of them lacked a Jihādī spirit. The Salafī jurisprudential details can be noted when the jurisprudence of Imām Ibn Taymiyyah was presented as the basis for Jihādī jurisprudence by the Jihād Organization and the Islamic Group in Egypt, forming a second intellectual phase in the late 1970s. The third addition was what the literature of the Arab Afghans offered in the late 1980s. This was practically a repetition of Qutbist activist thought and Salafī jurisprudence from the heritage of the Wahhābī school. Despite its comprehensiveness, this body of literature did not contain important concepts that could constitute a development commensurate with new circumstances and the intellectual, cultural, social, and political problems that arose in the Arab and Islāmic worlds after the establishment of the New World Order. Signs of an intellectual crisis began to appear within the Jihādī current.

Foremost among these intellectual crises was that none of the Jihādī organizations presented in their literature an integrated project for their transformative program on the political, social, and cultural levels. To the masses, especially the educated sector of the Ummah, they seemed to be swimming in the past, isolated from the contemporary problems of the Ummah. The jurisprudence of reality was largely absent from their proposals and literature. The Arab and Islāmic reality and its problems did not receive due attention as a result of the stagnation that characterized the contemporary Salafī school in general – Salafī Jihādism being a part of it. The second major crisis was the uncontrolled repercussions of the Salafī jurisprudential method among young Jihādī students of knowledge. In the latter half of the 1990s, a jurisprudence of extremism and dogmatism prevailed, due to the ignorance of some opportunists who infiltrated the Jihādī current in the absence of authentic writers during that phase, and due to the spread of excommunicatory publications on the fringes of the Jihādī and Salafī currents, and the exploitation and exaggeration of these aberrations by intelligence agencies. The clear distinction and a dividing wall between Jihādī thought and excommunicatory thought began to diminish in the eyes of the Muslim public during that period. I will elaborate on this problem at the end of the seventh and final chapter of the first part, if Allāh wills.

The critical security conditions did not allow senior Jihādīs and their prominent figures to operate in comfortable circumstances that would enable them to write and respond to this dangerous phenomenon. Furthermore, the influx of many new elements into Jihādī strongholds, most of whom were youth from an Arab reality burdened with problems and psychological pressures, coupled with the lack of favorable conditions for intellectual upbringing, created a major problem. An atmosphere of extremism and ignorance prevailed among many Jihādī followers during that period, especially in various havens in Europe and some countries like Yemen, Pakistan, and others.

Other intellectual problems included the inability of Jihādīs to define specific concepts and clear details for important terms and issues that arose due to the project of Jihādī confrontation with the pre-Islāmic (ignorant) regimes. Among these were:

The Shari'ah-based concept of the Jihādī group in its region, and whether it is tantamount to the community of Muslims. The issue of the legitimacy of multiple Jihādī groups in one region. If this is not legitimate, as many of these groups believed, then what is the legitimacy of their multiplicity in neighboring countries whose borders were originally established by enemies? Some Jihādīs went to the extreme of claiming the right to eliminate any new attempt to establish a Jihādī group in a country where a Jihādī group already existed, in order to preserve the unity of the Jihād ranks.

Similarly, the issue of the pledge of allegiance in organizations; its details regarding establishment, dissolution, and its consequences in terms of rights and duties. Some went to the extent of considering it merely a covenant or akin to an oath, from whose obligations the giver could free himself whenever he wished, at most requiring him to fast for three days like one who cannot fulfill a vow. Others, however, maintained that the pledge to an organization is like the pledge to the supreme Imām, from which an individual cannot withdraw unless he sees clear, manifest disbelief for which he has proof from Allāh.

Also, the issue of consultation (Shūrā) and leadership (Imārah) within the organization: the rights of the leader (Amīr), the method of his appointment, the duration of his term, methods of his removal, and his rights and duties. Likewise, the subject of consultation, the method of decision-making in the organization, its relationship to the leader's صلاحيات (authorities), and the institutional structures within the Jihādī group and methods of managing them, especially under conditions of security pursuits.

Furthermore, the problem of the legitimate political and intellectual methodologies chosen by the organization: with the absence of cadres capable of developing them in most countries, and the importation of such ideas from neighboring organizations.

In addition to a problem branching from methodologies, which is the problem of educational curricula and the mechanisms for their application to new members, and the difficulties created by the security situation and secrecy for implementing any training and educational programs.

And so forth. Due to security conditions, pursuits, a scarcity of cadres capable of theorizing, and an almost complete absence of scholars or even competent students of Sharī'ah knowledge, Jihādī organizations were unable to resolve these intellectual problems and crises. Consequently, these intellectual crises often reflected themselves in the form of organizational crises, adding further suffocation to the series of crises faced by Jihādīs in the last decade of the twentieth century.

5. Political Crises and Public Relations Problems

Amidst the Islāmic Awakening, as well as with secular political opposition circles, most segments of the Islāmic Awakening adopted a stance towards the Jihādīs' struggle with the ruling apostate authorities that ranged from neutrality and a spectator's position to negativity, hostility towards Jihādīs, and support for the positions of tyrannical rulers, motivated by the desire to preserve their partisan or personal interests.

As a result of the revolutionary mentality of most Jihādīs and the nature of emotional reactions to the siege, the Jihādīs' responses to the circles of the Awakening, its leaders, and senior Muslim scholars were often characterized by tension and harshness. These reactions were, in most cases, justified in the face of Awakening leaders and scholars who applauded the ruling disbelief, praised it, justified occupation and Crusader invasions under the pretext of necessity and seeking assistance, and permitted normalization with the Jews, or who adopted a stance of apathy, spectatorship, and indifference.

However, the reality, regardless of its justification or lack thereof, was the isolation of Jihādīs within the Awakening circles. Only some Jihādī leaders, in rare cases, were able to maintain political and normal relations with Awakening circles. Jihādī literature in that dark decade of crises (1990-2000) entered into media battles and altercations with various Awakening circles, their parties, and their prominent figures.

The same, and even more severe, can be said about the crisis in relations between Jihādīs and secular nationalist, pan-Arabist, and leftist opposition circles in the Arab-Islāmic world. The Jihādīs' relationship with them was based on the principle of excommunication and enmity, as was the case with most Islāmic Awakening circles towards the secular milieu, especially in the Arab world. Although most of these secular sectors, their parties, and their figures had suffered and continue to suffer from government repression, and found themselves in the same trench of persecution as Islāmists and Jihādīs, and it might have been possible for Jihādīs to win over some moderate figures from among them towards the religious phenomenon, or even draw them into a position of neutrality, tension on one side, suspicion on the other, mistrust and historical enmity on yet another, in addition to the lack of qualified political cadres in the Jihādī current's leadership to establish such a dialogue, and the Jihādīs' communication principle being based on absolute disassociation without considering the margins of the art of the possible, but rather on an uncompromisingly rigid approach in a market crowded with groups, personalities, programs, and methodologies.

All this resulted in amassing the largest possible number of enemies against the Jihādī phenomenon. This exacerbated the crises and the siege, culminating, along with all the aforementioned crises, in a comprehensive crisis, the title and result of which is the following crisis:

The Crisis of Failure to Achieve the Goal and the Proven Futility of the Means:

The goal of all Jihādī organizations that operated from the 1960s until the end of the twentieth century was, in short: to overthrow the existing apostate governments in their countries and establish an Islāmic system, implementing Sharī'ah on its ruins.

Their means to achieve this was armed action against these governments through organizations that were regional in scope, clandestine in method, and hierarchical in structure.

In short, half a century of attempts, especially after the exacerbation of the crises of the past decade, led Jihādīs to fail in achieving these goals and proved the futility of these means for many reasons. Most of these reasons were external, resulting from the onslaught of global forces of disbelief and communal apostasy against them, and from the stance of most of the Ummah's scholars, who either confronted them, as did the front of the Sultan's scholars, or adopted a spectator's position, uninvolved in the conflict. It was also due to the general reluctance of Muslim peoples to fulfill their duty in confronting all waves of injustice and darkness that overwhelmed the reality of Muslims, in addition to the internal problems and crises that afflicted Jihādī experiments.

Thus, all experiments failed, as we saw in the historical review of the most important attempts. All of them failed to achieve that goal. The last of these failures was the Algerian experience, which tragically concluded these experiments. The means, namely (regional, clandestine, hierarchical organizations), also proved their futility and inability to achieve that goal, especially after the emergence of the New World Order, which rendered the methods of these means obsolete and relics of the past in the age of globalization, which globalized the confrontation and relegated those methods, attempts, goals, and tactics to the archives of history.

A Breathing Space in the Realm of the Taliban and the Islāmic Emirate (1996-2001) and the Lost Opportunity:

Since early 1997, a considerable number of prominent Jihādī current cadres from various Arab countries, including organizational leaders, historical figures, students of knowledge, and those with experience, opinion, and expertise, gathered in Afghanistan under the Taliban. The atmosphere of security, comfort, relaxation, and all the elements of a suitable environment presented a historic and golden opportunity for these men to reflect on resolving those crises and to emerge with visions that would mark the beginning of a new phase of advancement. Everyone acknowledged the existence of crises and the necessity of seeking solutions. The period we spent there, approximately five years, was relatively sufficient to achieve a rebuilding process.

However, the surprise was that the "regional idea" and "organizational partisanship" re-emerged to dominate the new phase as well, through camps, guesthouses, and groups that built their conceptions on a "regional - clandestine - hierarchical" basis once again. Most organizations set the same goal that events since 1990, and at the latest since 1995, and what happened in Algeria and elsewhere, had proven impossible to achieve under the New World Order.

I am not here to detail that phase, but I will point out that this "regional - organizational partisan" mentality caused the Jihādī current to miss a golden opportunity. Advocates of the internationalist idea in confrontation, neither Sheikh Usama and al-Qaeda nor others, could persuade these segments and cadres to seize the opportunity and unite their ranks, or at least coordinate. Although Sheikh Usama was the primary candidate to persuade others, he failed to do so for several reasons, the most important of which were their regional and organizational conceptions on one hand, and al-Qaeda's lack of a clear methodology according to Jihādī standards, as well as the lack of clarity in its institutional structure. These two factors were the most significant in squandering that opportunity. It could have been possible to undertake efforts to review methodologies, methods, goals, and means in light of understanding the new reality, taking advantage of the favorable conditions, and rallying everyone around the legitimacy of the Commander of the Faithful (Mullah Muhammad Omar) and the global symbolism of Sheikh Usama. But that did not happen, and all efforts made in that direction by some independents, of whom I was one – as I repeatedly called upon the senior figures on several occasions to persuade them, but to no avail – failed. And Allāh's command is a decreed destiny.

Then came September, putting an end to that golden opportunity, and concealing in the unseen whether a new chance would be afforded to the Jihādīs, enabling their next generation to achieve what that pioneering mujāhid predecessor generation, which played a leading role in confronting the enemies of Islām and their apostate allies, failed to achieve. However, the crises and calamities were greater than their capabilities to achieve their goals. Perhaps the coming destiny holds promise for achieving what was missed of opportunities, and for every term, there is a decree.

Tenth: Ideas Proposed Among Jihādīs to Emerge from the Crisis (1996-2001):

By the mid-1990s, the Jihādī current, with its various organizations and components, had practically reached the depths of crisis. Most of its leaders and veterans became convinced that Jihādī paths had reached a dead end, that the diverse crises had peaked, and that continuing in that manner and with its given factors seemed impossible.

Jihādī attempts had failed successively, and most of their flames were extinguished one after another. Most organizations disintegrated. The surviving leaders and cadres dispersed to various overt and covert havens and hideouts, leaving behind in their countries large numbers of imprisoned mujāhid elements, or supporters and loyalists who had assisted them in their movements, in addition to a large number of families of martyrs, including women and children, in extremely tragic humanitarian conditions. The crises we previously mentioned in all intellectual, political, financial, and organizational fields also intensified, adding to the list of suffocating crises.

The culmination of shocks and crises was the horrific disaster that befell the Jihād experience in Algeria after intelligence agencies managed to activate the seeds of extremism and ignorance within the ranks of some Algerian mujāhidīn by planting intelligence agents to push the cause into the labyrinths of excommunication, criminality, and bloody massacres. Its dreadful and sorrowful news constituted a massive shock to Jihādīs, their supporters, and all believers in the idea of armed action.

Thus, senior Jihādīs and the remnants of their organizations began to search for solutions and ways out. I witnessed such reviews and discussions in the safe haven for Jihādīs in Afghanistan, after most of the remaining groups and important figures in the Jihādī current migrated to the Islāmic Emirate established by the Taliban.

The proposals, ideas, and attempts to emerge from the depths of the crisis among Jihādīs can be divided into three schools, each manifesting in practical attempts and a new direction of movement. They were three dynamic trends, which I have named as follows:

1. The school of surrender, laying down arms, and abandoning principles.
2. The school of steadfastness in principle and continuation of the method.
3. The school of internationalist orientation towards Jihād against the external aggressor, America and its allies.

Let us discuss each of these schools in some detail:

1. The School of Surrender to Emerge from the Crisis:

The essence of this school's idea is: Our crises as Jihādīs resulted from taking up arms, and they will not cease except by the cessation of that cause. So, the solution is to lay down arms and seek other methods of action.

In reality, the precursors of this school, whose proponents explicitly stated the content of their call in the mid-1990s, date back to the mid-1980s when Jihādī movements began to retreat and face crises and defeats. It was often proposed in each country after every practical defeat of a Jihādī attempt. The first to propose it was the leadership of the Muslim Brotherhood in Syria following the Hama tragedy in 1982. At the time, they called it the "reconciliation with the regime" initiative. The Syrian Brotherhood employed numerous intermediaries to pursue ways to knock on Hafez al-Assad's doors, which practically remained closed to those calls. His son Bashar continued to keep the door closed after him.

The remnants of the Fighting Vanguard organization in Syria had taken actual steps towards surrender under the guise of reconciliation. Many of its members came forward under state offers known as the "amnesty law." This process had no political details; it was almost individual surrender and repentance operations, in which some elements from the Vanguard, then from the Brotherhood individually, participated and signed "repentance" statements, at the top of which was written: {My Lord, for the favor You have bestowed upon me, I will never be an assistant to the criminals.} (Qur'ān, Al-Qaṣaṣ:17)

However, the Muslim Brotherhood in Syria wanted to surrender in a "semi-honorable" formula, so they made "reconciliation" offers politically, between their group as a political opposition party and the state and regime. But Hafez al-Assad's government, following diabolical advice from some of its state-sponsored scholars, chief among them Sheikh... (Said Ramadan al-Bouti) and others, imposed a set of impossible conditions on the Brotherhood, including a public admission of their error in taking up arms, their crimes against the state, and writing political-Sharīʿah research papers in which they would use verses and Ḥadīth to prove the error of their path! Then, they were to come under the amnesty law individually, not in a way that preserved even a modicum of dignity. The situation was not pressing enough on them in their havens in Iraq, Jordan, Saudi Arabia, the Gulf, and abroad for them to accept. Their offers of reconciliation continued, and their conditions shrank until the General Guide of the Muslim Brotherhood in Syria, Ali Sadr al-Din al-Bayanuni, appeared on media outlets and satellite channels offering reconciliation and presenting his demands, which had shrunk to a single demand: "the right of citizenship only, under democracy and political pluralism," and return to the homeland without conditions or programs. Despite this, the regime still refused, stating it was considering a general amnesty that would include the innocent, with the necessity of conducting trials for those proven to be involved in crimes against the state, the people, and the homeland. As for most of the wanted individuals, many of whom had not participated in any action in the revolution where most participants were martyred or imprisoned, most of them returned through surrender to Syrian embassies around the world under the amnesty law. Each one wrote a report detailing his life from when he left Syria and Jihād until his return. News came of some being arrested again, and others interrogated, prevented from traveling, and obliged to report to security departments to provide required information about themselves, their relatives, and neighbors, and the weak among them were turned into informants for the security services.

Something similar occurred under what was called the "repentance project" for those pursued in Tunisia in the mid-1990s, although most of them were from Islāmic political oppositions. Zine El Abidine's government imposed humiliating conditions, which some accepted, while others rebelled against them, and Sheikh Rached Ghannouchi rejected them, writing well-argued pieces emphasizing a strategy of steadfastness in confronting the Tunisian regime and similar tyrannical governments, at least politically.

In Algeria, in mid-1996, after dismantling armed groups, infiltrating them, and diverting their course towards excommunication, criminality, and massacres, and implicating some of their factions in them, while the regime itself carried out some massacres and attributed them to these groups, the regime offered a general amnesty through what was called the "National Reconciliation" initiative. Many jurists of the sultans in Saudi Arabia and elsewhere volunteered to support the initiative and issue fatwas for Muslims to surrender and come down from the mountains. Many factions descended and laid down their arms through individual initiatives.

However, the largest and most dangerous of these surrenderist practices and proposals from within the Jihādī current was through what became known as the "Initiative" undertaken by the Islāmīc Group in Egypt. This was known as the initiative to lay down arms and renounce violence unilaterally, without requesting anything in return from the state except calling on it to release Islāmists and end the crisis. The initiative ebbed and flowed from 1996 until mid-2003, when signs of the Egyptian government's responsiveness to it appeared. During the review of the Islāmīc Group's experience in Egypt, reference was made to this initiative, the most dangerous aspect of which was that senior historical leaders of the group began to provide a theoretical basis for surrender, writing numerous books and research papers condemning the methodology of armed Jihād, describing it as violence, and declaring a series of jurisprudential and intellectual violations of Jihādī thought and legitimate political thought concerning the صول (foundations) of the Jihādī current, the explanation and commentary on which would be lengthy. An indication of its deterioration is that it reached the point of considering the assassination of Anwar Sadat a historical mistake and describing him as a martyr of sedition. Thus, the apostate tyrant became a martyr, and Jihād against his Jewish masters became sedition.

I will try, if Allāh wills, to find this series of books and research papers to study them, respond to them, and refute their contents, if Allāh helps, time permits, and life remains. For blocking these pretexts is one of the most important areas of defending the Jihādī current, regardless of our respect for the history of those who undertook them and their excuse in their necessities. However, it is an intellectual response to a proposed idea, regardless of the stature of its proponents, as they presented what they presented while they were prisoners, having moved from a smaller prison to a larger one. The opinions of one who has lost his will are not to be considered. May Allāh help them in their ordeal, accept their good deeds, and overlook their shortcomings or what they were forced into.

Then, the proposals of this school continued, and its proponents became public after September 2001 and the global anti-terrorism campaign led by America, taking the Islāmic Group's initiative and its writings as a model to be emulated in renouncing their previous commitments and retreating from the constants of Jihādī thought and the doctrinal foundations of legitimate politics, under the pressure of the formidable media machine of America and its lackeys.

Similar regressions occurred when the Saudi government arrested a group of Jihādī jurists and scholars in Saudi Arabia and forced or persuaded them to retract and call on the mujāhidīn there and the American forces on the land of the Two Holy Sanctuaries to lay down their arms. Saudi media recruited dozens of scholars and senior preachers to promote these proposals and this school.

Thus, these proposals always emerge, as I mentioned, in the wake of defeats and setbacks, where their proponents search for a solution by removing the cause of the crisis according to their perception, which is "bearing arms." It is natural, as is always the human tendency to patch up one's actions and find excuses for one's failings and retreats, that the adherents of this methodology do not call it by its explicit name, which is "surrender" or "defeat." Instead, they search for gentler names and formulas and unleash a torrent of justifications and jurisprudence that subsequently follow to justify it. They call it at times "amnesty law," at other times "reconciliation," sometimes "national concord," sometimes "truce," sometimes "national reconciliation," and sometimes "initiative to renounce violence," and so on. The titles multiplied under claims of wisdom, rationality, and realism. The names varied, but the surrender was one and the same.

The calamity would have been minor if those people – may Allāh protect us from what the Messenger of Allāh ﷺ sought refuge from: worry and grief, incapacity and failure, cowardice and miserliness, overwhelming debt, and subjugation by men – had possessed frankness and courage and had come out to the people to say: "O our people, we exerted our utmost, we gave our all, those who abandoned us did so, and we could only achieve what our efforts allowed. Now we call for a truce or peace, or even declare surrender. We have lost the round, and Allāh will send for this religion those who will uphold its cause and grant it victory. Perhaps future generations will have better opportunities than what was presented to us." They would then dissolve their groups or organizations and withdraw from the confrontational arena.

But the calamity was greater when attractive names were given to the reality of surrender, and justifications were found for it. The catastrophe reached its peak when their writers and jurists began to theorize and issue fatwas for abandonment and surrender to enemies, unraveling their own work and that of others, which the mujāhidīn in the way of Allāh had established and affirmed with their blood over the years along the path of torment and hardship towards martyrdom and steadfastness. These demeaning efforts block the path for the upcoming youth of the Ummah, lest they follow in our footsteps, lest they try again and again, hoping to achieve what we were not successful in achieving. This is precisely what the cunning enemy, its intelligence agencies, and its psychological and security studies centers intended. They want to kill the seeds of revolution against injustice and oppression, and the fight against disbelief and occupation, and to nip its ideas in the bud. It is their attempt to extinguish Allāh's light with their wealth, ignorant or feigning ignorance that Allāh will perfect His light, even if the disbelievers detest it.

How often I stood perplexed when I read in the accounts of the Sīrah (Prophetic biography) that Abū Jahl ibn Hishām, may Allāh curse him, when he was grievously wounded in Badr, and the noble Companion ‘Abdullāh ibn Mas‘ūd mounted his chest to sever his head, Abū Jahl, in his last throes, asked him: "To whom does victory belong today?" ‘Abdullāh ibn Mas‘ūd replied: "To Allāh and His Messenger, and Allāh has disgraced you." That stubborn tyrant said: "Tell Muḥammad that I have never regretted my enmity towards him, not even at this moment!" Then he perished.

I used to wonder how that disbeliever, whose banner was defeated and whose soul was taken against his will as he departed to Hell, refused anything but to display pride, steadfastness, self-esteem, and sincerity to what he was upon, even though it was misguidance.

I wish our manliness, chivalry, and dignity would aid us; our respect for the blood of our martyrs, the sufferings of our prisoners and displaced, and the tears of our widows and orphans. Nay, if only the zeal for our religion and our banner, and the truth for which we waged Jihād, would ignite in our chests, so that we could say to our enemies when we lose some rounds and are defeated in some stations and battles in this eternal, open war; to say to our enemies:

"Convey to your pharaohs and your masters, the tyrants, and their masters among the Jews and Christians: that we have not regretted our enmity towards them, not even in the most severe hours of defeat and sacrifice. And that we are confident that Allāh's victory is coming. Its triumphant banners will be carried by those who will follow our path, and be guided by our footsteps as we were guided by the footsteps of the preceding caravan, connected by the succession of those who journeyed and strove since the Master of Messengers ﷺ led it. We are upon the truth, Allāh willing, whether we are victorious or defeated in this ideological confrontation."

How is it that we do not find such steadfastness and defiance, which a disbeliever facing Hell displayed? How can we not find it when we, Allāh willing, will be received by Paradise? And we believe that Allāh is our protector, and they have no protector.

Oh, if only the faltering understood his ﷺ glad tidings to Khabbāb, may Allāh be pleased with him, when he came asking him to pray for their victory, exhausted by the torment inflicted upon him and his brothers – may Allāh be pleased with them. So he told him about the sacrifices of those who came before and gave him glad tidings, saying: "But you are hasty."

2. The School of Steadfastness and Continuation on the Path of Jihād and Confrontation:

This path was adopted by most Jihādīs, from Jihādī organizations and groups, cadres, symbols, leaders, and bases of the Jihādī current, despite the path of hardship and torment. This was the stance of most of those blocs and men who sought refuge in Afghanistan during the Taliban era. Lofty ambitions and souls eager for work and contribution returned through a path of diligent preparation and movement. These individuals saw steadfastness as a Sharī'ah obligation that a Muslim could not abandon, and they viewed surrender as a disgrace and flight that they were not permitted to pursue.

However, I noticed from those steadfast individuals – may Allāh accept from them – that their steadfastness had two aspects:

1. Positive steadfastness.
2. Negative steadfastness.

As for positive steadfastness: It is steadfastness on principles, values, the banner, and the trust, for all the Sharī'ah imperatives calling for it, and for what the imperatives of dignity, honor, defiance, and zeal for sacred things demand.

As for negative steadfastness: It is what I observed of those brothers' adherence to their previous methods of operation and their organizational frameworks with all their components and ways. Organizations continued to operate according to the concept of "regionalism, secrecy, and hierarchy," and worked towards the same previous goal, which is overthrowing apostate regimes to establish leaders who rule by Allāh's Sharī'ah in their lands, following most of the traditional methods in systematic preparation and other areas of organizational work.

It seemed as if all the massive changes brought about by the launch of the New World Order, counter-terrorism systems, the collapse of security margins and havens between states, and all the lessons and admonitions we mentioned earlier, had not left a significant impact on the working methods of most Jihādīs. This was despite the fact that many of those methods and ideas were either no longer suitable for the current phase or had proven ineffective.

3. The School of Internationalist Orientation Towards Jihād Against the External Aggressor: America and Its Allies:

The essence of this school's proposal, as I explained in some detail, was that battles with regimes are futile, and that America and its allies from the Crusader and Jewish forces are the beneficiaries of these wars of attrition, despite the truth in them. The solution lies in waging Jihād against the head of the snake, America, whose demise would lead to the collapse of all these regimes, and the beginning of the rectification of conditions and their movement towards what is right, after which it would be easy to work on establishing Islāmic rule after cleansing the Arab and Islāmic region from its tyranny and the tyranny of its followers.

Sheikh Usāmah bin Lāden and the al-Qā'idah organization represented the most prominent Jihādīs who saw the need to move in this direction since 1996. This was inaugurated by issuing a declaration of Jihād against America, as happened in their experience, which I summarized in the previous chapter. I believe that this proposal, in general, regardless of the performance details of those who worked for it, is a correct and sound proposal that is very much in line with the scale of changes the world has witnessed with America's seizure of leadership of the New World Order and its unilateral rule of the world as a sole pole and an overbearing superpower.

A Look at Jihādī Attempts to Overcome the Crisis of the Jihādī Current Towards the End of the Twentieth Century:

Through evaluating the proposed ideas and comparing them with the summary of ideas I had formed, I reached the following conclusion regarding the three aforementioned schools:

First: The proposals of the school of "surrender," laying down arms, and abandoning the path of Jihād, represent a school whose ideas are invalid according to Sharī'ah and whose outcome is futile in reality, as indicated by the texts of the Sharī'ah and what the experiences of the past in our lands and in the experiences of all nations teach us.

What we did not achieve through Jihād and the sword, we will not achieve through defeat and surrender, neither at the level of objectives nor even at the level of personal salvation.

Second: The school of steadfastness on the Jihādīs' path, according to their old method, will only lead to what it led to in the past: repeated failure. It failed previously even though our working conditions and the realities of our situation before the establishment of the New World Order were better and more favorable. Nevertheless, those methods, ways of thinking, and means of action did not achieve the objectives. So what now, when the surrounding reality has changed and global conditions have emerged through which it is impossible to work with those methods in any way? The five years (1996-2001) proved the futility of those methods and the inability of old Jihādī organizations or new attempts by some to achieve any result or progress. They only resulted in more schisms, divisions, losses, and casualties among martyrs and prisoners, through the limited attempts they made, in addition to the exacerbation of the effects of campaigns to dry up resources, media distortion, and security pursuits in isolating these remnants and what remained of them from their countries and societies. Those who remained transformed into small groups living on memories and hopes of the past, and dreams of a future that become more fantastical day by day.

Third: The call put forth by Sheikh Usāmah, upon which al-Qā'idah operated, to engage in battle with America, represents a gateway to correcting the course of Jihād, mobilizing the Ummah, and moving from there to subsequent priorities in resolving the problems of the Muslim reality. It is the soundest and most realistic path, and appropriate for the new circumstances of the New World Order.

I saw in it hope and an opportunity for renewal and a strong launch to correct the course of Jihād and the Jihādī current, if it succeeded in bringing about a serious orientation towards the necessary methodological grounding for it, and development in management and method appropriate for the phase. I hoped they would be guided to the appropriate and correct means to achieve that, just as they were guided to the correct identification of the goal and method. This major renewal and shift in goal and method of operation required great efforts in developing the methodology and fundamentals of thinking, just as it needed significant development in the methods of putting those ideas into practice on the ground.

However, events were too swift to allow for that to be achieved, which is something that requires more time.

Based on that reality, I became convinced of the necessity of launching new theories of action to fill part of the large vacuum necessitated by that shift in confrontation.

After long reflection and benefiting from the accumulated sequence and development of these ideas within me over ten years, as I explained in the introduction, I proposed in the Afghan arena what I considered the beginning of a new school in attempts to reform the course of the Jihādī current and work to bring it out of the crisis, which I named:

The Call of the Brigades of Global Islāmic Resistance (Sarāyā al-Muqāwamah al-Islāmiyyah al-‘Ālamiyyah), whose theories are based on three foundations: First – Steadfastness... Second – Correction... Third – Development.

I worked on discussing these ideas with those veterans and cadres of the Jihādī current whom I was able to study with during the period (1998-1999). Then I became convinced of the necessity of establishing a new Jihādī nucleus to crystallize the ideas of this call and put them into practice. This began at the start of the year 2000.

Then came the events of September, which shuffled all the cards, and their repercussions scattered all efforts, overturned all situations, and placed all Jihādīs, indeed all Islāmists, indeed all Muslims, indeed the whole world, before a new stage with new realities that divided the entire world into two camps, as defined by the President of America when he launched what he frankly called the "New Crusades." He said, in short: "Whoever is not with America in its war is against it... and there is no place for neutrality."

Then, in the aftermath of the September events, most of the remaining cadres of the past generation of the Jihādī current were killed or captured, so the entities vanished and disintegrated, and those who survived were scattered and dispersed.

Then America invaded Iraq, laid out plans to occupy the Middle East and control the Islāmic world, and created new situations that made the only practically possible Jihādī school the Jihād against the aggressor America and its allies, as a sole and compulsory option. This convinced me that what I had concluded in 1991, regarding the necessity of a shift in the Jihādī current towards globalization and confining Jihād to a comprehensive project of resistance against America and its aides, and what occurred to me and others like me who saw this as the correct perception, was what the new reality imposed as the only possible and compulsory option.

Foundations of the Resistance Call and the Mechanism for Deriving Its Theories

After the first part, whose final chapters we are now approaching, has covered all the historical, political, intellectual, and methodological premises that justify and clarify the logic of the subsequent ideas which I will detail in the second part of this book, if Allāh wills. This is the essence of the theories of Global Islāmic Resistance, its call, and its method, as I believe it to be the effective means of confrontation in this phase, if Allāh wills. In the following paragraph, I will outline the principles from which the theories of action of Global Islāmic Resistance, as I conceive them, have emerged, if Allāh wills, and Allāh is the granter of success.

The Three Foundations of the Call and Theories of Global Islāmic Resistance

Steadfastness, Correction, and Development:

All theories of the Resistance call emanate from three foundations, the summary of which is as follows:

First: Steadfastness:

Steadfastness on the path of Jihād as the sole solution to the problems of Muslims, Arabs and non-Arabs, in our lands and everywhere. I have previously, in the second chapter of this book, mentioned the Sharīʿah-based, logical, and realistic justifications proving that armed Jihād is the solution. I reiterate here, in response to those "regressing Jihādīs" and other Islāmists who claim that laying down arms and returning to methods they falsely call "legitimate" or "legal," that this is a conception rejected by Sharīʿah, and flawed in reason and logic. After all Sharīʿah-based evidence supported by reality has proven that Jihād, repelling this aggressor, and fighting the invading campaigns and their apostate and hypocritical aides is an individual obligation (farḍ ʿayn) upon every Muslim, second in obligation only to the Tawhīd of Allāh, and more obligatory than all other duties of Islām after faith, it is no longer permissible for any Muslim to make excuses and search for other solutions when Allāh Almighty says: {It is not for a believing man or a believing woman, when Allāh and His Messenger have decided a matter, that they should [thereafter] have any choice about their affair.} (Qurʾān, Al-Aḥzāb:36).

Since the obligation has been determined, steadfastness in performing it is a Sharīʿah obligation not subject to debate, give and take, according to the ideas of minds and the whims of souls.

Even rationally and logically, how can one justify seeing the solution in laying down arms when America has deployed more than one and a half million American soldiers in what it calls the "Central Command Area of Operations," extending from the Islāmic republics in Central Asia, the Caucasus, and Afghanistan in the east, to the Atlantic coasts in Morocco in the west, across nearly twenty-five countries encompassing the entire Arab world and most of the Islāmic world? And it has attacked us with all weapons of war technology, openly declaring the banner of the Crusade and its objectives, those objectives which include occupying land, plundering wealth, dividing states, changing regimes, and imposing changes in cultural, intellectual, religious, and historical curricula! They want the destruction of our lands, the plunder of our wealth, the shedding of our blood, and the distortion of the components of our religious, national, and civilizational identity! How, then, can it be justified that steadfastness in the principle of Jihād and bearing arms is not the requirement of religion and reason? This is a truth that requires pointing out and emphasizing, not proof and demonstration, because it is necessarily known from the religion and established by reason with the consensus of all rational people and most of the insane.

How can Jihād not be the solution and steadfastness not be the requirement of religion, when the apostate, client regimes have rushed to place all their military, security, political, economic, media, and every other capability at the service of the invaders, for one sole purpose: the invader's satisfaction with them and the continuation of those pharaohs and their sons who are lining up on the thrones of crown princes in monarchies and republics alike?

How not, when the political oppositions to these regimes have aligned themselves, wanting to overthrow them, not for the requirements of religion, honor, and Arab and Islāmic dignity, but to offer the invading occupier greater services than those provided by the existing apostate client regimes? If we wanted to elaborate on proving the components of steadfastness and what Sharīʿah and reason impose, it would require hundreds of pages. But a mere indication and the preceding Sharīʿah-based and realistic evidence suffice.

So, steadfastness on the principle of Jihād, fighting, and raising arms against the enemy and its aides and agents among the disbelievers, apostates, and hypocrites, is the first foundation of the call for Global Islāmic Resistance to which we advocate.

Second: Correction:

One of the fundamental beliefs of us, the Ahl al-Sunnah wa al-Jamā‘ah, is that every human being's words can be accepted or rejected, except for the occupant of the noble grave ﷺ. Thus, all actions and sayings of humans, including the best of Muslims after the Messenger of Allāh ﷺ, are subject to this criterion. There are constants in our Jihādī methodology that are constants from the foundations of our religion and belief. They are not subject to alteration or change, and neither we nor anyone else has the right to tamper with them. These are constants based on the foundations of our beliefs as Muslims, and the foundations of our Jihādī belief as Jihādīs, as established in our methodology, such as the rulings of the Tawhīd of Governance, and the foundations of the doctrines of loyalty and disavowal, and so on.

However, everything else, including ideas, perceptions, and opinions proposed within the Jihādī current, ijtihād-based rulings and the concepts derived from them, and all methods of action that have been tried, such as means of movement, programs, and strategies, which succeeded at times and failed at others – all this heritage of concepts and experiences must now be subjected to evaluation and review, after the evidence of failure has accumulated and we have been pushed to the depths of crisis, indeed, crises.

Repeating methods and adopting concepts that, through review, have been shown to be causes of calamities, setbacks, and failure – either because they were erroneous or because they were suitable for their time but are no longer suitable due to changes in time, place, people, their natures, the laws of their movement, and the level of development of their lives – must be corrected, modified, or abolished, according to what Sharī‘ah-based or logical rational proof dictates.

Paths are like straight lines between two points; repeatedly treading them can only lead to the same outcomes and stations. Repeated premises, in their entirety, can only lead to the same results. Allāh, Glorified and Exalted, has commanded us to engage in self-accountability and review after every calamity. He, the Exalted, said: {Or why [is it that] when a [single] disaster struck you [at Uḥud], although you had struck [the enemy in Badr] with one twice as great, you said, "From where is this?" Say, "It is from yourselves."} (Qur'ān, Āl 'Imrān:165).

So He referred us back to ourselves to reflect on our mistakes and our path. This applies to every path and course, individual or collective. "From yourselves"!

And in the Sunnah, as narrated from him ﷺ: "The wise person is one who holds himself accountable and works for what is after death, and the incapable person is one who lets his soul follow its desires and pins his hopes on Allāh."

The wise, intelligent, discerning, rational person is one who begins by attributing the causes of defects, failure, and error to himself. So he "holds himself accountable" and reflects on the consequence and outcome, hastening towards what is after death with goodness that pleases Allāh. And Allāh does not accept from a servant except what is purely for His sake and is correct – sincerity and adherence to the Book and Sunnah, respect for Allāh's universal laws on this earth, and preparation according to ability. This is the methodology of the wise, rational person.

As for the incapable person, he is one who lets his soul follow its desires. Among the greatest incentives for desire is following the familiar, imitating elders, treading the path to which souls have become accustomed, and not compelling them to change what is familiar and beloved. After this incapacity, he pins his hopes on Allāh – hopes of victories and successes, but honey is not reaped from thorns. Incapacity yields nothing but failure.

Thus, we adopted the principle of correction as a second foundation after steadfastness, as a starting point for the call of the upcoming Global Islāmic Resistance, by Allāh's permission, to confront this aggression and coming invasion, and to resist and overthrow this ruling tyranny and disbelief.

Through the principle of correction, and as the first link in the chain of its course, comes the next chapter as an initial contribution and a proposal for dialogue and discussion, which is the Seventh Chapter:

[The Harvest of the Jihādī Current in Forty Years (1963-2003): Achievements to be Invested, Mistakes to be Corrected, and Methods to be Developed].

Third: Development:

One of the miracles of our true religion, and because its Prophet ﷺ is the Seal of the Prophets, and because his Shari‘ah is the final Shari‘ah, the rules of its rulings came in two types:

- Fixed and detailed: No room for change, alteration, or development.
- General and summarized: Presented in broad outlines and general rules, within whose framework ijtihād, development, and change are permissible according to the changing realities of time, place, persons, and circumstances.

For example, the rulings of acts of worship and their details are fixed and have no relation to changes in time, place, or persons. Similarly, the rulings of inheritance do not change; a father is a father, a mother is a mother, and likewise brothers and sons, and relationships do not change with the change of times. Therefore, the rulings of obligatory shares and inheritance were detailed and fixed. Likewise, the rulings of purity were detailed; the pure is pure, the impure is impure, ritual impurity is ritual impurity, and the menstruation of women at the end of time is like the menstruation of women at its beginning, and the rulings do not change, and so on with other constants. Therefore, the rulings concerning these matters came detailed, specific, complete, and perfect. However, many of the rulings of public relations, and what is related to human movement and activity whose circumstances change, have had their rulings regulated by broad outlines, and among these are the rulings of Shari‘ah-based politics.

Rulings of Sharī‘ah-based Politics:

These are rulings built on Sharī‘ah and policy. Sharī‘ah is fixed, its permissible is permissible, and its forbidden is forbidden. Policy, however, is transformative and changeable because it is based on human movement. As their conditions change, rulings and stances towards them change. Issues of movement, administration, organization, management, governance of people, and methods of peace and war are all subject to ijtihād. For hundreds of years, Islāmic scholars have filled the Islāmic library with precious productions and ijtihād, and the door remains open for the competent.

Jihād against enemies is a religion and a fixed obligation. However, its modality, methods, tools, system, and so forth, are all variables in which the Sharī‘ah has left the door open for human creativity and contribution according to what Allāh opens for His servants.

Tampering with the fixity of the fixed only leads to disasters, the least of which is failure and defeat, and the worst of which is ruin before Allāh Almighty as a recompense for playing with the definitive rulings of His religion, Blessed and Exalted is He.

Fixing the changeable by disabling Allāh Almighty's universal laws in His creation, constricting His servants, and reducing the horizons that Allāh, Glorified is He, has expanded for His servants.

For example, when Allāh, Glorified and Exalted, said:

{O you who have believed, fight those adjacent to you of the disbelievers and let them find in you harshness. And know that Allāh is with the righteous.} (Qur’ān, At-Tawbah:123).

The Messenger of Allāh ﷺ acted with utmost dynamism and breadth. He fought nearby enemies and bypassed some of them for distant ones. Thus, it appeared that "those adjacent to you" does not necessarily mean the closest in distance as a Sharī'ah obligation, but rather includes proximity in time and proximity of harm and injury. This is what the jurists understood, and Imām al-Shāfi'ī summarized it in Al-Umm (4/177) saying:

"If the enemy's condition differs, with some being more harmful or more feared than others, the Imām should begin with the more feared and more harmful enemy, and there is no harm in doing so, even if their territory is farther, if Allāh Almighty wills, so that one does not fear for those he begins with what he does not fear from others, for example. This is like a necessity, because what is permissible in necessity is not permissible otherwise. The Prophet ﷺ was informed that al-Ḥārith ibn Abī Ḍirār was gathering against him, so the Prophet ﷺ raided him, though there was an enemy closer to him. And he was informed that Khālīd ibn Abī Sufyān ibn Shuh was gathering against him, so he sent Ibn Unays who killed him, though there was an enemy closer."

To freeze it on the concept of distance and direct succession is to fix a variable, which only leads to hardship and distress. This is what some bound themselves to, saying we will not fight America and its allies until we fight the nearest enemy, namely the rulers, as an obligation and by text. The matter was not so.

Say even more than that about tools, methods, weapons, means, and ways of confrontation, and so on. They are not a fixed religion, but rather changeable and evolving means.

Hence, the third foundation of the call for Global Islāmic Resistance that we proposed is development – developing the idea of Jihād, its methods, and its means. This starting point is what generated the theories of resistance in all aspects of movement, which include:

a- The Idea.

b- The Means.

c- The Method.

In detail, it included developed theories for action in the eight areas upon which work and movement are based:

1. Methodology and combat doctrine.
2. Politics and its horizons.
3. Education, its domains, and its methods.
4. Military confrontation and its methods.
5. Organization, movement, and building Jihādī entities.
6. Training, preparation, and their appropriate methods.
7. Financing Jihād and ways to secure it.
8. Media, incitement, its tools, and its methods.

These are the theories that we will detail in the second part of this book, if Allāh wills.

These theories were born through a mechanism of generating what we believe to be correct from the lessons and experiences of the past, and through the lesson of what has been proven to us to be erroneous, or the unsuitability of continuing to work with it.

In any case, as long as we have established the principle of correction and development for previous experiences, methods of work and movement, concepts, methodologies, and ijtihād-based principles, the principle remains applicable even to the ideas and methods of work and administration that we propose. We assume their suitability for the current and upcoming phase in the developmental scope. These are ideas in the realm of "opinion, war, and stratagem," also subject to correction and amendment.

Those treading the path of resistance and Jihād against Allāh's enemies must review their actions at every stage, considering the circumstances of each country or place, the time and history of the work, the individuals and peoples involved and those around them, and the changing conditions of those around them from the circles of enemies, supporters of enemies, mujāhidīn, supporters of Jihād, and the working mujāhidīn. All these are variables that necessitate dynamism of movement and breadth of ijtihād and development.

Thus, as we embrace this spirit and through the lessons of our past experiences, I hope that hearts will be open and understandings receptive to dialogue. I draw attention to the fact that these proposals represent a critical study from within the Jihādī ranks. Praise be to Allāh, for I am a son of this path, one of its soldiers, and one of its workers, and I hope to be one of its martyrs in the way of Allāh, if Allāh wills.

This critical attempt has carried the compassion of a concerned person dealing with ailments, along with the seriousness of a researcher committed to fairness, objectivity, and practicality. I hope I have succeeded in what I intended of goodness. Whatever good is in it is from Allāh Almighty, and whatever shortcoming is from my deficient self, and perfection belongs to Allāh.

I have been keen on a methodology of general evaluation and have avoided, as much as possible, giving direct, embarrassing examples, so that this book may unite the largest possible number of hearts and not embarrass anyone, especially the brothers of Jihād and companions in arms and on the long path. May Allāh have mercy on those who have passed, make firm those who remain, help us to inflict harm on His enemies, and unite us and them in goodness.

I believe these proposals will find receptive and compassionate hearts that will forgive slips, take advice, and overlook what they consider unintentional offense. I hope the book carries nothing of that.

I also believe it will encounter narrow minds that will react with tension, either due to rejecting the principle of criticism or due to preconceived notions about the author. May Allāh forgive them in advance, and who is more deserving of forgiveness and pardon than the mujāhidīn brothers in the way of Allāh?

I ask Allāh Almighty for help in overcoming these difficult obstacles in such research, and I ask Him for guidance to what pleases Him, to make it provisions for the mujāhidīn in His way, and to write for us the like of the rewards of those who benefit from any of these counsels and proceed to wage Jihād against Allāh's enemies, without diminishing their rewards in any way.

The Harvest of the Jihādī Current in Forty Years (1963-2003 CE)

Allāh Almighty said:

*{Our Lord, indeed we have heard a caller calling to faith, [saying], 'Believe in your Lord,' and we have believed. Our Lord, so forgive us our sins and remove from us our misdeeds and cause us to die with the righteous. * Our Lord, and grant us what You promised us through Your messengers and do not disgrace us on the Day of Resurrection. Indeed, You do not fail in [Your] promise." * And their Lord responded to them, "Never will I allow to be lost the work of [any] worker among you, whether male or female; you are of one another. So those who emigrated or were evicted from their homes or were harmed in My cause or fought or were killed - I will surely remove from them their misdeeds, and I will surely admit them to gardens beneath which rivers flow as reward from Allāh, and Allāh has with Him the best reward."}* (Qur'ān, Āl 'Imrān: 193-195)

Abū Dāwūd and al-Tirmidhī narrated from the ḥadīth of Abū Tha'labā al-Khushanī, may Allāh be pleased with him, that the Messenger of Allāh ﷺ said concerning this verse: {O you who have believed, upon you is [responsibility for] yourselves. Those who have gone astray will not harm you when you have been guided.} (Qur'ān, Al-Mā'idah:105).

The Messenger of Allāh ﷺ then said:

"Nay, enjoin what is right and forbid what is wrong. Until you see avarice obeyed, desires followed, this world preferred, and every person with an opinion admiring his own opinion... then take care of your own self and leave the affairs of the common folk. For indeed, behind you are 'days of patience.' Patience in them will be like holding onto hot coals. The one who acts [righteously] in them will have the reward of fifty." I said: "O Messenger of Allāh, the reward of fifty of them?" He said: "The reward of fifty of you."

The Principle of Review and Evaluation and Obstacles to its Realization

Undoubtedly, this principle is from the methodology of the Qur'ān, the proposals of the Sunnah, and the fundamentals of the religion. It is also a consistent path for the righteous and an approved method among all rational people of every creed and religion. The Noble Qur'ān has alerted believers, collectively and individually, in more than one verse, to follow this methodology, especially after crises and indications from reality of the existence of errors and deviations that led to outcomes of affliction, calamities, or punishments. So He referred them back to review themselves. Allāh Almighty said, addressing the Companions of the Messenger of Allāh ﷺ in an explicit manner:

{Or why [is it that] when a [single] disaster struck you [at Uḥud], although you had struck [the enemy in Badr] with one twice as great, you said, "From where is this?" Say, "It is from yourselves." Indeed, Allāh is over all things competent.} (Qur'ān, Āl 'Imrān:165).

{And those who, when they commit an immorality or wrong themselves [by transgression], remember Allāh and seek forgiveness for their sins - and who can forgive sins except Allāh? - and do not persist in what they have done while they know.}

(Qur'ān, Āl 'Imrān:135).

(Qur'ān, Al-Qiyāmah:1-2).

{Indeed, those who fear Allāh - when an impulse touches them from Satan, they remember [Him] and at once they have insight.} (Qur'ān, Al-A'rāf:201).

*{But when they saw it, they said, "Indeed, we are lost; * Nay, we are deprived." * The most moderate of them said, "Did I not tell you, 'If only you would exalt [Allāh]?'"}*
(Qur'ān, Al-Qalam:26-28).

{Then why, when Our punishment came to them, did they not humbly supplicate? But their hearts became hardened, and Satan made attractive to them that which they were doing.} (Qur'ān, Al-An'ām:43). And the verses are many in this context. And from the noble Sunnah:

"The wise person is one who holds himself accountable and works for what is after death, and the incapable person is one who lets his soul follow its desires and pins his hopes on Allāh."

And 'Umar, may Allāh be pleased with him, said: "Hold yourselves accountable before you are held accountable, and weigh your deeds before they are weighed for you."

Today, we see this principle adopted by all states, governments, political parties, economic companies, and other various institutions. All these institutions, after each phase or interim plan, evaluate their work, rates of progress and decline, conduct profit and loss calculations, and study performance levels in past stages. They often do this for development and improvement periodically and naturally, even without experiencing crises or losses. As for when such things occur, alarm bells ring to initiate an investigation into their causes. Programs are changed, administrations are altered, areas of defect and negligence are identified, and those responsible are held accountable; they resign, are dismissed, or even prosecuted if their negligence harms others. Indeed, extremism leads some to suicide as an expression of a sense of responsibility or to escape its consequences before circles that do not forgive negligence and its repercussions on the collective. One of the most important reasons that drive rational people to processes of accountability and evaluation of past stages is the change in circumstances surrounding a work program, in a way that warns of the unsuitability of programs and plans developed for previous conditions whose givens have changed, or in the event of calamities and surprises that necessitate what is called in management science crisis cells or crisis management. Space here is too short to provide numerous examples from the experiences of Muslims and others, which are evidences known to everyone who lives in their era, interacts with it, and is aware of what is happening around them, especially among the educated, and even among common people in today's world.

The Awakening, Jihādīs, and the Principle of Review and Evaluation:

If we return to the reality of the Islāmic Awakening in general, with its various schools, and to the Jihādī current in particular, we find them to be among the furthest people from this methodology. I began my journey in the Muslim Brotherhood, lived in this Awakening and especially in its Jihādī current, interacted with many of its segments, and became acquainted with many circles of the Awakening, particularly due to my frequent travels and my work in the field of thought, writing, and media. I saw, unfortunately, how the greatest disasters, setbacks, and mistakes, especially those that led to tragedies on many levels, were justified and their files closed with four cold words: "Allāh has decreed, and what He willed, He did." Thus, this sacred sentence, indicative of one of the pillars of faith, is used in the worst way to utter a word of truth intended for falsehood and to justify incapacity, failure, and backwardness.

I am not here either, while presenting this chapter, to give examples from the course of the Islāmic Awakening and the Jihādī current – they are many and bitter, and deserve a separate, purposeful study. However, what I want to point out and emphasize, which I have done in many writings, lectures, and discussions, especially since the end of the Afghan Jihād and the launch of the New World Order in 1990, is that my conviction was: if it was possible to bypass this Sharī'ah-based, religious, logical, and rational principle throughout the course of the Awakening, which spanned decades from 1930 until the end of the twentieth century, and throughout the course of the Jihādī Awakening for half of those decades as well – which is not a short period – then it is unacceptable to bypass it now that the New World Order has been established, changing the balances of politics and reality, and a new reality has begun in the world. But unfortunately, very few circles of the Awakening and the Jihādī current undertook such necessary reviews.

Then came the opportunity of the second phase in Afghanistan, as I indicated. There were signs of such reviews, but only the initial stages were completed, which were the acknowledgment of the existence of crises and defects, and the acknowledgment of the need for reform and changes. But destiny was swifter in September 2001. The principle still stands after a new phase of the New World Order began, the phase called the "post-September world," where the "American Century" was launched, as American extremists and their allies among the Jews and Crusaders in Europe and the world wanted.

The Awakening, the Jihādī Current, and the Urgent Need for Evaluation and Reform:

There is a very pressing need today for the concerned figures among the sheikhs and leaders of the Islāmic Awakening, especially those working in its intellectual core – writers, thinkers, and scholars – to undertake these reviews, study the new situations, analyze the causes of external and internal crises and calamities, and devise effective solutions for them according to what Allāh opens for them.

In this context, I place this chapter of my book as a contribution from the heart of the Jihādī current, to evaluate this reality and its crises, in search of a solution. I hope that Allāh will accept it with His pleasure, guide me in it to sincerity, correctness, and acceptance, and store it for me as a treasure and reward, and overlook my shortcomings and slips.

I believe it is clearer than to require proof today that the world has changed and everything has altered after September and the launch of American campaigns. I think that most of the solutions and methods proposed in the Islāmic and Jihādī Awakening are no longer realistic or viable, although large segments of adherents to stagnation and backwardness unfortunately still operate with them, until Allāh decrees a matter that was destined to be.

Obstacles to the Methodology of Evaluation, Review, Reform, and Development:

This is an ancient problem, as old as human existence on this earth. Since deviation began, conditions became corrupt, and messengers and prophets were sent as bearers of glad tidings and warners to reform what people had corrupted. They called them to the clear, explicit call of truth and success, to which reason attests and to which innate disposition (fiṭrah) inclines, by saying: {Worship Allāh; you have no deity other than Him.}

They found the largest segment of humankind, led by the elite, their aides, and soothsayers whom their tyrants had made light of, answering them: "Indeed, we found our fathers upon a religion, and we are, in their footsteps, guided." The evidences in the calls of the prophets are very numerous regarding this defect inherent in the nature of most human souls that are prone to evil, except for those upon whom my Lord has mercy.

The first dilemma, and the greatest obstacle, is the insistence of souls on remaining with what they are accustomed to, clinging to reality and the heritage of the past, and rejecting change and development, especially when it concerns an inherited belief or a methodology of action and behavior.

The second obstacle is the sanctification of men and imitation of them in matters of religion and worldly affairs, and fanaticism for their ideas, paths, and methods, and the sanctification of structures and institutions, whether they be a tribe, a people, or an organization, at the expense of truth. How many such examples have I witnessed in the course of the Islāmic Awakening, and even the Jihādī one, and how many reformers in the call have complained about it. The scholar and martyr Sayyid Qutb protested against this phenomenon and argued against it with words that should be written in gold: "The exoneration of individuals does not equate to the distortion of the methodology."

Sheikh Marwan Hadid, the Sheikh of Jihād and its founder in Syria, cried out to the leadership of the Muslim Brotherhood in Syria, who refused to wage Jihād against the Ba'athists and Nusayris, saying to them: "You have made the interest of the organization an idol worshipped besides Allāh." Sheikh Abdullah Azzam, may Allāh have mercy on him, often repeated this in the face of the Muslim Brotherhood leadership who stood as an obstacle to the youth's orientation towards Jihād in Afghanistan.

The third obstacle is the resistance of those who benefit from the existing conditions to the principle of change, reform, and review, because it will hold them accountable for the results of their actions and change situations, which will at least take away their gains and positions. So they exploit the previous two obstacles: people's love for sanctifying heritage and its symbols, and the souls' familiarity with their current state and what they grew up and grew old with. They mobilize them to defend their positions, which ensure the continuation of failure and disasters, until the ship sinks with everyone, and sorrow engulfs all, except the captain clinging to the helm, turning its wheel in the uppermost cabin, hoping the command deck will be saved, unconcerned with most of the ship submerged by water, along with its crew and cargo.

Applying the Principle of Evaluation and Review to the Reality of the Jihādī Current from 1960 to the Events of September 2001:

With all objectivity, seriousness, and brevity, I say: if we were to set aside those obstacles, especially since we, as Jihādīs, have reached the depths of crisis and disaster after September, and with complete submission to Allāh's decree and contentment with His destiny, good and bad; then if we turned to analyze our reality and the reasons for what happened to us, while believing that we carry the essence of the call to truth and its pure banner, and hundreds of our leaders, and thousands of our cadres and members of this blessed Jihādī current have offered their efforts with all sincerity and sacrifice – then why was the outcome like this? And what is our share of His تعالى saying: {Or why [is it that] when a [single] disaster struck you [at Uḥud], although you had struck [the enemy in Badr] with one twice as great, you said, "From where is this?"} "Say, 'It is from yourselves.'" (Qur'ān, Āl 'Imrān:165).

And to what extent is it logical and correct that we do not bear responsibility for these results? Can we, truthfully and rightly, attribute them to external factors, and repeat with relief: "Allāh has decreed, and what He willed, He did"?

And to what extent are we responsible for violating the universal laws (sunan) and for not taking the possible means?

This is not for the sake of identifying those responsible for that, trying them, holding them accountable, demanding their resignation, imposing punishment on them, or demanding their suicide! Rather, it is for a positive action that preserves the status of the predecessors and the work of the workers, taking guidance from our Lord as a path of righteousness, as He commands us to be among the righteous: {And [there is a share for] those who came after them, saying, "Our Lord, forgive us and our brothers who preceded us in faith and put not in our hearts [any] resentment toward those who have believed. Our Lord, indeed You are Kind and Merciful."} (Qur'ān, Al-Ḥashr:10).

We find in the summary of our journey over forty years what can be summarized in two words: "We won many battles, but we lost the war in all fields."

The outcome of the work of the Jihādī current and its organizations was failure to achieve objectives, the breaking of the confrontation, a huge list of losses, proof of failure in achieving objectives, and futility in means. This leads us to a big question. Must we admit defeat and surrender to reality? I answer this by addressing the philosophy of the relationship between failure and defeat, and the difference between them.

I believe that failure is not achieving the goal in establishing truth, whereas defeat is abandoning the pursuit of establishing truth as a result of failure. Consequently, victory has two levels: apparent victory, which is achieving objectives in establishing truth, and inner, essential victory, which is persistence and continuation in striving to achieve truth, and diligence in pursuing it, until those whom Allāh chooses from among those treading the path coincide with Allāh's decree, and permission for apparent victory is granted to them, by guiding them to sincerity and correctness – sincerity of intentions for Him alone, Glorified is He, correctness in methodology, and success in choosing and applying the means. When destiny combines with victory, correctness of methodology, and success of means, complete, comprehensive victory is achieved, which is obtaining apparent victory in this world and acceptance of deeds in the Hereafter:

Allāh تعالى said: {So We took retribution from those who committed crimes, and incumbent upon Us was the support of the believers.} (Qur'ān, Ar-Rūm:47).

And it is narrated in tradition: "Indeed, Allāh does not accept from a servant except what was purely for His sake and was correct." {Those are the ones from whom We will accept the best of what they did and overlook their misdeeds, [their being] among the companions of Paradise. [That is] the promise of truth which they were promised.} (Qur'ān, Al-Aḥqāf:16).

Thus, we now find that the people of the Islāmic Awakening, including the Jihādīs, have divided into two groups:

A victorious group, wounded but unbowed, whose determination has not broken, confronting the twenty-first century to make it the century of Islām, and it will be so, Allāh willing.

And a prostrate group, whose head has bowed, whose determination has broken, prostrating itself, crushed by the tracks of America's tanks and the boots of its soldiers, deafening its ears to the roar of its planes and missiles, from hearing the voice of Truth تعالى resounding: Allāhu Akbar... Ḥayya 'alā al-Falāḥ (Come to success)... {So do not weaken and do not grieve, and you will be superior} – with an important condition: {if you are [indeed] believers.} But it is weak in strength, its resolve shattered! These are surrendering now; they have accepted that it is the American Century. The examples of their surrender are glaringly clear.

In the Islāmic Awakening generally, as in the Jihādī current, surrenderers have appeared. And in the large segment of the Ummah, most of them are surrenderers. Therefore, and due to my knowledge of the methodology, structure, and path of the Jihādī current, after my faith in Allāh's promise, I say in short:

Yes, we Jihādīs have failed, but we have not been defeated. Even if in the outcome of our path, alongside the list of martyrs, prisoners, displaced, and tortured, there is a black entry where some defeated surrenderers from the Jihādīs have recorded their names, as happened with some leaders of the Islāmic Group in Egypt, and some "repentants" from Jihād in Saudi Arabia, and from the Syrian Brotherhood and others.

But this does not change the overall result indicated by the stirrings of life in the body of the Ummah, which Allāh has distinguished with a glorious promise:

{Indeed, We will support Our messengers and those who believe during the worldly life and on the Day when the witnesses will stand.} (Qurʾān, Ghāfir:51). For that is Allāh's decree, written by Him Who said, Blessed and Exalted is He:

{Allāh has written, "I will surely overcome, I and My messengers." Indeed, Allāh is Powerful and Exalted in Might.} (Qurʾān, Al-Mujādilah:21). {And indeed, Our soldiers will be those who overcome.} (Qurʾān, Aṣ-Ṣāffāt:173). {Allāh has promised those who have believed among you and done righteous deeds that He will surely grant them succession [to authority] upon the earth just as He granted it to those before them and that He will surely establish for them [therein] their religion which He has preferred for them and that He will surely substitute for them, after their fear, security, [for] they worship Me, not associating anything with Me. But whoever disbelieves after that - then those are the defiantly disobedient.} (Qurʾān, An-Nūr:55). All of this is for a great, glorious, sacred reason, summarized by the glorious slogan:

"Allāhu Akbar... Allāhu Akbar... Lā ilāha illAllāh" (Allāh is Greater... Allāh is Greater... There is no god but Allāh). And because Allāh is Greater, and because there is no god but Allāh, let Hubal be exalted – for Allāh is Higher and More Majestic.

Reasons for the Failure of the Jihādī Current to Achieve its Objectives (1960-2000):

I believe the failure of the Jihādī current to achieve its objectives is due to three reasons; two are external to it, which I will mention briefly, and a third related to it, which I will detail in the following paragraphs. These reasons are:

1. The Ferocity of the Enemies' Attack on Jihādīs and the Glaring Imbalance of Power:

The enemies of Islām, both internal and external, have permitted themselves all means of oppression and abuse against Jihādīs, their groups, leaders, and members, and have extended this to brutalizing their families, and tormenting their fathers, mothers, relatives, women, and children. The ruling apostate regimes in the Arab and Islāmic world have borne the largest share of this effort and affliction. Then, forces of disbelief from Crusaders, Jews, and various atheists openly joined them, after supporting them and providing them with services, tools, and military, security, media, and material support. Those apostate disbelieving rulers fought, and still fight, everyone who stood against them as a mujāhid with all means of killing, torture, and liquidation: by killing, imprisonment, displacement, pursuit, violating honor, taking relatives hostage to pressure mujāhidīn, starvation, siege, and so on, as is well known.

Since the confrontations began, the balance of power between Jihādīs and these enemies appeared imbalanced, and it remains severely imbalanced in numbers, equipment, and means, especially in light of what we mentioned in the previous chapter about the prostration of most of the Islāmic Awakening and its leadership from engaging in confrontation, the corruption of the larger segment of scholars or their suppression and cowardice in the burrows of license, and their spinelessness in the pens of hypocrisy and abandonment, except for those whom Allāh has mercy on, and they are few. This is also in light of the aversion of the Ummah and the general Muslim populace from sacrifice and devotion in these fateful battles. Thus, the overwhelming military and security campaigns, some of whose means we briefly mentioned earlier, led to an imbalance of power and the inability of Jihādīs to achieve their objectives, and this was one of the external reasons.

2. The Inverted Reality of the Ummah and the State of Abandonment Surrounding Jihādī Attempts:

This inverted reality can be summarized in three aspects that collectively contributed to the loss of Jihādīs, the vanguard of this Ummah, in all confrontations so far. This bitter reality manifests in three deadly phenomena:

a. The Corruption of the Vast Majority of Muslim Scholars:

Most Muslim scholars in this era are divided into two categories: either scholars of the sultan and jurists of misguidance, or scholars withdrawn into burrows of incapacity, excusing themselves with license, weakness, and lack of resourcefulness. The evidence for this is too dark to be pointed out and too numerous to be counted. We have previously alluded to some aspects of this phenomenon. What is worse than the scholars of this Ummah themselves confronting their mujāhidīn sons, testifying against them that they are criminal terrorists and Kharijites, and rebels corrupting the earth, and issuing fatwas that they are the dogs of Hellfire in the Hereafter, while in this world their ruling is to be killed, crucified, have their hands and feet cut off on opposite sides, or be exiled from the land? They testify that their pharaonic, tyrannical rulers – who legislate besides Allāh, rule by other than what Allāh has revealed, and support Allāh's enemies with spear, tongue, and heart – are legitimate guardians, Muslim believers whose obedience is obligatory, and that they are more guided than those who believed and strove in the path?

Indeed, is there anything more calamitous and devastating than treacherous Muslim scholars bestowing legitimacy upon invading occupying forces, giving them the status of those granted security (musta'minīn) and protected non-Muslims (dhimmiyyīn), or even peaceful and supportive allies? These who came with their cavalry and infantry, occupying lands, plundering people, fighting Allāh and His Messenger, and spreading corruption on earth. To the extent that the hypocritical Saudi scholar Abd al-Muhsin al-Ubaykan – may Allāh silence his mouth – said that the Americans only strike those who attack them in Iraq, and that if disbelievers appoint a ruler over Muslims, they are legitimate guardians!

The black, reprehensible evidences require many books, too voluminous to be contained in multiple volumes, of the sayings, testimonies, and fatwas of misguidance openly declared by evil scholars and Pentagon jurists today in all countries and regions of the Arab and Islāmic world.

As for the small segment of righteous scholars among us, they are the ones silent about the truth, mute devils, أصحاب (companions) of excuses of humiliation, lack of supporters, and the license that a person is not burdened beyond his capacity.

Thus, scholars abandoned their duty of enjoining good, forbidding evil, and clarifying. They fluctuated between concealing the truth, altering it, changing it, and selling Allāh's religion and covenant for a paltry price.

This caused the scholars to recoil from leading the Awakening, and they refrained from leading Jihād. Consequently, the Islāmic Awakening went astray because of them, and then they began to criticize it for its straying! The Ummah exited the battle as a result. This deadly reason – the malfunctioning of the valve of صلاح (rectitude) and safety in the Ummah – was one of the most important causes for the enemy's ability to isolate the Jihādīs and for their loss of the battle.

b. The Corruption of Most Leaders of the Islāmic Awakening Schools:

The overwhelming majority of Islamic Awakening leaders refrained from entering the battle. Instead, they entered the arenas drawn for them by the enemy itself. Thus, the most prominent preachers of the Islamic Awakening became proponents of an Americanized version of Islām, advocating for democracy and moderation, and seeking to change curricula to eliminate violence and extremism. Regrettably, many leading figures of the Islamic Awakening became part of the institutions of the apostate, ruling infidel authorities—serving as ministers, legislators in parliaments, and guests at the tables of rulers on every occasion.

Consequently, since the late 1980s and early 1990s, particularly after the advent of the New World Order, and especially since the post-September 11th era, most leaders of the Islamic Awakening have become key pillars in perpetuating this intellectual invasion. They have supported their allies among the apostate rulers and their regimes, and have successfully contributed to the plan of isolating the Muslim nation from supporting the mujāhidīn against these enemies.

c. The Immersion of the Majority of Muslim Peoples in Corruption and Their Failure to Support the Mujāhidīn

The lives of ordinary Muslims today are characterized by distance from Allāh, immersion in frivolity, immorality, and disobedience, remoteness from obedience to Allāh, and most of them deserving Allāh's wrath and punishment. How, then, can one expect them to support the mujāhidīn or fulfill the obligation of Jihād against Allāh's enemies?

I have elaborated in the first chapter on the conditions and reality of Muslims today, which suffices to avoid repetition here.

In summary, the reality of most Muslims' lives is one of immorality, disobedience, cowardice, betrayal, and weakness—a love for this world and a hatred of death. This is due to the misguidance of their rulers, the corruption of their scholars, and the incompetence and deterioration of most of those described as leaders of their Islamic Awakening. How could they possibly ascend to the pinnacle of Islām to engage in Jihād in Allāh's path and support Allāh and His Messenger?

How can those who stay up late watching "Video Club" and "Star Academy" programs repel their enemies? How can an audience raised on satellite channels like Rotana and its ilk support the religion of Allāh? How can those who have forgotten Allāh, causing Him to make them forget themselves, stand by the mujāhidīn and make sacrifices?

Describing the shameful reality of Muslims would require many volumes. And describing the path to reform and success necessitates serious programs to rectify what has become corrupt in every aspect of Muslim affairs.

Most beliefs are corrupted. The majority of ideas are misguided. The behavior of the masses is deviant. Customs and traditions are imported from the disbelievers. Most earnings are from forbidden sources. Adultery and debauchery have become widespread, as have promiscuity, free mixing of genders, and women abandoning modest dress. The consumption of usury has been legalized, and devouring people's wealth unjustly is rampant. Deceit, fraud, vice, and ostentatious display by women have appeared. Competition in fields of frivolity and foolishness has become commonplace. Indulgence in luxury, triviality, and extravagance characterizes the lives of the affluent, while envy, malice, and hypocrisy mark most of the needy.

Those who pray among the people have become few. Most of those who fast in Ramaḍān break their fast at tables of amusement, staying up late engaging in sins, watching trivial quiz shows, and programs that promote disbelief in Allāh. Their latest invention is what they call "Ramaḍān tents," where crowds break their fast to the tunes of orchestras, the swaying bellies of dancers, artistic competitions, and prizes, continuing until near dawn. Then, they eat whatever delicacies they desire and fall asleep like corpses, starting their day by abandoning the Fajr prayer after filling their nights with transgressions. Only the fewest among them pay Zakāh. Despite having the means, only a rare few perform Ḥajj, and for most of them, it is for leisure, pride, or trade.

So where are the people called "Muslims" in relation to the reality of the testimony that there is no god but Allāh and the pillars of Islām? Where do they stand regarding the stations of faith in Allāh, His names and attributes, His angels, His books, and His messengers? What remains to indicate their faith in Allāh, the Last Day, and divine decree, both its good and its evil?

Let no one assume, nor any falsifier insinuate, that we believe in the disbelief (kufr) of such dissolute Muslims—not at all! This is merely a description of the conditions that have led to these outcomes. In general, they are Muslims, and Allāh knows best the state of each one. They are but misguided, wicked, and unfortunate individuals; may Allāh rectify them or relieve us of them.

This, regrettably, is the condition of the majority of Muslims, something the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) foretold would happen in the end times. (See Misk al-Khitām, at the end of this book). However painful this truth may be, and however much it is denied by evil scholars and modern shaykhs—those with white turbans and European neckties, with plucked beards, advocates of an Americanized Islām, and the public enamored by the wailings of the clean-shaven, clownish scholar Amr Khaled.

Otherwise, what more do these Muslim populations need to be stirred into action?

Do they need more hunger than they already endure to act? Hunger is typically the first thing that moves any human to revolt. Yet, these people do not go out to fight against their own hunger and the hunger of their children! May Allāh be pleased with Abū Dharr, who said: "I am amazed at a man who goes to bed hungry and does not go out with his sword against the people!"

Or do they need more humiliation than they already suffer? They are in a state of abasement that even the natural disposition of most animals would reject; you find animals kicking, head-butting, scratching, or biting if harmed, defending themselves. Yet, these people are not moved by their humiliation!

Do they need more violation of honor than what has occurred and is occurring? Or do they need foreign invasion and occupation? Or tyranny, injustice, and oppression? Is the Muslim nation lacking any of these to be stirred into action?

It is astonishing today that demonstrations and marches by non-Muslim peoples rejecting the occupation of Muslim lands are more numerous than those in Arab and Muslim countries whose lands have been invaded by disbelievers! In Europe, they protest in the millions, while in our lands, they number in the thousands, or often just hundreds or tens.

Indeed, one is astounded to find clashes between tens of thousands of demonstrators in Japan, Korea, and elsewhere with their own police to prevent their soldiers from occupying us. Meanwhile, these same soldiers land in the airports of our countries neighboring Iraq, Palestine, and other lands, enjoying complete peace and tranquility, sometimes even welcomed—not just by rulers, but by some of the populace! They even enjoy our prostitutes, licensed by law and constitution.

Lest anyone be surprised, an amusing news item reported that a group of officially registered Egyptian dancers (as "artists"), numbering over 5,000, demonstrated to protest the Egyptian government allowing imported dancers from Russia and Eastern European countries to work in Egypt's cabarets due to their lower wages. Most of them, of course, are prostitutes, like the demonstrators themselves.

An Egyptian minister responded to an Islamist's protest against taxing officially registered prostitutes, saying in the Egyptian dialect: "Well, she's earning, isn't she? And our law says: every earning is taxed!"

Foreign, secular, infidel human rights organizations protest France's ban on Muslim women wearing the ḥijāb, out of concern for personal freedom. Yet, the Grand Sheikh of Al-Azhar in Egypt, the disgraced Tantawi, issues a fatwa stating that the ḥijāb ban is an internal French matter for a sovereign state, and interference is impermissible! He claims the ḥijāb is obligatory for Muslim women in Muslim countries but not in foreign lands! Then, Hosni Mubarak endorses this fatwa in his speech, asking Muslims in France to be objective and engage in dialogue! May Allāh not bless him nor his donkey of a shaykh.

We are today from a nation whose leading scholar, Ibn Baz, head of the Council of Senior Scholars, issued a fatwa permitting normalization with the Jews, to the extent that Peres stood in the Knesset praising his moderation, while Knesset members, rabbis, and criminals applauded him!

The tragedies of the Intifada in Palestine have elicited nothing from the Muslim nation but a few demonstrations that were quickly suppressed and not repeated. The scene was then repeated with the occupation of Iraq! Before that, Bosnia was slaughtered before the eyes and ears of Muslims; more than 60,000 Muslim women were raped, 30,000 of whom bore illegitimate children from these rapes, children who were then taken by Christianizing institutions! Meanwhile, a debate raged on the pages of the Saudi newspaper Al-Muslimoon about whether a raped woman could strike her belly to abort the fetus, and the permissibility or prohibition of such an act! And Chechnya... and Kashmir... and Waziristan... and so on!

And now, satellite channels bring these events in full detail into every Muslim home. So, what more do these peoples need to be moved to action?

Can victory for the religion of Allāh be expected from such peoples today, so that Allāh Almighty might grant them victory, when He says:

{O you who have believed, if you support Allāh, He will support you and make your feet firm.} (Muhammad: 7). {So what is [the matter] with these people that they can hardly understand any statement?} (An-Nisā': 78). {Then do they not reflect upon the Qur'ān?} (Muhammad: 24). {Or are there locks upon [their] hearts?} (Muhammad: 24). By Allāh, most hearts today have locks and chains upon them. {No! Rather, the stain has covered their hearts of that which they were earning.} (Al-Mutaffifin: 14). And we seek refuge in Allāh from the causes of His displeasure.

One day, I asked a leader of the Jihād group in Egypt, during the time we were united in Jihād against the Russians in Afghanistan, "Why did Jihād fail in Egypt?" He said, "My brother, you know that among the most important elements for guerrilla warfare are the terrain and the people. Our problem in Egypt is that the land is flat, and the Egyptian people are also a 'flat' people... So how can Jihādī guerrilla warfare be established?"

With apologies to the righteous Muslims in Egypt—and I hope they are not saddened by this example—all peoples, in Egypt as elsewhere, have proven to be "flattened" populations. Their rulers have flattened their scholars and their Islamic Awakening with the sword, the whip, and gold; and the Islamic Awakening and the scholars, in turn, have flattened their populations. Thus, no resistance emerged from them except for a few upon whom Allāh bestowed His favor.

And here is my beloved, afflicted country, Syria, the land of Sham, the heartland of Islām; the Nusayris have turned its capital, Damascus, into a brothel for fornicators under the guise of tourism, to provide recreation for lecherous fornicators arriving from all corners of the earth, especially from neighboring countries, so they do not have to endure the trouble of traveling to Bangkok and boarding Boeing jets for it. There is no need for further embarrassment!

The same can be said of Morocco, Turkey, the hotels of Dubai, the brothels of the Maldives, and others, all the way to the Indonesian island of Bali!

The truth remains as Allāh Almighty has said:

{Indeed, Allāh will not change the condition of a people until they change what is in themselves. And when Allāh intends for a people ill, there is no repelling it. And there is not for them besides Him any patron.} (Ar-Ra'd: 11).

The bitter truth proves daily that for most Muslims, nothing remains of Islām but its name, and of religion, only its outward form. Among Muslims, those who adhere to what the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) and his Companions were upon—those he described as the "saved sect"—are but a few. And only a small number of latter-day men and women, scattered here and there, belong to their "victorious, Jihād-waging group" that fights for this religion. They worship Allāh, holding onto hot coals, isolated, accused, and persecuted. How then can such peoples support Allāh and His Messenger, or engage in Jihād alongside the mujāhidīn?

However, I do not forget to acknowledge the many oppressed individuals who reject these conditions, who are trapped, unable to find a way out or a path forward. They obey Allāh in their personal lives and cry out to Him against the tyranny of rulers and the siege imposed by the fatwas of misguided scholars. May Allāh relieve their distress. But what I have described is the state of the overwhelming majority.

There is a painful truth that must be pointed out: the victory of the mujāhidīn over their enemies, and the success of Jihādīs in their projects and in achieving their goals of ruling by what Allāh has revealed, is, in reality, a victory for the Muslim nation and its peoples. It is a blessing from Allāh upon them when their conditions merit it.

Do the conditions of these so-called "Islamic" peoples today merit Allāh's relief through the victory of their Jihādī vanguard, so that this blessing may encompass them? By Allāh, no!

Do the conditions of their scholars and Islamic Awakening leaders merit such relief from Allāh and His victory for this Muslim nation? By Allāh, no!

Does the reality of their apostate, oppressive, infidel, and transgressing rulers merit relief and aid? By Allāh, no!

I believe this explains our current situation, {and your Lord is not unjust to His servants} (Fussilat 41:46).

Thus, most Jihādīs, where Jihād was established, achieved a special victory for themselves. They were martyred and met their Lord as martyrs, {rejoicing in what Allāh has bestowed upon them of His bounty, and they receive good tidings about those [to be martyred] after them who have not yet joined them - that there will be no fear concerning them, nor will they grieve} (Āl ‘Imrān: 170). If Allāh wills.

Allāh granted the accepted and sincere among them the greatest victory. He brought them near to Him and delivered them from this wretched reality.

Visible, witnessed victory—the defeat of infidel enemies, the collapse of apostate tyrants, the rout of oppressors and transgressors, and the implementation of the Shari‘ah of the Lord of the Worlds in the Muslim nation—is a blessing that descends from Allāh upon these peoples when they deserve it. This is what the divine laws dictate and historical evidence indicates.

Calamity and ruin have become widespread. We are heading towards a time when injustice and corruption will cover the earth and those upon it, until Allāh brings forth one who will fill it with equity and justice after it had been, and is currently heading towards being, filled with injustice and tyranny. Thus, the mujāhidīn in Allāh's path stood alone in the arena of confrontation, lost their battles, and were defeated in their encounters. This description is not an excuse for anyone to say: "Then what is the use of Jihād if the Muslim nation's condition merits defeat?"

This idea is a whisper from Satan and a sign of a weak soul. Two points clarify this: First: Jihād is an individual obligation today, a personal act of worship that every Muslim must perform, whether willingly or unwillingly, just like prayer, Zakāh, fasting, and every other act of worship. One is rewarded for performing it, accountable for abandoning it, sinful for turning away from it, and an unbeliever for denying its obligation.

Indeed, confronting the aggression of disbelievers, apostates, and their allies today is more emphatic in its obligation than all other duties after affirming the Oneness of Allāh (Tawhīd), as we have previously presented the proofs in the second chapter. Second: The mujāhidīn's performance of this obligation stirs the potentials for righteousness within the Islamic Awakening sector and its grassroots, then among its leaders and scholars. Then, the path of righteousness begins to extend through immense sacrifices, a path of suffering, and the price the Muslim nation must pay.

Righteousness spreads, and the Muslim nation begins its correct steps until it becomes deserving of Allāh's victory.

And I believe, unless my Lord wills otherwise, that the Muslim nation will be granted victory, relief will descend upon it, the banner of its religion will be raised, and the Sharī'ah of its Lord will govern, merely due to the sacrifices of those who ascended to the heights of glory, those martyrdom-seekers and resisters here and there who rose to the levels of martyrdom, offering themselves as sacrifices for this religion as Allāh enabled them.

These individuals achieve an immediate, personal, intrinsic victory and pave the way for the Muslim nation's victory—when the Muslim nation moves! This will be due to cumulative action that will take a long time, along a bitter path perfumed by the blood of martyrs, watered by the tears of widows and bereaved mothers, and driven by the groans of the tormented who sacrifice for their religion and their nation.

I do not speak of the blood of thousands, nor hundreds of thousands, but rather the blood of millions of martyrs from this Muslim nation, until we deserve relief, victory, and triumph, and become worthy of Allāh's promise.

The flower of our generation's youth gave their utmost, and we, along with them, gave our utmost. Praise be to Allāh, and we ask Him for acceptance.

I recall now that when we were in Kabul during the Taliban era, I often repeated to my wife as she tearfully saw me off at the door, having brought our four children for me to kiss before I left for the grueling front lines near Kabul, where we lived and defended. The roar of bombs and the whizzing of bullets from battles could be heard from our house, only 12 kilometers from the battlefield! I would tell her:

"Your weeping is hard for me, and this bewildered look in the children's eyes breaks my heart. But I am content and my conscience is clear because I know that my going out, and that of others like me, will shorten your tears and the tears of women like you, sparing us the tears of millions of future weeping women. This anguish in my children's eyes will, if Allāh wills, save millions of Muslim children from tasting the bitterness of orphanhood and the pain of displacement. We are bearing the burden of the Muslim nation's calamities so that perhaps they may be lessened for them."

How many times did I slip out of bed just before the dawn call to prayer to attend to my duties in training, preparation, and garrison duty? My wife would grab my sleeve, saying, "Wait, be patient a little, it's very early." I would reply, "If I knew our enemies were sleeping and would wait for us, I would wait. But they are relentless in their war against us, and we are no less than them. Our example is the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him), to whom Allāh said: {And [remember] when you, [O Muhammad], left your family in the early morning to post the believers at their stations for the battle [of Uhud] - and Allāh is Hearing and Knowing.} (Āl 'Imrān: 121)."

May Allāh fight against ostentation, and I seek refuge in Allāh from pride. I only mention this among many cherished memories to motivate Muslims by informing them of our conditions and to make them yearn for such experiences. These are magnificent images, the likes of which we read about in the accounts of our predecessors, which motivated us. Then, praise be to Allāh, we lived them, and I wish to describe them for those who missed them, so perhaps they too will be motivated.

Otherwise, I am the least of the mujāhidīn I know in terms of state and effort, and whoever fabricates has failed. I only say what the mujāhid Sultan Nūr al-Dīn Zangī (the Shāmī-Ḥalabī) used to say when he saw martyrs departing around him in the Jihād against the Crusaders. He would lament and say: "If Allāh had a need for me, He would have taken me. Indeed, actions are but by intentions." How fitting this statement is for me, as most of those I knew, those I prepared for Jihād and positioned for battle, or accompanied in it, have passed on!

But I am a writer, and I have a trust to uphold. If those sincere mujāhidīn I knew were writers and men of letters, and wrote about their experiences, they would have captivated the hearts of anyone who had a heart or lent an ear while being a witness. This is not a place for pride. And what pride could there be? Can any man from this Muslim nation hold his head high with pride when young Muslim girls and women have gone out to blow themselves up against the Jews in Palestine and the Russians in Chechnya? May the eyes of cowards never sleep! May those who sit idly on their beds find no comfort! And may Allāh not allow traitors to enjoy food, drink, or offspring!

Yes, one day Ibrahim left his hiding place at night, disguised, wandering through the neighborhoods of Kufa. He and his brother Muhammad, known as "al-Nafs al-Zakiyya" (the Pure Soul)—both esteemed Imāms from the Prophet's household, may Allāh be pleased with them—had risen against Abū Ja'far al-Manṣūr, fighting his oppressive agents in Medina and Kufa. Then they went into hiding, concealed from the eyes of his agents and spies.

One night, as Ibrahim was out walking, he saw a woman rummaging through a garbage heap, taking a dead bird from it. He asked her about it, and she said she would feed it to the orphans under her care. He said to her, "You know it is forbidden dead meat." She replied, "It has become permissible for us (due to necessity)."

He (may Allāh be pleased with him) wept and said to her, "It is people like you who will cause me to come out tomorrow to have my neck struck!"

And so it was. His going out was not enough to solve the problem. He went out and was killed as a martyr, may Allāh have mercy on him.

Such incidents, and even worse, are what drove us out to have our necks struck, to be scorched by the heat of our women's tears and the deprivation of our children. We have nothing for them but the words of Allāh Almighty: {Indeed, my protector is

Allāh, who has sent down the Book; and He is an ally to the righteous.} (Al-A‘rāf: 196), acting upon His command, Glorified is He: {And let those [executors and guardians] fear [injustice] as if they [themselves] had left behind them weak offspring whom they would have feared for. So let them fear Allāh and speak words of appropriate justice.} (An-Nisā’: 9). And I have no words more fitting than what I have stated previously when people ask us to whom we leave our families.

But have our efforts and the efforts of those like us been sufficient to solve the problem? Nay, the accumulated problems of disbelief and injustice?

No, they have not been sufficient. The efforts of people like us have not been sufficient, and Allāh knows best, they are not adequate.

Our generation and those who come after will pay an enormous price for the consequences of inaction, regression, and the path of corruption in every aspect over the past hundreds of years, especially in this last century, until we reached the dark state we are in today—a state that pleases neither Allāh, nor His Messenger (peace and blessings be upon him), nor the believers.

Whatever the so-called reformers, deluded inactive scholars, may think or claim—that their global verbal campaigns to repel aggression will solve the problem, and that the Muslim nation can rise without Jihād and sacrifices—they are deluded. They have abandoned the requirements indicated by the evidence of the Book of Allāh, the Sunnah of His Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him), and the lessons of history, and have instead sought solutions in the labyrinths of errant thought and philosophies!

More astonishingly, they seek the victory of Allāh’s religion in arenas that incur His wrath and involve associating partners with Him—in the governmental apparatuses of sultans, in the administrations of occupying infidel invaders, and by carrying their ideas and their call! But the decision is with Allāh, before and after. And Allāh is predominant over His affair, but most of the hypocrites do not know.

Thus, three external factors converged: the strength and onslaught of the enemies, the corruption of most scholars, preachers, and their elite, and the regression in the condition of the majority of Muslim peoples. These became primary reasons for the absence of victory and relief, the failure of the Jihādī project, and the non-achievement of their goals.

That blessed cohort was let down, surrounded, and lost past battles and wars. In Allāh's promise lies hope for the days to come, if Allāh wills.

However, can we, as Jihādīs, attribute the reasons for repeated losses, defeats, and failures solely to these aforementioned external factors? No! There are internal reasons specific to the Jihādī current itself, due to shortcomings and conditions it experienced, which significantly contributed to the outcomes. This is what we will address in this chapter, if Allāh wills.

Before delving into the aspects of deficiency and the internal causes of failure within the Jihādī current, it is fitting to mention the positive aspects and achievements of this current throughout those years, rich with accomplishments and sacrifices.

The Positive Harvest and Achievements of the Jihādī Current Over the Past Forty Years:

Over forty years of accumulated efforts, sacrifices, and contributions from various groups, organizations, and individuals throughout the Arab and Muslim world, Jihādīs have made great achievements and secured many victories recorded in their honorable register, even if they failed to reach the ultimate goals they set for themselves, as previously mentioned. These achievements can be categorized as follows:

1. Intellectual and Methodological Achievements:

Through its scholars, leaders, and thinkers, and via collective literary and media efforts, the Jihādī current managed to present itself as a principal and distinct school within the contemporary Islamic Awakening. They succeeded in defining the features of its methodology through books, writings, and lectures, and in charting, with the ink of those scholars, thinkers, and leaders, the path for those who would follow them on that luminous way. The blood of thousands of martyrs who sacrificed their lives for Allāh in various fields has breathed life into these ideas and this methodology, establishing models and exemplars to inspire those treading their path towards Allāh's pleasure.

2. Da‘wah and Popular Achievements:

By the grace of Allāh first, then due to these experiences and the sacrifices made by martyrs and those who persevered in Allāh's path, and through the intellectual heritage and the media and da‘wah efforts of Jihādīs at various levels over the past four decades, Jihādīs gained a distinct audience within the Muslim nation generally and the Islamic Awakening specifically. Their contributions became an example and a beacon for all those from the masses of this Muslim nation hastening in repentance to their Lord.

3. Military Achievements:

This is the most prominent and tangible aspect of Jihādī achievements. The mujāhidīn in Allāh's path in this era, whether from the Jihādī current or from various components of the broader Jihādī phenomenon fighting external and local enemies of Allāh, at both collective and individual levels, managed to write with their blood and the suffering of their prisoners and displaced individuals, military achievements that cannot be underestimated.

Some experiences provided models for long-term, continuous revolutions, such as those in Syria, Algeria, and Tajikistan. They also presented models for qualitative confrontations and succeeded in toppling many heads of disbelief and enemy strongholds.

The mujāhidīn were able to execute many enemies of Allāh, including tyrants, presidents, ministers, and high-ranking as well as low-ranking aides of tyrants. The mujāhidīn soldiers of Allāh were able to retaliate against aggression with commensurate force in numerous countries.

Jihādīs also played a significant role in confronting the contemporary Crusader onslaught against Muslims in several issues. Among the most important was their role in Jihād in all open fronts of confrontation with external enemies, from the Philippines to Indonesia, to Kashmir, to Eritrea, to Somalia, and currently to Iraq. Most prominent and significant was the triumphant participation of Jihādīs in the Jihād in Chechnya against the Russian atheists, where the battle still rages. Likewise, their excellent performance in Bosnia against the Serb and Croat Crusaders, backed by various global Crusader powers, where they managed to thwart the genocidal project targeting Muslims there.

However, their greatest success was their participation in the Jihād in Afghanistan, where they managed to overthrow a bloody, collaborationist communist regime. Subsequently, they brought down the great superpower (the Soviet Union), dismembered it, furlled its flag, and reduced it to a mere memory. These efforts resulted in the birth of a nucleus for a new Dār al-Islām (Abode of Islām) with the establishment of the Islamic Emirate in Afghanistan and the appointment of an Amīr al-Mu'minīn (Commander of the Faithful), despite all attempts to prevent and abort it. For six years, the Emirate and its Amīr presented a model of governance by Sharī'ah in defiance of the New World Order, and a model of a fortress where believers could take refuge and live according to their religion and their Lord's commands. Then came the unique model with which the mujāhidīn inaugurated the twenty-first century—America's supposed century—by transferring the confrontation to its very heartland.

Then came the steadfastness of the heroic Arab-Afghan mujāhidīn in the battles of Afghanistan and the open fronts of confrontation with the superpowers and their followers across the globe in what they termed the "Global War on Terrorism."

And here are the mujāhidīn, and what followed that day, continuing in the arenas of confrontation with the Crusaders and their allies in more than one field. The Jihād arena in Iraq is ablaze, and glimmers of hope are emerging in more than one place. Tomorrow is indeed close for those who watch.

The Jihādī military contributions and achievements will continue until Allāh's promise to this Muslim nation of victory, empowerment, and the raising of this religion's banners is fulfilled, if Allāh Almighty wills.

That long path of confrontations, spanning over forty years, was filled with thousands of battles and encounters in which those heroes proved to the enemies of Allāh, both internal and external, that despite the stage of decline experienced by Muslims in general, the miracle of the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him)—his foretelling that a group from his Ummah would continue to be manifest upon the truth, unharmed by those who forsake them or oppose them, until the command of Allāh comes while they are in that state—is an ongoing and still realized miracle. It has its men even in the darkest stages of this Muslim nation's history. If Jihādīs truly knew the value of their heritage and the significance of their history and experiences, and if those capable among them had rolled up their sleeves to document this glorious heritage, they would have left this Muslim nation a magnificent legacy, rich with the history of experiences, lessons learned, stories of valiant heroes, and examples of devout martyrs and patient mujāhidīn.

Unfortunately, however, time has folded away those records, and many wonderful stories and unique examples have vanished over the days. May Allāh have mercy on their authors and reward them abundantly. As ‘Umar (may Allāh be pleased with him) said when he inquired about the martyrs of the conquests, and they recounted stories of those they knew, then mentioned others whom no one knew; he (may Allāh be pleased with him) said, "It does them no harm that people did not know them, as Allāh Almighty knew them."

4. Political Achievements:

Although the ultimate goal declared by Jihādīs—the overthrow of pre-Islamic (jāhilī) regimes and the establishment of an Islamic system in their ruins—was not achieved in all the arenas where they operated, along the path to this goal and alongside these efforts, Jihādīs accomplished many political achievements. Among the most important are:

- Threatening the projects of the pre-Islamic (jāhilī) ruling systems, exposing their falsehood, and stripping them of legitimacy.
- Exposing normalization projects with the Jews and the West pursued by regimes inclined to do so, especially projects of Westernization and the propagation of Islām in a Crusader-like manner.
- Jihādīs were also able to confront the deviations of the Islamic Awakening methodologically, practically, and through media.
- And they were able, by Allāh's grace, to prove to the invading occupiers that the Muslim nation, despite its collapse, is not an easy prey.

Among the political achievements whose results will compound over time until they align with Allāh Almighty's decree is the emergence of those qualified to achieve the greatest accomplishment: establishing the nucleus of the transient Dār al-Islām, defending it, and expanding its company until the promised Rightly-Guided Caliphate, about which the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) gave glad tidings, is established. It will undoubtedly be established, and it will come through Jihād, not through dialogue, electronic forums, or parliamentary battles. For seriousness is not born from frivolity. Truth is not born from error. And virtue does not arise from paths of vice. The Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) spoke the truth when he said: "I was sent with the sword until Allāh alone is worshipped. My provision was placed under the shadow of my spear. Humiliation and subservience were placed upon those who disobey my command. And whoever imitates a people is one of them."

Errors, Gaps, and Negative Outcomes of the Jihādī Current Over Forty Years:

One might ask: If you believe that the Jihādī current has achieved all these accomplishments mentioned in the preceding section, then why mention the errors? I say: It is for the sake of well-being. As Al-Mutanabbī said:

"I have not seen among the flaws of people a flaw... like the deficiency of those capable of perfection."

And so that we may come closer to achieving the desired goal for which the Jihādīs set out. This can only happen through correction, development, and improvement of the path, after Allāh's guidance.

An objector might argue that listing flaws and shortcomings exposes secrets and vulnerabilities that could benefit the enemy. I respond that these gaps are, unfortunately, better known to the enemy than to the members of our own ranks, who are the ones concerned with reform. Thus, there is no exposure of secrets, especially since most of them are lessons from the past, and their proponents have passed on. Praise be to Allāh, besides Whom no other is praised for adversity; the scholars of the sultans, the media of the tyrants, and international agencies have left no real or fabricated deficiency without attributing it to us to tarnish our reputation.

We mention these errors to avoid and rectify them. We mention outdated and worn-out methods in order to replace them. We also mention those erroneous concepts, most of which are new to the Jihādī current, so they may be corrected. This knowledge is obligatory even for the grassroots of the Jihādī current, let alone their cadres and seniors. This should not be whispered or kept secret.

The process of purposeful criticism must be practiced in an atmosphere of freedom, honesty, credibility, and frankness, between conscious leadership and a base that deserves to participate in knowledge because they are men—men at the peak of manhood, who made the decision to confront at a time when resolve faltered. It is not permissible to thrust them forward and sacrifice them using outdated methods that have been tried and proven to fail, or erroneous concepts that have led to failure, and sometimes even disasters.

Treating illnesses involves three essential stages, after trusting in Allāh and seeking well-being and cure from Him.

First: Acknowledging the illness and intending to seek treatment.

Second: Consulting a trustworthy, faithful, and honest physician, revealing all flaws, ailments, and shortcomings to him without fear or shame, even if they pertain to private matters one might be shy about.

Third: Taking the medicine, even if bitter, with determination, sincerity, and resolve to achieve recovery.

These stages must be undertaken by those concerned with healing the Jihādī endeavor from its ailments. This applies also at the level of the entire Islamic Awakening, school by school, group by group, and at the level of overall responsibility for the Islamic Awakening. Without this objectivity, healing will not occur—and Allāh knows best—because these are divine laws that favor no one.

What is the benefit if parents take their sick child for treatment of a debilitating disease that is about to consume his body, and when the doctor asks about his condition, they begin to list his good qualities! And when he asks them about his ailment, they do not mention it, or mention only parts of it and hide others, out of love, tenderness, and well-intentioned motives!

Such a child is destined for demise if Allāh's mercy does not intervene, because the tenderness and love practiced upon him are of the killing kind—an ignorant and backward tenderness.

Pointing out flaws and shortcomings from outside the ranks can be annoying, even rejected if it creates a feeling of ill intent. If a doctor tells you your child has scabies, you will feel pain but accept it with an open heart, ask about the treatment, and implement it. If the doctor were a family friend, it would be easier because you are sure of his affection and good intentions. This is different from a distant neighbor telling you your "son is mangy"! You will find yourself predisposed to reject the observation, and perhaps attribute the characteristic of mange back to him and his advice, and not accept it from him.

The process of presenting shortcomings and gaps must be done internally and at the level of every gathering and school.

The one needy of Allāh Almighty—and praise be to Allāh—is one of the sons of this Jihādī current. He is among the remnants of a generation, most of which has been shattered and has passed on. I ask Allāh that this is for a good He intended, for further contribution and fulfillment of the trust, and not because we have fallen from His sight, Blessed and Exalted is He, such that He did not choose us among those He chose.

I have long been, and still am, an advocate and defender, with all enthusiasm and sometimes even ferocity, of this current, its men, and its works. This is evident in confronting the attacks of adversaries from the enemies of this blessed school (the Jihādī current), and what I have written and lectured is the greatest proof of that, praise be to Allāh. However, I am not here in that capacity. I am here in the capacity of offering internal advice and constructive criticism of our school, our work, and our method, with the intention of discerning paths closer to soundness and correctness, according to my belief. Allāh is the granter of success, and He guides to the path.

This is what I will try to extract, according to what Allāh Almighty facilitates, in the second part of this book, if Allāh Almighty wills.

We—the Jihādī community—have criticized other non-Islamic schools of action, rejected them, and adopted a stance of refusal and hostility towards them. Then, we criticized all non-Jihādī schools of the Islamic Awakening—be they da‘wah-oriented, reformist, Muslim Brotherhood-affiliated, Salafī, or others—motivated by mutual admonition and by our right as members of the general Islamic Awakening, to prove that Jihād is the solution, or as a means of repelling malicious attacks.

Now, it is our turn to place ourselves before the mirror, review our actions and their results, hold ourselves accountable before we are held accountable, and weigh our deeds before they are weighed against us. This is before Allāh Almighty holds us accountable for negligence in reviewing and learning lessons from ourselves and others, and before generations and the Muslim nation hold us accountable, especially those who come after us, for not enlightening them about the mistakes of a bygone phase, and for not imparting to them the lessons of experiences for which we paid with pure blood.

We must weigh our actions by the scale of sincerity and correctness. As for sincerity—O Allāh, Your aid—each is according to his conscience: {Rather, man, against himself, will be a witness, Even if he presents his excuses.} (Al-Qiyāmah: 14-15).

As for correctness, it is the scale of the Book and Sunnah, then the logic of reason and the lessons of experience. Perhaps Allāh will grant us success in what He loves and is pleased with, and accept from us, then bring us closer to victory over His enemies.

Types of Errors and Gaps that Occurred During the Course and Experiences of the Jihādī Current, According to My Perception, and Allāh Almighty Knows Best:

If we imagine a man walking on a path towards a specific goal, and we find him walking and staggering, falling at times and rising at others, deviating from his goal at times and walking on the correct path at others, weakening at times and strengthening at others, and then we find him not reaching his goal in the end, our observation would lead us to identify one of three general reasons for his incapacity and poor performance:

1. Errors in the way of thinking and conceptualization of the path (intellectual flaws).
2. Errors and flaws in his physical structure and its inability to perform correctly (structural flaws).
3. Errors in the method of progression and outlining steps unsuitable for the path (methodological/operational flaws).

This is what mostly happened to the majority of Jihādī endeavors and their current over approximately the past half-century. I point out here that I am undertaking a general assessment, not addressing the experience of a specific group, organization, individuals, or a particular country's experiences. Rather, I am attempting an evaluation, considering the Jihādī current as a conceptual unit, as a school of thought and a set of experiences. I will mention the types of flaws and errors that occurred in the course of the current as a whole. It goes without saying that this does not mean that a specific organization or experience was afflicted by all these shortcomings or some of them. However, some experiences may have possessed one, three, more, or fewer of the deficiencies I will mention.

Some (Jihādīs) might imagine they were in perfect health and not afflicted by any of these ailments, but it was just bad luck, or as they often repeat, "Allāh has decreed, and what He wills, He does." Let them then praise Allāh for the perfect health they enjoyed and bask in their positive assumptions about themselves and be at ease. I am here to present errors and problems that afflicted most schools of the Jihādī current. If I were to give examples, I would start with myself and the experiences I underwent, so no one would be saddened. But I am generalizing for the sake of benefit.

Returning to our point, I reiterate that the errors and flaws in the course of the Jihādī current were of three types:

- (1) Methodological and intellectual errors.
- (2) Structural and organizational errors.
- (3) Errors in the method of operation and course of action.

Let us enumerate, detail, and explain, as much as clarity allows, those errors with which we, the workers in the Jihādī current, have been afflicted over a blessed course that spanned nearly four decades. I ask Allāh to accept from each of us what was good and to overlook what was bad, for He is the Lord of piety and the Lord of forgiveness.

First: Methodological and Intellectual Errors:

Perhaps this is one of the most important areas where flaws were generally minimal, thanks to Allāh Almighty's favor upon the mujāhidīn and the blessing of His saying: {And those who strive for Us - We will surely guide them to Our ways. And indeed, Allāh is with the doers of good.} (Al-ʿAnkabūt: 69).

I have previously presented the most important intellectual and methodological foundations of the Jihādī current and its various groups.

However, some Jihādī groups, organizations, and experiences have encountered some errors and flaws in the intellectual and methodological aspect, according to my belief, and Allāh knows best. Among the most important of these errors and methodological flaws that served as internal obstacles to the work are the following:

1. Infiltration of extremist ideas into the methodologies of some Jihādīs:

As I previously explained, the Jihādī current generally passed through two intellectual phases:

- a. The intellectual-activist phase.
- b. The Salafī-Jihādī thought phase.

I mentioned how the second phase complemented the doctrinal and jurisprudential gaps that existed in Jihādī thought, and I highlighted the positive aspects of this integration. However, I point out here that these positive aspects were sometimes accompanied by significant negativity due to misapplication by some groups or individuals in certain experiences. This led some segments of Jihādīs to incline towards levels of rigidity and extremism in their doctrinal, jurisprudential, and politico-legal discourse. It also caused some Jihādī methodological literature to contain generalizations and doctrinal rules which, coupled with factors of ignorance, zeal, and psychological pressures among some Jihādīs, became a basis for "takfīrī" ideas (ideas of declaring others infidels) that overstepped the boundaries upon which Jihādī thought was founded. I am not saying here that Jihādī thought was mixed with takfīrī thought, no. Rather, I am saying that such propositions from certain figures of the Salafī-Jihādī current, or from some prominent scholars or students of knowledge who joined it, were either severe and extremist, or were formulated in such general terms that some later Jihādīs tended to transgress and expand in declaring others infidels.

It also allowed some affiliated with the "takfīrī current" to adopt these texts as a basis and to cite their authors in their writings. This made the margin on these topics between "Jihādī thought" and "takfīrī thought" very thin, enabling adversaries—whether intelligence agencies, scholars of the sultan, or regime media—to use them as evidence to brand Jihādīs as takfīrīs. This, as I have shown, was one of the most successful methods used to strike at Jihādīs. So how did this happen?

This occurred when there was a conflation between the Salafī creed and the contemporary Salafī methodology and its methods—this methodology which the majority of the Jihādī current adopted since the late 1980s, as I mentioned, during the first phase of the Arab Afghans—and the methodology of the contemporary Salafī current, its jurisprudence, and the style of its contemporary scholars and pioneers, especially scholars from Saudi Arabia and those educated in their school. Then, what branched off from this school, which in most cases traces its origins to the heritage of the second and third generations of scholars of the Wahhābī call.

In reality, a study of the "traditional Salafī school," its doctrines, and its jurisprudence, when compared with "contemporary Salafism," its principles, and its intellectual and doctrinal schools, reveals significant differences.

The influence of contemporary Salafism and its branches has spread throughout the Arab and Muslim world. In the last two decades, it has diversified into schools, paths, and madhhabs, whose variety, jurisprudential heritage, and an opinions of their proponents often reach the point of conflict and contradiction, all within what is known as the "Salafī current."

This is a thorny, complex, and important issue. It must be studied and scrutinized, and this requires a separate book and research, which is not its place here. I am merely pointing to the influences of this contemporary Salafī current on Jihādī thought and the course of the Jihādī current, both negatively and positively.

As for the positive aspects, they were covered in previous chapters: the activist Jihādī current of the early 1980s found its solution to its jurisprudential-activist problems, as I said, in Salafī jurisprudence and Salafī creed.

As for the negative aspects, which is the subject of the current paragraph, it led to scholarly cadres from the Salafī current, who were not activist Jihādīs, joining the activist Jihādī current that had emerged from Muslim Brotherhood and Qutbist thought. It also led to the emergence of a class of students of knowledge among Jihādīs who studied under them during the first phase of the Afghan Jihād and the subsequent period of safe havens. They adopted their methodology without having the competence for research, issuing fatwas, or tackling major issues.

Because one of the greatest afflictions of the Muslim nation in this era is the aversion of firmly-grounded scholars from Jihād, from taking stances for truth, and from addressing the major politico-legal calamities facing the Muslim nation—issues of governance, loyalty and disavowal, and their application to the reality of these governments, societies, and conditions of invasion and occupation. This was reflected in the Jihādī current and phenomenon by it being a current largely devoid of senior, firmly-grounded scholars, or even moderately knowledgeable ones, except in rare cases.

Thus, a fatal phenomenon infiltrated the Jihādī current, one that originally arose within the contemporary Salafī current, which itself was based on sound doctrine and authentic jurisprudence. However, certain practical applications led to disasters that then spread to the Jihādī current. To make matters worse, Jihādīs are generally revolutionaries and zealous in defending Allāh's religion. So, their enthusiasm, and the enthusiasm of some students of knowledge among them, was added to those undisciplined foundations of the contemporary Salafī method. This opened the door to severe storms of jurisprudential chaos at times, which manifested as extremely harsh and extremist fatwas and opinions. Whether these were erroneous or correct but formulated in a generalized manner, they could be used by ignorant members of the Jihādī current or by takfīrīs as a basis for extremism, rigidity, and declaring others infidels without proper controls. This helped demolish a barrier whose existence is very important between Jihādī thought and takfīrī thought.

Re-emphasizing this barrier is one of the most important priorities for the restoration process within the Jihādī current in the upcoming phase, if Allāh wills.

2. Extremism of some later Jihādīs in sectarian adherence to their concept of "Salafism"

This problem is a derivative of the previous one. Some circles and individuals among Jihādīs, or those who later joined their arenas from previous adherents of the Salafī current, were characterized by this problem.

The foundational principle upon which the Jihādī current was established is to mobilize the Muslim nation for Jihād in the path of Allāh and to repel various types of aggressors. Although it is incumbent upon the mujāhidīn and their leadership, as they strive to adhere to the methodology of the Victorious Group in knowledge and action, that their beliefs align with those of the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him), his Companions, and those who followed them in excellence—our righteous predecessors whose creed and methodology we must emulate, and whose principles and methodology must be the basis for our own.

However, there is a very important point that most of those who claim affiliation with Salafism in this era—both Jihādī and non-Jihādī Salafīs who monopolize this banner and this noble designation—have overlooked. This point is that the reality of the Muslim nation, with its hundreds of millions, is not like the reality of the Companions and the best generations that followed, nor does it resemble the reality of most of Islamic history, let alone align with our standards as Jihādīs and Salafīs. We have been afflicted by a highly complex reality after the fall of the Caliphate and the Westernization and internal and external crises witnessed by the Arab and Islamic world.

The principle is that we, as Jihādīs, are concerned with accommodating the Muslim nation, the general populace, and directing them towards fulfilling the obligation of Jihād against various types of aggressors, both external enemies and their lackeys among the tyrannical governments. It is known that the religiously committed among this Muslim nation, the majority of its scholars, and the religious circles within the Islamic Awakening, are not predominantly Salafī in methodology, even though it is my methodology and I believe it to be doctrinally soundest.

Most of the committed Muslims and scholars of the Muslim nation (in its entirety as an Islamic Ummah) are overwhelmingly followers of jurisprudential schools (madhhabs) and not followers of Salafī jurisprudence. Many of them also do not adhere to the Salafī methodology in creed, with the majority being Ash‘arīs, particularly among scholars and students of knowledge. As for the religious common folk, they are imitators of these circles. This has been the state of Ahl al-Sunnah for over a thousand years. It is known that the contemporary non-Jihādī Salafī current has engaged in many doctrinal and jurisprudential debates and issues with these circles, reaching the level of Byzantine arguments over decades, even centuries.

There is no doubt that the problem of aggressors descending upon us and the obligation to repel them requires us to proceed according to the creed of Ahl al-Sunnah wa-l-Jamā‘ah in Jihād with Muslim rulers and common folk, be they righteous or wicked, knowledgeable or ignorant. The interest of uniting hearts and rallying all ranks for Jihād is undoubtedly and indisputably prioritized over the interest of raising most of these jurisprudential and doctrinal polemics, especially now in our current weakened state. This is from the core of the Salafī methodology that these individuals claim. The evidence for this is abundant.

However, some Jihādīs and their leading students of knowledge, or those who joined them later, dragged the Jihādī milieu into a state of conflict with those Islamic and religious circles. They imposed conditions that, by their standards, were prohibitive, becoming a real obstacle in dealing with them and calling them to Jihād. This played a major role in causing the Jihādī current to lose its popularity and become elitist. It also drew many of its segments and personalities into side battles where they applied the rules of loyalty and disavowal to many Muslims, disassociating from them instead of the Jihādī current accommodating them in a single rank, or at least in a single alliance against the various types of aggressors to repel them, or at the very least, to keep them neutral.

But many Jihādīs, due to this methodological inclination, became narrow-minded. Many of them ruined relationships and interests that could have advanced the Muslim nation more effectively towards fulfilling the obligation of Jihād. This was due to not considering the reality and the jurisprudence of priorities, benefits, and harms in their activism, which was characterized by much rigidity with texts and their application out of context.

I recall engaging in many debates and discussions with some Jihādīs, including leaders and grassroots members, emphasizing the necessity of combining our Salafī-Jihādī identity and adherence to the methodology of the righteous predecessors with the need to be gentle with Muslims and engage in Jihād with them. We should call them to Jihād with us, accommodating their existing jurisprudential and doctrinal schools, which ultimately fall within the circle of Ahl al-Sunnah wa-l-Jamā'ah. But unfortunately, I often discovered that we were on one path and these brothers were on another. Indeed, in these areas, I heard accusations, disparagements, and strange ideas, and I faced hardship.

Whoever reads the writings of Sheikh Abdullah Azzam will find much about his suffering from this problem and its proponents, as they created crises with the Afghans due to issues of madhhab and creed, even with the common people.

One of the strange things I recall in this context is that one of these very Salafī Jihādīs once said to me during a discussion: "Jihād must be under a Salafī banner, its leadership must be Salafī in composition, its rulings Salafī in methodology, and everything must be based on evidence. If we accept non-Salafis to fight with us, it is out of necessity, but they can have no share in leadership; rather, we lead them like cattle to perform the obligation of Jihād!"

I could not truly understand how we would engage in Jihād with brothers in religion and creed if our relationship with them was like that with cattle, based on pulling from one side and kicking and butting from the other!

Unfortunately, this phenomenon was not confined to narrow circles. Some Jihādīs even refused to work with us one day on a Jihādī project because I was responsible for it, saying, "How can we engage in Jihād with a man who does not raise his hands during rukū' (bowing) and prays according to innovation!" I do not know who told them that someone who does not raise his hands, based on evidence he possesses, is an innovator! Not to mention that all that was happening was that I was following the fatwa of scholars who permitted accommodating the local people in their madhhab to win their hearts, as stated by Imām Ibn 'Abd al-Barr and others. I would not raise my hands during rukū' and when rising from it when praying with the Afghans, who are known to be Ḥanafīs, most of them fanatical and ignorant. We and they were in great harmony and engaged in a binding defensive Jihād. Senior Arab mujāhidīn leaders like the martyr Abdullah Azzam (may Allāh have mercy on him) and Sheikh Osama (may Allāh preserve him) requested this and urged the mujāhidīn to do so, and they faced much hardship in this regard. These are examples to clarify the point; otherwise, the examples are numerous.

How often were prominent Imāms subjected to criticism in those circles if they engaged in some form of allegorical interpretation (ta'wīl) or other such matters, like the great Imāms of Ahl al-Sunnah such as Ibn Ḥajar, al-Nawawī, and others. How often was the sanctity of the four madhhabs and some of their Imāms violated, especially the esteemed Imām Abū Ḥanīfah (may Allāh have mercy on him) and others, under the pretext of championing the Salafī methodology and creed. Although in my own belief I follow the Salafī methodology without fanaticism or narrowness, and I was known for this, many of our brothers would become impatient even with that.

It is known that these problems are issues of the Salafī current and not of the Jihādī current, but they spread to it. One senior Arab-Afghan mujāhid, who was very Salafī and formerly a Surūrī, even rebuked me because I said "may Allāh have mercy on him" after mentioning Imām al-Nawawī. He said, "Do not say 'may Allāh have mercy on him.'" I asked, "What should I say?" He replied, "Say 'may Allāh forgive him,' for he was not upon the Sunnah!"

Once, after one of my lectures, some of these mujāhidīn, some of whom were leaders in their groups, reproached me because I mentioned Imām Ḥasan al-Bannā, Sheikh Saʿīd Ḥawwā, and Sheikh ʿAbd al-Fattāḥ Abū Ghuddah, saying "may Allāh have mercy on them," even though they knew my criticisms of the Muslim Brotherhood's methodology. They asked, "Why do you ask for mercy for innovators?" I replied that the madhhab of Ahl al-Sunnah is to ask for mercy for any Muslim who has died and whose outward appearance was that of a Muslim. One of the senior brothers (may Allāh preserve him) responded, "Imām Sufyān did not believe in asking for mercy for one who died upon innovation!" I told him, "May Allāh have mercy on him; other Imāms of the Salaf held a different view. One must consider the innovation, its type, its level, evidence of the mistaken person's good intentions, and the context of mentioning mercy." But there was no benefit from the discussion, which, if prolonged, would have led to me being registered with them as an innovator, or even as a defender of innovations! And to Allāh belongs the command.

It was one of the simplest things for one of them to end the discussion by saying: "I have conveyed to you the requirement of the call to Tawhīd! I believe in such-and-such before Allāh and I reject such-and-such."

How many relationships were severed, and how many disputes arose between these individuals and many mujāhidīn, let alone other Muslims, because of this approach. This was one of the greatest ailments that afflicted the Jihādī methodology due to the influence of the negative aspects of the Salafī current.

I repeat my earlier statement that the immense benefits the Jihādī current intellectually reaped from the Salafī methodology are too numerous to count. However, this was not without negative side effects, some of which have been mentioned. I truly could not imagine how these individuals, who could not even reach an understanding with other Jihādīs and Islamists, could lead a resistance that must be popular, with all that the word "popular" entails in terms of diversity and differing inclinations.

3. One-dimensionality of the Jihādī discourse, its lack of comprehensiveness, its restriction to issues of loyalty and disavowal (al-walā' wa-l-barā') and sovereignty (ḥākimiyyah), and the narrow scope of the Jihādī current's library and literary output:

Compared to the general schools of the contemporary Islamic Awakening and considering their comprehensive libraries, we find that the Jihādī library—the sum of its methodologies, books, and literature, even including internal bulletins of various groups and organizations, periodic statements, or other materials—is small in quantity and one-dimensional in its content. The books are few, and the publications are limited. The volume of this output does not correspond to the magnitude of their contributions and performance, the enormity of their sacrifices, and the abundance of their experiences. Much could have been written about their history, lessons, analyses, parables, eyewitness accounts, and biographies of men and martyrs. But unfortunately, the output is very meager and almost non-existent in many movements. If we look at the type of content, we find it restricted to issues of ḥākimiyyah, the principles of al-walā' wa-l-barā', and creeds. Creativity within it is scarce, mostly consisting of repetition and reiteration, and largely relying on quotations and restatements of the jurisprudence of Imam Ibn Taymiyyah, some imams of the Salafī school, and the heritage of the scholars of the Wahhābī call, may Allāh Almighty have mercy on them.

Although contemporary issues are numerous, politico-legal and practical political fields are vast, and the need for writing in them is great—as well as in areas of jurisprudence, contemporary Jihād rulings, and related sciences like political science, administration, education, general culture necessary for a mujāhid, discussing present and future issues of the Muslim nation, and engaging with new developments and topics of dialogue in the Arab and Islamic reality—the Jihādī current in general was characterized by a scarcity of writers. Qualified leaders, symbols, and those capable of writing were preoccupied with fieldwork. Security pursuits and unstable conditions prevented them from contributing in this field. Therefore, the Jihādī library was limited either to military books and training and operational manuals, or to what I referred to regarding issues of ḥākimiyyah and matters of al-walā' wa-l-barā'.

4. Weakness of educational material in the curricula of the Jihādī current:

The field of educating the grassroots of the Jihādī current is one of the largest areas that suffered from deficiency and a decline in standards, especially after the 1990s. Since the security pursuits began, people were preoccupied with the onslaught of fear and hunger; they were afflicted by hardship, adversity, and loss of wealth and lives; and they were tossed about by migrations and refuges to the four corners of the earth.

Unlike the first and second generations of Jihādīs, who managed, before those confrontations, to achieve a reasonable level of education for their initial cadres between approximately 1965 and 1985, circumstances did not allow Jihādīs after that to implement comprehensive educational programs except on a limited scale. It is also noticeable that the Jihādī current's reliance in education was not on a contemporary library and curricula they developed according to their current needs, but rather on classical heritage texts or on some books from other Islamic Awakening schools, which often contain material contradicting the Jihādī perspective on many issues.

After 1985, Jihādī circles—camps, gatherings, and places of activity—were dominated by educational curricula with two dimensions, as I mentioned. Either military, limited to military subjects and combat training courses, or some materials on issues of ḥākimiyyah, al-walā’ wa-l-barā’, creed, and the Salafī methodology. During the second phase of the Arab Afghans under the Taliban, I observed that the third generation of Jihādīs was increasingly characterized by ignorance and a lack of educational grounding in most of its segments. Many Jihādīs in this phase (1996-2001) showed little interest in it, despite the availability of means, camps, safe havens—indeed, very comfortable ones under the Taliban compared to the refuges of diaspora and the phase of pursuit. However, most people were active in and keen on military subjects, and did not give other educational aspects the importance they deserved. Therefore, this was reflected in that phase by many internal problems and crises, which I believe were due to the decline in levels of behavior and general ethics.

The influx of many young men from the ordinary Muslim masses, filled with emotions, enthusiasm, and sincerity, but with low levels of Sharī‘ah knowledge, religious commitment, principles of Islamic ethics and dealings, and even levels of worship, contributed to this. Many Jihādī circles were characterized by a very shallow level of qualifications in these areas. Psychological pressures, the effects of security pursuits, the general problems of Arabs and Muslims, internal problems within Islamic Awakening circles, the opposition of its leaders to Jihādīs, and the immersion of most of them in the bandwagon of sultan's scholars and tyrannical regimes' apparatuses all played a part.

All this led many Jihādī circles, in the absence of an educational methodology, to be characterized by harshness, aloofness, lack of mercy, and the absence of the exemplary figures often described in books on spiritual refinement (raqā’iq) and stories of righteous predecessors and successors in areas of worship, asceticism, good character, gentleness towards Muslims, excusing them, showing them mercy, and guiding them.

Many atmospheres were tense, and numerous Jihādīs exhibited behavior closer to a neurotic state than to the conduct expected of a qualified mujāhid, educated in knowledge, character, worship, and behavior.

This was a reflection of the weakness of the educational methodology in terms of material and application. Allāh is sufficient for us, and He is the best disposer of affairs.

Thus, I used to observe that many Jihādīs had reduced Islām, its beliefs, and its rituals to the obligation of Jihād, thinking it was the entirety of religion. They reduced Jihād—with its rulings, etiquettes, behaviors, and characteristics required by its status as the pinnacle of Islām—to mere fighting. And they reduced fighting—with the patience, perseverance, preparation, and ethics it demands—to merely witnessing battles. Even during the witnessing of battles, one would notice a lack of patience, perseverance, and endurance of long garrison duty. They had reduced the concept of fighting to simply firing weapons.

I, along with many veteran brothers, noticed that the atmosphere within Jihādī circles in the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries began to indicate an impending trial and tribulation that would descend to restore those sincere, good souls to their purity, their need for their Lord, and the ethics and educational components of their religion. This is what came with the events of September and their subsequent repercussions.

{But perhaps you hate a thing and it is good for you; and perhaps you love a thing and it is bad for you. And Allāh Knows, while you know not.} (Al-Baqarah: 216).

5. Absence of the impact of understanding contemporary realities (fiqh al-wāqi‘) in the politico-legal methodology of many Jihādīs:

This, in my view, was caused by the weakness or absence of educational materials and studies that would aid in this understanding. Consequently, there was an imbalance in determining who is with us and who is against us, and confusion between the circles of enemies, neutrals, and supporters, as well as their rights and how to deal with them.

During the last decade of the twentieth century, the realities in the Arab and Muslim world, and indeed the entire world, became complex in all their political, economic, social, and cultural dimensions. All fields of human activity in these worlds witnessed enormous complexity, development, and diversification.

Societies in the Arab and Muslim world are, unfortunately, generally lagging in keeping pace with levels of civilizational knowledge, to a regrettable extent.

The Islamic Awakening in general, being a phenomenon emerging from that reality, was characterized by many influences of that general backwardness and a lack of awareness of the era it was in. While Islamic parties and groups from the school of political Islamic Awakening, along with many of their leaders and cadres, advanced in fields of knowledge and understanding of reality due to political awareness and practice, the remaining schools of the Islamic Awakening—the da‘wah-oriented, reformist, and what is termed Salafī, as well as the Jihādī school—were characterized by a low level of knowledge, civilizational awareness, and understanding of reality. The non-political schools were so due to their isolation from living reality, and the Jihādī current because the majority of its members were young people who, due to their youth in most cases and difficult security conditions, did not get their share of civilizational knowledge and understanding of reality, except in rare cases within some groups, cadres, and personalities.

Considering that today's battle is managed not only in the military and security fields, where Jihādīs and Islamists in general can perform well, but also in the fields of politics, media, and economics, and even in military and security confrontations, the level of knowledge and science has become crucial. Therefore, the low general level among the majority of Jihādīs in understanding contemporary realities with all its data and dimensions was reflected in their methodologies, literature, media, the content and style of their discourse, and its delivery. This resulted in an imbalance in priorities, understanding of realities, and confusion between what general texts require and what reality necessitates. There was also confusion in classifying segments of people—who is with us and who is against us—and disarray in determining battle priorities.

Given the weakness of the institutional structure in the Jihādī current generally, the narrow scope for consultation and utilization of cadres, and the preference of many amīrs for yes-men, this ignorance combined with that flaw to produce a tragic result manifested in a weak level of battle management, failure in determining methods of confrontation, and poor alignment between intellectual methodology and military, political, and media action. The impact of reality was absent in issuing rulings and making political, military, and fateful decisions. It is well-known that the validity of a fatwa depends on two necessary pillars: knowledge of the Sharīʿah and understanding of reality. Assuming the existence of correct Sharīʿah understanding in many cases, the absence of understanding reality led to decisions closer to being crippled than being described as on a straight path.

6. Failure to adopt the concept of Jihād against the external aggressor and entering the vortex of confronting regimes:

This was initially triggered by the provocations of the regimes. Then, a methodological principle was adopted as a result of a literal understanding of Allāh Almighty's saying: {O you who have believed, fight those adjacent to you of the disbelievers} (At-Tawbah: 123), and applying it to the ruling apostate regimes. This led to entering conflicts whose nature and course were determined by the enemy, resulting in losses drawn from the Muslim nation's reserves without tangible benefit or desired outcome.

The Jihādī current originally emerged due to the crisis of confrontation with the pre-Islamic ignorance (Jāhiliyyah) weighing upon the chests of Muslims, represented by apostate ruling systems. The matter evolved, as we explained, from abstract Jihādī thought to practical application.

Jihādī organizations were established and clashed in many arenas with those ruling systems. This trend was supported by Sharīʿah ruling and an existing reality. The existing reality was that the hardship and punishment inflicted upon Muslims in general, Islamists in particular, and Jihādīs specifically, came from the ruling regimes and their security apparatuses, which rationally and logically necessitated confrontation. Likewise, the Sharīʿah ruling and the command for Jihād are derived from many texts, including the saying of Allāh Almighty:

{O you who have believed, fight those adjacent to you of the disbelievers}. Based on this jurisprudence and this reality, Jihād organizations operated for nearly thirty years (1960-1990).

However, with the rise of globalization in everything alongside the launch of the New World Order, the evolving level of external invasion, the strong alliance between global and local apostate ruling infidel powers and international forces, and the hypocritical forces linked to them, and with the development of confrontation arenas and methods of pursuing Jihādīs from local to regional to global levels, Jihādīs should have realized this and developed their methodologies and operational style, and not remained stuck in vicious circles drawn by international Jewish-Crusader powers and their allies, leading to a futile war of attrition. But the rigidity of methodologies and understanding within most of the Jihādī current did not permit the shift necessary to give the jurisprudence of confronting aggression its due consideration. The basis remained the command to fight those disbelievers nearest to them, as if this meant the nearest security officer or the nearest apostate government in the Jihādīs' area of operation. This involved a narrowness of perspective, whether in understanding the interpretation of the text or in understanding the operational Sunnah that clarifies it, derived from the Prophet's (peace and blessings be upon him) wars and his heading to fight the Romans while disbelievers closer to him were around. There was also ignorance of explicit statements by scholars about the non-binding nature of this command in its literal sense. This methodological rigidity was reflected in the resistance of most Jihādīs to moving towards global Jihād and globalizing the confrontation when it was proposed by a limited segment of Jihādīs in the late twentieth century.

7. Inability to define the Shari‘ah-based and operational content of several fundamental concepts:

The contemporary Jihādī project introduced a number of fundamental terms and designations upon which the organizational structure and operational conduct of Jihādī groups were based. However, these created problems that Jihādīs could not resolve and clarify, including:

The Jihādī Group: What is it? What is its definition? What is the nature of its relationship with surrounding groups? What is the legitimacy of the multiplicity of such Jihādī and non-Jihādī groups? What is the extent of its powers and scope in relation to the general Muslim community? What are the justifications and legitimacy for its existence?

Emirate, Consultation (Shūrā), and Decisions: What are the limits of the amīr's authority in his relations with the grassroots, leadership, and institutions of the group? Consequently, what is the method of decision-making in the group? What is the nature and bindingness of shūrā? Is it a private or public emirate?

Pledge of Allegiance (Bay‘ah), Hearing, and Obedience: What is the nature of this bay‘ah? What is the content of its contract? Consequently, what are the mutual rights and duties between the amīr and the individual, or between the individual and the group? How is it dissolved? Based on what?

What are the consequences of breaking it? When is it legitimate and when is it forbidden? And so on, for these issues that were not precisely defined in the Jihādī current and differed from one organization to another. While most Jihādīs in their methodologies considered their group to be one of the Muslim groups and an emirate of Jihād, and that the bay‘ah was limited to those duties, the reality was that some of these groups practically behaved as if they were the Muslim community in their country. Some senior figures in the Jihādī current declared their group to be the sole legitimate group in a particular country, and consequently resisted, by various means, the emergence of other groups or the continued existence of previous ones. Some even went as far as seeking fatwas permitting the Jihādī group to unify the ranks of Jihād by force and violence to eliminate other groups! Some deviants were found who issued such fatwas, among those students of knowledge who joined the Jihādī current and took leading roles in issuing fatwas due to the absence of scholars. Some groups also established prisons, punishments, and organizational courts without defining these limits and powers, which created real problems within the organizations. Secrecy and security conditions added an abnormal situation that complicated these matters.

I asked some students of knowledge from the Jihādī current (may Allāh preserve him) about the legitimacy of an individual leaving a group if the path did not suit him or if he saw its futility after joining. He told me it is not permissible unless he sees clear disbelief (kufr bawāḥ) for which he has proof from Allāh!

Consequently, he extended the rights of the supreme Imām to the amīr of the group! When I asked him what if one sees clear futility, clear chaos, or clear bankruptcy, and becomes certain that what he sought by joining that particular group will not achieve his goals? Should he continue like this for his entire life? Is it not permissible for him to switch to another group or strive to form a new one? The man was at a loss for an answer when he considered the dimensions of the problem.

If the group can expel a member from it, why does he not have the right to separate himself and withdraw? And how, in this case, do we resolve the issue of the secrets he possesses? And so on for these issues.

There were real problems in codifying this and issuing fatwas on it, and in operating on undefined bases.

These are problems not present in the general Muslim community in its natural form. The Commander of the Faithful cannot expel a Muslim from the Muslim community, even if he does not pledge allegiance to him, unless he rebels against him. Nor can an individual member of the Muslim nation withdraw from it. Nor do the rights and duties incumbent upon him by virtue of his general pledge of allegiance and obedience to the Commander of the Faithful equate to those incumbent upon a member of a specific Jihādī or other group.

The problem of the absence of the supreme Imāmate and the demise of the political structure of the Muslim nation opened up many issues. When groups arose to solve this problem and were forced into secrecy due to the regimes' brutality, other insoluble problems emerged. This was one of the manifestations of the Muslim nation's predicament due to the absence of Dār al-Islām, the Imāmate, the Sharīʿah, and their consequences. These problems were some manifestations of the flaws and inadequacy of the proposed methodologies, not only in the Jihādī current but at the level of all Islamic Awakening organizations.

Secondly: Errors and Flaws in the Organizational Structure and Frameworks of the Jihādī Current:

The second type of errors and ailments that appeared in the operational methods of the Jihādī current are flaws and shortcomings in organizational structures and the nature of frameworks. This produced problems, chief among them the major issue whose dimensions became apparent in the last decade of the twentieth century after the launch of the global campaign against terrorism. Reality proved the impossibility of continuing Jihādī work with the existence of this structural problem, which is that all Jihādī organizations and groups built their structures on the basis that they were (secret - hierarchical - country-specific) organizations.

1. Problems Arising from Secrecy:

Choosing clandestine methods was an obligatory and logical response to tyrannical, oppressive, and unjust powers whose pharaohs and their aides showed no regard for pacts or kinship with believers. I am not here to criticize the principle of secrecy in Islamic work; it is a Sharī'ah principle with its evidence and historical precedents, starting from the Prophetic biography and passing through many experiences throughout Islamic history. Nor am I objecting to it operationally, because it was a compulsory method we practiced during a period of necessity, as is well known. However, I am here to mention the major problems that arose from it due to the nature of things and the shift in the levels of security confrontation to a point where apostate regimes and the global infidel powers behind them became so savage that these problems made continuing with that method a form of insistence on futile failure in the end. These savage methods led to Jihādī groups becoming deeply immersed in secrecy. This generated problems for them in education and preparation, in recruitment and expansion, in the weakness of public outreach and broadening their audience, and in the limited scope of activity for production and contribution.

It is known from the history of the call to Islām since its advent and throughout Muslim history that the methodology of education was primarily based on the relationship between the educator and the followers, which relies on direct contact. This is the primary means of transmitting knowledge and learning, explaining the methodology, presenting an example, demeanor, and behavior, and conveying various areas of influence. Thus was the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) to the Companions, the Companions to the Tābi'īn (Successors), and these to their followers among the scholars and inheritors of the prophets, and then these to their students and their public, down to the common people.

However, clandestine operational methods do not permit this. So, how is cultivation to occur? And if cultivation becomes impossible, how can the work continue with cadres who have not been trained according to the methodology or preparation programs? Clandestine cells rely on the leader of a given cell meeting with his followers to prepare them in the various necessary areas of religious, intellectual, methodological, and political knowledge, as well as military and security training, and so on. This meeting is periodic, often weekly, but becomes less frequent with heightened security tensions, sometimes ceasing altogether. Thus, the initial vanguards of Jihād were prepared to a high standard because they were developed before the phase of covert operations, in mosques or in public or semi-public Islamic groups. Their Jihādī performance was consequently high, commensurate with the levels of cultivation these cadres had received.

However, with the attrition of the first and subsequent generations of cadres – as the path of Jihād consumes its personnel through martyrdom, detention, and emigration from the arena – unqualified cadres and cells join the ranks. These are often from the common people and a younger generation that has typically not been previously cultivated within an Islamic movement. This is especially so since Islamic movements from other schools of thought often immunize their members against joining Jihādī work, because their own leaderships have not entered it.

This tragedy has recurred in all Jihādī experiences. Cadres were quickly depleted, and organizations were forced to rely on new, unqualified personnel, particularly some who proved courageous and effective in combat on the ground. Thus, the group loses its standard and then its identity due to the discontinuation of the cultivation project. This problem and its catastrophic results are sufficient affliction to prove the futility of the entire method. Unfortunately, this was not the only problem.

Security pressures and enforced secrecy also impose conditions that do not allow for widespread recruitment. Most Jihādī groups built themselves and their entities before the confrontation and the outbreak of battle. They formed their structures and recruited most of their members. Then, the confrontation usually began before preparations were complete, either due to intelligence agencies discovering the initial stages of preparation, or due to situations exploding as crises worsened. The Jihādī organization finds itself compelled either to enter the battle and continue preparation and building amidst it, or to be liquidated by security campaigns without resistance. So, they enter the battle. With this entry, the consumption of cadres and members begins. The organization needs recruitment, and recruitment requires propaganda, mobilization, and a popular base. It also needs, to be effective, to monitor potential recruits and study their eligibility and circumstances. However, secrecy and security problems do not permit this, so recruitment weakens, and numbers dwindle. After being fragmented, the organization transforms into disjointed, gang-like cells, gradually consumed by the battle, unless the organization succeeds in developing guerrilla warfare, moving it from one stage to another until recruitment expands. Yet, what happened in all previous experiences, without exception, was that the preparation of Jihādī cadres and members was limited. It did not expand due to many reasons, the most important being the security challenge and the method of secrecy.

For example, the number of active mujāhidīn in Syria, the longest attempt (around ten years), did not exceed 1,500 at its peak, not including local supporters. This was in a country with a population of approximately 12 million at the time. In Egypt, the Jihād Organization did not exceed 2,000 members, and the Islamic Group perhaps had double that number of active members, excluding general mosque attendees. This was from a nation that numbered over 60 million people. In Libya, the number of mujāhidīn did not surpass a modest figure from a population that was itself limited, not reaching 4 million. In some countries, like Tunisia, the number did not exceed the dozens, and so on.

As for weak propaganda, a shrinking popular base, and the consequent poor mobilization due to secrecy, this requires little explanation, as clandestine methods do not provide what is necessary for mobilization, which fundamentally relies on connecting with the masses through public means.

2. Problems Arising from Hierarchical Structure and Security Issues

All political and Jihādī Islamic organizations, and similar groups, were built using a hierarchical method. Often, the call begins with a few individuals who define the foundations of their methodology, their objectives, and their program of action. They pledge allegiance to one among them as their leader (emir), forming the initial core of his leadership and consultative council. Thus, the top of the pyramid begins. Recruitment and mobilization operations continue, with each of these individuals becoming responsible for a department, cell, or group, and the system perpetuates. From this collective, what is known as the organizational pyramid is formed.

This method of movement construction possesses strength in terms of control and command, as orders are issued, programs are decided, and they descend from top to bottom. The method is then followed to some extent, and reports, advice, proposals, and so on, return in the opposite direction with flexibility and speed.

However, such a structure is characterized by security weaknesses and a lack of resilience against intelligence and security confrontations. This is especially true after security agencies and tyrannical governments, followed by the disbelieving forces warring against the Jihādī phenomenon, demonstrated their readiness for all forms of brutality, physical and psychological torture, and even the use of drugs and medications to extract information. Consequently, most detainees did not hold back from confessing most or all of the information they possessed, or even adding to it to satisfy the ravenous wolves among the torturers, eager to extract every shred of information from the depths of the detainee's memory, even from under his fingernails if necessary, or by flaying his skin if that did not suffice.

Thus, in every experience, a few hours were often sufficient to extract a quantity of information that was quickly disseminated to security agencies, widening the circle of arrests. This cycle was repeated again and again, so that security campaigns encompassed the greater part of the clandestine organization within short periods.

The organizational pyramid thus became like an inflated plastic bag containing liquid; puncturing it from any side would lead to its contents emptying, sooner or later. Jihādī organizations that engaged in confrontations attempted to develop their operational methods with something called a linear or cluster structure, where operatives work in separate clusters of cells. However, collectively, these are forced to transform into a collection of organizational pyramids, re-establishing the features of the main pyramid through communication channels.

The problem was not resolved within a single country. This, especially where most countries did not offer rugged geographical terrain allowing organizational leaderships to secure themselves to manage their operations, led to further issues. Even when such terrain was available, they were forced to communicate with active cells that also operated using the same method. Then, Jihādī organizations, like all gangs and secret groups, were compelled to have their leaderships migrate to safe havens in neighboring countries. These havens, by virtue of the old margin of regional conflicts between states, provided them a secure refuge from which they managed their affairs. However, security cooperation, as we previously explained, and its transition from the regional to the international sphere, narrowed and then eliminated these havens. The hierarchical problem remained unsolved amidst operations of brutality, torture, kidnapping, and rendition. This, combined with other factors, led to the erosion of organizations, ultimately providing all the elements for decline and disintegration.

3. The Problem of Regionalism

Most, if not all, Jihādī organizations and groups forming the Jihādī current that operated during the latter half of the last century were regional in their field of operation and their movement's objectives. This was a result of the prevailing political, social, and practical circumstances before globalization permeated all aspects of human activity, including Jihādī groups themselves.

Few were those countries that possessed a vast area, aided by geographical ruggedness and diversity, in addition to a large population and expansive borders and access points, such that they had the various factors to create the conditions for a Jihādī guerrilla war that could progress through stages to success. The Western colonial partition plans, enacted during what can be considered a new wave of Crusades, fragmented the Islamic and Arab world into entities, most of which were small, incapable, and lacking geographical, human, or economic prerequisites.

However, Jihādī organizations planned their work within the confines of confronting their own particular tyrannical regime, within the context established by Sykes-Picot at the beginning of the twentieth century. Thus, most Jihādī organizations found themselves facing realities that did not, in fact, allow for the success of a revolution or the launch of comprehensive guerrilla warfare in most countries. What can a Jihādī organization achieve at the level of Bahrain, Qatar, Tunisia, Jordan, Syria, or Libya, given these regional constraints? Even large countries like Egypt and Saudi Arabia were not provided by their national circumstances with sufficient factors for the success of clandestine confrontations by hierarchical organizations within their borders. The final outcome, resulting from the confluence of these reasons, was commensurate with these realities. All such attempts, without exception, were liquidated over 40 years and through dozens of experiences.

Following these three fundamental problems of structure and framework, there were other structural issues, the most important of which include:

4. The Problem of Non-Field Leadership

As mentioned, the main leaderships of the organizations, the emir and his senior aides, were forced to leave their countries and emigrate under the pressure of security campaigns. They settled in nearby or distant havens, far from the sites of their cause, and dealt with it through messengers or external communications: couriers, telephones, fax machines. This method created vulnerabilities for the organizations and points of penetration for intelligence agencies.

This automatically created active military field commanders, while the external leaderships transformed into political and media leaderships. This reality quickly generated countless problems. I personally witnessed a number of experiences where this issue was at the forefront of what contributed to the ruin of Jihādī causes. The "Jihādī Revolution in Syria," which I experienced from within, was a model of this problem. The political leadership of the Muslim Brotherhood settled in Baghdad, Amman, and neighboring areas of Syria. They began to lay down plans and programs for a political, military, and security reality inside Syria about which they knew very little. Soon, conditions changed, their knowledge of developments diminished, and they began to draw up plans in a vacuum. The field commanders found themselves forced to act and maneuver, but they were constrained by two strong tethers: the pledge of allegiance and the duty to hear and obey the leadership abroad, and the desperate need for the funds sent along with the orders.

I also witnessed a number of Jihādī causes through my interaction with their members and leaders in several Arab countries, and I found they had the same problem. Those leaderships should have transformed into popular symbols that move the masses and political-media leaders, leaving military action and field decisions to the field commanders. However, they clung to the details of decisions and did not trust young field commanders. In some cases, they were right to do so, but this did not eliminate problems that found no solution and were, by the nature of things, inherent to organizations operating with such methods in such circumstances.

5. The Problem of Funding

Jihādī organizations were limited in number, elitist, and not mass-based in most, if not all, cases. Consequently, their bases or popular support did not provide them with sufficient financial resources. They were forced to resort to external sources, which created significant problems. Ultimately, these resources, from entities not intrinsically committed to these causes, could not meet the needs that ballooned with the launch of operations and the escalating costs of military and security expenses, as well as the needs of the families of martyrs, the pursued, and prisoners, and so forth.

Jihādī organizations relied either on the support of political groups and organizations that were forced into confrontation due to regimes expanding the circle of conflict out of their own stupidity and tyranny (as happened in Syria), or on exploiting a revolution in which young men would die and mujāhidīn would be martyred, and which would require ready-made leaderships to assume power, according to dreams of the collapse of those regimes that ultimately did not collapse.

Alternatively, Jihādī organizations relied on the support of some Islamic groups from other countries or some philanthropic individuals who supported Jihād, usually in countries other than their own. This was the case for most benefactors of Jihādī groups from the primary source for most of these movements: the Gulf Cooperation Council states, especially Saudi Arabia and Kuwait.

Or, they found themselves forced to accept aid from some governments and regimes with their own special agendas for providing such support.

I do not wish to elaborate on the many problems caused by this situation and by Jihādī groups operating under the banner of "Charity for the sake of Allāh."

However, the outcome was that programs to dry up funding sources, and the irregularity of those sources even before these programs were implemented, led the organizations, whose expenses had expanded, to practical bankruptcy. This was one of the primary reasons for failure.

6. The Problem of Consultation (Shūrā), the Absence of Institutionalization, and the Impossibility of Establishing It Amidst Security Challenges

The issue of consultation (shūrā) and the method of decision-making was one of the biggest problems that accompanied the work in most Jihādī organizations. It often led to splits and divisions within organizations and the spread of the phenomenon I have termed "amoebic organizations," which divide and divide, and soon divide again.

Most Jihādī organizations adopted the principle of non-binding consultation, where the emir is authorized to choose what he deems appropriate after reviewing the opinions of his leaders and aides. A few adopted the principle of binding consultation, where the emir is obliged to accept the opinion of the majority of the leadership or consultative council on a given matter. This is a matter whose explanation and delineation of the pros and cons of each method would be lengthy, and this is not the place for expansion and detail. Some Jihādī organizations addressed these issues by making consultation of two types: binding for general and important strategic decisions, and non-binding for the tactics of implementing those strategies. However, all these classifications and administrative efforts, amidst security storms and the dispersal of Jihādī organization leaderships – either in hideouts within their countries or in various havens in neighboring countries, openly or secretly – meant that everyone eventually went into hiding and moved frequently, making it impossible to practice any form of consultation. The general emir and sub-emirs issued whatever necessary orders were feasible, relying on Allāh in extremely tragic circumstances. Institutions and administrations collapsed and devolved to a few officials responsible for subsidiary matters, acting according to the exigencies of de facto necessities. Work was forcibly reduced to day-to-day management on all levels.

7. The Problem of Weak Internal Security in the Jihādī Current

The principle of operating in clandestine organizations that take the form of gangs using security-conscious methods is a principle and operational model foreign to Arab and Islamic societies. Due to their historical and social components, these societies have operated in ways entirely contrary to the principles of this method, to which we were compelled by repression. Arab and Islamic societies are open societies. Cultivation within them relies on contact with the public, and mobilization relies on oratory, public proclamation of the call, and influencing people. News circulates in our societies through a system of rumor; the love of spreading news is an old social heritage. Public confrontations, duels, encounters, and displays of heroism are likewise historical and cultural legacies. Wasted time, freedom of movement, and a Bedouin culture of spontaneity still characterize our societies despite industrial and urban transformations.

Thus, the methods of concealment, gangs, and secrecy; the modus operandi of mafias; precise appointments and brief meetings; strict, concise orders; and literal execution without expansive independent judgment; punishment for mistakes, even the elimination of troublemakers in the operational system of gangs – all these are methods that did not find acceptance in our societies. Organizations were unable to prepare more than a very limited number of cadres within their structure to perform according to these methods. General social characteristics and inherited flaws imprinted themselves on the work of these organizations and led to disasters due to the lack of harmony with this approach.

At the forefront of these problems was the lack of security awareness and the impossibility of elevating most active elements and grassroots members to the necessities of this method. I observed that most of the heroic mujāhidīn, many of whom I knew, and whose splendid performance I witnessed in open field confrontations and on fronts in Afghanistan, were among the least effective performers when entrusted with clandestine tasks or forced into security-conscious movement after becoming fugitives.

Rumor-mongering, narrating secrets, excessive chatter, imprecision in movement, and disrespect for the security of various communications – movement, telephones, faxes, and later the internet, and so on – were incurable diseases that could not be resolved and destroyed many cells throughout various experiences. I almost became certain that this method does not suit our people, and that we must find for them a method that unleashes their energies according to their capabilities and temperaments, without requiring methods that I have seen few able to work with and adopt.

Thirdly: Mistakes in Operational Methods and Confrontation Management

In mentioning these mistakes, I will rely on enumeration for brevity and because they are clear and do not require much explanation or detail, and Allāh, the Exalted, knows best. Among them are:

1. Inability to develop operational strategies due to the unavailability of the necessary data, for reasons either external or internal, leading to work devolving into a series of daily routines and sometimes haphazard decisions.
2. Opening side battles with segments of the Islamic Awakening schools, unnecessarily embroiling various sectors of the populace and its political or social components. These side battles included doctrinal, creedal, and political problems, and a failure to maintain a unified direction of the battle against the primary enemy, represented by tyrannical governments and their allied external aggressors.
3. Becoming entangled in long-term confrontations with government security agencies, which turned into a war of attrition where both the killer and the killed, the rightful and the wrongful, the just and the unjust, were drawn from the nation's reserves. Governments had no difficulty in throwing the sons of the people from the security and army forces – most of whom were either ignorant or coerced – into this endless battle. Meanwhile, the forces and interests of the external aggressor remained unharmed, indifferent to these battles consuming our sons for long years. Thus, the game was played on fields defined by the greater enemy, using methods he designed, and in which he achieved his objectives. The Jihādīs exhausted their strength in it to no avail.
4. Failure, in most cases, to identify keys to the conflict and slogans for confrontation around which people could be mobilized against the governments faced by the Jihādīs. The issue was confined to the details of God's sovereignty (ḥākimiyyah) and its slogans. This was a losing battle due to the difficulty of the content being presented, the opposition from scholars of the authorities, and their success in undermining its fundamental basis, which is proving the disbelief of the ruler and the obligation to rebel against them. They managed to prove to the populations the rulers' Islām and the obligation to obey them, and that we were a group of Kharijites, dogs of Hellfire, corrupters on earth, and criminal rebels. The Jihādīs were generally unable to raise banners highlighting popular, easily understandable keys to the conflict that would arouse public support. There were very important issues around which the populations could have been mobilized to support the Jihādīs, such as problems of hunger and injustice, squandered dignity, the occupation of holy sites, colonial plunder, and political and economic occupation. These and other slogans were skillfully exploited by nationalists, pan-Arabists, leftists, and even some schools of the political Awakening, turning them into popular currents. All these are fundamentally legitimate issues from a Sharīʿah perspective and can be presented in an Islamic and Jihādī manner. However, the Jihādīs, especially after the intermingling of intellectual data from the so-called Salafī current into their methodology, chose the one-dimensional presentation of problems related to sovereignty (ḥākimiyyah) and allegiance and disavowal (walāʾ wa-l-barāʾ). These are topics, as I mentioned, that require an elite understanding and are difficult for the common people to digest.

5. The style of discourse of most Jihādīs was not populist. Communication methods were generally limited and underdeveloped, both in type and quantity. Jihādīs relied on leaflets, communiqués, and, in very limited cases, some cassette tapes. Many Jihādī groups had no media message at all. Indeed, many populations in some countries knew nothing about the Jihādīs within them, nor why they were fighting and being martyred, nor what their objectives were.

Furthermore, the discourse of most of them, especially after mixing with non-Jihādī Salafī thought, was characterized by arrogance and harshness, lacking heart-softening reminders, emotional appeals, and elements that evoke mercy, compassion, and sympathy. They adopted an approach of shunning people and distancing themselves from them in everything, which isolated the Jihādīs and helped media campaigns to paint a repulsive caricature of the Jihādī personality, a portrayal confirmed by the actual practices of many of them.

Fourthly: Other Mistakes, Problems, Obstacles, and Types of Dysfunction in the Operational Method of the Jihādī Current

These too I will mention briefly as bullet points. Due to their variety, I will list them without intentional order. Among them are:

1. The Jihādī current's lack of scholars to lead its course, who could fill the gap in cultivation, religious edicts (fatwā), writing, and guidance, and serve as popular symbols to mobilize the masses. This contributed to the emergence of the phenomenon of the "young muftī," or what they loosely termed "a brother who has knowledge" – a term that could apply to anyone with any knowledge, as no Muslim is without some knowledge.
2. A general decline in the level of religious knowledge within the Jihādī current at all levels. This even led to the formation of Jihādī groups in some countries in later stages by young cadres characterized by extremely modest levels in this fundamental field for an Islamic fundamentalist Jihādī current.

3. A decline in the levels of devotional, behavioral, and moral cultivation among many of the later young men who joined the Jihād. Due to the absence of cultivation programs, regrettable phenomena appeared in some Jihādī groups. Anyone who lived through the first generation of Jihād and whom Allāh decreed should see these types from the later Jihādīs could observe the vast difference.
4. The spread of general ignorance across various fields of knowledge, in addition to human ignorance and low levels of behavioral cultivation. Many who later joined Jihādī groups were characterized by superficiality and ignorance of political, security, and scientific realities, and most aspects of contemporary developments. Indeed, the modest or even poor levels that characterized many of the common young men who joined the Jihād extended to become the condition of some who assumed leadership and administrative roles in some nascent Jihādī groups at the end of the twentieth century.
5. The restriction of cultivation and preparation curricula on open fronts and fields like Afghanistan in both phases to almost purely military training programs. Programs for religious scholarly preparation, political guidance, intellectual qualification, and behavioral cultivation were absent from these curricula, despite the availability of favorable conditions such as sanctuary, security, and material resources. The majority adopted "Janissary-style training" and a "cannon culture" in the Ottoman style. This method, and those who supervised it, contributed to cultivating ignorance and producing individuals who did not belong to the Jihādī current we knew two decades earlier, except in emotion, enthusiasm, and sincerity – virtues whose positive outcomes were largely negated by these deficiencies.

6. The emergence of the phenomenon of excessive adherence and extremism in the later stages of the Jihādī current, after the mid-nineties. General conditions – pursuits, oppression, suppression, injustice, the ailments of the Islamic Awakening, the tribulation of palace scholars, the tyranny of governments, invasions by external enemies, and the calamities befalling the Ummah, along with most of its people turning away from their religion – led to reactions that imbued many Jihādī grassroots with fanaticism, a love for extremism and excessive adherence, expressing religiosity through extremism, and commitment through violence and extremism in the simplest rulings and matters. Some veteran Jihādīs and I, after Allāh decreed that we see some of these later models, observed that the gap between these models and the societies from which they had detached themselves had become so vast that they were fit only to fight these societies, and could not find any common ground with the components of the vast majority of the peoples of our lands.
7. The spread of a "yes-man" spirit and a decline in levels of creativity. The emergence of the phenomenon of active elitist management in every group, with the rest becoming followers separated by a large gap in capabilities and qualifications from the limited elite in the inner circle of some Jihādī groups.
8. A decline in the spirit of enjoining good and forbidding evil, a scarcity of purposeful self-criticism, and a diminished ability to rectify defects within Jihādī groups except in a very limited circle. The absence of achieving consultation in general circles, and its confinement to the elite in most groups, contrary to how it was in the Prophetic Sunnah and the methodology of the righteous predecessors.

9. The spread of the phenomenon of the "Jihādī on his own terms" among later Jihādīs. This is one of the effects of the "they were men, and we are men" approach, especially in Afghanistan in both its phases: no school of thought, no group, no emir, no methodology, no controls; absolutely free, unaffiliated, a rebel who cannot be controlled, and has no point of reference.
10. The spread of the phenomenon of "Jihādīs who have not engaged in Jihād," yet who came to the fore as symbols, guides, and muftīs for Jihādīs. This appeared among followers and supporters of the Jihādī current who were very fanatical about its methodology and symbols in words, but did not actually engage in Jihād, especially among Awakening circles in Western countries, and other circles.
11. The spread of the phenomenon of those who wanted preparation but did not want to go forth for Jihād, contrary to those who, if they had wanted to go forth, would have prepared for it. But these prepared and did not go forth. Thousands of trainees were of no benefit; their fate after receiving advanced training is unknown. The reason is that they were trained, but those who trained them did not cultivate them nor instill in them any combat doctrine.
12. Working for the benefit of others in issues of intersecting international and regional interests, and the inability of interim leaderships to create an autonomous project, as happened in the first Afghanistan experience and the Bosnia experience.
13. Forgetting the prisoners: This is one of the catastrophes of the Jihādī current. Prisoners accumulated by the thousands in the prisons of tyrants, among them scholars, preachers, senior Islamists, Jihādī leaders, and their best cadres. Then, hundreds of prisoners also accumulated in the prisons of America and Western countries. Yet, the Jihādī current showed no movement towards carrying out operations aimed at their release, as if they were completely forgotten.

14. Loss of the ability to "deter" various kinds of enemies, to the point where we became the ones instilled with fear, even though they call us terrorists.

And so on.

An important historical phase of one of the most significant schools of the Islamic Awakening, and one of the most impactful on the reality of Muslims, has concluded. This is the school of the Jihādī current, whose experiences and contributions spanned approximately four decades. In these two chapters, the sixth and seventh, I have attempted to record a summary of its trajectory and characteristics, and the lessons from its experiences. I presented a summary of its positive harvest and great achievements, as well as the internal and external reasons that led to the failure of those attempts to achieve their ultimate goals, by the decree of Allāh.

With the conclusion of this chapter, the first part of this book ends. It has dealt with the roots of the events we are experiencing, and a summary of this Ummah's history of conflict with the Romans – this Ummah's eternal affliction and ordeal.

It also presented a summary of the course of its Islamic and Jihādī awakening, and the experiences and lessons it abounded with, which must be known and whose lessons must be drawn upon as we enter the twenty-first century and step into the post-September world – the world of the great Zionist-Crusader campaigns against our vast Islamic world.

This century, which they want to be American-Zionist, where "nations have conspired against us as diners conspire over a bowl of food," just as the truthful, confirmed Prophet (peace be upon him) informed us.

This century, we must inaugurate by launching global Islamic resistance against this aggressor targeting our religion, holy sites, lives, honor, property, and all the foundations of our existence as a Muslim nation.

This resistance cannot proceed with guidance and insight without knowledge of the roots of this conflict, its history, and its experiences, for which the preceding chapters were written to fill some of its gaps.

This resistance, which must be launched on foundations of guidance, insight, and integrated principles, building upon past lessons and morals, and proceeding according to a methodology and methods suitable for the current stage, in light of the constants of this religion and the combative Jihādī creed of this Ummah, and the foundations of a disciplined movement methodology appropriate for the new calamities and circumstances that have befallen us.

This is what I will attempt to lay some groundwork for in the next part of this book. And Allāh is the Giver of success, and He [is the one who] guides to the right path.

Introduction to Second Part of the Book

All praise be to Allāh, Who is deserving of all praise and commendation. Praise be to Allāh, Who is praised in the Earth and the heavens. Praise be to Allāh, Who fulfilled His promise, aided His servant, strengthened His soldiers, and alone defeated the confederates. Praise be to Allāh, Who commanded His Messenger, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace, with a command that encompasses every believer in his nation, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace. The Almighty, the Speaker, said:

{So fight, [O Muḥammad], in the way of Allāh; you are not responsible except for yourself, and incite the believers [to fight]. Perhaps Allāh will restrain the might of those who disbelieve. And Allāh is greater in might and stronger in punishment.} (Al-Nisā' 4:84)

And may prayers and peace be upon His beloved and His chosen one from His creation, our Prophet, our master, our leader, and our beloved – the smiling warrior, the Prophet of Mercy and the Prophet of the Fierce Battle. He, may Allāh's prayers and peace be upon him, said: "I have been sent with the sword just before the Hour, so that Allāh alone is worshipped. My provision has been placed under the shadow of my spear, and humiliation and disgrace are for those who disobey my command. Whoever imitates a people is one of them." The Messenger of Allāh, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace, spoke the truth.

And now, to proceed:

Before delving into this important part – for which the first part, despite its length and all it contained, was but a series of foundational premises and supports, whether Sharī'ah-based, historical, political, intellectual, or methodological, for what this section will encompass, if Allāh wills – and before that, I wish to introduce the chapters of this section with a number of points that will pave the way for it and aid in its further understanding, if Allāh wills.

First: The Fixed and the Variable in Jihādī Thought and the Theories of the Call for Global Islamic Resistance

Al-Mubārakfūrī, in his valuable book Al-Raḥīq al-Makhtūm (The Sealed Nectar), in which he summarized the biography of the Messenger of Allāh, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace, presented a summary of the following account:

"The Messenger of Allāh, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace, moved with his army to reach the waters of Badr before the polytheists and prevent them from seizing it. He encamped in the evening by the nearest water source of Badr. Here, al-Ḥubāb ibn al-Mundhir, may Allāh be pleased with him, stood up as a military expert and said: 'O Messenger of Allāh! This encampment, is it a place that Allāh has commanded you, so we can neither advance nor retreat from it? Or is it a matter of opinion, warfare, and strategy?' The Prophet replied: 'Rather, it is a matter of opinion, warfare, and strategy.' Al-Ḥubāb said: 'O Messenger of Allāh! Then this is not the [ideal] place to encamp. Lead the people until we reach the water source closest to the enemy – Quraysh – and encamp there. We should then render unusable the wells behind it, build a cistern over it, fill it with water, and then fight the enemy. We will drink, but they will not.' The Messenger of Allāh, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace, said: '(You have indeed offered a sound opinion).'"

This profound account contains great wisdom through which the Messenger of Allāh, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace, teaches us significant benefits, including:

1. The Muslim's etiquette with the religion of Allāh: what is revelation, we neither advance beyond nor fall short of.
2. The necessity of ijtihād (independent reasoning) in matters of "opinion, warfare, and strategy."

3. The soldier's etiquette when presenting views to his commander.
4. The commander's etiquette with his aides when ijtihād and innovative ideas are presented to him.
5. The obligation to present opinions without hesitation, regardless of the commander's rank and knowledge. We have before us an example where an opinion was presented to the greatest teacher, the Messenger of Allāh, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace.
6. Clarity and decisiveness in presenting an opinion after confirming it falls within the scope of ijtihād: "(Then this is not the [ideal] place to encamp)."
7. The leadership's adoption of what is proven correct, and not disregarding an evident truth, irrespective of the perceived low status of the one who uttered it.

Among these, we note a point relevant to this introduction: it established a golden rule for the fixed and the variable, upon which dynamic Jihādī thought and the jurisprudence of action and movement in the entire Islamic Awakening should be based. Indeed, I believe that this rule is the foundation for all aspects of a Muslim's activity and movement throughout his life.

This point divides the rules and laws subject to thought and action into two categories:

- Fixed principles: These are fundamentals of the religion, creed, and firmly established methodological rules. The required approach here is: "a station Allāh, the Exalted, has appointed for you, from which we are neither to advance nor retreat."
- Variable elements: These change according to circumstances and events. This is the arena for competing intellects, understandings, expertise, and experiences, and the domain for innovation therein. It encompasses matters of "opinion, warfare, and strategy."

The second important wisdom from the jurisprudence of this great account is teaching the leader, the led, and everyone who came after the Messenger of Allāh, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace, and his noble Companions, how to deal with the fixed and variable aspects of belief, action, and application. Every individual must employ the intellect Allāh has blessed him with, making it the basis of accountability in every matter he faces, and he should ask and seek clarity if he does not know. He should ask those of knowledge about matters he encounters: Is it from the fixed tenets of belief and established Sharī'ah rulings? If so, his stance should be submission and compliance (he neither advances nor retreats). Or is it a matter of ijtihād in opinion, warfare, strategy, and similar aspects of human activity?

If it becomes clear to him that it belongs to the latter category, he should present his opinion, expertise, and ijtihād with full conviction, decorum, and responsibility, just as that esteemed Companion, may Allāh be pleased with him, did. And every leader whom Allāh has tested with decision-making must allow scope for this, listen, and encourage the led to bear the responsibility of thinking, proposing, and innovating. This is what the Messenger of Allāh, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace, did, though he, unlike those after him, was independent of all that due to revelation. Indeed, it extends to yielding to the opinion of the expert who reasons correctly, and to say in response what the Prophet, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace, said: "You have indeed offered a sound opinion)," and even to submit to that opinion.

These represent two schools of leadership! One school accepts proposals in the domain of opinion, warfare, and strategy, and encourages innovators through consultation (shūrā); "You have indeed offered a sound opinion)."

The other is the school of Pharaoh, about whom Allāh, Blessed and Exalted is He, informed us: {Pharaoh said, "I do not show you except what I see, and I do not guide you except to the way of right conduct."} (Ghāfir 40:29). His entire basis for this was his claim: "O my people, does not the kingdom of Egypt belong to me and these rivers flowing beneath me? Then do you not see?"} (Al-Zukhruf 43:51).

This led him, when Satan inflated his ego, to the outrageous claim: {And he said, "I am your most exalted lord."} (Al-Nāzi'āt 79:24). This is not the place to elaborate on the treasures within these magnificent divine texts and noble prophetic traditions that stir the soul and invite the pen to expound. What has been briefly mentioned suffices for our current purpose.

What I will present in the following theories I offer as a step, among the initial steps that must be taken today, before it is too late, within the Jihādī current and the field of practical thought in the glorious Islamic Awakening. This is so we may open the door for correction and development through our strategic, faith-based decision for steadfastness – steadfastness on the path of Jihād.

Most of what I present consists of ideas related to matters of "opinion, warfare, and strategy," especially those concerning the practical application of Jihād in the post-September world as I perceive it.

There is also an aspect that belongs to the realm of fixed principles, by virtue of our belief in the fundamentals of our upright religion, our religious tenets, and their established Sharī'ah rulings. These are methodological constants for us, inherited within this blessed Islamic Awakening and the glorious Jihādī current over successive decades, from trustworthy and proven leaders, scholars, and working mujāhid shaykhs. Most of these constants that I convey are interspersed throughout this book in the chapters dealing with thought, methodology, fighting creed, and the fixed fundamentals of Shari‘ah-based politics when we address the political theory of resistance, in addition to religious educational aspects.

The reader can easily distinguish this. I will indicate them in their place to differentiate what is a fixed religious belief or a Shari‘ah ruling, our stance towards which is that we neither advance beyond nor retreat from it, but rather; we hear and we obey.

There are also jurisprudential choices we have adopted, and these are subject to the golden rule summarized by the esteemed jurist Imām Mālik, may Allāh have mercy on him, in the great saying: "Every person's words may be accepted or rejected, except for the occupant of the noble grave, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace." Thus, these are theories put forth for dialogue, discussion, experimentation, and application, in order to launch a call and a method of action and resistance that I believe the arena of Islamic work and the blessed Awakening are in dire need of.

I have named it "The Call for Global Islamic Resistance." To launch it, I have laid foundations in various aspects and components of the movement, through its eight theories which constitute the eighth chapter, occupying most of the space in the second part of this book, and which is its core and objective.

I present these theories after they have, according to my current belief, reached a sufficient level of maturity. The repercussions of the post-September world, the realities of the new American-Western Jewish-Crusader campaigns, and their comprehensive objectives targeting all civilizational levels and fields have convinced me and increased my faith in the correctness of most of what I had arrived at in developing these theories over fourteen years, from 1990 until today.

I ask Allāh for guidance to the truth, to inspire me with sincerity, to guide me to what is correct, and to bless me with acceptance. Any success in reaching correctness is from Allāh, the Exalted. Any error is from my deficient self and from Satan. Deficiency is characteristic of the work of the son of Adam. I seek forgiveness from Allāh, the Mighty, and I repent to Him.

Second: The Theories of the Call for Global Islamic Resistance are Practical Theories

In my book, The Jihādī Islamic Revolution in Syria, which was my first work in 1987, I mentioned in the third chapter of the first part some important definitions of what I termed "practical theory." I wish I had the book with me to quote that paragraph here.

I wrote therein, in essence, that there is a fundamental difference between "theoretical theories" and "practical theories." Theoretical theories are intellectual conceptions formulated by their authors from their own ideas and intellectual or philosophical flights of fancy, for reality to later prove them right or wrong. Such theories are often characterized by their detachment from reality, remaining confined to the ivory towers where their authors reside, especially when their theories address fields far removed from their practical experiences and real-world expertise.

As for practical theories, they are theories of action born in the field of movement and application by their proponents, who generate them through the practical process itself, in order to correct it and steer it towards the better, ultimately achieving objectives, especially in the context of Jihād and battle.

Practical theories can be defined as: theories born in the battlefield and confrontation, formulated by Jihādī thinkers active on the ground and scholars working in the arena of battle. They are penned by Jihādī writers in the field. They are not handed down from above, neither from a sedentary leadership nor from scholars whose joints may have been stiffened by air conditioners during sessions of intellectual luxury at lavish tables after a rich dinner full of pleasures.

This is because the sincere among those writers – if they exist and are sincere – can write on the jurisprudence of Jihād and its rulings, merely re-pasting old texts, rewriting them, and stamping them with their names preceded by titles like Shaykh, Professor, Doctor, and Thinker. Then they market them in elegant editions on expensive paper, to be read by an audience no less indulgent than themselves. Perhaps believers, moved by the wisdom therein and by other horizons of wisdom, might benefit from it on the battlefields.

Indeed, practical theories of Jihād are born by their proponents in the field of Jihād, confrontation, and the arenas of battle. They emerge and are born after digesting the experiences of the past and reviewing the exorbitant prices paid for a series of failed experiments, in an effort to correct and develop, through the strategy of steadfastness and its deliberate choice, as I mentioned earlier. Those with knowledge among people are few, and those who act among them are fewer still. And the knowledgeable who act are rarer than precious stones in these sprawling chains of rubble and dust. The sincere among these are a small group from the early generations and a few from the later ones. We ask Allāh, by His beautiful generosity, to make us among them.

Practical theories are the task of those who have shouldered the trust of the sword and the pen, and whom Allāh has granted the understanding of the wisdom of experiences and lessons.

Seventeen years ago, if memory serves me correctly, I said in that book, in essence:

Victories in confrontational experiences are few when measured against failed experiments. However, the lessons from failure are more enriching than the lessons from victories, and their price is far heavier. With their benefits, they guide the actor towards victory and success.

The lessons of failure are doubly beneficial because they teach us the moral of the experience and they produce for us the experienced individual. If those experienced individuals are destined to remain steadfast, they become qualified by virtue of those lessons for great victories, by Allāh's permission.

In this context, I say:

The theories of the Call for Global Islamic Resistance that I include in this book are, after the success [granted by Allāh], the product of two things:

First: Direct field experience over nearly a quarter of a century, closely following and being informed by the experiences of the Islamic Awakening, and from fieldwork within the Jihādī current, involved in many of its aspects and interacting with many of its pioneers, leaders, and elements.

Second: Their generation through careful study and deliberate review of the past experiences of the Islamic Awakening in general, and Jihādī attempts in particular. This involved examining their literature, history, and publications, and direct accounts from their participants where written material was unavailable. Then, adopting the principle of correction and development of those experiences, after embracing the choice of steadfastness as a Shari'ah-based religious and creedal foundation, and as a strategic operational basis.

Thus, these theories emerge within the Jihādī current and the Islamic Awakening as practical theories.

These theories have taken – by Allāh's help – thousands of hours of reading, contemplation, thinking, comparison, and meticulous daily monitoring of various media to keep abreast of the latest developments in the reality of Muslims and the plans of their enemies. An equivalent amount of effort and time was spent in dialogue, study, and discussion with various levels within the Jihādī current and other figures of the Awakening, especially among thinkers, callers, and Jihādī leaders with experience.

Allāh facilitated, after these many hours of study and dialogue, the birth of many illuminating ideas. Perhaps some were gleaned from the mouths of ordinary, simple mujāhidīn relating their experiences and opinions, or from experienced, active leaders who were not interested in authorship or capable of writing. I formulated them in my style, placed them in their context, and assembled them as a jeweler does with precious gems.

Perhaps a dialogue with some individuals would spark in my mind a chain of thought from a proposed idea, which would then develop and its intellectual ramifications would unfold to take their place in the context. Much of the credit for what appears creative and innovative in these theories goes to dozens of men, callers, and active mujāhidīn with whom I dialogued. Thus, I can claim that they are practical theories and prove it. From this, I believe these theories derive their value. This is why I mention these stages in their generation, and I ask Allāh for sincerity.

Third: The Mechanism for Generating Theories through the Methodology of Steadfastness, Correction, and Development

I have spoken sufficiently about this methodology – the strategy and choice of steadfastness, the importance of correction, its reliance on the principle of presenting and studying the ailment without embarrassment, and the principle of reviewing methods of action, addressing them without sanctification because they are tools and means, and developing, abolishing, or innovating what suits the time from methods not previously experienced – at the end of the sixth chapter and the beginning of the seventh of the first part.

This led me to review the harvest of experiences from the Jihādī current with complete openness and freedom, and with the jurisprudential understanding of a self-critical methodology aiming for noble goals. And is there anything nobler than earnestly searching for a path of Jihād through which we hope to achieve victory and lift this Ummah from the mire of defeat?

I addressed the aspects of that harvest in the seventh chapter, after a brief history of the experiences in the sixth chapter, which is one of the longest chapters in the book. However, here I refer to the mechanism of generating theories after conducting a review of the flaws and errors of those experiences and methods, most of which were not mistakes but rather methods that became outdated and surpassed by time. Meaning, they were not wrong then, but are no longer correct. One of the most beneficial sections for the search for presumably correct theories was the discussion of the internal, inherent reasons for the failure of Jihādī projects, the errors in methodology, structure, and path, and the errors in the mode of performance, which I presented in the seventh chapter.

After that, I undertook the process of searching for what is correct or appropriate to counter what I believed to be erroneous or no longer suitable.

And just as the sum of errors equated to failure in outcome, or constituted the most important causes of failure, the set of hypotheses of correctness formed "The Theories of the Call for Global Islamic Resistance," in the manner illustrated by this representative outline:

- Assumed Error: Methodological errors.
- Assumed Correction: Correct methodological conceptions.
- New Theory: The Theory of Thought and Methodology in the Call for Resistance.
- Assumed Error: Educational errors.
- Assumed Correction: Correct methodological conceptions.

- New Theory: The Theory of Education in the Call for Resistance.
- Assumed Error: Political application errors.
- Assumed Correction: Correct political conceptions.
- New Theory: The Political Theory in the Call for Resistance.
- Assumed Error: Errors in military methods or outdated methods.
- Assumed Correction: Suitable military conceptions.
- New Theory: The Military Theory for the Call for Resistance.

And so on, in the remaining areas of the theories of the Call, which I endeavored to make comprehensive and integrated, starting from the creedal, intellectual, and political foundations, through the appropriate educational methodology, and ending with the practical methods of military action, and the necessary preparation, training, organization, and financing, without forgetting the appropriate methods for da‘wah (calling to Islām), media, and incitement.

Fourth: Adopting the Approach of Mobilizing the Ummah for Resistance Without Compromising Methodological Constants

The validity of a theory can only be established by proving the error of what contradicts it in its field. This is what I termed in some of my old lectures the "principle of demolition and construction." It is a principle adopted in all calls.

The foundation of the call of Islām is based on this:

{So whoever disbelieves in Ṭāghūt and believes in Allāh has grasped the most trustworthy handhold.} (Al-Baqarah 2:256). Belief in Allāh cannot be built except upon the demolition of belief in Ṭāghūt (false deities/tyranny) and disbelief in it. This principle extends to lower levels of contradiction, from the realms of truth and falsehood to the realms of error and correctness, which are particularly matters of ijtihād in the fields of action and movement.

Thus, it is not possible to prove that Jihād is the solution to emerge from our crises except by proving that parliament is not the solution. The same applies to the various methods proposed in the marketplace of the Islamic Awakening.

When it comes to reviewing and evaluating experiences, the matter becomes highly sensitive. Experiences are calls, and calls are ideas and methodologies. Criticizing them provokes the sensitivity of their proponents. Even more sensitive is that calls are associated with individuals, symbols, and the actions of activists. Criticizing them provokes even greater sensitivity, indeed, it evokes a sense of aggression and provokes a response.

Here, it is necessary to return to the principles of disagreement and the etiquette of disagreement according to the rules of Islām. The theories of "The Call for Global Islamic Resistance" stand before two levels of opposition when dealing with the various segments of the presumed war front to be mobilized in this Ummah against its enemies: a level of difference and a level of dispute.

When addressing what touches upon our creedal, intellectual, and methodological constants, we and those who hold different views – including some components and movements of the Islamic Awakening, its methodologies, schools, and media – are in a domain of dispute; a dispute of opposition. For example, the difference between us and the "parliamentarian and democratic" Islamists is a domain of oppositional dispute, not an acceptable difference of variation.

I believe this glaringly problematic example clarifies similar methodological problems.

As for what concerns methods of action and mechanisms of confrontation within the Jihādī current and schools of Islamic work, we are in domains of possible, and perhaps beneficial, difference of variation. It is a difference in means of remedy.

Here, perhaps, the sensitivity is less, or at least it should be.

Despite the revolutionary nature of such ideas presented in this book, I have been keen to mitigate all repercussions of this dispute and difference, because we are in a state of confronting an aggressor whose repulsion is the most obligatory duty after affirming the Oneness of Allāh (Tawhīd). Ranks must be closed and hearts united, despite the difficulty of the matter. Souls are naturally inclined to sanctify ideas and individuals, which is one of the greatest dilemmas that faced the Prophets and those after them from among their followers and inheritors of their calls.

However, I have strived, and will continue to strive, so that the seriousness of the discourse, its profound revolutionary nature, and its regenerative dimensions do not affect my intention of mobilizing for resistance. For I am here in the process of establishing theories for a call, not laying down rules for an organization or a movement-based gathering that competes with others in the field of action and struggles with them over the human and material resources for work, as has unfortunately happened and continues to happen in the arena of the Islamic Awakening and the Jihādī current.

Indeed, in this proposal, I have gone further than that in closing ranks and attempting to unite the Ummah. This is because the domains of dispute and difference become domains of contradiction and enmity when we move outside the circle of the Islamic Awakening to the various intellectual, cultural, and political segments and components of the Islamic Ummah, in its human totality and its complex cultural and civilizational makeup. Examples include currents with imported ideas such as nationalist and secular patriotic currents, and others which – to be fair – despite our contradiction with their ideas and our enmity towards the deviation and misguidance they contain, include a broad sector of honorable people who sincerely want to participate in resisting our same enemies. They intend – though they have not been guided to correctness – the salvation of this Ummah and hope for its victory and elevation. They have shared with us, as Islamists, many of the burdens of hardship under tyrannical regimes and the colonial powers behind them.

So, even with this sector, I have been keen in the theories of resistance – without transgressing what is permissible by creed and the sacred constants of religion – to win over those hearts as much as possible. I have sought to enter through the gates of areas of agreement with them, relying on their sense of honor, dignity, zeal, and Islamic sentiment where present, aiming to win them over to be on the right side of the resistance war front against America, Israel, and their apostate and hypocrite allies. If not an alliance for the victory of truth, then at least neutrality towards us.

This is one of the most important duties of those who take the lead in the process of mobilization: mobilizing the Ummah for resistance. This is what I have striven for as one who hopes to stand in this rank.

I hope that all hearts will be accommodating as they review what I could not avoid criticizing in some matters, or where I might not have used the most appropriate style in addressing them. This is especially true for my brothers in creed and arms from the Jihādīs, or my brothers on the path of the Awakening and service to Islām from the Islamists, or those with whom we share a noble goal, honor, and zeal in striving towards its achievement.

Fifth: Characteristics and Features of the Theories of the Call for Global Islamic Resistance

1. The Call adopts a methodology of renewal in the methods of Jihādī action and the operational thought of the Islamic Awakening.
2. This is due to the radical changes in our surrounding circumstances since the establishment of the new world order, the launch of the Zionist-Crusader campaigns, and their reliance on an alliance with apostate regimes and forces of hypocrisy in our lands. This is especially true after what became known as the post-September 11th world, and then the unveiling of the programs of the American Zionist-Crusader campaigns against our Islamic world, and their comprehensive civilizational projects for our world, which they termed the "Greater Middle East," and upon which they launched military, political, cultural, and all-encompassing assaults. The radical nature of the renewal was necessitated by the radical nature of the transformations arising from these campaigns and the composition of the enemy front.
3. The fundamental characteristic of the Call – despite its comprehensive methodology – is that it is primarily a call for Jihādī resistance against the external enemy.
4. Most schools of the Islamic Awakening, especially the political ones, and particularly the Jihādī ones, were established to overthrow, politically or through Jihād, regimes ruling by other than Allāh's law, and to establish Islamic rule in their place. This was the goal of the Awakening in all its schools. Because of this goal, the characteristics of the methodologies and methods of movement were determined, and they were as they were.
5. However, the goal for which the Call for Resistance is established is different now. It is specifically to repel the aggression of the external enemy. Even if our success in achieving this goal automatically leads to the same comprehensive goal of the Islamic and Jihādī Awakening – which is the establishment of the state of Islām and the implementation of Allāh's Sharī'ah – the current strategic, interim goal imposed by reality is not to establish an organization or organizations to overthrow local governments, whether through secret organizations or (legal) political parties. This is because the calamity now is greater, and confronting it is more urgent and more emphasized.

6. The goal of the Call for Resistance is:
7. To resist the aggression of the invading Zionist-Crusader campaigns led by America and its Jewish and Crusader allies from external forces of disbelief, and the local forces of apostasy and hypocrisy collaborating with them. With the change of the old strategic goal, which was confronting governments, the parameters of the required methodologies and suitable operational methods also change.
8. No one should understand from this that it is not among the goals of the Call for Resistance to "establish the rule of Allāh's Sharī'ah" – Allāh forbid! Can anyone be a believer if this is not his goal? However, we consider this ultimate goal to be a result of the success of the resistance in repelling these campaigns and bringing down the superpower, America.
9. We have shown sufficiently in the first part what the old methods, whether Jihādī or political, led to in the struggle against existing governments, while leaving the hidden powers that supported them. This led to internal warfare and revolving in vicious circles. Fortunately, and so that the battle may be clear, those powers have now come to us openly with their cavalry and infantry, praise be to Allāh. Repelling them will automatically lead to the fall of their apostate and hypocrite allies, and those among them who insist on apostasy by allying with the invading enemies and do not turn to join the resisting masses of the Ummah.

10. By the nature of things, the victorious political and Jihādī forces in the resistance, if Allāh wills, will be automatically nominated to fill that vacuum. And will they fill it, after that entire Jihādī path of sacrifices, with anything other than the implementation of Allāh's Sharī'ah and the establishment of the state of Islām? And will new, obscurantist local forces dare to stand in the way of that goal then, with the absence of the major international powers – which planted the parties of disbelief and hordes of collaborators in our lands – and with humanity resting from their evils?
11. The victory of the resistance project and the fall of America, by Allāh's permission, will change the balance of power and make the earth different from what it was. Then, nothing will rule us except Allāh's Sharī'ah. It is for this goal that we must work now.
12. So, the strategic goal of the resistance is to repel the campaigns and unite the Ummah for that purpose, under the banner of Jihād and the methodology of Islām, in a comprehensive, integrated educational call. It will, by Allāh's permission, give birth to a generation, indeed generations, that will not be satisfied with anyone other than Allāh as Lord, other than Islām as religion, other than the Qur'ān as book and constitution, and other than our Prophet Muhammad, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace, as Prophet, Messenger, leader, and Imām.
13. The theories of the Call for Global Islamic Resistance carry, in many of their aspects, dimensions of Sharī'ah-based politics.
14. Sharī'ah-based politics (al-siyāsah al-shar'īyyah), as is apparent from the composition of this term, is the product of:

15. (Sharī‘ah + Politics). Sharī‘ah consists of fixed rulings and broad guidelines that define the domains of politics, so that it proceeds according to divine guidance for managing reality.
16. Reality is dynamic, based on human movement, and behavior is variable, relying on the art of the possible, and hearts are fluctuating, held between the fingers of the Most Merciful, Majestic and Exalted is He, Who turns them as He wills.
17. Therefore, the Call for Global Islamic Resistance must operate within these horizons, governed by the controls of Sharī‘ah-based politics, with the stability of its constants and the variability of its variables, with a dynamic fluidity that suits the immense renewal and fluctuation in circumstances and givens. For one of the characteristics of practical theories is the ability for renewal and keeping pace with changes, by the actors themselves, and the continuity of the chain of those who proceed with insight from their religion, after choosing the strategy of steadfastness and continuity with Allāh’s help.
18. The Call for Global Islamic Resistance is a call to organize the collective effort by highlighting the role of the individual.
19. It is inspired by the saying of Allāh, the Exalted:
20. {So fight in the way of Allāh; you are not responsible except for yourself, and incite the believers [to fight]. Perhaps Allāh will restrain the might of those who disbelieve. And Allāh is greater in might and stronger in punishment.} (Al-Nisā’ 4:84).
21. The Call for Resistance is a call established so that the individual, as an individual, and the small group, however limited its capabilities, can perform the individual obligation (farḍ ‘ayn) of Jihād to repel the aggressor, in a manner suitable to its situation, conviction, and ability to gather and organize.

As Allāh, the Exalted, said: {So fight}, {you are not responsible except for yourself}. It thus unleashes the individual to act if he finds no one to join his effort. If he finds someone to assist him and join him, then that is excellent.

22. This is not fighting for just any principle! Rather, {So fight in the way of Allāh}. And the way of Allāh is, in short, regulated by the Sharīʿah of Allāh. It is a religious creed and Sharīʿah rulings, which produce behavior and a methodology.

23. As it tasks the individual, every individual however insignificant his status and capabilities – excluding those with legitimate Sharīʿah excuses, not the excuses of the sedentary and the hypocrites – it tasks him with fighting. It also adds another obligation to everyone according to his general ability: {and incite the believers}. Thus, it specifies those of knowledge, scholars, men of thought, and people of opinion, adding to them another obligation, which is to undertake incitement for resistance: {and incite the believers}. So, he must incite and call for resistance, in addition to his duty to fight.

24. The domain of incitement is for the believers, those who have believed, all who fall under the designation of "Lā ilāha illā Allāh, Muḥammad Rasūl Allāh" (There is no god but Allāh, Muhammad is the Messenger of Allāh). They are the general circle of incitement.

25. All of this is for a goal whose realization is in the hand of Allāh, the Exalted, in terms of timing and manner. We are obligated to strive for it. All that effort, resistance, and fighting is so that: {Perhaps Allāh will restrain the might of those who disbelieve} – restrain their might and aggression. Then, every mujāhid must believe with creedal conviction, as a fundamental of faith, in His saying: {And Allāh is greater in might and stronger in punishment}.

26.They will be defeated by Allāh’s might and will end up in His punishment in this world and the Hereafter.

27.And the good end is for the God-fearing. {Allāh has written, "I will surely overcome, I and My messengers." Indeed, Allāh is Powerful and Exalted in Might.} (Al-Mujādilah 58:21). {And indeed, Our soldiers will be victorious.} (Al-Şāffāt 37:173).

28.And as he, peace and blessings be upon him, said – and this is sufficient as a driving moral impetus: "This religion will surely reach what the night and day reach." So, there is no god but Allāh, Muhammad is the Messenger of Allāh, Allāh is the Greatest, and to Allāh belongs all praise. There is no might nor power except with Allāh, the Most High, the Most Great.

And now to the eight theories of the Call for Global Islamic Resistance, beginning with the most important and its cornerstone, as is the foundation of every call and method: the theory of confrontation (Methodology and Fighting Creed).

The Jihādī Methodology and Creed

The Fighting Creed

It is the set of ideas and beliefs that a fighter carries in his mind, heart, and soul, and is motivated by them to fight for their sake. This creed instills in him steadfastness in bearing the costs of this fighting, which demands all he possesses and the dearest of what he owns: his self, his wealth, his children, his family, and his entire being. It also includes the ethics, behaviors, rules, and rulings that are binding upon him during his combative journey.

This fighting creed is what has moved armies, fueled conflicts, and established states throughout history. Because of it, men have risen, and heroes have stood firm in the fields of battle. Motivated by it, the steadfast have persevered through the hardships of the path to reach their goals in every time and place, and in every nation, religion, and sect. With it, every vessel has exuded its contents since ancient times.

In modern times, states, military leaderships, ideological organizations, revolutions, movements, and parties that carried principles, as well as leaders and chieftains, have been keen to indoctrinate their soldiers with a fighting creed that drives them to sacrifice and give, and to exert effort and patience on the battlefields, to convince them, rightly or wrongly, of the justice of their cause and the loftiness of the principles for which they fight, whether it be religion, belief, love of homeland, or devotion to the nation.

Thus, in every army in the world today, there is an important department within the military command and armed forces called the "Department of Training and Moral Guidance," or its equivalent. Specialists such as scholars, writers, thinkers, and psychologists work there, preparing programs and curricula of lectures and lessons to instill ideas, maintain the soldiers' conviction in their fighting creed, and preserve their values and morale.

These materials often occupy more than half of the general training hours and preparation programs. In some revolutionary movements and ideological organizations, it can reach more than 80% of the time allocated for work and preparation among followers and soldiers.

Religions and religious beliefs have been, and still are, from ancient times to the present day, the primary and most influential motivator in creating this fighting creed and morale among fighters. Even in societies and states that adopted atheism and secular doctrines – most of which are collapsing today – the world is witnessing a return to religiosity and religious zealotry.

Alternatively, they attempted to compensate for religions with these materialistic secular doctrines, creating man-made creeds that held the awe of religion and the sanctity of belief for their adherents.

The Difference between a Combatant/Warrior and a Mujāhid/Ideological Soldier

Studies concerned with the fighting creed and its importance in modern armies have extensively clarified this difference. A combatant or warrior fighting without a cause, without a belief, and without a sacred, lofty goal – such as thieves, highway robbers, and mercenary soldiers – shares all the characteristics of a fighter with any ideological soldier or mujāhid fighting for a noble goal and a sacred creed, except for the creed itself. They share in all aspects of preparation, and in all combat movements and military actions.

They train, master the use of weapons, combat tactics, and the necessary auxiliary arts. Gang members, mafias, criminals, thieves, and highway robbers may even surpass the most capable soldiers, security personnel, and intelligence agents in mastering combat techniques and the technical knowledge necessary for all forms of fighting. They might even surpass them in courage, initiative, combat experience, and persistence. However, there are fundamental differences between these individuals and the ideological fighter. These differences quickly become evident with prolonged confrontation and harsh conditions, especially in cases of defeat and successive sacrifices.

One who does not fight for a creed and principle does not endure defeats, nor does he endure prolonged suffering. He quickly becomes susceptible to selling his integrity and conscience to his enemy. He might even work for his enemy if it provides him with the same worldly goals, or more than what was previously provided, such as various worldly pleasures like money, women, status, reputation, leadership, and so on. He then turns traitor and betrays, or at least surrenders and withdraws into his private life, preferring safety and content with what he has gained, happy to escape if he achieves nothing else.

But the ideological fighter stands firm. He does not betray, does not turn, and does not become an agent for his enemy. He does not surrender unless overwhelmed and surrounded, and he tries to break free from his enemy and continue his efforts. He perseveres and seeks reward from Allāh for his hardship. The peace of his conscience or his conceptions of his ultimate fate serve as a deterrent for such patience and steadfastness. Even if he falters and becomes inactive for a period due to necessity, his soul remains eager, and his conscience torments him, pushing him to resume Jihād for his lofty goals and values. There is a vast difference between a mere warrior and an ideological fighter.

Educators of every religion and sect have realized the impact of this, so they have given the fighting creed its due place in preparation and training curricula. Libraries are replete with educational materials, methodologies, and specialized studies in this field.

The Jihādī Creed among Muslims, its Impact and Status

We Muslims call fighting our enemies "Jihād in the way of Allāh." Consequently, the appropriate term synonymous with "fighting creed" for others is the term "Jihādī creed." The status of the Jihādī creed among us is evident and clear, overflowing in the texts of the Noble Qur'ān and the purified Sunnah, and in a heritage that has a beginning but no end, of the sayings of scholars, the wisdom of sages, and the literature of poets and prose writers throughout the successive centuries of our glorious history.

Our Jihādī creed is distinguished from other fighting creeds in that it contains, in addition to what all those creeds contain of inciting motives of zeal for homeland, land, and honor, the wellsprings of manliness, honor, and pride, and the horizons of noble character and lofty merits, it has linked the mujāhid in the way of Allāh to what He has promised him of empowerment and honor in this world, for him or for his brethren and co-religionists who come after him – a definite promise from Allāh of empowerment if they persevere on the path of Jihād, patience, steadfast endurance, and guarding the frontiers against the enemies of Allāh. And it has promised him what is loftier, more precious than that, and dearer to himself: the reward in the Hereafter from Allāh, of recompense, Paradise, and Allāh's pleasure, in return for his effort, patience, and the trial of flashing swords above his head. Thus, Paradise is made obligatory for him for standing in the ranks as a mujāhid for a few minutes – the time it takes between milking a she-camel and the milk returning to her udder (which is the duration between milking a she-camel and the milk returning to its udder). It is narrated from the Messenger of Allāh, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace, that he said: "Whoever fights in the way of Allāh for the duration of milking a she-camel, Paradise becomes obligatory for him. Whoever sincerely asks Allāh for martyrdom in His way, then dies or is killed, he will have the reward of a martyr. Whoever is wounded in the way of Allāh or suffers a calamity, it will come on the Day of Resurrection as profusely as it was, its color like saffron and its scent like musk. And whoever develops an abscess in the way of Allāh, he will bear the stamp of the martyrs." (Narrated by Abū Dāwūd).

And if he is killed in the way of Allāh, he is promised the reward of a patient martyr, such as no eye has seen, no ear has heard, and no human heart has conceived.

The texts of the Qur'ān and Sunnah are replete with what makes hearts leap from chests with longing, senses dance with joy, and souls fly with desire to meet Allāh and His promise of the details of that bliss. And what Allāh has prepared for him beyond that: the companionship of His beloved Chosen One, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace, along with those whom Allāh has favored from among the Prophets, the truthful, the martyrs, and the righteous. Then the greatest bliss: the pleasure of the Lord of Might, seeing Him, and His smiling at him and absolving him at the Reckoning.

The Jihādī creed has provided the Muslim mujāhid with intricate details about everything: about his creation, his origin, his path in this world, and his return in the Hereafter. It has left no question unanswered within the recesses of his soul.

Detailed creeds, codified laws, harmonious regulations, and spiritual elevations. Glorified is He Who did not create us in vain and did not leave us neglected.

If any creature were destined to be bewildered in its affair, and for the horizons of its soul to constrict upon it, Allāh has saved the believer and the mujāhid from this torment in this world and the Hereafter. So, while the soul of the atheist wanders in confusion and stammers, repeating the words of the wretched Christian Arab poet, whose poetry was sung by a similarly wretched singer, and to whose tunes the wretched, lost souls of this Ummah swayed, when he said:

I came, not knowing from where, but I came... And I saw before me a path, so I walked.

How I came, where I am going, I do not know...

Indeed, the believer, and especially the mujāhid, knows and understands. So, glory be to Allāh Who taught us His saying:

{[All] praise is [due] to Allāh, who has sent down upon His Servant the Book and has not made therein any deviance. [He has made it] straight, to warn of severe punishment from Him and to give good tidings to the believers who do righteous deeds that they will have a good reward.} (Al-Kahf 18:1-2). The Book of our Lord, as He, the Exalted, described it: {And We have sent down to you the Book as clarification for all things.} (Al-Naḥl 16:89). And in the field of Jihād and the Jihādī creed:

Islām has clarified for him why he engages in Jihād, whom he fights, how he fights, for what purpose he fights, and what the conduct of the mujāhid and the ethics of Jihād should be. It has clarified for him the laws and rulings concerning blood, wealth, and honor, and the details of rulings on killing, captives, and spoils of war. It has equipped him with what aids in piety and adorns him with patience and steadfastness, and what cultivates within him the wellsprings of courage and initiative. It has taught him the etiquette of humility towards believers and sternness towards disbelievers, and commanded him to wage Jihād against disbelievers and hypocrites, and that they should find harshness in him. It taught him that he is a soldier for the religion of mercy and the Prophet of mercy, and so on, as filled the books and enriched the Islamic library of this great religion.

If we were to attempt to enumerate some of that here, it would take too long and deviate from the intended purpose. So, glory be to Him Who blessed us with His saying: {This day I have perfected for you your religion and completed My favor upon you and have approved for you Islām as religion.} (Al-Mā'idah 5:3).

Because of this Islamic creed in general, and the Jihādī creed in particular, we have had in history exemplary models to be emulated, and it has produced for us a caravan of role models and exemplary men, at the forefront of whom was he about whom his Lord, Glorified is He, said:

{There has certainly been for you in the Messenger of Allāh an excellent pattern for anyone whose hope is in Allāh and the Last Day and [who] remembers Allāh often.} (Al-Aḥzāb 33:21). History has also preserved for us glorious stories of when that fighting creed was present in the souls of its believing adherents, of the victory of the small band of believers over the multitudes of their enemies when that creed was ascendant in them.

And bitter stories and painful news of what befell them when generations came in whose souls the ember of that Islamic creed and Jihādī spirit had faded, or when love of worldly gain dominated them during times of confrontation. These were horrifying pages of the opposite, when their multitudes were defeated, their fortresses demolished, their castles fell, their palaces plundered, their nobles killed, and their women taken captive in scenes of the Tartar invasions, the Crusades, the fall of Andalusia, and others throughout history, leading to similar events in our contemporary history, which is full of pain and tragedies. Yet, even here, some bright spots emerge from examples of the patience of the steadfast and the Jihād of the mujāhidīn, who openly declare their lofty Jihādī creed.

Aspects of the Jihādī Creed among Muslims

- The first thing our Jihādī creed teaches us, the Muslim community, is the reality of "Lā ilāha illā Allāh, Muḥammad Rasūl Allāh" (There is no god but Allāh, Muhammad is the Messenger of Allāh), and the beliefs, rulings, and requirements of this religion that branch from it. We worship none but Allāh and obey only what Allāh has commanded, in the manner revealed to His Messenger and beloved, our leader and beloved, Muhammad, the Messenger of Allāh, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace.
- Among what our fighting creed commands us is His saying, the Exalted, that we fight our enemies and whoever violates the sanctities of our religion or its believers, until the religion is entirely for Allāh: {And fight them until there is no fitnah and [until] the religion, all of it, is for Allāh. And if they cease - then indeed, Allāh is Seeing of what they do.} (Al-Baqarah 2:193). It teaches us and fills us with faith that judgment belongs to Allāh alone:

- {Legislation is not but for Allāh. He has commanded that you worship not except Him. That is the correct religion.} (Yūsuf 12:40). And that the Sharī‘ah of Allāh came to rule and prevail, and to regulate the lives of Muslims: {Indeed, We have revealed to you, [O Muḥammad], the Book in truth so you may judge between the people by that which Allāh has shown you. And do not be for the deceitful an advocate.} (Al-Nisā’ 4:105). It teaches us that turning away from this causes us worldly disgrace, the convergence of enemies, punishment in the Hereafter, and Allāh's wrath.
- Our Jihādī creed clarifies for us who our believing allies (awliyā’) are and commands us to ally with them, and who our disbelieving enemies are and commands us to disavow them and wage Jihād against them as much as we are able.
- It teaches us that whoever allies with the believers is a believer, and whoever allies with our disbelieving enemies is one of them, and like them in ruling in this world and the Hereafter, and it commands us to fight them.
- Our Jihādī creed clarifies the obligation to work for the implementation of Allāh's Sharī‘ah, to appoint a Muslim Imām, and to establish the state of Islām.
- Our creed commands us to fight those who ally with our enemies and fight under their banner. It details for us the rulings concerning their various types and forms, including loyalists, the ignorant, and the coerced.
- Our fighting creed equips us with the traits and morals that aid in this, such as faith, patience, generosity, courage, steadfastness, mercy, worship, devotion, and sacrificing one's self, wealth, parents, and children in the way of Allāh.
- The mujāhid in the way of Allāh is disciplined with the ethics of mercy, justice, fairness, and all aspects of praiseworthy morals and manners.

- It also teaches us the etiquette of dealing with the enemy himself, and the rulings concerning that on the battlefield, or in a state of treaty, truce, or reconciliation. It teaches us the rulings of dhimmah (covenant of protection) and isti'mān (granting security) as Allāh commanded, not as promoted today by the sycophantic court scholars, the allies of the disbelievers.
- The Jihādī creed teaches us obedience to Muslim authorities. It also teaches us that there is no obedience to one who disobeys Allāh, and that obedience is in what is good. It teaches us to advise them, support them, and assist them in righteousness and piety, not in sin and aggression. And to be patient with their slips and mistakes, and even their injustice, even if they flog backs and seize wealth. And to overlook all of that unless it reaches the level of the most corrupt corruption and the most wicked transgression. It taught us this with a decisive Qur'ānic text: {O you who have believed, obey Allāh and obey the Messenger and those in authority among you. And if you disagree over anything, refer it to Allāh and the Messenger, if you should believe in Allāh and the Last Day. That is best and most Dhimmah appropriate in result.} (Al-Nisā' 4:59). It clarifies for us who are the authorities "among us" – as long as they uphold the laws of Islām. It also clarifies for us, with a decisive text, that if our rulers ally with our enemies, they are no longer "among us." Allāh, the Exalted, said:
- {O you who have believed, do not take the Jews and the Christians as allies. They are [in fact] allies of one another. And whoever is an ally to them among you – then indeed, he is [one] of them. Indeed, Allāh guides not the wrongdoing people.} (Al-Mā'idah 5:51). The scholars of Islām said: "(one) of them" means [they are disbelievers like them].
- At that point, our creed teaches us that the obligation is to revolt against the leaders of disbelief, the allies of Allāh's enemies, and to oppose them due to the clear, explicit disbelief we have witnessed, for which we have proofs from Allāh.

- Our Jihādī creed teaches us the obligation of repelling the aggressor from the religion, honor, self, wealth, and land – even if the aggressor is a Muslim, so what then if he is an invading disbeliever?
- It teaches us that a Muslim is the brother, ally, supporter, and helper of another Muslim, and has the right to his support and assistance, even if he is a transgressor, sinner, or negligent. And that a disbeliever is the brother and ally of another disbeliever, and whoever allies with him and supports him against Muslims and aids him in aggression is like him, even if he claims faith and Islām, fasts, and prays.
- Our Jihādī creed teaches us mercy, compassion, and cooperation in righteousness and piety, and the prohibition of cooperation in sin and aggression. And that we fulfill every covenant for its covenanter. And that no bearer of burdens will bear the burden of another, by the command of Allāh, the Exalted. It teaches us: {O you who have believed, be persistently standing firm for Allāh, witnesses in justice, and do not let the hatred of a people prevent you from being just. Be just; that is nearer to righteousness. And fear Allāh; indeed, Allāh is Acquainted with what you do.} (Al-Mā'idah 5:8).
- And it teaches us the saying of our beloved Chosen One: "Whoever revolts against my Ummah, striking its righteous and its wicked, and does not spare its believer, he is not of me and I am not of him."
- It teaches us everything that falls under noble ethics and prohibits its opposite, and so on, from what these integrated creeds and detailed Shari'ah rulings teach us.

- And it teaches us what was narrated from Ibn Zayd ibn Aslam, that the Messenger of Allāh, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace, said: "Jihād will remain sweet and verdant as long as rain falls from the sky. And a time will come upon people when reciters among them will say: 'This is not a time for Jihād.' Whoever lives to see that time, then it is indeed an excellent time for Jihād." They asked, "O Messenger of Allāh, will anyone say that?!" He replied, "Yes, one upon whom is the curse of Allāh, the angels, and all people." (Al-Sunan al-Wāridah fī al-Fitan - 371).
- And the Messenger of Allāh, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace, spoke the truth. Upon them be the curse of Allāh, the angels, and all people!

The Impact of the Absence of the Jihādī Creed among Muslims

Among what our fighting creed teaches us and warns us against is that which the days have come to confirm and prove as a miracle within an endless series of prophetic miracles.

Abū Dāwūd narrated from Thawbān that the Messenger of Allāh, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace, said: "The nations are about to flock against you from all sides, just as diners flock to a bowl of food." A questioner asked, "Will it be because of our small number on that day?" He replied, "No, on that day you will be numerous, but you will be like the scum carried down by a flash flood. Allāh will remove the fear of you from the hearts of your enemies and will cast Wahn into your hearts." A questioner asked, "O Messenger of Allāh, what is Wahn?" He replied, "Love of the world and hatred of death."

This is what we are clearly experiencing today.

This noble Ḥadīth and profound narration has shown, with miraculous brevity by one who does not speak from inclination but whose words are revelation revealed, the impact of the absence of the Jihādī creed on Muslims and its causes in what has befallen their hearts.

So, when the ember of creed fades in the Muslims' souls over time, as has happened many times, the result has always been the same: nations converge upon them like hungry, ferocious wolves upon their prey. They dismember it, desecrate its sanctities, take its lives, violate its honor, occupy its land, and plunder its wealth and resources. And the cause has always been one.

When the ember of faith weakens in their souls, they stray from living the reality of their religion's rulings and laws. They compete for the world and its pleasures, which drag them into rivalry, mutual hatred, envy, and fighting over it and for sovereignty within it. This pushes their criminal leaders to ally with their enemies for its sake and betray their Ummah in pursuit of it.

When this occurs, and corruption spreads among their righteous, and knowledge and religion are professionalized by those who sell them for a paltry price, then Wahn fills their hearts, about which he, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace, informed: "love of the world and hatred of death."

At that point, the natural, automatic result occurs: Allāh removes the fear of them from the hearts of their enemies, and terror of their enemies befalls them. The outcome is what we have seen throughout ages and generations, as preserved in the books of history.

Read, if you wish, about the state of the Ummah during the Tartar invasion, as well as during the Crusades, and what we know about the fall of Andalusia.

And why go far when our recent history is replete with living evidence of the absence of the Jihādī creed from the hearts of most of this Ummah? Our recent history tells us:

The new Roman Crusader campaigns were launched. They toppled the Caliphate in 1924. Then the Sykes-Picot agreements tore the Ummah, its lands, and its peoples into pieces, turning them into conflicting, fragmented states, emirates, and kingdoms. They occupied their sacred sites and plundered their wealth, and settled the Jews in their heartland. What we have narrated briefly in previous chapters is a part of this. For those who do not know history, and whose knowledge and understanding fall short of studying it, here is our present reality with the new Jewish-Crusader campaigns, led by America and its NATO allies from Western countries, and their plans for the Greater Middle East, to occupy it from end to end, and to recruit its rulers to kill the elite youth of their peoples, and to use Muslim armies to slaughter Islām and Muslims. Then, to create programs for the war of ideas, imposing on us changes to the curricula of thought, upbringing, and education in our schools, even the Friday sermons and religious lessons in our mosques, and dictating to us the Qur'ānic verses that we must not print, study, or disseminate.

This is a sample of the consequences of the absence of the Jihādī creed. All of this is from what we witness of the disbelief of rulers, the corruption of most scholars, the misguidance of the majority of the common people, and the Wahn that has possessed everyone: love of the world and hatred of death!

Indeed, matters portend worse: the emergence of generations that sanctify the creeds of the new invading occupier, and call for its ideas, systems of rule, lifestyle, culture, and followers in everything. And behold, the earth proceeds as if preparing to receive the Dajjāl (Antichrist) – multitudes wandering aimlessly, not recognizing good nor denouncing evil.

The enemy has identified the ailment and has begun to plant and nurture it: the war of ideas, drying up the wellsprings of resistance, and eliminating the creeds of Islām, most importantly, aspects of its fighting creed. This is the disease, and its cure is the opposite. There must be adherence to the religion and a replanting of the Jihādī creed in the youth of this Ummah.

The Jihādī Creed in the Jihādī Current of the Contemporary Islamic Awakening

After the fall of the Caliphate, and during its final days and decline, the early signs of the Islamic Awakening were born. They were calls for comprehensive reform, and the Jihādī creed aspect was present in most of them. A prime example is the famous slogan in the mother of Islamic movements and its heart, the Muslim Brotherhood, and the movements that emerged from it in the Arab and Islamic world. The slogan at that time stated: "Allāh is our goal... The Messenger is our role model... The Qur'ān is our constitution... Jihād is our way... And death in the way of Allāh is our highest aspiration."

I find no expression in the literature of any contemporary writer or orator of this Ummah more comprehensive of the components of the Jihādī creed than this slogan, which encapsulates the entirety of religion, its fundamentals, and its branches. The Awakening proceeded under this banner in its early period. But what happened thereafter on the ground? Corruption crept into that Jihādī creed. Many movements ended up with parliament as their goal, the West as their role model, democracy as their constitution, elections as their way, and achieving participation with tyrants in their governments as their highest aspiration. This is the stark reality, however painful it may be and however much its exposure may be a slap in the face to its proponents.

Indeed, the situation deteriorated further. Most Muslim scholars, leaders, and symbols of their Awakening are today moving to adapt the creeds of Islām to the whim of the new invaders under claims of moderation and respect for the other.

One of their top priorities today is to comply with the war of ideas by cutting the roots of the fighting creed. The Jihādī creed has become terrorism, an terrorist ideology that must be fought. Future generations must forget it. If they were to succeed – Allāh forbid, and they will not succeed, by Allāh's permission, because they wish to extinguish Allāh's light with their mouths, but Allāh will perfect His light, even if the disbelievers detest it –

I say, if they were to succeed, generations would be born, most of whom would not know the religion of their Lord nor the history of their Ummah, nor even the language of their fathers and grandfathers. They would be generations without a Jihādī creed to protect this Ummah from demise and defend its survival and the foundations of its existence.

I say quite simply – however painful the truth may be – the Jihādī fighting creed in the schools of the Islamic Awakening has gradually faded since the early sixties. It has only been preserved and nurtured by what has come to be known as the "Jihādī current" – groups and individuals here and there.

We mentioned a part of that history in the fifth, sixth, and seventh chapters of the first part. We showed how most schools of the Awakening, especially the politicized ones, in order to pay the price of entering the realm of "legal legitimacy" for political practice under governments, gradually abandoned their Jihādī fighting creed.

Indeed, many of their symbols and leaders turned to fight those of their own sons who adhered to that creed. They expelled them from their organizations and put pressure on them, not to mention fighting the Jihādī current through da‘wah, intellectually, and in the media, and even in terms of security at times, where some callers undertook to inform security services about the intentions of Jihādīs!

The Jihādī current, through its organizations and the literature of its thinkers, writers, and media, carried that creed in accordance with the initial slogan of the Awakening, in word and deed. Various Jihādī groups and organizations were established on those foundations, and their contributions and the clarity and rootedness of the details of that creed in their methodologies varied.

Overall, it can be said that most Jihādī organizations adopted the Jihādī creed and had a written Jihādī thought and methodology, and consequently, they had their educational program that entrenched that Jihādī creed in the minds of their members. All those organizations went through two stages from a methodological and educational perspective and in training members accordingly.

The stage before the clash with authorities in their countries, and the stage after the clash. In general, those organizations and groups were able to cultivate, during the preparation stage before the clash, a good cadre in quantity and quality based on that creed and methodologies, and mature, exemplary models of ideological mujāhidīn emerged, carrying a firm and clear Jihādī creed. They are the first and second generations in almost every Jihādī movement and organization. However, most of those groups, after opening armed confrontation, were unable, for the reasons mentioned earlier, to cultivate subsequent layers of followers. Although the methodologies were known and documented, the quality and level of education declined thereafter.

When those organizations migrated, they tried to resume their course and were able to build some of that, especially through the Afghan Jihād stage in its first and second phases.

In general, the members of Jihādī organizations represent the best model of the ideological mujāhid who carries a Jihādī creed in the phenomenon of the contemporary Islamic Awakening.

In the experience of the Afghan Jihād, first phase, the gathering of Arab Afghans was heterogeneous. The largest segment did not belong to any organization, group, or amīr (leader). The open public training camps were almost exclusively limited to military training. The few simple methodological lessons given there could not be described as an educational program that instills a fighting creed, with the exception of some valuable and few lessons delivered by Shaykh ‘Abdullāh ‘Azzām, may Allāh have mercy on him, to the first layer of the Arab mujāhidīn gathering before he became preoccupied and then was snatched away by the hand of fate, may Allāh, the Exalted, have vast mercy upon him. Shaykh ‘Abdullāh, may Allāh have mercy on him, left a huge legacy containing many aspects of the Jihādī creed. His legacy is still unjustly neglected and needs someone to extract its pearls.

Despite the gathering of more than 40,000 Arab and Muslim mujāhidīn in the first phase of the Arab Afghans, which constituted a rare opportunity to educate that group or its vanguards on a Jihādī fighting creed to face the impending events and Crusader campaigns threatening the Ummah, that opportunity was lost.

The primary reason, in my belief, was the failure of the supreme leadership of the Arab Jihādī gathering at that time to realize the importance of that Jihādī creed. I believe that many of them, at that stage, did not possess that Jihādī creed themselves, nor did they give it any weight. Rather, they were acting out of religious emotion and limited, specific Jihādī convictions. Indeed, some of them held ideas that fundamentally contradicted the requirements of the Jihādī creed, bearing the imprints of non-Jihādī methodologies they were raised on.

Were it not for the grace of Allāh and the presence of Jihādī callers, some scholars and thinkers, and Jihādī organizations whose members carried that Jihādī creed, the gathering would have assembled and dispersed, leaving behind nothing but the echo of battle shots and training courses that quickly faded, after America's need and purpose from that gathering were fulfilled, without its members knowing and without having benefited the course of Jihād in any way for our own account as Muslims and mujāhidīn.

However, that conscious, understanding cohort sowed the seeds of Jihādī thought and was able, through the camps and guesthouses of Jihādī organizations, and through some lessons and lectures delivered by some thinkers and students of knowledge conscious of their Jihādī creed and its importance, in addition to the spread of literature carrying Jihādī thought, to achieve some impact.

But success in implanting the Jihādī creed among those tens of thousands was shallow and faced fierce resistance from Saudi circles that controlled most of that gathering through many institutions. The weak outcome of that group and its lack of contribution to subsequent events proved the utter failure of the project to educate those mujāhidīn. A rough statistic clearly demonstrates this:

The Arab gathering consisted of about 40,000 mujāhidīn who frequented Peshawar, training camps, and battlefronts between (1985 - 1992). Undoubtedly, more than two-thirds of them received reasonable military training, more than half of them entered battlefronts, and at least a quarter of them actively participated in real battles, making them fairly proficient fighters.

The approximate percentages of nationalities in that group, as far as I could ascertain, were:

Saudi Arabia: about 20,000 mujāhidīn

Yemen: about 5,000 mujāhidīn

Egypt: about 4,000 mujāhidīn

Algeria: about 2,000 mujāhidīn

Morocco: about several hundred mujāhidīn

Libya: about several hundred mujāhidīn

Palestine: about several hundred mujāhidīn

Arab Gulf Emirates: about several hundred mujāhidīn

As for Tunisia, Iraq, Syria, Lebanon, Mauritania, and Somalia, from each came numbers ranging between hundreds and tens of mujāhidīn. The same applies to other countries of the world.

This is in addition to tens of thousands of Pakistani mujāhidīn who attended and participated through independent gatherings and camps or directly with the Afghans.

Let us remain within the framework of the Arab mujāhidīn. Except for a few hundred who were already wanted in their home countries, most of those many thousands returned to their countries as the new world order was launched, the Arabian Peninsula was occupied, Iraq was destroyed and besieged, the Intifada ignited, Russia advanced into Chechnya, Serb massacres occurred in Bosnia, and the tragedies of Muslims continued horrendously as the twentieth century neared its end, with the media bringing into every home what would ignite oppression and anger in the conscience of any Muslim.

So, what was the role of those thousands of mujāhidīn who were prepared, trained, mastered the use of light and heavy weapons, and learned the use of explosives and all kinds of arms? What was their impact on that raging battle everywhere in general, and in the Middle East – the Arabian Peninsula, Iraq, and Greater Syria – in particular?

Almost nothing. Except for some individual Jihādī operations, most of which were carried out by those who had no connection to that gathering at all, and except for some who joined the Bosnian and Chechen fronts in the same Afghan manner, those multitudes did not contribute to the battle.

Their conduct ranged from some cases of turning against Jihād and the Awakening altogether, as happened in Yemen with Jihādī cadres joining Yemeni intelligence services and the army – among whom were close associates and aides of Shaykh Usāmah bin Lādin himself! – to cases of complete return to the worldly life they had left for Jihād, then returning to immerse themselves in it completely as if there had been no Jihād or preparation!

This is in addition to some cases of deviance, intellectual aberration, and falling into the labyrinths of extremism, takfīr (declaring Muslims as disbelievers), and frustration resulting from zeal without a sound Jihādī creed!

So why was that?

The reason is very clear: it was because those multitudes did not receive any guidance or training in the field of the Jihādī fighting creed. They received nothing of Sharī‘ah-based creedal lectures, neither in the field of politics and understanding of reality, nor in the scope of operational thought and Sharī‘ah-based political awareness.

Military training, military training, sports, weapons, sessions of chanting, fighting, battles... only that.

Some leaders of the Arab mujāhidīn gathering resisted any discourse of Jihādī thought and political awareness.

This had its reasons, which I may address if I write about the history of that period; this is not the place for it here.

But I point to the results of the absence of proper and sufficient education and awareness in the field of Jihādī thought and creed, and I give a glaringly clear example:

The largest gathering of Arab mujāhidīn was those from the Arabian Peninsula who came from the Gulf Cooperation Council countries and Yemen, headed by Saudi Arabia. They numbered about 25,000 mujāhidīn, perhaps more, plus several thousand who went to Bosnia, Chechnya, and other open fronts.

They returned to their countries during the second half of the nineties to live under a state of semi-overt occupation by America, and its launch with its NATO allies from their lands to kill Muslims in Iraq, and to support and kill Jews in Palestine. This was in addition to the persecution, imprisonment, and investigations they faced at the hands of intelligence agencies in their countries, especially Saudi Arabia. So, what was the reaction to all of that? Simply nothing!

Where are the scholars? Where are the orators? Where are the callers who filled the world with enthusiasm for Jihād and martyrdom? There was no effect whatsoever!

From 1991 to 2001, over a decade, American forces on the land of the Arabian Peninsula were subjected to only two isolated operations, in Riyadh and Khobar. If we accept most indications that the Khobar operation was the work of followers of Iranian intelligence and the Shiite Hezbollah, only one operation remains: the bombing of an American residential compound in Riyadh in the Olaya district, in which four Americans were killed! This, in ten years! This shames any nation whose land is occupied by hundreds of thousands of soldiers, and then this is the extent of its resistance! It is a shameful matter!

This, in a country where the enemy occupies the heartland of Islām, which contains their Ka‘bah and the mosque of their Prophet, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace, and even their treasury, which pumps more than a billion dollars daily into America's coffers every time the sun rises and sets!

During the investigation, it was proven that the four mujāhidīn who were executed, may Allāh have mercy on them, in that incident were among those who deviated from the norm of the gathering and had received Jihādī thought and creed from some Jihādīs from Jihādī organizations, and had spent time with them in Afghanistan. The effect of Jihādī thought and creed was clear on them through their confessions and what Saudi television broadcast of interviews with them.

In the final days of the second phase of the Arab Afghans, the general picture began to become clearer and clearer to everyone. America's audacity and its onslaught, and the explicit support of Arab and Muslim rulers for it and for the Zionist project, began to play a fundamental role in the spread of the Jihādī creed. The scandals and hypocrisy of the Sultans' scholars entered a deplorable stage that their admirers could no longer patch up. The features of the picture began to clarify, and the foundations of the Jihādī creed began to present themselves spontaneously among the Ummah in general, and the atmosphere became ripe for a promising revolutionary Jihādī thought.

Then came the events of September and what followed, then the occupation of Iraq and its aftermath, and the events of the Intifada and what is happening there, to make the choice of Jihād, and the discourse of the Jihādīs, the most popular and logical discourse within the Islamic Awakening, and even among various segments of the Ummah with all its components. Here, the need becomes very urgent to represent the foundations of the Jihādī creed and its details in a popular style suitable for the stage.

The State of the Jihādī Creed in the Ummah, the Awakening, and the Jihādī Current Today

The state of the Jihādī creed among the various segments and strata of the Ummah, despite fervent emotions, is passing through a real crisis. The Ummah cannot rise to confrontation and resistance without starting to reform it.

This is a field and a front that is one of the most important fields and most dangerous lines of confrontation in the war that the Ummah is waging today, a war whose intensity increases day by day. This field is the responsibility of the scholars, thinkers, writers, literati, intellectuals, politicians, and media figures in this Ummah, especially and specifically the figures of the Islamic Awakening. And even more specifically, those who will carry the trust of Jihād and the direction of the resistance and the Jihādī current in two stages: the current dangerous upcoming stage, and the stage to come.

A Dangerous and Important Paradox:

The enemy has realized that this line of war is the most important and most dangerous line of confrontation. They realized that they surpass us on all other lines of war: militarily, technologically, scientifically, culturally, in media, politically, in security, and economically. The Jewish-Crusader enemy, led by America and its allies today from among the disbelievers, apostates, and hypocrites, surpasses us overwhelmingly, beyond comparison, in all those fields and aspects, which provides them with the material means of victory on all these fronts of confrontation. That is why they invaded us at this time. But they also realized that we surpass them on the front of the Jihādī creed and moral values, overwhelmingly and beyond comparison as well. That is why the Zionist Crusader Rumsfeld, America's Secretary of Defense, declared that the confrontation with "terrorism," as they call it, has entered the stage of a war of ideas, and that it is one of the most important stages of the "preemptive war strategy." America's declared war on Muslims since the Clinton era in the mid-nineties has passed through several stages. Then, the accursed Bush maintained its strategy and added new aspects to it.

America's war with Muslims and its Crusader campaign under the guise of combating terrorism (meaning Muslims) was based on the foundations I detailed in the sixth chapter, which are:

1. Drying up the financial and material sources of terrorism.
2. Assassinating the leaders and resisters, or capturing and imprisoning them.

3. Eliminating elements through kidnapping and rendition to their countries or international detention centers.
4. Eliminating safe havens for terrorism by forcing countries to deport or eliminate mujāhidīn.
5. Media distortion.
6. Security pursuits in cooperation with the governments of Muslim countries.

Then Bush Jr. added to that, stating and declaring several axes, which are:

7. Direct military advance under explicit Crusader-Jewish banners into Muslim lands, through what he called the "preemptive war strategy."
8. Forming an international military alliance to participate in this advance under American leadership.
9. Transferring security pursuits to the international domain under direct American supervision.
10. Applying the principle of preemptive war to cells of the Islamic and Jihādī Awakening, which they called "aborting terrorist attempts before they arise."
11. And finally, what concerns us in this chapter, which is what Rumsfeld announced and called: the "war of ideas." The hag Condoleezza Rice, National Security Advisor in the American administration, participates in theorizing this war, in which even the Shaykh of Al-Azhar and the Imāms of the Two Holy Mosques participate!

Some Tactics of the American "War of Ideas"

This war has involved tremendous media and intellectual momentum. This included the launch of several radio stations in Arabic and Muslim languages, directly guided and funded by the American government.

Then America entered the field of satellite channels in Arabic with a professional Arab media team of hypocrites, apostates, and collaborators, launching the "Al-Hurra" channel.

America also compelled Arab and Islamic governments to change education and upbringing curricula, and to impose strict censorship to delete anything that would foster a spirit of resistance in the Ummah. American orders were also issued to our governments to adhere to a list of directives that include besieging mosques, lessons, sermons, and religious education, and which contain details of cancellation, restriction, distortion, and falsification.

The calamity of calamities is that America uses many sectors of scholars and symbols of the Islamic Awakening due to government pressure. It uses this professional Islamic sector in the battle of ideas to distort religion and destroy the foundations of resistance and Jihād within it through collaborationist, distorted fatwas under the name of combating terrorism and extremism, and by spreading ideas of submission and dissolution into American thought and civilization, under many names, including: moderation, centrism, cooperation, and dialogue with the other, and other claims of callers at the gates of Hell who wear our clothes and speak with our tongues from among our own kinsmen.

Amidst these overwhelming, oppressive tribulations, the state of the fighting creed among Muslims can be summarized by observing it in three segments:

- The Jihādī fighting creed among the general Muslim populace.
- The Jihādī creed among schools and sectors of the Islamic Awakening.

- The Jihādī creed among Jihādīs today after the events of September, Iraq, and newly emerged circumstances.

We will address this briefly, then I will move to the core of the first part, which is:

The Theory of the Jihādī Creed and Methodology in our Call: The Call for Global Islamic Resistance.

Firstly: Regarding the Fighting Creed among the Sectors of Arab and Islamic Peoples Today:

Due to successive decades of policies of oppression, fear, and induced ignorance, and the war against Islām and the suppression of its laws – practiced by governments through media and educational curricula that rely on corruption and secularization, and the elimination of what remains of the components of religion and creed among their peoples in the vast majority of Muslim countries – little remains of the Jihādī creed among most segments of the Ummah.

And because of the Wahn (love of the world and hatred of death) that has settled upon the hearts of the majority, little remains of the Jihādī creed among the various strata of the Ummah, except for emotions and some traces of what remains of the creed of Jihād among a very small minority of the Ummah.

However, America's campaigns against us for a decade, its successive provocations, what it did in Iraq, then Afghanistan, then Iraq again, and what it proposes today of programs of occupation and aggression on all levels, targeting everyone – rulers and ruled, states and groups, ruling parties or oppositions – and its unlimited support for Israel, and what the Palestinian cause and its developments have stirred, especially since the Intifada:

All this has caused the fundamentals of the Jihādī creed to return to the Ummah. The ordinary man in the street is witnessing a natural, instinctual awakening, which is only prevented from generating actions and deeds by policies of oppression, fear, and police states everywhere.

But the glad tidings appear greater, by the grace of Allāh, then by the folly of America and its Crusader allies, and behind them the forces of the sons of Zion. These glad tidings are tangible everywhere today.

Contrary to what America thinks, its campaigns to change curricula and the principles of upbringing and education, and to fight religiosity, have brought about a tremendous backlash, even within the ranks and circles of secularists, who today find no substance or identity for confrontation driven by motives of honor and dignity, except Islām, its banner, and its identity. It is the plan of Allāh.

The spirit of the Jihādī creed is seeping into the Ummah in a way that inspires hope, indeed, a belief in the proximity of movement towards victory. The masses are stirring.

America has plundered their worldly life, which they were afflicted with loving, and has made death dearer to them as a state preferable to the conditions of life it promises them. Thus, America is solving for us the complex of love of the world and hatred of death!

America is helping us today to detest the world and love death. We should thank them:

So may Allāh not reward them with good, and may He give us power over them with a swift death.

When this sentiment becomes widespread among the masses, they will cast off their weakness. Matters will then proceed in a reverse manner. At that point, awe of us will return to the hearts of our enemies, and we will no longer be worthless, like the flotsam carried down by a torrent. Instead, we will be believing masses, propelled by the driving force of "There is no god but Allāh, Muḥammad is the Messenger of Allāh."

Secondly: Regarding the state of the Jihādī fighting creed within the Islamic Awakening:

Over successive decades and on the path of politicization, the various non-Jihādī circles within the Islamic Awakening, despite their differing schools of thought, have practically shed all the essential components of the Jihādī creed. However, since the rise of the New World Order, and particularly after September and the declaration of Crusader campaigns following the occupation of Iraq against the "Greater Middle East"—which is, in practice, the Islāmic world—the non-Jihādī Islamic Awakening has been witnessing a state of acute polarization and division.

A righteous minority of good people—scholars, leaders, and prominent figures of the Awakening—were provoked by the onslaught, which revived in them a defensive stance and a sense of honor. They leaned towards resistive thought, albeit hesitantly. This is an awakening within the Awakening that bodes well.

Unfortunately, the majority are transforming, whether they realize it or not, into hypocritical pawns in service of Rumsfeld's program for the "war of ideas."

To demonstrate this and to identify the names, organizations, and individuals launching this assault on Islām from within its own ranks, it suffices to trace the various media outlets—internet, satellite channels, newspapers, magazines, and publications. One can then follow the torrent of activity by this battalion waging war against Allāh and His Messenger, the resisting vanguard in this Ummah, under the slogans of dialogue, moderation, centrism, and renouncing terrorism.

The assault and its venom have reached every aspect and principle of this religion: permitting the forbidden, forbidding the lawful, and waging war against Allāh and

His Messenger. Thus, "mosques of harm" are built according to the planning of Rumsfeld and Condoleezza.

Indeed, the mosques of harm and hypocrisy are rebuilding their prayer niches and raising their minarets anew, as an outpost for those who waged war against Allāh and His Messenger, to fight the people of the Qubā' Mosque, who founded their structure on piety from Allāh and His pleasure from the very first day.

The internal battle rages today and will be fierce against Rumsfeld's turbaned vanguards—those with neatly trimmed beards and bulging bellies, filled with illicit dollars out of desire, and terrified by the whips and threats of rulers out of fear.

This has produced for us the likes of the devil among scholars, 'Abd al-Muḥsin al-'Ubaykān; the puffed-up Imām of the Ḥaram, the corpulent scholar, 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Sudays; and the Sheikh of al-Azhar of the Ṭanṭāwiyyāt—and their counterparts in every Muslim country.

As for the state of the Jihādī creed within the Jihādī current after September:

The situation heralds much good, but there are problems that require a great deal of effort and work.

The good tidings are that the American aggression has tipped the scales in favor of Jihādī propositions and broadened popular support for resistance. This facilitates the Jihādī call in its mobilization efforts.

As for the problems, they are several:

The first and most dangerous is that America's war on Afghanistan, and then on the Jihādī current in its entirety, has inflicted severe human losses on the Jihādī current, through death or imprisonment. Most of its core cadre have perished in the path of Allāh, as previously indicated. Only a very small fraction of those who carry its banner and call, especially its writers and theorists, remain. Upon their shoulders rests the task of reviving the call to Jihād, spreading the principles of the Jihādī creed, and republishing its methodologies.

Furthermore, the written Jihādī heritage, scarce as it is, in addition to the intellectual heritage of the Islamic Awakening that constitutes an intellectual and jurisprudential reference for Jihādī thought—such as the works of Sayyid Quṭb, may Allāh have mercy on him, and others like the works of his brother, Professor Muḥammad Quṭb, and some writings by others from the 1960s and 1970s—is today under attack and subject to confiscation from libraries and publishing houses. It is also being slandered and distorted.

Similarly, the thought of Sheikh Muḥammad ibn ‘Abd al-Wahhāb's call and the scholars of the Najdī school, and the heritage of sincere callers from the Land of the Two Holy Sanctuaries built upon it, are all currently subject to confiscation, suppression, slander, and distortion.

Indeed, the matter goes further. The attack today has reached the heritage of figures like Imām Ibn Taymiyyah, Ibn al-Qayyim, and their school, and other works at every level that could provide material for the Jihādī creed.

They are even pursuing certain Qur’ānic texts in elementary school books. They have stated in some of their studies that they will not allow the teaching of the Sūrah that says, {Say, "O disbelievers, I do not worship what you worship..."} because it concludes with {For you is your religion, and for me is my religion}. This, they claim, encourages terrorism. How? The answer is simple: today, there is only one religion, the religion of Bush, who wants to impose himself upon the world as one, singular lord, accepting no partner. May this cur be abased.

And the people must decide: either with him or against him. So has the criminal decreed.

Thus, the Jihādī creed within the Jihādī current is threatened by the absence of its pioneers on one hand, and by the suppression of its literature and supporting materials from the Islamic library on the other.

There is a third problem: Jihādī thought was built on the principle of Allāh's sovereignty (ḥākimiyyah) and the principles of separation from all pillars of pre-Islamic ignorance (jāhiliyyah), in order to launch elite Jihādī organizations that fight regimes. It had its jurisprudence and literature, a heritage that must be preserved, but with attention to an important matter:

Our battle today is different. It is a battle to repel the aggression of infidel enemies and their allies, through an internationalist approach and a global Islamic popular resistance. This is a field about which little has been written, and today it needs its thought, theories, jurisprudence, rulings, and literature.

So who will undertake this, when swords have claimed the men of the Jihādī current, and they have gone to their Lord as martyrs? And when chains have dragged thousands, tens of thousands, of mujāhidīn to America's Guantanamo and the many "Guantanamos" in European, and even Arab and Islāmic, countries?

The gap is vacant. We ask Allāh to appoint its knights. This is where the beginning lies. A Jihādī creed suitable for the stage of resistance must be put forth.

After these introductions and clarifications, we will delve into the heart of the subject.

The Fundamentals of Jihādī Creed, Thought, and Methodology in the Call for Global Islamic Resistance

To begin, we state that creed is an indivisible whole. This academic division is only to facilitate understanding, distinguish between parts of the creed, and clarify the interconnectedness of these parts.

The "fighting Jihādī creed" is a branch of the whole, which is the "Islamic creed." This briefly includes all the pillars of Islām and faith (īmān), submission to the rules of Sharī‘ah and religion, obedience and compliance with the judgment of Allāh and His Messenger, and everything that arises from this compliance and submission—from belief in the heart, affirmation by the tongue, and action by the limbs, and the conduct, thoughts, and feelings that follow. All of this is part of the creed, as is the consequent striving to do what is commanded and abandon what is forbidden, with contentment and submission.

When I intended to introduce the Jihādī creed with an overview of creed in its comprehensiveness, I decided to excerpt from the writings of Sheikh ‘Abdullāh ‘Azzām. It is my methodology in writing that if I arrive at a concept, or write something, and then find that a predecessor has summarized it well, I suffice with their summary.

Our esteemed Sheikh and professor, Abū Muḥammad ‘Abdullāh ‘Azzām, may Allāh forgive him and have vast mercy upon him, defined it in his concise and valuable booklet, Creed and its Impact on Building the Generation, saying:

"Creed is the faithful regulator that governs actions and directs behavior. Everything that emanates from the self—words, movements, even the fleeting thoughts that stir the heart, the feelings that work in the soul's recesses, and the notions that cross the imagination—all depend on the extent of its precision and soundness. In short, creed is the brain of behavior. If a part of it malfunctions, it causes great corruption in behavior and a huge deviation from the straight path..."

He then said: "Based on this, all the deviations we suffer from in our behavior, as individuals and groups, are entirely due to deviations in creedal perception. People these days need to rebuild their creed and correct their conceptual understanding of belief. Allāh, Glorified and Exalted be He, must be singled out for divinity. The greatness of Allāh, Mighty and Majestic, must be established in the depths of the soul, and love for Him must fill hearts. There is no escape from hearts living while sensing His awe and majesty. This religion is founded upon:

1. The reality of Divinity.
2. The reality of Servitude.
3. The connection between the servant and his Lord.

These are three matters that must be established in the souls:

- Knowledge of Allāh and His measure.
- Knowledge of the servant and his limit.
- And the connection between the Creator and the created.

Therefore, it is futile to pursue the branches of Sharī'ah and demand them from a person in whose heart the reality of this religion is not firmly rooted, and in whose being the greatness of Allāh, which dominates every stillness, whisper, and movement in this universe, is not established. The truth is that the reality of this great religion has become absent from people. Many of them—even those who perform acts of worship—are like a blind man who has grasped the tail of an elephant and thinks he holds the entire elephant in his hands..."

He further stated: "It has become commonplace today to see a person who regularly performs acts of worship while simultaneously engaging in actions that remove him from the framework of this religion, such as mocking an established Sunnah of the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings of Allāh be upon him, or an obligation mentioned in the clear revelation. He does not know that by mocking, he is mocking and ridiculing the commands of Allāh. The people of knowledge in this Ummah have agreed that this means the apostasy of the mocker and his exit from Islām. Cursing the religion, or cursing Allāh or His Messenger, falls into this category; whoever does so is judged to have apostatized..."

Then he said: "I return to affirm the great truth: people do not know the reality of this religion and mix various methodologies in their lives. A small portion of their life's methodology is from the religion of Allāh, while most of the methodology that directs their lives is of their own making or the making of other humans. {Have you seen him who has taken as his god his [own] desire? Then would you be responsible for him? Or do you think that most of them hear or understand? They are not except like livestock; rather, they are [even] more astray from the way.} (Qur'ān, Al-Furqān: 43-44).

Therefore, I believe that focusing on secondary matters of Sharī'ah for people is illogical; rather, it is a futile attempt to plant seeds in the air. One can never form a tree with roots deeply embedded in the earth by merely gathering fresh branches together in the air.

We must follow the divine methodology that Allāh has ordained for this creation. The seed must be planted in the soil, then nurtured until it stands firm on its roots, then extends its branches and boughs. So too with the rest of this great religion; we must follow the path that Allāh has ordained for this being to carry this religion. The foundation must be built by planting the seed deep in the earth, meaning, planting the creed deep in the heart.

Creed is the firm foundation upon which all branches of this religion rest. It is futile to attempt to erect a massive structure without a foundation. Hence, attempting to meticulously follow the branches of Sharī'ah with detailed explanations is to be preoccupied with the less important at the expense of the more important. Such an attempt cannot yield the desired outcome or the hoped-for fruits. It is more fitting to follow the divine methodology in building this religion within the human soul, by first instilling the creed deeply, then demanding of the soul all the commands of Sharīʿah. For the divine methodology in nurturing the soul is part of the creed itself.

We must not forget that the caller to the Lord of the Worlds must fully embody the divine methodology. He must be a Qurʾān walking on the earth; when he moves, the Qurʾān moves with his movement. The caller is required to adhere to the entire Sharīʿah. However, at the same time, he does not demand the branches of Sharīʿah from people before teaching them this religion, drawing their attention to its complete and comprehensive framework, and after they have formed a complete picture in their minds. Then he enters with them into the framework to teach them the details and branches of this religion. This is how Islām was first established in human souls, and this is how it is established every time one attempts to build these souls with Islām. There is no avoiding this path, and no escaping its adoption. Just as these commands and prohibitions are an obligation from Allāh, and following them is a binding duty upon us, so too is following the divine methodology in building the soul an obligation. Any attempt to establish this religion without this divine methodology is doomed to fail, because this religion is and will only be as Allāh intended, and it will only be built by the same methodology ordained by the Lord of the Worlds. Any human methodology we use to convey the truth of this religion to people is inevitably flawed; it is futile, a diversion, and a game.

We must follow the valuable divine methodology ordained by the Lord of the Worlds and trodden by the master of humanity, Muḥammad, peace and blessings of Allāh be upon him, to convey the religion of Allāh to human hearts. We must begin with creed: by introducing people to their true God, the reality of their existence on this earth, and the mission entrusted to them during their passage through this world. Who is responsible for them? Which methodology should govern them? Man's connection to the universe around him, this being's place in the universe—in short, establishing the majesty, awe, and dominion of Allāh in the depths of the human heart and the way to attain His pleasure.

Therefore, at this time, I do not see the point in pursuing the minutiae of this religion in people's behavior, such as drinking with the right hand, abstaining from smoking, or drinking while seated, and other such details that can only be borne and consistently maintained by souls built upon creed and molded by the greatness of faith. We must begin with the human soul as it is, picking it up from the abyss into which it has fallen. Then we walk with it upwards, giving it faith dose by dose. We accompany it in its growth, forgive its stumbles, guide it from here, and refine it from there, until it stands firm on its pillar, solid, unshaken by earthquakes and storms. Only then do we ask of it all that Allāh wants from it, and it implements it willingly, submissively, and contentedly, certain that all good lies in what it has implemented, because all good is confined to the methodology of Allāh, and all evil lies in deviating from the methodology of Allāh.

{Then if there comes to you guidance from Me, then whoever follows My guidance will neither go astray [in the world] nor suffer [in the Hereafter]. And whoever turns away from My remembrance - indeed, he will have a depressed life, and We will gather him on the Day of Resurrection blind.} (Qur'ān, Ṭā Hā: 123-124, the author cites 126/124, but the standard numbering for this passage is 20:123-124).

I reiterate that the souls who present Islām to people must inevitably be a Sharī'ah treading the earth, adhering to the highest standards. They must be clear mirrors reflecting the reality of this religion, its principles and branches. Their flesh and blood must be this religion to which they call, and the methodology they urge people to adopt. {This is [Qur'ān] a notification for mankind that they may be warned thereby and that they may know that He is but one God and that those of understanding will be reminded.} (Qur'ān, Ibrāhīm: 52)..."

He also says:

"Creed represents the foundation for the structure, and a massive building requires a firm foundation and a solid base for the structure to rest upon. Here, another factor emerges from this truth: the foundation must be built before starting to raise the building, otherwise the entire building will collapse. We must begin with any soul we call to this religion or wish to nurture on the basis of Islām, with faith first and foremost, especially in this era where the concept of creed has faded in the souls of this generation affiliated with Islām. We must follow the same path that the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings of Allāh be upon him, followed: establishing creed in the soul, then demanding the branches from it. We must introduce people to their Lord, His greatness, and His dominion over the universe. He is the Owner of Dominion, in His hand is the sovereignty of all things. He is the Subjugator over His servants, to Him all matters return, and He is the Creator, the Provider... We must start here. As for starting by demanding they apply the branches of Sharī'ah while they do not know the Owner of creation and command, this is futile and an attempt to plant seeds in the air."

This concludes the quotation from his words, may Allāh Almighty have mercy on him.

Now, after quoting at length to introduce the subject of Jihādī creed with these words, through which our martyred Sheikh expressed what I wished to express with the best articulation, carrying within them the spirit and style of the martyred teacher Sayyid Quṭb—may Allāh have mercy on him—whose writings are filled with these meanings and terminologies. What I wish to add here is to connect the branch to the root; that is, to link the "fighting Jihādī creed," which is our concern in this chapter, to the comprehensive creed, which is the "creed of Islām" in its totality and perfection.

I contend that this connection between the root and the branches is understood by the enemy in this age more than most adherents of the Islāmic faith realize. When the enemy embarked on invasion and occupation, he knew there would be "resistance"—this is self-evident. He also knew that the most important, formidable, and intractable resistance is that which stems from the "fighting Jihādī creed" among Muslims in general, Islamists in particular, and Jihādīs specifically.

Because this contemporary enemy is intelligent and has been a professional aggressor for decades and centuries, and because he bases his actions on strategic studies and expert opinions, he has understood this simple equation profoundly—an understanding that, unfortunately, eludes most Muslims, even most leaders of the Awakening and scholars of this era among Muslims.

This equation, understood by the enemy, is simply:

Resistance is born of a Jihādī creed, and the fighting Jihādī creed is a branch of the tree of the comprehensive Islamic creed.

Therefore, the enemy works today to prevent the fruit of resistance from ripening by drying up the branch of Jihādī creed, and this is done by severing the roots of the comprehensive creed as a system of belief, action, and feeling, and as a methodology of thought and movement among contemporary adherents of the Islāmic faith.

So Bush and his Secretary of Defense announced what they called the "war of ideas" and "preemptive intellectual warfare" after the preemptive military war. They came to us with projects for "curriculum change," modifying methods of education and teaching (both general and religious), and controlling mosque discourse and methods of upbringing therein. This was followed by a project summarized by American strategists in over 1000 pages, titled "The Greater Middle East Project," which lays down the rules for comprehensive change in the Arab and Islāmic worlds at all levels: political, economic, cultural, religious, historical, linguistic, social, artistic, and all components of our civilization as an Ummah—peoples, rulers, and ruled.

From here, we must realize—and this is what I alluded to in the introduction to this second part of the book, as well as in the introduction to the first part concerning "Axes of Resistance and Levels of Resistance"—and I reiterate here what is relevant to this paragraph:

For the resistance we aspire to achieve, there must be growth in the fighting Jihādī creed. This cannot sprout except in souls filled with faith in the comprehensive aspects of the Islamic creed, the foundation of which is complete submission to the meaning of "There is no god but Allāh," according to the specific understanding of the meaning of "Muḥammad is the Messenger of Allāh." Thus, one becomes prepared to build one's life methodology with complete submission, compliance, and contentment with the meaning of this testimony, fully realizing the meaning of His, the Exalted's, saying: {It is not for a believing man or a believing woman, when Allāh and His Messenger have decided a matter, that they should [thereafter] have any choice about their affair. And whoever disobeys Allāh and His Messenger has certainly strayed into clear error.} (Qur'ān, Al-Aḥzāb: 36). And His, the Exalted's, saying: {But no, by your Lord, they will not [truly] believe until they make you, [O Muḥammad], judge concerning that over which they dispute among themselves and then find within themselves no discomfort from what you have judged and submit in [full, willing] submission.} (Qur'ān, Al-Nisā': 65).

The scholars of the Ummah and the leaders of the Awakening must work to consolidate the foundations of the complete and comprehensive creed to impel Muslims to adhere to the fundamentals of their religion, in belief and conduct, and to highlight and nurture the features of their Jihādī creed.

For the sake of the integration we are pointing to between the root and the branch, I will first refer to the various aspects of the creed. Then I will focus on the aspect we are concerned with, which is the "fighting Jihādī creed" and related matters of creed, Sharīʿah-based politics, and other educational principles. With Allāh's help, I will address this as follows:

- (1) A summary of the general aspects of the Islamic creed of Ahl al-Sunnah wa al-Jamāʿah.
- (2) The general aspects of the fighting Jihādī creed for the call of Global Islamic Resistance.
- (3) Some detail on fundamental points of the Jihādī creed for the call of Global Islamic Resistance.

First: A Summary of the Fundamentals and General Aspects of the Creed of Ahl al-Sunnah wa al-Jamāʿah

This summary is based on foundational works such as Creed and its Impact on Building the Generation by Sheikh ʿAbdullāh ʿAzzām, the Explanation of al-ʿAqīdah al-Ṭahāwiyyah by Ibn Abī al-ʿIzz al-Ḥanafī, and the Explanation of al-ʿAqīdah al-Wāsiṭiyyah by Imām Ibn Taymiyyah, with the commentary by Ibn ʿUthaymīn.

It is reported in the authentic Ḥadīth narrated by Muslim, may Allāh have mercy on him, from ʿUmar, may Allāh be pleased with him, that the Messenger of Allāh, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace, said when Jibrīl, peace be upon him, came to him asking: "Islām is to testify that there is no god but Allāh and that Muḥammad is the Messenger of Allāh, to establish prayer, to pay zakāh, to fast Ramaḍān, and to perform Ḥajj to the House if you are able to find a way." He (Jibrīl) said: "Tell me about Imān (faith)." He (the Prophet, peace and blessings of Allāh be upon him) said: "It is to believe in Allāh, His angels, His books, His messengers, and the Last Day, and to believe in divine decree (qadar), both its good and its evil." He said: "Tell me about Iḥsān (excellence)." He (the Prophet, peace and blessings of Allāh be upon him) said: "It is to worship Allāh as if you see Him, and if you do not see Him, then indeed He sees you."

This Ḥadīth has encompassed the essence of the pillars of Islām, the fundamentals of faith, and the levels of excellence and gnosis.

Muslim scholars, past and present, have detailed sufficiently in the chapters of creedal sciences and Tawhīd. The creed of Ahl al-Sunnah wa al-Jamā'ah has been established upon fundamental principles, a summary of which, reflecting my own beliefs, is presented here:

The Creed of Ahl al-Sunnah wa al-Jamā'ah and the Saved Group, by Allāh's permission:

1. We testify that there is no god but Allāh, alone, without partner, and that Muḥammad is His servant and His Messenger.
2. We believe in Allāh, His angels, His books, His messengers, the Last Day and the resurrection after death therein, and we believe in divine decree (qadar), both its good and its evil.
3. We affirm the Tawhīd of Allāh in His Lordship (rubūbiyyah) and believe that He is the Creator, the Provider, the Originator, the Returner, the Owner of Dominion; there is no lord for the universe besides Him.
4. We affirm the Tawhīd of Allāh in His Divinity (ulūhiyyah) and believe that He is the God truly worshipped; there is no deity worthy of worship besides Him, Majestic is His Glory.
5. We affirm the Tawhīd of Allāh in His Most Beautiful Names and Lofty Attributes. We believe in what He, Glorified is He, has described Himself with in His Noble Book, and what has come through the tongue of His trustworthy Messenger, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace, without distortion (taḥrīf), denial (taʿṭīl), asking 'how' (takyīf), or likening (tamthīl). He, Glorified is He, is as He described Himself: {There is nothing like unto Him, and He is the Hearing, the Seeing.}

6. We adhere to the doctrine of the Companions and those who came after them from the righteous predecessors (Salaf) regarding belief in the Names and Attributes of Allāh. They knew those Names and Attributes and consigned the 'how' and the true nature to Allāh, Mighty and Majestic. They believed in Allāh according to Allāh's intent. They believed that He, Glorified and Exalted is He, is described by these attributes in reality, not metaphorically, in a manner befitting the Majesty of Allāh, to Whom there is nothing comparable. We believe in this as Imām Mālik, may Allāh Almighty have mercy on him, summarized the methodology of Ahl al-Sunnah wa al-Jamāʿah and the Saved Group, when a questioner asked him about the meaning of Allāh's Istiwāʾ (istiwaʾ - rising over) upon the Throne and its modality, he said: "Istiwāʾ is known, the 'how' is unknown, belief in it is obligatory, and asking about it is an innovation." So we believe that Allāh Almighty has, as He affirmed for Himself, a Hand, Sight, and Hearing befitting His Majesty, not like our hands and sight. We believe that Allāh Almighty descends to the lowest heaven in a manner befitting His Majesty, without our knowing how that is. And that He, Blessed and Exalted is He, laughs in a manner befitting His Majesty. And that He, Blessed and Exalted is He, is transcendent above limits, extents, parts, limbs, and instruments. We believe in the Throne and the Kursī (Footstool) and Allāh's self-sufficiency from them, and that He, Exalted is He, encompasses all things and is above them.

7. We believe that He, Exalted is He, is established over His Throne, distinct from His creation, above the seventh heaven, while affirming His transcendence, Glorified and Exalted is He, from being confined by time or space. We believe He is with His creation through His Hearing, His Sight, and His Knowledge.
8. We believe in the angels, and that they are a creation from Allāh's creation, entrusted with their tasks which Allāh, Glorified is He, has assigned to them. Among these are protecting humans, safeguarding them, and recording their deeds. We believe in what is established in the authentic Sunnah regarding their actions, detailing what is mentioned in the Qur'ān. Among them are those entrusted with revelation, those entrusted with taking human souls, those entrusted with rain, and those entrusted with mountains. They attend gatherings of remembrance and raise deeds. Among them are the guardian angels who are with humans.
9. We believe in the books of Allāh mentioned in the Qur'ān and the established Sunnah. We believe in the Scrolls of Ibrāhīm, the Torah revealed to Mūsā, the Zabūr (Psalms) revealed to Dāwūd, the Injīl (Gospel) revealed to 'Īsā, and the Qur'ān revealed as the final message to the seal of the prophets, our Prophet Muḥammad, upon him and all prophets of Allāh be peace and blessings. This belief includes two important matters:
  - 10.A. That the books preceding the Qur'ān were revealed from Allāh, then underwent distortion and alteration at the hands of humans, by rabbis and monks, except for the Qur'ān, which Allāh Almighty preserved as the final book and Sharī'ah. {Indeed, it is We who sent down the Dhikr [i.e., the Qur'ān] and indeed, We will be its guardian.} (Qur'ān, Al-Ḥijr: 9).

- 11.B. That the Qur'ān came abrogating what preceded it and as a guardian over it, and that the Sharī'ah of Islām came with the creed of Tawhīd, which is the creed of all prophets, and with the final Sharī'ah abrogating what came before it.
- 12.{And We have revealed to you, [O Muḥammad], the Book in truth, confirming that which preceded it of the Scripture and as a criterion over it. So judge between them by what Allāh has revealed and do not follow their inclinations away from what has come to you of the truth. To each of you We prescribed a law and a method. Had Allāh willed, He would have made you one nation [united in religion], but [He intended] to test you in what He has given you; so race to [all that is] good. To Allāh is your return all together, and He will [then] inform you concerning that over which you used to differ.} (Qur'ān, Al-Mā'idah: 48).
- 13.{And whoever desires other than Islām as religion - never will it be accepted from him, and he, in the Hereafter, will be among the losers.} (Qur'ān, Āl 'Imrān: 85).
14. We believe in all of Allāh's prophets and messengers. The faith of one who denies the message of any one of them is not valid: {The Messenger has believed in what was revealed to him from his Lord, and [so have] the believers. All of them have believed in Allāh and His angels and His books and His messengers, [saying], "We make no distinction between any of His messengers." And they say, "We hear and we obey. [We seek] Your forgiveness, our Lord, and to You is the [final] destination."} (Qur'ān, Al-Baqarah: 285).
15. So we believe in them, love them, and send peace and blessings upon them all.
16. We believe in the Last Day, the Day of Resurrection, when Allāh will resurrect the first and the last from after their death for reckoning. The believers will proceed to Paradise, and the disbelievers to Hellfire. We believe that Allāh has forbidden Paradise to the polytheists, and that disobedient believers will either be forgiven by Allāh through His mercy and pardon, or they will be punished for their sins as Allāh wills, then they will proceed to Paradise by Allāh's mercy.

17. We believe in the divine decree (qadar) of Allāh, both its good and its evil. We believe that Allāh has decreed everything and written everything, and that no soul will die until it completes its provision and its predetermined, allotted term. We believe that if the entire Ummah, jinn and men, were to gather to benefit or harm someone, they could not do so except by what Allāh has written. The pens have been lifted and the pages have dried, as stated in the texts of the Qur'ān and the authentic Sunnah. The believer must be content with Allāh's decree, both its good and its evil. Whoever is content will receive contentment, and whoever is discontent will receive discontent, as reported from the Messenger of Allāh, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace.

18. We believe thereby that Allāh created us and created our actions, although the servant has free choice in his actions and will be held accountable for them. We believe that Allāh is Able to do all things, All-Powerful, Doer of what He wills; nothing occurs in this universe except by His command and decree. Our creed—the creed of Ahl al-Sunnah wa al-Jamā'ah—is a middle path between the Qadariyyah, who attributed actions to servants, denied divine decree, and made the created being a creator of its own actions, good and evil; and the Jabriyyah, who denied free will for the servant and made him compelled in his actions, good and evil, by decree.

19. We hold the creed of our righteous predecessors, that faith (īmān) is speech with the tongue, belief in the heart, and action with the limbs and pillars, and that it increases with obedience and decreases with disobedience.

20. Regarding the sins and transgressions of believers, we hold a middle creed. We do not declare those who commit major sins to be disbelievers, as the Khawārij did, nor do we say that sin does not harm faith, as the Murji'ah said. Nor do we place them, as the Mu'tazilah said, in a state between two states, between faith and disbelief. We hope for mercy and grace from Allāh for the Muhsin (good-doer), and we believe that the sinner among believers will ultimately face either Allāh's pardon or His punishment. If He wills, He will punish him for his sin, and if He wills, He will forgive him by the mercy of Allāh, the Forgiving, the Merciful.
21. We believe in the virtue of all the Companions, and we do not exaggerate in [praising] any of them. We ally ourselves with all of them, seek forgiveness for them, love them, mention their good qualities, and refrain from [discussing] their faults and what transpired between them. We acknowledge their virtue and that they are all trustworthy and upright, may Allāh be pleased with them. We believe that the best of the Companions are Abū Bakr, then 'Umar, then 'Uthmān, then 'Alī, then the rest of the ten promised Paradise (Sa'd, Sa'id, Ṭalḥah, al-Zubayr, Abū 'Ubaydah, and 'Abd al-Raḥmān ibn 'Awf), then the people of Badr, then those of the Pledge of Riḍwān, then the rest of the Companions, may Allāh be pleased with them all. We love the family of the Messenger of Allāh, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace, and ally ourselves with them, without exaggerating about them, and we recognize their virtue and kinship. We love the Mothers of the Believers, the wives of the Messenger of Allāh, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace, and ally ourselves with all of them, may Allāh be pleased with them all.
22. We do not declare any of the ahl al-qiblah (people of the qiblah, i.e., Muslims) a disbeliever for a sin unless he deems it permissible, or commits an act that can only be interpreted as disbelief, such as one who denies something necessarily known in the religion, or deems permissible something unanimously forbidden, or forbids something unanimously permissible, or commits an act that can only be interpreted as disbelief, such as cursing Allāh Almighty, or His Messenger, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace, or wearing a cross, or desecrating the Qur'ān. We follow the way of Ahl al-Sunnah wa al-Jamā'ah regarding the disbelief of one in whom the conditions [for declaring disbelief] are met and impediments are absent, as detailed by the established scholars among the righteous predecessors of the Ummah.

23. We believe in the karāmāt (miracles) of the awliyā' (friends/saints of Allāh), and that all believers are awliyā' of Allāh. The closest and most honored of them to Him are the most pious and the most adherent to the Book and the Sunnah. If someone experiences a karāmah, we examine his adherence to the Book and the Sunnah. If he is upon them, it is a karāmah; otherwise, it is a form of istidrāj (being led gradually to ruin) from Allāh Almighty, as happens to some sorcerers and charlatans, as a trial for them and for those enticed by them.

24. We believe that none knows the unseen except Allāh Almighty, Who informed His prophets, peace and blessings of Allāh be upon them, of some of His unseen through His revelation. Whoever among jinn or men claims knowledge of the unseen has fabricated a lie against Allāh. We do not consult soothsayers, diviners, or sorcerers, nor do we believe them.

25. We believe that those who commit major sins among the monotheists (muwaḥḥidīn) will not abide eternally in Hellfire as long as they do not associate partners with Allāh. They are subject to Allāh's will and wisdom: if He wills, He will forgive them by His mercy, and if He wills, He will punish them by His justice.

26. We believe in the validity of prayer behind every righteous and unrighteous leader and common Muslim. We pray over those of them who die and eat their slaughtered animals. We believe that whoever prays our prayer, faces our qiblah, and eats our slaughtered animal is a Muslim. We do not testify that any Muslim is a disbeliever, hypocrite, or polytheist, unless evidence of such appears from them, and we entrust their inner secrets to Allāh Almighty. We dislike the people of innovation and disavow their innovations and misguidance.
27. We believe in the trial of the grave, its bliss and its torment, and in the resurrection of people for reckoning on the Day of Resurrection. We believe in what is mentioned in the Qur'ān and the established Sunnah regarding the setting up of the scales and the spreading of the records on the Day of Resurrection. We believe in the ṣirāṭ (bridge) that will be set over the brink of Hell, over which people will pass at speeds according to their faith and deeds.
28. We believe in the Ḥawḍ (basin) of the Messenger of Allāh, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace, and in his intercession. We believe that Paradise and Hellfire are real, existing, and will not perish. We believe in the believers seeing their Lord on the Day of Resurrection, without being harmed in their vision of Him.
29. We believe that the Qur'ān is revealed from Allāh, the speech of Allāh, uncreated. From Him it began and to Him it returns. He revealed it to His servant and Messenger Muḥammad, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace, through the trustworthy Jibrīl, the spirit.
30. We believe that seeking help from servants, created beings, the dead, and graves, and believing that they can bring benefit or harm, is shirk (polytheism). Seeking means of nearness (tawassul) through any of Allāh's creation is not permissible. We consider building graves contrary to the Sunnah, erecting domes over them, raising flags, and taking them as shrines to be innovations forbidden by the Sharī‘ah, the manifestations of which must be removed by enjoining good and forbidding evil, as long as this does not lead to a greater evil, when one has the ability to do so.

31. We believe that Jihād continues until the Day of Resurrection; neither the tyranny of a tyrant nor the justice of a just ruler prevents it. It is with the generality of Muslims and their leaders, righteous and unrighteous. It is generally a communal obligation (farḍ kifāyah); if some undertake it, it is lifted from others, except in three situations where it becomes an individual obligation (farḍ ‘ayn):
  - 32.A. When the enemy's ranks meet the believers' ranks, Jihād becomes obligatory, and withdrawal is forbidden.
  - 33.B. When the legitimate Imām, ruling by what Allāh has revealed, who allies with the believers and is hostile to the disbelievers, calls to mobilize, it is obligatory to respond and go forth for Jihād in the path of Allāh with him.
  - 34.C. When the invading enemy enters Muslim lands, or threatens their religion, lives, honor, or property, Jihād becomes obligatory and an individual duty, as is the case these days.
35. We believe that supporting believers is a religious duty, regardless of their sins and shortcomings in religion, due to the right of creed and the brotherhood of Islām. {If they seek your help in religion, then you must help.} We believe that the believer is the ally of the believer, and that the disbelievers and hypocrites are allies of one another. Whoever allies with disbelievers, apostates, and hypocrites is one of them, as He, the Exalted, said: {And whoever is an ally to them among you - then indeed, he is [one] of them.}

Supporting disbelievers against Muslims is disbelief in the religion of Allāh. Whoever resides among polytheists without compulsion or necessity has sinned, and the Messenger of Allāh, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace, has disavowed him.

36. We believe that Tawhīd of ḥākimiyyah (sovereignty of Allāh in judgment and legislation) is a fundamental part and a strong pillar of Tawhīd al-ulūhiyyah (Tawhīd of worship) and the duties of servitude. Whoever legislates without Allāh, contrary to what Allāh has revealed, has disbelieved, apostatized, and exited the fold of Islām. All rulers who govern by other than what Allāh has revealed, as He, the Exalted, described them: {So those are the disbelievers}, {the wrongdoers}, and {the defiantly disobedient}, have all these attributes and their consequences. They are apostates, even if they claim to be Muslims, because of their involvement in legislating without Allāh and ruling by other than what Allāh has revealed.
37. We believe that repelling the invading disbelievers who attack Muslim lands and transgress against Muslims, as well as the apostates who legislate without Allāh and rule Muslims by other than what Allāh has revealed, and repelling them from Muslims today, is an individual obligation upon every Muslim. Every Muslim must wage Jihād against them; Allāh does not burden a soul beyond its scope. Whoever wages Jihād against them with his hand is a believer, whoever wages Jihād against them with his tongue is a believer, and whoever wages Jihād against them with his heart is a believer, and that is the weakest of faith. There is no excuse for anyone to refrain from Jihād, except for those excused by Allāh due to legitimate Sharīʿah reasons, such as the blind, the lame, the sick, those who find nothing to spend, and the oppressed who cannot devise a plan nor find a way, provided they are sincere to Allāh and His Messenger; there is no blame upon the good-doers. Every person is accountable for himself, and Allāh is watchful over him.

38. We believe in everything that has come in the Book of Allāh and is authentically reported from the Messenger of Allāh, in general and in detail.

We are content with Allāh Almighty as Lord, with Islām as religion, with the Qurʾān as Imām (guide), and with our master Muḥammad, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace, as Prophet and Messenger. I seek forgiveness from Allāh, the Great, and I repent to Him.

Before leaving this section in which I have summarized the creed of Ahl al-Sunnah wa al-Jamāʿah—which is my creed by which I worship Allāh Almighty, and to Him alone is due all grace and favor, and I ask Him for steadfastness upon what pleases Him—I would like to highlight a critical issue that has long troubled Muslims throughout the history of Islām. It is one of the major problems that profoundly affects the unity of Muslims in the face of their enemies, as well as the issue of the "fighting Jihādī creed" and its fundamental principles, which we will discuss later, Allāh willing.

This thorny issue is the divergence of Ahl al-Sunnah wa al-Jamāʿah into two schools regarding some matters of "creed" and two opinions regarding the issue of "jurisprudential schools (madhāhib)." A concise explanation of this and my summary opinion on it—I ask Allāh for guidance, success, and rectitude towards what pleases Him—will be presented in the following section, Allāh willing.

Some Effects of the Islamic Creed Being Alive in the Heart of a Muslim and its Application in Real Life

This is a vast topic about which many books have been written. So that this research does not deviate from its purpose, I will allude to some of this by way of mention and indication, concerning the effects of the pillars of Islām and faith on the soul and conduct of a Muslim.

When a believer truly and sincerely testifies that there is no god but Allāh and that Muḥammad is the Messenger of Allāh, and his heart is filled with it, and its lights permeate his mind and being, and are reflected in his beliefs, thoughts, morals, and behavior, he transforms into a wondrous human being in his loftiness and refinement. He becomes inherently good and radiates goodness to those around him.

By his belief that there is no god but Allāh, no creator of this universe and no lord for it but Allāh, and no deity worthy of worship in truth but Allāh, his understanding of Allāh's Most Beautiful Names and Lofty Attributes is reflected upon him. He knows that Allāh is the Owner of Dominion, in His hand is the disposal of all things, and that nothing in this universe benefits or harms except by His permission. He is the Creator, the Provider, the Life-Giver, the Causer of Death, the Judge, the Just, the Forgiving, the Merciful, the Mighty, the Compeller, the Supreme... He believes that He alone is the Abaser, the Exalter, the Giver of Honor, the Humiliator, the Strong, the Subduer, the Self-Subsisting... Who is not overcome by slumber or sleep, from Whom not even the weight of a mustard seed is hidden, in the darknesses of the earth, nor anything wet or dry. To Him belong the command and the creation. He is All-Aware, a Manager of His creation, All-Hearing, All-Seeing... to the end of the lights of Allāh's Most Beautiful Names and Lofty Attributes. His soul becomes tranquil and his spirit serene. He no longer hopes for benefit or fears harm except from Him alone. He becomes a dignified, noble, and upright human being, not swayed by desires nor misled by Satan. If his foot slips due to human weakness, he knows he has a Lord Who is Oft-Returning, Merciful, Forgiving, so he repents and turns back promptly. If he does well in his actions, he knows he has a Lord Who is Appreciative, Forbearing, Generous, so he strives for more.

And when his soul is filled with the lights of "Muḥammad is the Messenger of Allāh," he knows that he is the trustworthy Messenger of Allāh, upon whom the Qur'ān was revealed from his Lord as guidance for people, a mercy, and a light. He is the truthful, the confirmed, who does not speak from inclination; it is nothing but revelation revealed.

When this is achieved, his soul is filled with faith in the Book of Allāh, and he strives to follow its guidance, permitting what it permits and forbidding what it forbids, and being guided by its guidance. He takes the master of messengers, Muḥammad, the Messenger of Allāh, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace, as his role model and example, following his Sunnah, tracing his footsteps, and persevering with his patience. He is indeed a sufficient example and a lofty model, a prophet through whom Allāh saved humanity, brought it out from darkness into light by His permission, and guided it to a straight path.

When the believer establishes prayer, soars in its expanses, and performs it properly, it restrains him from immorality and wrongdoing. It becomes for him a repeated appointment at Allāh's table five times a day and night, besides what he performs voluntarily for Allāh, Glorified is He. Five appointments in which he stands before Allāh and senses His greatness. He repeats in every rak'ah (unit of prayer): he praises Allāh, Lord of the worlds, knows He is the Most Gracious, the Most Merciful, Master of the Day of Judgment. He directs his worship to Him and asks Him for guidance, saying: {It is You we worship and You we ask for help}, {Guide us to the straight path}. He asks Allāh to follow the path of his righteous predecessors and to make him with them and among them, desiring {The path of those upon whom You have bestowed favor}, asking the Master to keep him away from the paths of the wretched—those who have incurred anger and those who are astray. Those who incurred anger are those who knew the truth and abandoned it, like the Jews. Those who are astray are those whose hearts deviated, so they were not guided to the truth at all, like the Christians. When he continues reciting the verses of Allāh, their lights shine in his heart. He bows, proclaims Allāh's greatness, declares His oneness, praises Him, and glorifies Him. Then he sits, recites the salutations to Allāh, sends peace and blessings upon His Prophet and his noble Companions. He feels a sense of belonging to them, striving in their footsteps, and closeness to them, so he greets them: "Peace be upon us and upon the righteous servants of Allāh." Then he testifies with the testimony of Tawhīd, certain and believing, then sends blessings upon his beloved, the master of the first and the last, and upon his good and pure family and Companions.

Thus, prayer becomes for him a renewed appointment before Allāh, reminding him to strive for good conduct and noble character, making him ashamed of the sins and misdeeds he committed, and joyful for what prayer has washed away of his impurities.

Like prayer, zakāh has its effects in purifying the soul, cleansing the spirit, and conquering stinginess and miserliness. It fosters a sense of mutual support and solidarity with Allāh's needy servants, and responsibility towards the bond of brotherhood in Allāh with them.

Fasting has its signs and its psychological and physical effects, and its reflections on willpower, purity of soul and spirit, clarity of mind, and empathy for the hungry in this world.

Ḥajj, with its signs and meanings, has its effects in shaping the believer. He experiences the brotherhood of faith with those who have come from every distant path, from every race and color, having cast off the adornments of the world and adhered to the single, simple attire that carries all meanings of equality, tranquility, and peace. They stand before the Most Gracious in a gathering that reminds them of the Day of the Great Assembly, motivating them to start anew on the path of goodness.

When the heart is filled with the lights of the pillars of faith, and the soul and spirit experience their effusions and mercies, faith in Allāh, His Names, and Attributes fills the soul and is reflected upon it in good morals. It impels it to a conduct of fear and hope in Allāh alone. Man thereby detaches himself from all else and finds a balanced, noble, serious, and merciful personality.

Belief in Allāh's books, His messages, and all His prophets, peace and blessings of Allāh be upon them, and the Muslim's knowledge of aspects of their lives, their suffering and hardship in the path of Allāh, and their patience in conveying Allāh's call, makes the believer feel a sense of belonging to this one Ummah. This glorious caravan has been marching forward since the existence of humans on this earth: from Ādam to Nūḥ, to Ibrāhīm, Mūsā, and ʿĪsā, to the seal of the prophets, Muḥammad, peace and blessings be upon them all, and the calls, prophethoods, and Jihādī, patient nations that existed between them throughout history.

As for belief in the Last Day, it is one of Allāh's greatest blessings upon the believer. It makes man feel the perfection of divine justice, and that matters and grievances for which reckoning and punishment were not completed in this world will be judged with justice on the Day when Allāh sets up the just scales for the Day of Resurrection. This fills him with fear of Allāh lest he transgress, exceed limits, or err regarding his Lord's rights, his own rights, or the rights of others. It also fills him with longing for Allāh's mercy, His abundant reward, and His justice. This inspires him to increase in goodness and hope for reward. So he engages in acts of worship, rituals, prayer, fasting, zakāh, Ḥajj, Jihād, enjoining good, forbidding evil, doing good, and avoiding evil. Belief in the Last Day is tranquility, happiness, and mercy that bequeaths serenity and contentment, and impels towards sacrifice, devotion, and giving.

As for belief in divine decree (qadar), that what Allāh wills happens, and what He does not will does not happen, that there is no might nor power except with Allāh, the Most High, the Most Great, that Allāh is Able to do all things, and that Allāh has encompassed all things in knowledge:

Belief in divine decree is one of Allāh's great blessings upon the believer's soul because it bequeaths contentment, serenity, and submission. It bequeaths strength and courage, generosity and steadfastness, and not fearing people, nor desiring them or what is in their hands. Then, the lights of the Sunnah of the Messenger of Allāh, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace, emanate in his soul, some of which state:

"O young man... guard Allāh, and He will guard you. Guard Allāh, and you will find Him before you. If you ask, ask Allāh. If you seek help, seek help from Allāh. Know that if the entire nation were to gather to benefit you with something, they would not benefit you except with something Allāh has already written for you. And know that if the entire nation were to gather to harm you with something, they would not harm you except with something Allāh has already written against you. The pens have been lifted, and the pages have dried."

Yes, by Allāh, the pens have been lifted, and the pages have dried. Nothing will befall us except what Allāh has written for us; He is our Protector, and upon Allāh let the believers rely.

What strength these lights bequeath to the weak human soul! What hope and aspiration in Allāh! And what detachment from seeking such from other weak, created beings!

These pillars of Islāmic worship and realities of faith, whenever their lights shine from the Book of Allāh and the Sunnah of His Prophet, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace, bequeath all good and turn away from all evil.

The discussion on this is lengthy because the field is vast, expansive, and good. We mention a part of it briefly:

Among what it bequeaths, proportionate to one's faith in it and ability to strive therein, are purity and cleanliness—purity of the soul, and cleanliness of the limbs, externally and internally. It bequeaths readiness for sacrifice in the path of Allāh and in repelling harm from believers. It bequeaths happiness in life.

It bequeaths kindness to parents, maintaining ties of kinship, love for the family, compassion for the weak, loyalty to the spouse, mercy towards children, and striving for their well-being and upbringing on noble morals.

It bequeaths loyalty and sincerity to friends, love for the homeland and the Ummah, and hatred for enemies, oppressors, criminals, and corrupters.

It bequeaths upright conduct and noble character. It bequeaths patience and certainty. It bequeaths contentment and submission. It bequeaths courage and generosity. It bequeaths emulation of good role models and striving for the believer to be a role model for those around him and after him. It bequeaths a sense of Allāh's presence and belonging to the chosen caravan of goodness and the elite of humanity with whom Allāh is pleased and who are pleased with Him. It bequeaths strength and superiority over falsehood. It bequeaths serenity, awe, and gentleness. It bequeaths excellence, good manners, forbearance, deliberation, kindness, and mercy.

It also bequeaths humility towards believers and compassion for them. It marks the Muslim with a tender heart, tears of awe, mercy, and repentance. It bequeaths severity towards disbelief and its people, and harshness towards disbelievers and hypocrites, while seeking guidance and mercy for them, and justice in dealing with them, and equity with creation in contentment and anger.

It bequeaths truthfulness and chastity from what is in people's hands. It bequeaths love for Allāh and love for His creation and dependents, and striving for their well-being and benefit. It bequeaths the creed of allegiance (walā') to believers and disavowal (barā'ah) from disbelievers.

It bequeaths love for meeting Allāh. It bequeaths humility towards His creation.

It bequeaths all noble morals and distances a person from all their opposites, such as bad morals, actions, behaviors, and habits. The research is vast and expansive, and a mere indication suffices us.

Then, sincere belief in Allāh's promise of victory, empowerment, and support for His believing servants—that true promise which has come in many texts of the Qur'ān and the established Sunnah—gives certainty. Certainty of victory and triumph in this world and the Hereafter, of the empowerment of this religion and the rising of its sun to fill the world and reach wherever night and day reach, and of the victory of its adherents and allies on the Day of Resurrection and their attainment of Allāh's pleasure. This certainty generates patience and resolve on the path, because patience is the offspring of certainty.

Belief in the good reward for those who strive, the great reward for sincere mujāhidīn, and the destiny of patient martyrs who advance and do not retreat, makes this certain, steadfast believer a mountain unshaken by winds and unmoved by storms, by Allāh's strengthening. He knows that if he meets his Lord as a martyr, he is alive, receiving provision, in a seat of truth with an Omnipotent Sovereign. He strives for the company of the Highest Companion with the prophets, the truthful, the martyrs, and the righteous—and excellent are those as companions. Thus, hardships become easy for him, and difficulties do not concern him. He proceeds confidently towards one of the two good outcomes: either victory or martyrdom.

Creed and Role Models

This creed, throughout the history of Islām, was not merely beautiful texts and ideals recorded in the Noble Qur'ān, the purified Sunnah, and the books of scholars. Its models were realized on earth from the very first moment and moved, alive, on the earth. The master of the children of Ādam, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace, was an exemplar in everything, a model in everything. He suffices as an example and a role model. Since that day, and with the first generation, models began to emerge successively.

There was Khadījah, may Allāh be pleased with her, then the Mothers of the Believers, may Allāh be pleased with them. The Companions were students of the Muḥammadan school, peace and blessings be upon its founder. There were the models of Abū Bakr, 'Umar, 'Uthmān, and 'Alī, may Allāh be pleased with them. There were the models of the people of Badr and Riḍwān. There were the Muhājirūn (Emigrants) and the Anṣār (Helpers). From his school, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace, the school of this creed, graduated the conquering heroes: Khālīd, Abū 'Ubaydah, 'Amr, Shuraḥbīl, and Usāmah ibn Zayd. From that school graduated the scholars among the Companions: Mu'ādh, Ibn 'Abbās, 'Abdullāh ibn Mas'ūd, and Ubayy ibn Ka'b, may Allāh be pleased with them and all the Companions of the Messenger of Allāh.

It was a creed and a school that produced models and luminaries, may Allāh be pleased with them, from the vanguard of the best generations. Then came the Tābi'ūn (Successors), who were conquering leaders, exceptional scholars, and exemplary callers who spread this religion and followed the path of their predecessors. Then came their followers in excellence. With them, Islām reached the borders of China, Sindh, India, Khurasan, and Transoxiana in the east; the Caucasus and the walls of Constantinople in the north; and North Africa, Andalusia, and the Atlantic coasts in the west. There were leaders, scholars, and outstanding models. There were patient, enduring believing women who followed in the footsteps of the Mothers of the Believers and the pioneering, noble female Companions. Models continued to emerge throughout history, in every time and place.

Wherever souls adhered to this creed, nurtured by its lights and following the guidance of their predecessors, you saw prominent, shining models. Islamic history is replete with them: righteous caliphs, sultans, kings, and princes, both Arab and non-Arab. There was ‘Umar ibn ‘Abd al-‘Azīz, Hārūn al-Rashīd, Nūr al-Dīn Zangī the Turkmen, Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn al-Ayyūbī the Kurd, Maḥmūd Sebüktegin the Ghaznavid from Khurasan, Alp Arslān the Seljuk, Muḥammad al-Fātiḥ the Turk, Ṭāriq ibn Ziyād the Berber, Yūsuf ibn Tāshfīn the Moroccan, and many others.

Among the scholars were Abū Ḥanīfah, Mālik, al-Shāfi‘ī, and Aḥmad ibn Ḥanbal; Sufyān al-Thawrī, al-Awzā‘ī, al-Sha‘bī, Sa‘īd ibn Jubayr, Ibn al-Musayyib, Abū Ḥāzim, Ṭāwūs, Muḥammad ibn Aslam al-Ṭūsī, Ibn al-Mubārak, al-Juwaynī, Abū Ḥāmid al-Ghazālī, and many others, may Allāh have mercy on them.

There were the ascetics, worshippers, and eminent jurists: al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī, Ibn Adham, al-Junayd, Bishr al-Ḥāfi, Ḥātim, al-Saqatī, al-Biṣṭāmī, al-Harawī, and many others.

There were also righteous, worshipping women whose biographies adorn the books.

This school presented models of trustworthy merchants who were callers to this religion, conveying it to the heart of Africa and its remote regions, and to distant sea islands. Islām reached the Philippines, Indonesia, Southeast Asia, and the entire East African coast with them. If we were to investigate their stories, models, and lessons, volumes would not suffice.

Praise be to Allāh, the Islamic library has preserved a rich heritage of models of knowledge, action, Jihād, character, conduct, righteousness, and integrity, unmatched by any nation before or after them. This was nothing but an effect of that comprehensive, complete, divine creed when it permeated people's lives.

Some Effects of the Absence of Islamic Creed from Humanity or its Weakness in the Hearts of Muslims

As for the effects of the absence of such a creed among humankind, you may read the histories of non-Muslim nations and civilizations and what they perpetrated in terms of oppression, enslavement, subjugation, and tyranny against nations and peoples under the rule of Chosroes, Caesars, Pharaohs, and their ilk.

You may read in the books of historians of those nations, in their past and present up to this day, about the disintegration of their societies and their affliction with the vices of adultery, debauchery, alcohol, usury, anxiety, and aimlessness. For one ignorant of their history, their current conditions will not escape the sight of any rational person. It is enough to look at statistics on crime, social diseases, divorce and suicide rates, anxiety, injustices, and wars, and the calamities that those disbelieving civilizations have brought upon their own peoples and upon the peoples of the entire world, past and present.

Indeed, even the Arabs themselves, this nation that became, through Islām and that creed, the best nation brought forth for mankind—what was their condition before Islām? And what did it become when they abandoned it after it had raised them to the pinnacles of glory?

Were the Arabs anything but warring factions, the strong devouring the weak? They indulged in alcohol, practiced vices and adultery, prostrated to stones and idols, buried their daughters alive, and severed ties of kinship and public order.

They had no significance, no weight among nations, like other disbelieving nations lost in misguidance, except that they lacked what those nations had of civilization, glory, authority, and power. Then, for those who misunderstand history and are enveloped in ignorance of it, let them look at the reality of the Arab and Islamic Ummah, its distance from the religion of Allāh, and what this has bequeathed to it after it had achieved honor, sovereignty, and scaled the heights of glory and the horizons of might and civilization, east and west.

Are we not today the most insignificant of nations and the most backward? Are not our rulers examples of oppressive, infidel, dissolute traitors? Are not most of our scholars, who have sold the verses of Allāh for a paltry price, models of rabbis and monks who devour people's wealth unjustly and conceal what Allāh has revealed of clear proofs and guidance? Are not the prominent and wealthy among the people models of corruption, vice, and dissolution, except for the rarest few whom Allāh has protected? Has not this Ummah been consumed by diseases of debauchery and social ills, as it followed the West and adopted the causes of its maladies, thus becoming afflicted just as they were, and even more so?

What we previously described was a model of life with creed. This present reality we live in is a model of its absence. A mere indication of models, details, and lengthiness suffices.

Before moving to the next section, which is the core of this chapter ("The Fighting Jihādī Creed for the Call of Resistance"), I wish to point out an observation I have often repeated in some of my lessons, lectures, and discussions within mujāhidīn circles. It is an observation that has long troubled me regarding its prevalence in the reality of the Jihādī current and its outcomes. This is what prompted me to preface the fighting Jihādī creed with the comprehensive, general foundations of the creed of Islām. This observation is:

From my long interaction with the mujāhidīn, my companionship with them, and my membership in the Jihādī current, I have noticed that a notion has become dominant among the later ones, especially in experiences of mass, unscreened mobilization, as occurred in open Jihād arenas like Afghanistan and elsewhere. There, unfortunately, their leaderships did not attach importance to comprehensive creedal education, nor to Jihādī education, as I have indicated.

A feeling has dominated most young mujāhidīn that fighting is Jihād, and that Jihād is Islām! This has instilled in them the sense that by practicing the ritual that is the pinnacle of Islām, they are in no need of the rest of that complete, integrated body. The foundations of the creed in its entirety and comprehensiveness, to whose aspects I generally alluded in this section, have weakened among many mujāhidīn.

I have often used an example for my brothers, and I repeat it here:

The saying of the Messenger of Allāh, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace, that "Jihād is the pinnacle of Islām" has been misunderstood by many mujāhidīn. We must return to the full Ḥadīth in which this noble sentence from him, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace, appears:

[From Mu‘ādh, may Allāh be pleased with him, who said: "I said, 'O Messenger of Allāh, tell me of an act that will admit me to Paradise and keep me away from Hellfire.' He said, 'You have asked about something great, and indeed it is easy for whom Allāh Almighty makes it easy. Worship Allāh and associate nothing with Him, establish prayer, pay zakāh, fast Ramaḍān, and perform Ḥajj to the House if you are able to find a way.' Then he said, 'Shall I not guide you to the gates of goodness? Fasting is a shield, charity extinguishes sin as water extinguishes fire, and the prayer of a man in the depths of the night.' Then he recited: {Their sides forsake their beds...} until he reached {...they were doing.} (Qur'ān, Al-Sajdah). Then he said, 'Shall I not tell you of the head of the matter, its pillar, and its pinnacle?' I said, 'Yes, O Messenger of Allāh.' He said, 'The head of the matter is Islām, its pillar is prayer, and its pinnacle is Jihād.' Then he said, 'Shall I not tell you of what controls all that?' I said, 'Yes, O Messenger of Allāh.' So he took hold of his tongue and said, 'Restrain this.' I said, 'O Messenger of Allāh, will we be taken to account for what we say?' He said, 'May your mother be bereaved of you! Are people thrown into Hellfire on their faces except for the harvests of their tongues?']" Narrated by al-Tirmidhī, who said it is a ḥasan ṣaḥīḥ Ḥadīth.

The Ḥadīth is clearer than to require interpretation.

The root of the matter is Islām, all of Islām, with the pillars of Islām and the pillars of faith. Its pillar is prayer, with its complete establishment and horizons; and "there is no prayer for one whose prayer does not prevent him from immorality and wrongdoing," as he, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace, said. Then charity, then supererogatory acts and night prayers, then its pinnacle, Jihād in the path of Allāh—the peak of the camel, above its body, its pillar, and what it carries. Then the sum of all that is: "guarding the tongue." This is a symbol of good character, because the "tongue" is a door to good or to evil.

I have said, and I repeat the reminder here: the pinnacle of the hump. He likened the body to a camel. Can a traveler journey on a mount merely on its hump, even if he ascends to its peak? How can one travel on a piece of fat if the hump is not situated on a complete body, standing on firm pillars?

The matter is clear. Here I reach the conclusion:

There is no Jihād as Allāh Almighty commanded without a fighting Jihādī creed. And there is no correct, sound fighting Jihādī creed unless it is built upon the foundations of the comprehensive, complete Islamic creed, through a comprehensive, complete, and correct educational methodology.

This is what has been absent from many organizational components of the Jihādī current, especially in its recent stages.

Now that most of the first generation of Jihādīs have passed, we are in dire need of rebuilding the Jihādī structure in the coming stage on sound foundations. This means building the Islamic creed in its comprehensiveness and perfection in souls, making it firm and strong, and building the fighting Jihādī creed as a branch upon it. Otherwise, by Allāh, disasters will ensue unless Allāh's mercy overtakes us.

The absence of the fighting Jihādī creed from the Ummah will render it a supine, weak, and worthless mass, a platter preyed upon by ravenous wolves and attacking dogs from here and there, after nations have gathered upon its platter because its vast majority—rulers and ruled, scholars and ignorant—have become like the flotsam of a torrent, struck by weakness: "love of the world and hatred of death." This Ummah will not revive and resist except with a fighting Jihādī creed carried by scholars, callers, sheikhs, writers, intellectuals, and Muslim thinkers, who plant it in this Ummah, which yearns to rise. These elites will then lead the youth's march with knowledge, insight, and good example.

The existence of resistance and Jihādī practices, or rather, a military fighting culture, and emotional reactions stemming from dignity, honor, chivalry, and enthusiasm among the youth of the Ummah...

The existence of a fighting Jihādī culture and principles not built on correct foundations of comprehensive creed and religion, under circumstances of oppression and occupation, warns of a catastrophe sometimes more severe than the catastrophes of abandoning Jihād.

The presence of weapons in the hands of fighters who strike the enemy but, in their course, commit the most heinous calamities due to ignorance of creed and the absence of integrated upbringing, can bring harm to the Ummah, Jihād, resistance, and everything we aspire to.

Matters may lead to chaos and tribulations, and the confusion of right and wrong. It may cause betrayals and regressions, and indiscriminate striking without clear guidance. Allāh Almighty has commanded: {O you who have believed, when you go forth [to fight] in the cause of Allāh, investigate...}.

The circumstances are difficult. The enemy is vigilant, and the Islamic ranks are infiltrated. The enemy's agents are in every sector: rulers, scholars, intellectuals, and those with ulterior motives are numerous, too many to point out.

If chaos spreads, vendettas will arise, reactions will occur, people will become fanatical and follow every demagogue, and neither resistance nor Jihād will be sustainable with that.

So, no fighting without a correct Jihādī creed, built on firm foundations of a comprehensive Islamic creed that establishes certainty, regulates rulings, and preserves morals—the morals of fighting, its rulings, etiquettes, and laws with friend and foe. It is a complete religion. Either Jihād on the foundations of religion, or fighting of chaos and epic tribulations, from which we seek refuge in Allāh.

Here lies the responsibility of scholars and leaders of the Islamic Awakening to descend into the arena of leading Jihād and resistance. Every person is accountable for himself.

O Allāh, we have conveyed the message, so bear witness. O Allāh, help us to convey, call with insight, act with insight, wage Jihād with insight, and attain martyrdom in Your path with insight.

Despite my keenness not to prolong the book's discussions, I chose to preface the Jihādī creed with the foundations of the comprehensive creed, for it is the foundation upon which it is built, and without it, it cannot exist. I hope that this indication and summary will suffice for the intelligent, and that Allāh will appoint pen-bearers from among working scholars and sincere callers to relieve the Ummah of the burden of clarification and building the creed and foundations of religion, so that we may devote ourselves to fighting the enemies of Allāh, and so that they may see from us and from the mujāhidīn in the path of Allāh, by Allāh's permission, what they have been dreading. And Allāh is the Granter of success.

Secondly: General Aspects of the Fighting Jihādī Creed for the Call of Global Islamic Resistance

With Allāh Almighty's help, I will address these aspects in this section by way of headings and indications, without delving into the Sharīʿah evidence for those Sharīʿah-based political, intellectual-methodological, or Jihādī-activist principles. I will select from among them some fundamental basics, upon which the remainder is built, and detail their Sharīʿah evidence and horizons in the following section, Allāh Almighty willing.

To begin, I state that many of the methodological aspects contained in this book, with all its chapters and messages, and what I will try to append to it of messages for the Call of Resistance, Allāh willing and if He aids in it, are part of the fighting Jihādī creed. This includes religious doctrines, Sharīʿah rulings, Sharīʿah-based political rules, methodological ideas, historical information, activist ideas, or political stances. All of this forms an integrated methodology of thinking and an interconnected call. All of this is from the fighting Jihādī creed, which forms an integrated culture and mutually supportive information, bequeathing faith, thought, belief, character, and conduct, producing the ideological Jihādī fighter, whose existence I hope for to undertake the mission of resistance and Jihād against the enemies of Allāh.

Among the aspects of the fighting Jihādī creed, which the ordinary mujāhid may suffice to know only in general terms, but which the cadres of resistance and leaders of Jihād must know in detail and with understanding, are the following:

(1) The ideological mujāhid who will undertake the act of resistance as Jihād in the path of Allāh must comprehend the reality of Muslims and what they have reached in all their religious, political, social, economic, and cultural realities, and all aspects of the present reality of Muslims, and what they are living under the circumstances of this sweeping Crusader-Zionist aggression and invasion. This is what the first chapter of this book addressed.

(2) The mujāhid must know the rulings of Allāh's Sharī'ah in this reality. Foremost among these, and their essence, are two matters:

a- That armed Jihād and armed resistance are the sole solution to these problems.

b- That this solution is an individual obligation upon him, which he must practice unless he is among those with legitimate Sharī'ah excuses, such as the blind, the lame, the sick, the incapable, or the constrained who is prevented from this obligation.

This is what the second chapter of this book addressed in general, and its completion and detail will come, Allāh willing, in the following section of this part, with Allāh's help.

(3) The mujāhid must understand the roots of this conflict we are in, and its historical trajectory from the dawn of history to the present day, in general terms. This is to understand the history of this conflict, its reality, and its parties until it became a clear conflict between us Muslims and America and its allies from among the contemporary Romans, just as it was a conflict between our great ancestors and their ancestors from Banū al-Aṣfar (the Byzantines/Romans of old) and their successive centuries, and the stages thereof. Likewise, the form of the current international system, its parties, its roots, and the historical stages that led to its current form. This is what the third chapter of this book addressed.

(4) The ideological mujāhid must understand in detail the history of this conflict, its stages with the Romans and their major campaigns against us, and the equations of those campaigns and the parties involved in them, after having been generally acquainted with the historical course of the conflict between truth and falsehood, especially since the advent of Islām. He must know how Muslims performed in stages of victory and defeat in the conflict with the Romans, in terms of causes: what were the reasons for our victory when we won, and what were the reasons for our defeat when we were defeated? This is to arrive, through a precise understanding of Allāh's universal laws (ṣunān) in that trajectory, at an understanding of the final equation today and its parties, and to deduce how to confront each of them and the means to do so. This is what the fourth chapter detailed.

This chapter is one of the most important pillars of the Jihādī creed and its fundamental bases. It is knowing who we are and who our enemies are, and who is with us and who is against us in this confrontation. Otherwise, the scales will be confused for the mujāhid, and he will not distinguish friend from foe, nor will he know the means of Jihād against each enemy: whom we fight with the spear from among the disbelievers and their apostate helpers, and whom we fight with clarification from among the hypocrites, the deviant, the misguided, and their followers, and how this is to be done.

(5) After that, the ideological mujāhid must know his historical roots as a mujāhid resisting the enemies of Allāh at the beginning of the twenty-first century, resisting the vanguards of the third Crusader-Zionist campaigns launched against us by the wretched Western civilization. He must know that he has predecessors who passed the banner of this Jihād and resistance to him, and that he is the latest link, though not the final one, in a chain of links of this Jihādī Awakening, which is itself the product of a comprehensive Islamic Awakening nearly a century old, regardless of the rightness or wrongness of the sincere, striving individuals who exerted their efforts and made ijtihād (independent reasoning), sometimes erring and sometimes being correct. He should acknowledge the merit of all of them upon him and deal with them according to the saying of Allāh, the Exalted: {And [there is a share for] those who came after them, saying, "Our Lord, forgive us and our brothers who preceded us in faith and put not in our hearts [any] resentment toward those who have believed. Our Lord, indeed You are Kind and Merciful."} (Qur'ān, Al-Ḥashr: 10). This is on one hand, and on the other, to understand the history of their experiences, their failures and successes, their mistakes and correct actions. This is what the fifth chapter addressed regarding the course of the Islamic Awakening over three-quarters of a century. This is one of the most important aspects of the culture of the resisting ideological mujāhid, especially the leaders and cadres in whom I hope a new elite of thinkers and writers will emerge to frame and theorize for this resistance, which I believe will occupy us for at least the beginning of this twenty-first century, and Allāh knows best.

(6) The ideological mujāhid must be acquainted with the history of contemporary Jihādī experiences, even if briefly, after a general overview of the history of the Awakening and its schools. He should know the reasons for the success and failure of those Jihādī experiences to be convinced of the method of resistance we have arrived at, and to have the ability to develop and choose the method suitable for his stage, and not to repeat the lessons and causes of failure. He should know that he is treading a path where tens of thousands of martyrs have fallen, and tens of thousands of prisoners, tortured, and displaced have suffered, and to know the value of those who passed the banner to him, their thought, heritage, and methodologies of work, and to proceed with insight and experience. The sixth and seventh chapters of this book dealt with this matter, concluding the first part.

(7) The ideological mujāhid must be armed with his specific fighting Jihādī creed and his activist methodology of work, after having grasped the preceding general activist, historical, and Sharī‘ah-based political knowledge. As I mentioned earlier, this must be built on a solid foundation of the comprehensive Islamic creed, based on the pillars of Islām and faith. An integrated educational methodology, whose aspects I indicated at the beginning of this part and which the third part will address, must undertake the inculcation of this.

(8) The ideological mujāhid must understand that this conflict of his is: religious in its reality, political in its nature, military in its means, and security-oriented in its method.

Consequently, he must arm himself with his creed in this confrontation, as previously indicated. He must understand and realize the link between the firm, fundamental principles and the reality of political movement and its data.

This is the task of Jihādī leaderships, which must understand their political theory and explain it as much as possible to their fighters. The fighters must submit to their leaderships in managing the intricate political game of this confrontation, which is its most difficult and complex arena. The vast majority of victories in this era are decided politically, and military means today are only to support political programs and strengthen positions. The leaderships of the resistance must realize the weak reality of the Ummah today and formulate policies for it through the jurisprudence of reality (fiqh al-wāqī‘), necessities (ḍarūrāt), and the balance of benefits and harms (mawāzīn al-maṣāliḥ wa-l-mafāsīd). This is what the second part will outline, drawing the features of our political theory, with Allāh's help and guidance, Allāh willing.

(9) Then, the mujāhid must know the role of education, its integrated horizons, and its appropriate methods, to indicate that the call for resistance is a call for individual performance and individual effort. The ideological mujāhid will play the primary role in exerting effort in educating himself and those with him on these Sharī'ah-based, political, military, and security-activist methodologies, knowledge, and sciences.

The guide can direct the mujāhid to rituals, worship, the Qur'ān, remembrance, and night prayers, and can set the educational curriculum for him. But the mujāhid must supervise the purification of his own soul and exert effort. The mentor can guide him to references and books and facilitate his study of research, but he himself must read and learn.

Similarly, the trainer can prepare and train him, but he himself must develop his fighting capabilities.

And the writer can guide him to Jihād, endear martyrdom to him, and remind him of what Allāh has prepared for him, but he himself must step forward and act, relying on Allāh.

The call for resistance is a call that teaches the individual mujāhid primary responsibility for himself, for those with him, and for the entire Ummah.

The remaining chapters will assist him in this, and Allāh is the Granter of success.

Here I move to define the core axes of the fighting Jihādī creed for the Call of Global Islamic Resistance, summarizing them in concise points:

The Jihādī Creed and the Constitution of the Call for Global Islamic Resistance

The constitution of the Call for Global Islamic Resistance is based on and proceeds from the fundamentals of the Islamic creed and the rulings of Sharī'ah-based politics, derived from an understanding of the Ummah's current political reality, the principle of repelling harms and securing benefits (dar' al-mafāsīd wa istijlāb al-maṣāliḥ), the jurisprudence of necessities (fiqh al-ḍarūrāt), consideration of priorities (i'tibār al-awlawiyyāt), and taking consequences into account, based on a precise understanding of the reality of Muslims and the world around them.

We will present here a summary of the foundations of the fighting Jihādī creed for the Call of Resistance, as the following section will include details and Sharī'ah evidence for the most important of these foundations, Allāh willing.

Article 1:

The Call for Global Islamic Resistance is not a party, an organization, nor a limited, defined group. It is an open call. Its goal is to repel the aggression of the colonialist Crusader-Zionist forces attacking Islām and Muslims. Any organization, group, or individual convinced of its methodology, objectives, and methods can join it, directly or indirectly.

Article 2:

The creed of the Call for Global Islamic Resistance is the creed of Ahl al-Sunnah wa al-Jamā'ah, with all their schools of thought and jurisprudential madhāhib. It is a call for cooperation with all Muslims who testify that there is no god but Allāh and that Muḥammad is the Messenger of Allāh, consider the Qur'ān their book and the Ka'bah their qiblah, and the Islamic Ummah their nation.

It wages Jihād with Ahl al-Sunnah, cooperates with the ahl al-qiblah, and seeks the help of every sincere person in supporting Muslims to repel this aggressive enemy, within the controls of Sharī'ah-based politics.

Article 3:

The Call for Global Islamic Resistance believes in the legitimacy of Jihād with every righteous and unrighteous Muslim leader and commoner to repel the aggression of disbelievers against Muslims. This is one of the foundations of the creed of Ahl al-Sunnah wa al-Jamā‘ah.

Article 4:

The Call for Global Islamic Resistance believes that the Crusader-Zionist campaigns attacking Muslims consist of an alliance comprising the following components:

- (1) The Jews, global Zionist forces, and their leader, Israel.
- (2) International Crusader forces, led by America, then Russia, NATO countries, and allied Crusader nations.
- (3) Forces of apostasy, spearheaded by the existing rulers and regimes in the Arab and Islamic world.
- (4) The hypocrites: Chief among them are the official religious institutions and the scholars of the ruling power, along with their followers from among the jurists of hypocrisy, and the media and cultural circles that support the enemies in their campaign against Muslims.

The concise equation of the conflict today is:

Jews and Zionism, led by Israel + Global Crusaderism, led by America, Britain, NATO countries, and Russia + Apostate regimes and secular forces warring against Islām + Hypocrites from among the scholars of the ruling power and proponents of ideologies hostile to Islām versus the armed mujāhidīn resistance forces.

Article 5

The Call for Global Islamic Resistance considers Jihād against this international alliance of Jews, Crusaders, apostates, and hypocrites to be an individual obligation (farḍ ‘ayn) upon every Muslim who bears witness that there is no god but Allāh and that Muḥammad is the Messenger of Allāh. One is rewarded for fulfilling it and sins by abandoning it.

Article 6

The Call for Global Islamic Resistance considers armed Jihād and combat, known as the Jihād of the spear (jihād al-sinān), to be the primary means of confronting the first three parties of the alliance (Jews, Crusaders, and apostates) and those who fight alongside them. It considers the Jihād of exposition (jihād al-bayān), which is the Jihād of argument, evidence, and the word, to be the means of confronting the forces of hypocrisy, including the scholars of colonialism, the jurists of the sultans, and their media outlets.

Article 7

The Call for Global Islamic Resistance adopts as its slogan the saying of Allāh Ta‘ālā: {So fight in the way of Allāh; you are not responsible except for yourself, and rouse the believers} (al-Nisā’ 4:84). It considers fighting invaders and their allies, and calling for such, to be an obligation upon every Muslim. It upholds as a firm principle of its movement that the Call for Global Islamic Resistance is the battle of the Muslim Ummah, not merely the struggle of the mujāhidīn elite.

Article 8

The Call for Global Islamic Resistance considers all forms of presence of America and its allies who are at war with us, in all Muslim lands today, to be legitimate targets for Jihād. This applies whether the presence is military, diplomatic, economic, security-related, cultural, civilian, or of any other form. It demands their departure and warns those who remain that they face death and liquidation.

Article 9

Our call considers all rulers of Muslim lands who ally themselves with the enemies of Muslims—namely the Americans and their allies among the Jews and Crusaders—who rule Muslim lands by other than what Allāh has revealed, and who legislate for them laws other than Allāh's, to be apostate infidels whose Sharī'ah-based legitimacy has been nullified. Allāh Ta'ālā says: {And whoever does not judge by what Allāh has revealed – then it is those who are} the {disbelievers} (al-Mā'idah 5:44), or {the wrongdoers} (al-Mā'idah 5:45), or {the defiantly disobedient} (al-Mā'idah 5:47). They no longer have any share in the words of Allāh Ta'ālā: {O you who have believed, obey Allāh and obey the Messenger and those in authority among you} (al-Nisā' 4:59). Allāh Ta'ālā has commanded us to obey those in authority 'from yourselves' (minkum), and these rulers are no longer 'from us.' Rather, they have become 'from our enemies.' Allāh Ta'ālā clarified this when He said: {And whoever is an ally to them among you – then indeed, he is [one] of them} (al-Mā'idah 5:51). All exegetes and established scholars have said regarding 'of them' that it means they are infidels like them.

As in the authentic Ḥadīth agreed upon by al-Bukhārī and Muslim, narrated by 'Ubādah ibn al-Ṣāmit, may Allāh be pleased with him, who said:

"The Messenger of Allāh ﷺ called us and we pledged allegiance to him. Among the terms of our pledge were: that we pledged to hear and obey in times of vigor and reluctance, in hardship and ease, and when others are given preference over us, and that we would not contest the rule of those in authority." He ﷺ said, "Unless you see clear and manifest disbelief (kufran bawāḥan) for which you have proof from Allāh." (Narrated by Muslim).

Indeed, allying with enemies, supporting them against Muslims, enabling them to control Muslim frontlines, and supplying them with resources and reinforcements to fight their brothers in faith constitutes the most manifest disbelief. Similarly, ruling Muslims by the laws of infidels and altering the nation's religion, its methodologies, and all its foundations in obedience to them is the clearest departure from the religion of Islām. The words of Allāh Ta‘ālā and the Sunnah of His Messenger ﷺ are clear regarding the ruling on deposing and rebelling against them, and indeed, on killing them, as he ﷺ commanded: "Whoever changes his religion, kill him." This is what we will strive for with Allāh’s help.

Article 10

The Call for Global Islamic Resistance nullifies the legitimacy of any pact, pledge of security, treaty, or covenant of protection extended by the rulers of Muslim lands to the infidels. This is due to their apostasy from the religion of Islām and the forfeiture of their authority, and because they are allies and supporters of the infidels against Muslims. Therefore, neither they nor their pacts, pledges of security, and treaties have any legitimacy until legitimate Sharī‘ah-based leaders (Imāms) are established who can grant security according to Sharī‘ah-compliant covenants and treaties, and reciprocal relations within the framework of our Islamic Sharī‘ah.

Article 11

Anyone who supports the invading enemies of Muslims—the Americans and their allies—against Muslims, by fighting with them, or aiding them against Muslims through combat, guidance, assistance, consultation, or an opinion that supports them against Muslims, is an apostate infidel who has exited the religion of Islām. He must be fought unless he desists from this and repents to Allāh.

As long as he persists in this action, all the rulings pertaining to apostates apply to him, such as the annulment of his marriage contract, the severance of inheritance between him and his Muslim relatives, not performing the funeral prayer for him, not burying him in Muslim cemeteries, and all other rulings detailed by jurists concerning apostates. The ruling on fighting such individuals ranges between obligation and permissibility. The practical application of this, however, is subject to the principles of promoting benefits and repelling harms. Every Muslim should know that he becomes an apostate by this act, whether the mujāhidīn fight him or leave him.

Article 12

Regarding those who support the apostate rulers and fight Muslims and mujāhidīn alongside them—their soldiers, police, security personnel, and aides who defend them and obey their orders to kill and pursue mujāhidīn—we do not declare each one of them individually an infidel. They are fought as a general group of apostasy, regardless of their members being ignorant, coerced, or having a misinterpretation. This is especially so since everyone, near and far, knowledgeable and ignorant, has realized that these rulers stand in the trench of America and its allies, fighting the Muslim mujāhidīn youth under America's banner and command.

Article 13

The Call for Global Islamic Resistance is a call to Jihād against colonial invaders and their aides. It is not a call for declaring Muslims as infidels (takfīr). Everyone who testifies that "there is no god but Allāh, Muḥammad is the Messenger of Allāh" has thereby rendered his blood and property inviolable, except by right, and his reckoning is with Allāh. It is not among the tasks of the Resistance Call to confront specific misguided or deviant Muslims by declaring them infidels (takfīr), innovators (tabdīʿ), or defiantly disobedient (tafsīq). This is the task of qualified callers (duʿāt) and scholars who dedicate themselves to it. It is not part of the work of the resistance, which is directed towards fighting the aggressor.

Article 14

The Call for Global Islamic Resistance adopts a strategy of fighting the soldiers of the occupation and all forms of presence of states hostile to Muslims and their interests in Muslim lands, both offensively and defensively, using all forms of armed resistance.

However, it adopts a strategy of fighting the security men, soldiers, and aides of the governments of Muslim lands only in self-defense, despite the permissibility of fighting them offensively and through every legitimate means, whether defensively or proactively. This is for reasons of overriding interests that are not hidden, aiming to unify the ranks of the Ummah against the infidel invaders and to be gentle with all its sons until the truth becomes clear to them, so that they may return to the ranks of their Ummah and resist its enemy. It is also to close the door to sedition (fitnah) and pointless internal strife, and to block the path of those who erect barriers between the mujāhidīn and the general Ummah, such as the proponents of misguidance and the media of the tyrants.

Therefore, the Call for Global Islamic Resistance urges Jihād and resistance forces to avoid deliberately targeting for killing the men of the army, police, and security forces in our countries, restricting such actions to self-defense. It calls on them not to kill their prisoners and wounded, but to treat them well and call them with wisdom to join the ranks of the Ummah in fighting its enemies. It also calls on the men of security, army, and police not to obey their leaders in aggression against Muslims and supporting the infidel enemies of Muslims. It calls them to fight their infidel enemies and their leaders from among the major apostates, not innocent Muslims.

This is a specific independent reasoning (ijtihād) of our call, based on the principles of promoting benefits and repelling harms, and drawing lessons from our past experiences. This is one of the fundamental operational principles of the Call for Global Islamic Resistance, after the principle of armed Jihād against occupying invaders and resisting them by every possible legitimate means in all their forms.

(As for those soldiers working with the infidel occupation forces, such as the army and police in Iraq and similar situations, like those fighting Muslims in the Indian army in Kashmir, these are apostates who are fought in the same way as occupiers are fought.)

Article 15

The Call for Global Islamic Resistance adopts the principle of repelling the aggressor who attacks religion, life, honor, or property, even if the aggressor is a Muslim. This is based on the saying of the Prophet ﷺ in the authentic Ḥadīth: "Whoever is killed defending his property is a martyr, whoever is killed defending his life is a martyr, whoever is killed defending his religion is a martyr, and whoever is killed defending his family is a martyr." (Narrated by Aḥmad and Abū Dāwūd). It is also narrated from him ﷺ: "Whoever is killed defending himself against an injustice is a martyr." (Narrated by al-Nasā'ī). Accordingly, it calls upon mujāhidīn and resistance fighters not to surrender themselves to the soldiers of tyrants and agents of colonialism who intend to fight or harm them. Rather, it calls upon them to fight and kill them in self-defense, adhering to this defensive policy without transitioning to offensive Jihād against them, as previously indicated.

Article 16

The Call for Global Islamic Resistance considers any government established by colonialism and occupation forces, such as what occurred in Iraq with the Governing Council or the appointed government, to be an illegitimate occupation government that must be fought through Jihād and overthrown. The minimum obligation towards it is to believe in its illegitimacy and not to cooperate with it. It does not accept any excuses for cooperation, such as alleged benefits for the country and people or the facilitation of public affairs. It considers such excuses to be void according to Sharī'ah and unacceptable to reason. Colonialism brings nothing but evil and is only satisfied with those who follow its creed, as Allāh Ta‘ālā said: {And never will the Jews or the Christians approve of you until you follow their religion} (al-Baqarah 2:120).

Article 17

Since the Call for Global Islamic Resistance believes in the disbelief (kufr) and apostasy of rulers who govern by other than what Allāh has revealed and who are loyal to the enemies of Muslims—such as all current rulers in Muslim lands—it considers affiliation with their governmental institutions and their three branches of power:

- Executive: The government and ministries.
- Legislative: The parliament, people's assembly, or consultative council.
- Judicial: Courts that judge by other than what Allāh has revealed.

to be a forbidden act and an act of disbelief, for which one at least incurs sin, or may even become an infidel. This depends on one's responsibility, crime, and share of excuse or misinterpretation. This will be further elaborated in the explanation in the following section, if Allāh wills. It calls upon all Muslims generally, and scholars and Islamists specifically, to avoid the tyrannical systems (ṭāghūt) of colonialist and apostate apparatuses. It calls on them not to mislead Muslims by their presence in those tyrannical apparatuses.

Article 18

The Call for Global Islamic Resistance considers the principles of democracy to be disbelief (kufr) in Allāh Ta‘ālā and a creed that contradicts the requirements of the testimony that there is no god but Allāh. It considers calling for democracy and practicing it to be an act of disbelief, for which one incurs sin. This sin may even lead to one's exit from the religion of Islām, depending on the nature of one's belief in it, the type of practice, and one's share of excuse due to ignorance or misinterpretation.

It calls on all Islamists not to seek participation in democracy or advocate for it, whether by cooperating with occupation authorities or the authorities of apostate rulers. It also calls on Muslims not to participate in it, to boycott it, and not to vote through it for anyone, whether beneficial or corrupt. It calls on Islamists and reformers to be active through non-governmental civil society organizations and in various political, social, cultural, and other activities they aim for in terms of reform, without falling into the defilement of entering the apparatuses of disbelief. The purpose of this is to avoid tyrannical systems (ṭāghūt) and to isolate the segment of corruption and collaboration socially, politically, and on all levels.

Article 19

The Call for Global Islamic Resistance considers the efforts of all sincere individuals in the Islamic awakening—be they in proselytization (da‘wah), reform, scholarly, religious, or other fields—which are pursued by all schools of the awakening such as Da‘wah wa Tablīgh, Salafism, the Muslim Brotherhood, Ḥizb al-Taḥrīr, and other schools of Islamic awakening, as well as the efforts of independent scholars, callers, and reformers across the spectrum of the awakening, to be praiseworthy efforts for preserving the religion of Muslims and reforming their conditions. It calls on all of them to cooperate in righteousness and piety and to support the resistance. It considers their efforts in calling to the religion of Allāh as support and strengthening for the roots of resistance in the Ummah and preservation of its components. It calls on everyone to transcend points of disagreement at this stage when the very existence of Muslims is threatened on all civilizational fronts.

It reiterates its conviction that engaging in armed Jihād against the Crusader and Jewish forces, and those who ally with them, aid them, and fight alongside them, is a binding individual religious obligation upon every capable Muslim who does not have a Shari‘ah-valid excuse. The performance of other good deeds and acts of charity does not absolve one of this individual obligation, just as giving obligatory charity (zakāh) does not substitute for performing prayer (ṣalāh).

Article 20

The Call for Global Islamic Resistance considers every Muslim who says "Lā ilāha illā Allāh, Muḥammad Rasūl Allāh" (There is no god but Allāh, Muḥammad is the Messenger of Allāh), regardless of their different schools of thought (madhāhib) and sects, to be within the general circle of Islām, termed by the jurists as "People of the Prayer Direction" (Ahl al-Qiblah). It considers doctrinal, jurisprudential, and sectarian differences to be matters for scholars to resolve, and that the avenues for this are dialogue with truth, and exposition with wisdom and good admonition, as Allāh Ta‘ālā said: {And if you disagree over anything, refer it to Allāh and the Messenger} (al-Nisā’ 4:59). It forbids sedition (fitnah) and infighting among Muslims. It calls on all Muslims of the Ahl al-Qiblah—schools of thought, groups, and individuals—to cooperate in repelling the aggressor and engaging in Jihād against the infidel enemy that raids Muslim lands. It calls on everyone to renounce the causes of internal strife, from which only the infidel enemy invading Muslim lands benefits in such circumstances.

Article 21

The Call for Global Islamic Resistance considers all principles of secular ideologies—such as communism, socialism, democracy, nationalism, and other forms of intellectual and creedal affiliation to other than the religion of Islām and the identity of Islām—to be calls of disbelief and misguidance, each according to its nature, judged by the standards of Shari‘ah. However, it considers most followers of these ideologies from among the sons of this Ummah to be Muslims who are ignorant of their religion and intellectually deceived, due to the circumstances of intellectual Westernization and civilizational invasion that the Ummah has been subjected to. Many of them harbor affection for this religion, feel respect for its components, harbor animosity towards colonial powers, and possess a strong will to resist foreign invasion. Our call invites all schools of the Islamic awakening and various segments of the Islamic resistance to engage in good dialogue and proselytization (da‘wah) among these segments. It also calls on all nationalist and patriotic forces and all honorable people in this Ummah to study their religion and understand it in its true reality, to cooperate in Jihād against the invading infidel forces and those who cooperate with them, and to rally together under the banner of Islām to defend Muslims, their religion, and their civilization.

Article 22

The Call for Global Islamic Resistance considers every Muslim who says "Lā ilāha illā Allāh, Muḥammad Rasūl Allāh" to have his blood and property inviolable, except by right, and his reckoning is with Allāh. It considers the blood of a Muslim to be among the most sacred of sanctities, and its preservation one of the greatest obligations and commands emphasized by the Islamic Sharī‘ah.

It considers what was stated in the Farewell Sermon by the Prophet ﷺ: "Indeed, your blood, your property, and your honor are sacred to you, like the sanctity of this day of yours, in this land of yours, in this month of yours. You will meet your Lord and He will ask you about your deeds. Lo! Do not revert to disbelief after me, striking the necks of one another. Lo! Let the one present convey it to the one absent," to be a divine constitution and a definitive prophetic text that calls every Muslim generally, and every mujāhid specifically, to protect the blood, honor, and property of every Muslim.

It calls every mujāhid in the way of Allāh, who exerts his effort, self, and wealth in the way of Allāh and fights the invading infidels from the Crusader and Zionist forces and their allies, to heed the words of Allāh Ta‘ālā: {O you who have believed, when you go forth [to fight] in the cause of Allāh, investigate} (al-Nisā’ 4:94). It calls them to avoid harming any Muslim. Let them fear Allāh and reflect on the saying of the Prophet ﷺ: "Whoever departs from obedience and splits from the community (jamā‘ah) and dies, he dies a death of pre-Islamic ignorance (jāhiliyyah). Whoever fights under a blind banner, becoming angry for partisanship, calling to partisanship, or supporting partisanship, and is killed, his death is one of jāhiliyyah. And whoever rebels against my Ummah, striking its righteous and its wicked, not sparing its believer, nor fulfilling his covenant with one who has a covenant, he is not of me and I am not of him." (Narrated by Muslim).

Article 23

The Call for Global Islamic Resistance considers religious minorities of non-Muslims who are citizens in our countries, such as Christians and others, to be citizens whose rights of citizenship and residence among Muslims are guaranteed respect by the Islamic Sharī‘ah, within a known and detailed Sharī‘ah framework, which is applied to them when the law of Allāh governs and a Muslim Imām is appointed.

However, at present, the Call for Global Islamic Resistance does not consider them targets for Jihād, unless they cooperate with the invaders. Jihād is rather directed against the invading Crusader-Zionist forces and those allied with them, even if they claim to be Muslim. The Resistance Call invites these original non-Muslim citizen groups to express their rejection of colonialism and invading forces, and to call upon their members not to cooperate with them. It also calls upon the mujāhidīn not to open side battles on such issues, which prevent focusing on the general course of resistance and repelling the aggressor.

Article 24

The Call for Global Islamic Resistance considers the primary arena for Jihād against America and its Crusader and Zionist allies to be the Muslim lands occupied by these colonial invaders, whether directly or indirectly. It is in these lands that their forces and military bases are concentrated, or through which they pass by land, sea, and air. It is in these lands that looting and economic colonialism occur, and where various colonial institutions—security, political, cultural, and otherwise—are spread. These are the colonial targets that mujāhidīn should target throughout the length and breadth of the Islamic world.

Article 25

The Call for Global Islamic Resistance considers its war to be primarily with the governments of countries that have entered into the Crusader-Jewish alliance of aggression led by America. It considers any state that participates in their war effort and aids them against Muslims to be a target for resistance. Foremost among them are the NATO allies, who are bound by defense commitments with America. This also applies to any state that attacks Muslims in any country or place. As for infidel countries that have not been involved in aggression against Islām and Muslims, they are not an arena for war or a target for the forces of Global Islamic Resistance.

Article 26

The Call for Global Islamic Resistance considers its war to be primarily with the governments of hostile states, not with their peoples. While it considers Muslim lands to be the primary arena for Jihād and defense, it calls upon mujāhidīn to practice Jihād against colonial invading governments and states and their allies in their own lands, with Sharīʿah-based political controls dictated by the principles of Sharīʿah and the rulings of Jihād, based on the consequences of actions in terms of benefits and harms for Islām and Muslims. Among these controls are:

1. Not to engage in general combat and targeting in the lands of hostile states except within the limits of deterrence and reciprocity. It is not a primary objective or main battlefield, as the primary arena for Jihād is defense in Muslim lands.
2. To avoid killing the women and children of infidels, as well as those whom Shari‘ah texts stipulate should not be intentionally killed, such as monks and places of worship. Avoid killing non-combatant civilians if they are isolated, as much as possible.

When conducting operations of deterrence and reciprocity in their lands, focus on military, political, and economic targets, while taking care to avoid, as much as possible, those previously indicated as not to be targeted.

Article 27

The Call for Global Islamic Resistance calls for focusing the efforts of mujāhidīn, Jihādī organizations, and resistance forces on confronting the external aggressor. It calls for not opening confrontations with the existing apostate and collaborationist regimes in Muslim lands through comprehensive revolutions according to the old conceptions of the Jihādī current, despite our conviction of their apostasy. Instead, it calls for limiting targeting to high-level apostates from among the leaders of disbelief due to their cooperation with occupation forces and foreign invasion. The purpose of this is to concentrate efforts on defeating the assaulting enemy, after whose defeat, by Allāh’s permission, all collaborationist forces subordinate to it in our lands will collapse, if Allāh wills.

Article 28

The Call for Global Islamic Resistance calls upon mujāhidīn and resistance fighters not to preoccupy themselves with combating manifestations of corruption, immorality, disobedience, innovations (bid‘ah), and religious deviations within Muslim communities through Jihādī actions. These are symptoms of the disease of tyrannical rule (ḥukm al-ṭāghūt) imposed and consolidated by the invading foreign infidel aggressor forces. Attention should be paid to three important matters:

1. The sanctity of a Muslim's blood, even if he is immoral or disobedient, regardless of his actions, as long as he has not committed disbelief.
2. The implementation of Sharī'ah punishments and rulings on Muslim individuals who commit them is the responsibility of the empowered, legitimate Imām, who does not exist at present. The goal of the resistance, after repelling the aggressor, is to establish such an Imām.
3. The current objective and primary Sharī'ah obligation is to repel the infidel aggressor from Muslim lands.

Article 29

The invading Crusader campaigns in our lands, in addition to the military forces supporting and fighting alongside them, rely on two important pillars:

1. Advocates for the occupation who welcome it, promote its ideas and civilization, and condemn Islām and its advocates.
2. Advocates for dissolution, vice, immorality, and licentiousness, spreading intermingling of sexes, adultery, and obscenities under the pretext of personal freedom and living according to the American model.

Most of these are from the sector of intellectuals, writers, thinkers, artists, journalists, poets, littérateurs, and media personalities.

The Call for Global Islamic Resistance calls upon the mujāhidīn to liquidate the senior leaders of these colonialist advocates and their figureheads, as well as the senior advocates of vice and dissolution who work to spread lewdness among those who believe.

Allāh Ta‘ālā said: {And if they break their oaths after their treaty and defame your religion, then fight the leaders of disbelief} (al-Tawbah 9:12).

And Allāh Ta‘ālā said: {Indeed, those who like that immorality should be spread [or publicized] among those who have believed will have a painful punishment} (al-Nūr 24:19).

And He, Exalted is the Speaker, said: {If the hypocrites and those in whose hearts is disease and those who spread false rumors in the city do not cease, We will surely incite you against them; then they will not remain your neighbors therein except for a little. Accursed, wherever they are found, they will be seized and killed with a [terrible] slaughter} (al-Aḥzāb 33:60-61).

This malicious, hypocritical fifth column, openly professing disbelief, is one of the most important pillars of colonialism in our lands and among the foremost working to sever the roots of resistance and belonging to this Ummah. We reiterate for clarity: what is required is the assassination of the senior leaders of disbelief and corruption and the dismantling of their institutions, not their servants and mercenary profligates working with them, nor specific dissolute Muslims.

Article 30

The Call for Global Islamic Resistance considers the Zionist Israeli presence in every inch and speck of dust of the land of Palestine, and the adjacent Muslim lands, to be null, void, and illegitimate. The same applies to every occupation of Muslim lands, wherever it may be. It considers the state of Israel an illegitimate state and an alien colonial entity that must be removed and the face of the earth cleansed of its existence.

It does not recognize any peace treaty or agreement that relinquishes any of the Sharīʿah-based rights of the Muslim Palestinian people. It considers the Palestinian issue an Islamic issue, not merely an Arab or Palestinian one. It does not recognize the legitimacy of the Palestinian National Authority, considering it a rogue authority whose ruling is the same as that of all apostate Arab and Islamic regimes. It considers most of its senior figures to be a group of traitors, blood merchants, agents of the Jews, and slaves to their desires and interests.

It considers armed Jihād to be the only solution for the liberation of Palestine. It strongly supports the Muslim mujāhidīn from Jihādī organizations. It calls upon all fighters and resisters in armed Palestinian organizations—nationalists, patriots, and leftists—to engage in Jihād under the banner of Islām and to renounce the principles of disbelief and misguidance that have always led, and continue to lead, to the Ummah's defeat and to the non-acceptance of martyrdom by Allāh. The Prophet ﷺ said: "Whoever fights so that the word of Allāh is supreme is in the way of Allāh." (Narrated by the Five). And: "Whoever fights under a blind banner, calling for partisanship and supporting partisanship, and dies, his death is one of pre-Islamic ignorance (jāhiliyyah)." It calls upon the youth of Palestine not to waste their blood by working under those banners of jāhiliyyah, but rather with those who raise the slogan of Islām and Jihād, because whoever dies a death of jāhiliyyah is in Hellfire, and Allāh does not bless his actions. It calls upon Muslims everywhere to wage Jihād against the Zionists, their aides, and their followers in Palestine and everywhere.

Article 31

The Call for Global Islamic Resistance considers calls for normalization with the Jews and the cancerous entity (Israel) to be null and void. It considers anyone who calls for it to be a traitor, an infidel, an apostate, and an agent of colonialism, especially if they are among the so-called Muslim scholars or collaborationist rulers.

It calls upon mujāhidīn everywhere to wage Jihād against all forms of normalization, its institutions, its proponents, and its advocates, and to target all its political, cultural, economic, and other establishments, to destroy them, and to assassinate those in charge of them, while being careful not to harm Muslims erroneously in the process.

Article 32

The Call for Global Islamic Resistance considers all Christianizing and Crusader missionary institutions in Muslim lands to be among the most dangerous pillars of colonialism and the most dangerous sources of tribulation (fitnah) for Muslims. It considers them legitimate targets and calls upon mujāhidīn to target them and destroy their facilities. It considers any security pledge or license for these institutions in Muslim lands to be a void license and an illegitimate pledge of security.

It calls upon mujāhidīn and resistance fighters not to confuse these institutions with the churches and places of worship of Christians who are citizens residing among Muslims. Likewise, they should distinguish between foreign Christianizing and missionary institutions and local clergy and monks who supervise the affairs of their religious communities and do not work to sow tribulation among Muslims regarding their religion or to assist colonial invaders.

Article 33

The Call for Global Islamic Resistance is an internationalist (umamiyyah) call that recognizes no identity or affiliation except to "Lā ilāha illā Allāh, Muḥammad Rasūl Allāh," regardless of ethnicity, nationality, color, homeland, language, or any other difference.

It considers the field of action for every mujāhid and resister to be wherever he is, wherever he resides and moves, and wherever his performance is most beneficial, effective, and damaging to the enemies of Allāh.

Article 34

A process of normalization with the Crusaders and American colonialists is currently underway in Muslim lands. This normalization is far more dangerous than the issue of normalization with Israel and Zionism, as the components of this phenomenon today permeate all areas of life and political, social, cultural, scientific, sporting, and other activities. There are many declared projects and others under various covers, including:

- In the political field: Working to establish centers and institutions under their direct supervision, in our countries and in America, to produce political and intellectual elites who carry their project, to undertake these projects within the next ten years to reach decision-making and leadership positions.
- In the economic field: Joint (American-local) projects run by American businessmen and giant corporations, with the participation of local businessmen, merchants, and brokers.
- In the scientific field: Establishing universities, institutes, and scientific research centers (such as the project established a while ago in Wadi Araba), in cooperation with the Jordanian government and scientific institutions there, which is a project between America, Israel, and Jordan.
- In the cultural field: Establishing many cultural, artistic, sporting, and other cultural activity centers under American supervision and with local participation.

- In the social field: Spreading many institutions under the cover of social aid and awareness centers under pretexts of freedoms, minorities, women's freedom, childcare, spreading democracy, health institutions, and so forth.

This massive and dangerous invasion is more perilous in destroying the Ummah and dismantling its components than the military campaigns of Schwarzkopf, Franks, and John Abizaid, and their military fleets.

Mujāhidīn and resistance fighters must target all these objectives, demolish them, and liquidate their foreign administrations and senior local collaborators. Extreme care must be taken to avoid shedding the blood of Muslims who frequent them, or even work in them, because the majority of them are Muslims ignorant of their aims and purposes.

The war effort against Zionist and Crusader normalization centers must be accompanied by an awareness effort undertaken by scholars and callers, parallel to the work of resistance cells in destroying these targets.

Article 35

The Call for Global Islamic Resistance considers that the Sharīʿah rulings concerning lands (diyār), as explained by the jurists, are of three types:

- a. Abode of Islām (Dār al-Islām): These are lands governed by Islamic Sharīʿah.
- b. Abode of Disbelief (Dār al-Kufr): These are lands governed by the laws of disbelief and not by what Allāh has revealed.
- c. The special case: These are lands of Islām that have been overcome by the rule of infidels after being Dār al-Islām, while their inhabitants remain Muslims.

Accordingly, lands in the world today are divided into four categories based on this:

1. Dār al-Islām whose people are Muslims:

These are lands governed by the law of Allāh and most of whose inhabitants are Muslims. This category does not exist today but will be established soon, by Allāh's permission.

2. Dār al-Islām whose people are infidels:

These are lands governed by the law of Allāh but most of whose inhabitants are non-Muslims, like the lands conquered by the early Muslims whose people did not enter Islām.

3. Dār al-Kufr whose people are Muslims:

Such as the case of all Muslim lands today, which are ruled by apostate regimes with laws of disbelief, while Muslims constitute the majority of their populations.

4. Dār al-Kufr whose people are infidels:

Such as most countries of the world today outside the Islamic world.

Many Sharī'ah rulings result from this current reality that must be known, given the absence of a political entity for Muslims and the absence of a Muslim Imām. Among the most important of these rulings are:

a. A Muslim in any of these lands, everywhere, has inviolability of blood, property, and honor by his testimony that "Lā ilāha illā Allāh, Muḥammad Rasūl Allāh." His protected status is not violated, nor is he aggressed against.

b. It is obligatory to work towards appointing a Muslim Imām in Muslim lands and obeying him in what is right, wherever he is found.

c. Rulers who govern by other than what Allāh has revealed in Muslim lands today have no legitimacy, no right to obedience, and no covenant or pledge of security. It is forbidden to cooperate with them or to voluntarily pay them funds. One must draw closer to Allāh by disobeying them, working to depose them, and replacing them with a Muslim Imām wherever possible and the ability to do so exists.

Article 36

The Call for Global Islamic Resistance considers a Muslim's residence in the lands of infidels and amongst polytheists to be forbidden except out of necessity. Explicit and detailed authentic texts from the Sunnah have prohibited this.

In the ḥasan (good) Ḥadīth narrated by Abū Dāwūd from Samurah, attributed to the Prophet ﷺ: "Whoever associates with a polytheist and lives with him is like him." And in the ḥasan Ḥadīth narrated by al-Nasā'ī: "Allāh does not accept any deed from a polytheist after he has embraced Islām until he separates from the polytheists."

And from the Messenger of Allāh ﷺ, he said: "The covenant of protection (dhimmah) is removed from whoever resides with the polytheists in their lands."

The residence of Muslims there has resulted in great harms to them in their religion and the religion of their offspring. Today, the Crusader war is raging, and the mujāhidīn resistance brigades are fighting the armies of the Crusaders in our lands, and their operations reach their lands. This has resulted in reactions from those societies that have led to the oppression of Muslims and their exposure to tribulation (fitnah) in their religion, its manifestations, and the ḥijāb of their women. Some Muslims have begun to incline towards abandoning fundamentals of their religion out of fear of the infidels, and they show loyalty to them and disavowal of the mujāhidīn in the way of Allāh. Based on this:

The Call for Global Islamic Resistance calls upon Muslims residing in Western countries and the lands of disbelief and infidels to do two things:

First: To emigrate (hijrah) from the lands of disbelief and polytheism to Muslim lands, even if this leads to loss in worldly matters and exposure to the oppression of apostate governments. The interest of preserving one's religion and the religion of one's children takes precedence over preserving worldly possessions and a comfortable life, for those not compelled by security reasons to stay.

Second: The Resistance Call reminds every Muslim residing in Western lands, even those who are native inhabitants, that the obligation of Jihād against the governments of those invading infidel states that are part of the American-Jewish alliance is an individual obligation upon him, just like every Muslim everywhere. Its performance is easier for him than for non-resident mujāhidīn who go to those lands to deter their governments from aggression against Muslims. They must resist those governments, wage Jihād against them, strike their interests, and target their rulers and their political and economic powers, within the controls of Sharī'ah rulings and distinguishing between those who deserve to be targeted and those who do not.

We repeat the warning to them: Every Muslim is responsible before his Lord for his religion and the religion of his family, and for protecting their lives and honor. So, seek safety, seek safety! Seek salvation, seek salvation! Do not lead yourselves to the paths of perdition.

{Say, "Indeed, the losers are those who will lose themselves and their families on the Day of Resurrection. Unquestionably, that is the manifest loss."} (al-Zumar 39:15).

End.

Third: Details and Sharī'ah Evidences for Some Basic Points of the Jihādī Creed of the Call for Global Islamic Resistance.

First: Muslim lands today are in a state of direct or indirect occupation by enemies, and Jihād against them is an individual obligation upon Muslims by consensus.

Second: The governments of Muslim lands today are apostate and infidel for altering the Sharīʿah, ruling by other than what Allāh has revealed, their loyalty to infidels, and their betrayal of Allāh, His Messenger, and the believers.

Third: Rebelling against a ruler if he apostatizes from Islām or is an infidel is an obligation upon Muslims by consensus.

Fourth: The rulings of Islamic Sharīʿah decide by consensus the disbelief and apostasy of whoever cooperates with infidels and aids them against Muslims, and make it obligatory to fight him.

Fifth: The rulings of Sharīʿah decide the obligation or permissibility of fighting an aggressor against the religion of Muslims, or their lives, honor, or property, even if he is a Muslim.

Sixth: The rulings of Sharīʿah decide the sanctity of the blood, property, and honor of Muslims, and decide that all forms of presence of infidel aggressors (their blood and property) everywhere are permissible to be shed or taken by Muslims.

Seventh: The obligation to support Muslims in religion if infidels attack them, regardless of the sins and shortcomings they may be involved in. Legitimate Jihād is established with every righteous and wicked among the Imāms of Muslims and their common folk.

Eighth: The issue of democracy and the experiences of Islamic awakening movements with it.

Ninth: The issue of doctrinal and jurisprudential differences within Ahl al-Sunnah.

Tenth: The issue of takfīr (declaring infidelity), general rulings of takfīr, and the issue of declaring a specific individual an infidel (takfīr al-mu‘ayyan).

Let us address these rulings with some detail regarding their evidences:

First: Muslim lands are in a state of occupation, aggression, and invasion by enemies, and Jihād against invaders today is an individual obligation upon Muslims by consensus.

As we established in the first chapter under the title "The Reality of Muslims Today," it has become an accepted fact for every discerning rational person that all our lands, from one end to the other, are occupied, either directly by enemies or by proxy through their apostate deputies, with a heavy Crusader military presence through the spread of their bases in all its regions. This is accompanied by complete economic occupation through the control of economic monopolies, and the proliferation of their intelligence networks and security centers.

Today, America is openly reoccupying the Islamic world. It has directly occupied Afghanistan and extended its control over Pakistan and Central Asia. It has occupied Iraq and deployed hundreds of thousands of soldiers in the Arabian Peninsula, Turkey, and southern Syria (al-Shām), in addition to what it deploys in Egypt, the Horn of Africa, North Africa, and the seas surrounding these areas. Bush has declared that he is leading a Crusader campaign against Muslim lands, accompanied by his allies in NATO from European countries, in addition to the main ally, Israel, which occupies Palestine and is preparing to demolish al-Aqṣā Mosque and expel the remaining Muslims from there.

So, what is the ruling of Sharī‘ah in such circumstances? And what do the rulings of religion impose on every Muslim regarding them?

Jihād is an act of worship and an obligation imposed by Allāh on Muslims. It is established by numerous mutawātir verses in the Book of Allāh and Ḥadīth in the Sunnah of the Messenger of Allāh ﷺ, to an extent that obviates the need to cite evidence here, as they are too famous to mention and too numerous to count.

In the book Defense of Muslim Lands: The Most Important of Individual Obligations by the mujāhid Shaykh, the martyr ‘Abd Allāh ‘Azzām, the Shaykh of the Arab mujāhidīn in Afghanistan during the Jihād against the Russians – may Allāh have mercy on him – we find the following, from which we quote:

Jihād against the infidels is of two types:

1. Offensive Jihād (Jihād al-Ṭalab: seeking out the infidels in their lands) where the infidels are not mobilizing to fight Muslims. In this case, fighting is a communal obligation (farḍ kifāyah). The minimum communal obligation is to man the frontiers with believers to terrorize the enemies of Allāh, etc. Then he, may Allāh have mercy on him, said, which is the point of evidence
2. Defensive Jihād (Jihād al-Daʿf: repelling infidels from our lands). This is an individual obligation, indeed the most important of individual obligations, and it becomes binding in the following situations

First: If infidels enter a town in Muslim lands.

Second: If the two ranks meet and the two armies confront each other.

Third: If the Imām mobilizes individuals or a group, they are obliged to mobilize.

Fourth: If infidels capture a group of Muslims.

Then Shaykh ‘Abd Allāh, may Allāh have mercy on him, discussed the first situation, which is the entry of infidels into Muslim land, saying:

"In this case, the predecessors (Salaf) and successors (Khalaf), the jurists of the four schools of thought, the Ḥadīth scholars, and the exegetes throughout all Islamic eras are in absolute agreement that Jihād in this situation becomes an individual obligation upon the people of that town which the infidels have attacked, and upon those near them. Thus, a son may go out without his father's permission, a wife without her husband's permission, and a debtor without his creditor's permission. If the people of that town are insufficient, or they fall short, or are negligent, or stay back, the individual obligation expands in circles, to those nearest, then the next nearest. If they are insufficient or fall short, then it falls upon those who follow them, then those who follow them, until the individual obligation encompasses the entire earth."

Then the Shaykh, may Allāh have mercy on him, summarized the evidence for this according to the schools of Ahl al-Sunnah and their scholars, saying:

First: The Ḥanafī jurists:

Ibn ‘Ābidīn said in his Ḥāshiyah (Vol. 3, p. 238): '[It becomes] an individual obligation if the enemy attacks a frontier of Islām. It then becomes an individual obligation upon those near it. As for those behind them, far from the enemy, it is a communal obligation if they are not needed. If they are needed, because those near the enemy are unable to resist the enemy, or they are not unable but are negligent and do not engage in Jihād, then it becomes an individual obligation upon those who follow them, like prayer and fasting, which they are not permitted to abandon. Then upon those who follow, and so on, until it becomes obligatory upon all people of Islām, east and west, in this gradual manner.'

Al-Kāsānī gave a similar fatwā in Badā’i‘ al-Ṣanā’i‘ (Vol. 7, p. 72), as did Ibn Nujaym in al-Baḥr al-Rā’iq (Vol. 5, p. 191), and Ibn al-Humām in Fath al-Qadīr, all of whom are leading Ḥanafī Imāms.

Second: According to the Mālīkīs:

It is stated in Ḥāshiyat al-Dasūqī (Vol. 2, p. 174): 'Jihād becomes individually obligatory if the enemy suddenly attacks (i.e., repelling the sudden attack is obligatory) upon everyone, even a woman, a slave, or a child. They must go out even if their guardian, husband, or creditor forbids them.'

Third: According to the Shāfi'īs:

It is stated in Nihāyat al-Muḥtāj by al-Ramlī (Vol. 8, p. 58): 'If they enter one of our towns, and the distance between them and us becomes less than the distance permitting shortening of prayers, then its people are obliged to repel them, even those upon whom Jihād is not normally incumbent, such as the poor, children, slaves, debtors, and women.'

Fourth: According to the Ḥanbalīs:

It is stated in al-Mughnī by Ibn Qudāmah (Vol. 8, p. 345): 'Jihād becomes individually obligatory in three situations:

1. If the two armies meet and the two ranks confront each other.
2. If infidels descend upon a land, it becomes obligatory for its people to fight and repel them.
3. If the Imām mobilizes a people, they are obliged to mobilize.'

Shaykh al-Islām Ibn Taymiyyah says:

'As for defensive Jihād, it is the most severe type of repelling an aggressor from honor and religion, and it is obligatory by consensus. The assaulting enemy who corrupts religion and the world, nothing is more obligatory after faith than repelling him. No condition (like provisions or a mount) is stipulated for it; rather, he is repelled as much as possible. Our scholars and others have stated this.'

Ibn Taymiyyah also says in his Fatāwā (Vol. 4, p. 608): 'If the enemy enters the lands of Islām, there is no doubt that it is obligatory to repel him, upon the nearest then the next nearest, as all lands of Islām are like a single land. And it is obligatory to mobilize for it without the permission of a parent or creditor, and the texts of Aḥmad are explicit on this.'

Then Shaykh 'Abd Allāh 'Azzām added, following these evidences:

'[This is known as general mobilization (al-naḥīr al-'āmm). He then said, and the evidences for general mobilization are:

1. Allāh, Exalted and Majestic, said: {Go forth, whether light or heavy, and strive with your wealth and your lives in the cause of Allāh. That is better for you, if you only knew.} (al-Tawbah 9:41). The preceding verse (9:39) establishes punishment and replacement as a consequence for abandoning mobilization, and there is no punishment except for abandoning an obligation or committing a forbidden act. Allāh Ta'ālā said in Sūrat al-Tawbah, verse 39: {If you do not go forth, He will punish you with a painful punishment and will replace you with another people, and you will not harm Him at all. And Allāh is over all things competent.} Ibn Kathīr, may Allāh have mercy on him, said: "Allāh Ta'ālā commanded general mobilization with the Messenger of Allāh ﷺ in the year of the Tabūk expedition to fight the enemies of Allāh from the Roman infidels among the People of the Book." Al-Bukhārī, may Allāh have mercy on him, titled a chapter: "Chapter on the Obligation of Mobilization and What is Obligatory of Jihād and Intention," and he cited this verse. The general mobilization was because it reached the ears of the Muslims that the Romans were preparing on the borders of the Peninsula to invade Madīnah. So how much more so if the infidels enter Muslim lands? Would not mobilization be more appropriate? Abū Ṭalḥah, may Allāh be pleased with him, said regarding the meaning of Allāh Ta'ālā's words {light or heavy}: "Old men and youths, Allāh did not hear anyone's excuse." (From the abridgment of Tafsīr Ibn Kathīr, Vol. 2, p. 144). Al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī said: "In hardship and ease."

Ibn Taymiyyah says (Vol. 28, p. 358): "As for when the enemy intends to attack Muslims, repelling him becomes obligatory upon those targeted, just as Allāh Ta‘ālā said: {And if they seek help of you for the religion, then you must help.} (al-Anfāl 8:72). Just as the Prophet ﷺ commanded to help a Muslim, whether the man was a mercenary fighter or not. This is obligatory according to ability, upon everyone, with his person and his wealth, whether few or many, on foot or mounted, just as the Muslims did when the enemy targeted them in the year of the Trench; Allāh did not permit anyone to abandon it." Al-Zuhrī said: "Sa‘īd ibn al-Musayyib went out for an expedition when he had lost one of his eyes. He was told, 'You are ill.' He replied, 'Allāh has mobilized the light and the heavy. If I cannot fight, I will swell the numbers and guard the belongings.'" (Narrated by al-Qurṭubī in al-Jāmi‘ li-Aḥkām al-Qur’ān, Vol. 8, p. 150).

Shaykh ‘Abd Allāh ‘Azzām, may Allāh have mercy on him, continues with the evidences for general mobilization, saying:

2. Allāh, Exalted and Majestic, says: {And fight against the polytheists collectively as they fight against you collectively. And know that Allāh is with the righteous.} (al-Tawbah 9:36). Ibn al-‘Arabī said: "Collectively means surrounding them from every side and in every situation." (Narrated by al-Qurṭubī in al-Jāmi‘, Vol. 8, p. 150).
3. And He, Exalted and Majestic, says: {And fight them until there is no fitnah and [until] the religion, all of it, is for Allāh.} (al-Anfāl 8:39). Fitnah is polytheism (shirk), as stated by Ibn ‘Abbās and al-Suddī, mentioned by al-Qurṭubī (Vol. 2, p. 253). When infidels attack and seize lands, the Ummah is threatened in its religion and liable to doubt its creed, so fighting becomes obligatory to protect religion, life, honor, and property.

4. The Prophet ﷺ said: *"There is no hijrah (emigration) after the Conquest, but Jihād and intention. And if you are called to mobilize (istunfirtum), then mobilize (infirū)." (Narrated by al-Bukhārī). Mobilization is obligatory if the Ummah is called to mobilize. In the case of an attack by infidels, the Ummah is mobilized to protect its religion. The obligation revolves around the need of Muslims and the mobilization by the Imām, as Ibn Ḥajar said in his commentary on this Ḥadīth in Fath al-Bārī (Vol. 6, p. 20). Al-Qurṭubī said: "Whoever knows of the Muslims' weakness against their enemy and knows that he can reach them and aid them, he too is obliged to go out to them."*

Imām al-Jaṣṣāṣ said in Aḥkām al-Qurʾān (Vol. 1, p. 242): "We know of no disagreement that if a man were to draw his sword against another man to kill him unjustly, it is upon the Muslims to kill him (the aggressor)." In this situation – aggression (ṣiyāl) – if the aggressor is killed, he is in Hellfire even if he is a Muslim, and if the just defender is killed, he is a martyr. This is the ruling on an aggressor. So how then if infidels aggress against Muslim land, where religion, honor, life, and property are exposed to loss and annihilation?! Is it not obligatory in this case for Muslims to repel the infidel aggressor and the infidel state?

7. Fighting the rebellious group (al-fiʾah al-bāghiyah): Allāh, Exalted and Majestic, says: {And if two factions among the believers should fight, then make settlement between the two. But if one of them oppresses the other, then fight against the one that oppresses until it returns to the command of Allāh. And if it returns, then make settlement between them in justice and act justly. Indeed, Allāh loves those who act justly.} (al-Ḥujurāt 49:9). If Allāh has obligated us to fight the rebellious Muslim group to preserve the unity of Muslims and protect their religion, honor, and property, then what is the ruling on fighting rebellious infidel states? Is this not more fitting and appropriate?

8. The prescribed punishment for highway robbery (ḥadd al-ḥirābah): Allāh Ta‘ālā said: {Indeed, the penalty for those who wage war against Allāh and His Messenger and strive upon earth [to cause] corruption is none but that they be killed or crucified or that their hands and feet be cut off from opposite sides or that they be exiled from the land. That is for them a disgrace in this world; and for them in the Hereafter is a great punishment.} (al-Mā'idah 5:33). This is the ruling for Muslim belligerents who frighten the general Muslim populace, cause corruption in the land, and tamper with people's property and honor. So what about infidel states that corrupt people's religion, property, and honor? Is fighting them not more obligatory and more fitting for Muslims?!

These are some of the evidences and justifications for general mobilization if infidels enter Muslim land; that repelling the infidel enemy is the most obligatory of obligations after faith.]" End of the slightly abridged quotation from the book Defense of Muslim Lands.

I say: If we contemplate the conditions of Muslims today, we would find that Jihād has become individually obligatory upon them from all four aspects, throughout the entire world. The clearest aspect of its obligation is the first one (the descent of enemies into most Muslim lands).

There is no Muslim country today that is not occupied by various types of infidels: by Jews, like Palestine and parts of Syria (al-Shām); or by Crusaders, like Bosnia and the Balkans, Chechnya and the Caucasus, the Islamic republics in Central Asia, the Philippines, and others; or by pagans, like Kashmir, occupied by Hindus, and East Turkestan and parts of Southeast Asia, occupied by China, and so on.

In all these lands, their people and their neighbors, then those who neighbored them, and then all who followed and neighbored them, have either failed, been negligent, or fallen short. Thus, the individual obligation of Jihād has encompassed all the people of Islām.

As for the remaining Islamic and Arab countries, including the heartland of Islām, their Ka'bah, and the Mosque of their Prophet ﷺ, they are indirectly occupied by Crusaders and Jews, through the agency of apostate rulers and their hypocritical aides who have placed their armies in the service of the infidels. This is under the leadership of America and its master Israel, and their Crusader allies, who have filled the lands with military, naval, and air bases. They have occupied the lands in this modern way, by concentrating their forces in centralized bases instead of deploying them, and sufficing with the deployment of apostate armies composed of hypocrites, the ignorant, the coerced, and the lost, who play the role of occupier by proxy, from which the Crusaders deploy their forces from their centers when needed. It is enough to know that America and its Crusader allies have over two hundred thousand soldiers on the land of the Arabian Peninsula, and stored weapons and equipment sufficient for a million soldiers, who can be transported within weeks when needed. Through this malicious method of concentrating forces in central bases and relying on apostate forces for detailed services, the new occupiers avoid provoking Muslims to Jihād and allow apostate rulers to claim independence, and allow the scholars of the sultans to divert people from Jihād and call them to obey the apostate rulers in authority!

The outcome is one: the lands are occupied, wealth is plundered, infidels inflict various forms of humiliation and degradation upon believers at the hands of apostate aides, the Sharī'ah of Allāh is suspended, the word of the infidels is supreme, and the righteous are inmates of prisons and torture dungeons. An observer of the conditions in the lands of the Two Holy Mosques, Syria (al-Shām), Egypt, North Africa, Turkey, Pakistan, and Africa, and their causes, will see this in its clearest form.

As for the second aspect of the individual obligation of Jihād, which is "the meeting of the rank of believers with the rank of infidels," we find it realized in all Muslim lands in its fiercest forms, but also in a malicious way. The Crusader infidels and the apostate infidels have deployed their forces, closed their ranks, and asserted their presence in every inch of Muslim lands, through hundreds of thousands of army, police, intelligence, security personnel, spies, and informants, not to mention the thousands of Crusader soldiers we mentioned, concentrated in their military centers and bases in every country. Thus, no Muslim who takes a stance to defend his religion, adhere to it, and defend the causes of his Ummah can escape the hands of these soldiers and the eyes of these spies! So, has the rank of infidels met the rank of believers, or not yet? Or do our shaykhs need all these soldiers, intelligence agents, and spies to gather in a single line in front of mosques and their homes for them to see it and issue fatwās accordingly?

As for the third aspect, "the mobilization by the Imām," to Allāh is the complaint and to Him is praise in all circumstances. Muslims today do not have a single legitimate Imām on the face of the earth. All present are at war with Allāh and His Messenger, striving to spread corruption in the land. All of them rely on various types of infidels: Jews, Crusaders, and pagans, and those hypocrites whose allegiance they have bought. So, there is no legitimate Imām to mobilize for Jihād. Rather, there are Imāms of disbelief and apostasy who mobilize the lowly against the believers! Has Jihād then been nullified due to the absence of a legitimate Imām? Who then will repel the aggressor?

The truth is that Allāh's proof has been established against His Muslim servants in most countries of the world. There is no Muslim country where callers to guidance have not arisen, be they working scholars, sincere callers, or devoted Jihād leaders, who called people to Jihād, to enjoin good and forbid evil, and mobilized them. Even if a country were devoid of such Imāms and righteous Jihād leaders – assuming this – the Ummah of Islām is one. From an Islamic perspective, there is no consideration for the borders drawn by the Crusaders between our countries, nor for the nationalities, allegiances, flags, and passports they invented. The Ummah of Islām is one and remains one. It has not been devoid of Jihād leaders who called Muslims and mobilized them. Among such figures at the time of the Russian invasion of Afghanistan was Shaykh ‘Abd Allāh ‘Azzām, may Allāh have mercy on him, and those who stood with him in calling for general mobilization for Jihād from the scholars of Pakistan, Afghanistan, and elsewhere. Among them are all the shaykhs and leaders of Jihādī groups and calls in various Islamic countries. Among them today is Shaykh Usāmah bin Lādin, may Allāh protect him, who mobilizes Muslims for Jihād against the Americans and Jews today, and similar to him are many scholars and callers to Jihād against them from Arab and non-Arab lands in Iraq, Chechnya, Palestine, the Philippines, Indonesia, and elsewhere. Muslims must answer their call to mobilize.

As for the fourth aspect of the individual obligation of Jihād, which is "if the enemy captures some Muslims," what can we say? What can we reiterate? Where can we count? What can we add?

- The Muslim youth prisoners abducted from various countries of the world to the disgraceful American prison of Guantanamo now exceed 700 from various nationalities, according to American sources themselves. A similar number are in American prisons in Afghanistan and Pakistan.
- More than this number are the total Muslim youth prisoners in Western European prisons (Britain, France, Spain, Germany, Belgium, Italy, etc.).
- In Russia, they are in the thousands. The same can be said for Kashmir, the Philippines, Eritrea, African countries, Central Asian countries, and Turkestan.

- As for the prisons of the tyrants in Arab and Muslim countries, such as the rulers of Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Syria (al-Shām), North Africa, Turkey, and Pakistan, the figures published by human rights organizations and Amnesty International reports amount to tens of thousands in a single country at times! There is no doubt that the number of Muslim youth prisoners in those countries exceeds hundreds of thousands! This is a documented reality, not an imagined exaggeration.
- As for Palestine, international news informs us daily about the killing of hundreds and the capture of thousands. The Jews captured more than a thousand prisoners in a single day during the Intifāḍah!

Imprisonment in most of these countries has affected women, girls, and even children.

As for incidents of killing, torture, rape, and violation of the honor of men and women, hardly any country is free of them! So, has Jihād become obligatory, or not yet? Muslim scholars have issued fatwās that if a Muslim woman is captured in the East, it is obligatory for the people of the West to liberate her, and that Muslims must rescue their prisoners even if they exhaust all their wealth in doing so.

Perhaps some hypocrites or some ignorant people deny the state of occupation in some Muslim lands and forbid fighting the invaders under the pretext that they came based on agreements with the rulers of Muslim lands. It should be proven to these people that this is not permissible for a Muslim ruler, even if he were a Muslim. And we must show them that these rulers have lost their legitimacy due to their disbelief, apostasy, and departure from our religion.

This is what the following section will clarify:

Second: The governments of Muslim lands today are apostate and infidel for altering the Shari‘ah, ruling by other than what Allāh has revealed, their loyalty to infidels, and their betrayal of Allāh, His Messenger, and the believers.

When every Muslim testifies with his tongue, believing with his heart, saying, "I bear witness that there is no god but Allāh and that Muḥammad is the Messenger of Allāh," he is acknowledging, in essence, that he believes no deity is rightfully worshipped except Allāh, and that he worships this One God according to what Allāh revealed to His Prophet, Muḥammad, the Messenger of Allāh ﷺ.

This momentous testimony has implications, the denial of which, in word or deed, is considered an act of disbelief in Allāh and an exit from the religion of Islām, may Allāh protect us. Many of these implications have been obscured from people to the point that many are ignorant of them. The truth is that many people know they have a Lord and believe in Him in the depths of their hearts, even if they sometimes deny Him with their tongues. But fewer of them worship this God. In this section, we will briefly address some of the content of this testimony. Whoever wishes for a detailed explanation should refer to books that have elaborated on the creeds of Tawhīd.

Allāh, Glorified is He, has informed us that most of those who believe in Him as God (Ilāh) associate partners with Him as Lord (Rabb), and that most of those who disbelieve in Him as God do not deny His Lordship. He has shown us that belief in Him as Lord does not benefit a person if they do not worship Him as God and associate no partners with Him. Allāh Ta‘ālā said: {And most of them believe not in Allāh except while they associate others with Him.} (Yūsuf 12:106). Most humans have believed that they and this universe have a Lord who created, provided, manages, and bestows blessings. With the exception of a handful of atheists, who doubt their atheism, especially in times of distress, most of humanity throughout the ages has believed in this Lord. However, their ways of associating partners with Him (shirk) and disbelieving in Him as a God to be worshipped have varied. Christians, Magians, Hindus, Jews, and others believed in Allāh as Lord, then disbelieved in Him through their worship, associating partners and worshipping others besides Him or with Him. The Qur'ān affirmed this belief of the infidels in Him as Lord and their association of partners with Him as God, addressing them thus: {Say, "Who provides for you from the heaven and the earth? Or who controls hearing and sight and who brings the living out of the dead and brings the dead out of the living and who arranges [every] matter?" They will say, "Allāh." So say, "Then will you not fear Him?"} (Yūnus 10:31). Meaning, will you not then fear your Lord, Glorified is He, and worship Him alone without associating partners, as you do? This question and denunciation are repeated in His saying: {Say, "To whom belongs the earth and whoever is in it, if you should know?" They will say, "To Allāh." Say, "Then will you not remember?" Say, "Who is Lord of the seven heavens and Lord of the Great Throne?" They will say, "[They belong] to Allāh." Say, "Then will you not fear Him?" Say, "In whose hand is the realm of all things – and He protects, while none can protect against Him – if you should know?" They will say, "[All belongs] to Allāh." Say, "Then how are you deluded?"} (al-Mu'minūn 23:84-89). {Then will you not remember?} {Then will you not fear Him?} {Then how are you deluded?} Meaning, how can you believe and then associate partners?

Many types of associating partners with Allāh have crept into the beliefs of many Muslims over successive ages until we have reached these wretched later times. Among these is the worship of others besides Him by many, disobeying Him and denying His rulings while obeying others and their rulings, and abandoning allegiance to Him and His allies, then allying with His enemies instead of His allies.

Every Muslim believes, acknowledges, and claims faith that Allāh is the Creator, the Provider, the Giver of Life, the Giver of Death, the One Who Harms and Benefits, the One Who Abases and Exalts, the Just Judge, and so on, to the rest of Allāh's names and attributes. However, many Muslims in their actual lives turn to humans like themselves – especially rulers, dignitaries, rabbis, monks, scholars, and shaykhs, and men in whom they place their trust – for bringing benefit, repelling harm, seeking sustenance, fear and hope, judgment and legislation, and declaring lawful and unlawful, in ways other than what Allāh has commanded.

This is the reality of worship and obedience that contradicts their claim of belief in the Creator Lord, as they allege. The Lord, belief in Whom is not complete except by adhering to His worship as God and obeying Him alone without any partner in His rulings, just as one must believe in Him as the Creator Lord, Provider.

One of the greatest aspects of worshipping and obeying Allāh is adherence to His rulings, commands, prohibitions, and laws; this is self-evident. Is there any greater denial than for a man to claim belief in Allāh, then deny His legislation and disparage it, claiming it is unsuitable for the age, that it is the cause of Muslims' backwardness, and practically preferring the laws of men over it, ruling people by them and compelling them to follow these man-made laws by force?

Such obedience is not accepted by any of them from his wife, his son, or his servant – and to Allāh belongs the highest similitude. Would the master of a house accept from his wife a claim of love while she obeys another and implements another's orders in his house? Would he accept from his son a claim of obedience while he obeys his neighbor and disobeys him? Would he accept from his servant and worker, who eats from his provision, that he claims his mastery, then acts according to the directives of another? They do not accept this for themselves, and to Allāh belongs the highest similitude. This is why the address came to them: {Then will you not fear Him?} {Then will you not remember?} This is a false claim and a reprehensible act.

That sovereignty (ḥākimiyyah) belongs to Allāh alone, that legislation is from Him alone, that obedience is to Him alone, that the lawful (ḥalāl) is what Allāh has made lawful, that the unlawful (ḥarām) is what He has made unlawful, that what He has commanded is to be executed, and that what He has forbidden is to be abandoned – these are matters at the core of the Tawhīd of Divinity (Tawhīd al-Ulūhiyyah) and the worship of Allāh alone. The Qur’ān has affirmed this and affirmed the disbelief of one who denies it, just as the Sunnah has affirmed it, and the consensus of this Ummah, its leading scholars, and its jurists throughout the ages and eras has settled upon it. The religion, in reality, cannot be entirely for Allāh except in this way. The verses are numerous and mutually reinforcing on these meanings. Among them is the saying of Allāh Ta‘ālā:

- {Legislation is not but for Allāh. He has commanded that you worship not except Him. That is the correct religion, but most of the people do not know.} (Yūsuf 12:40).
- {The decision is only for Allāh. He relates the truth, and He is the best of deciders.} (al-An‘ām 6:57).
- {Indeed, We have revealed to you, [O Muḥammad], the Book in truth so you may judge between the people by that which Allāh has shown you. And do not be for the deceitful an advocate.} (al-Nisā’ 4:105).
- {And Allāh judges; there is no repeller of His judgment. And He is swift in account.} (al-Ra‘d 13:41).
- {Then We put you, [O Muḥammad], on an ordained way concerning the matter [of religion]; so follow it and do not follow the inclinations of those who do not know.} (al-Jāthiyah 45:18).
- {Or have they other deities who have ordained for them a religion to which Allāh has not consented?} (al-Shūrā 42:21).

- {And judge, [O Muḥammad], between them by what Allāh has revealed and do not follow their inclinations and beware of them lest they tempt you away from some of what Allāh has revealed to you. And if they turn away – then know that Allāh only intends to afflict them with some of their sins. And indeed, many of the people are defiantly disobedient. Then is it the judgment of [the time of] ignorance they desire? But who is better than Allāh in judgment for a people who are certain [in faith]}?} (al-Mā'idah 5:49-50).

Ibn Kathīr, may Allāh have mercy on him, said in his commentary: "[{And judge between them by what Allāh has revealed and do not follow their inclinations}]": Meaning, judge, O Muḥammad, between people – Arabs and non-Arabs, unlettered and People of the Book – by what Allāh has revealed to you in this great Book." Then he said: "[{and do not follow their inclinations}]": Meaning, their opinions which they have agreed upon and due to which they abandoned what Allāh revealed to His messengers. This is why Allāh Ta'ālā said: {and do not follow their inclinations}. Meaning, do not turn away from the truth which Allāh has commanded you to follow, due to the inclinations of these ignorant, wretched people." Then he said – and pay attention to this great and important narration – Ibn Kathīr, may Allāh have mercy on him, said: "[And His saying, Ta'ālā, {Then is it the judgment of [the time of] ignorance they desire? But who is better than Allāh in judgment for a people who are certain [in faith]}?}": Allāh Ta'ālā denounces whoever departs from the established judgment of Allāh, which encompasses all good and forbids all evil, and turns to other than it from opinions, inclinations, and conventions laid down by men without any basis from the Sharī'ah of Allāh. This is like how the people of the pre-Islamic era (Jāhiliyyah) used to judge by misguidance and ignorance, which they formulated with their opinions and inclinations. And it is like how the Tatars judge by royal policies derived from their king, Genghis Khan, who laid down for them the Yassaq (Yassa). This is a book compiled from laws he had borrowed from various legislations – Judaism, Christianity, the Islamic faith, and others. Many of its laws were taken merely from his own views and whims. It became an adhered-to law among his descendants, which they gave precedence over ruling by the Book of Allāh and the Sunnah of His Messenger ﷺ. Whoever among them does that is an infidel who must be fought until he returns to the judgment of Allāh and His Messenger, so that he does not judge by anything else, neither in small matters nor in great. Allāh Ta‘ālā said: {Then is it the judgment of [the time of] ignorance they desire?} Meaning, do they seek and desire it, and turn away from the judgment of Allāh? And His saying, Ta‘ālā: {But who is better than Allāh in judgment for a people who are certain [in faith]?} Meaning, who is more just than Allāh in His judgment for one who understands His Sharī‘ah from Allāh, believes in Him, is certain, and knows that Allāh is the Wisest of judges and more merciful to His creation than a mother to her child? For He, Ta‘ālā, is the Knower of all things, Competent over all things, Just in all things.]"

Regarding what Ibn Kathīr said about the Yassaq in his history al-Bidāyah wa al-Nihāyah, he stated: "[Then al-Juwaynī mentioned excerpts from the Yassa, including: whoever commits adultery is killed, whether married or unmarried; likewise, whoever commits sodomy is killed; whoever intentionally lies is killed; whoever spies is killed; whoever urinates in stagnant water is killed; and whoever immerses himself in it is killed. All of this contravenes the laws of Allāh revealed to His servants, the Prophets, peace and blessings be upon them. So, whoever abandons the established Sharī‘ah revealed to Muḥammad ibn ‘Abd Allāh, the Seal of the Prophets, and seeks judgment from other abrogated laws, has disbelieved. How then about one who seeks judgment from the Yassaq and gives it precedence over it? Whoever does that has disbelieved by the consensus of Muslims.]"

I say: The Yassaq is a constitution and a set of laws formulated by Genghis Khan, the Tatar king, when he invaded the East. Seeing the multiplicity of religions and philosophies, he, in consultation with his legislators, formulated this constitution from what they deemed good with their intellects and from the inspiration of their experiences, mixing it with rulings from Islām, Christianity, and their pagan religions. This is the same act that the rulers of Muslims today undertake with the help of their legislators and parliaments. They have based them primarily on French and English laws, of Roman origin, and mixed in some Islamic Sharī'ah and what their whims dictated to them! Then they wrote at the top, as in some Islamic countries: "Islamic Sharī'ah is the primary source of legislation and codification!!" And in some countries, they were too miserly even for this polytheistic, false phrase. If Ibn Kathīr transmitted the consensus of Muslims on the disbelief of one who rules by the Yassaḡ or other forms of human ignorance, what then of one who rules by these man-made laws among Muslims and compels them to follow them by force of arms?

It is sufficient for anyone who wishes to see the extent of disbelief, defiant disobedience, injustice, alteration of laws, and mockery of Allāh's signs, to look at a copy of his country's constitution, the laws applied in courts, and the legislative decrees issued by his country's government every day. This is the situation in Pakistan and all Muslim countries, exactly as the Prophet ﷺ informed in what was narrated from him by Imām Aḥmad: "The bonds of Islām will be undone one by one. Whenever one bond is undone, people will cling to the next. The first of them to be undone will be the ruling (al-ḥukm), and the last of them will be the prayer (al-ṣalāh)." There is no doubt that whoever implements these laws is an infidel who must be fought, by the consensus of Muslims.

Regarding the saying of Allāh Ta'ālā: {Have you not seen those who claim to have believed in what was revealed to you, [O Muḥammad], and what was revealed before you? They wish to refer legislation to ṭāghūt (false deities/tyrannical systems), while they were commanded to disbelieve in it. And Satan wishes to lead them far astray.} (al-Nisā' 4:60). Ibn Kathīr, may Allāh have mercy on him, says:

"[This is a denunciation from Allāh, Exalted and Majestic, of one who claims belief in what Allāh revealed to His Messenger and to the previous Prophets, while at the same time wishing to seek judgment in disputes from other than the Book of Allāh and the Sunnah of His Messenger.]" Then he said: "[For it – meaning the verse – condemns everyone who turns away from the Book and the Sunnah and seeks judgment from other than them of falsehood, which is what is meant here by ṭāghūt. This is why He said: {They wish to refer legislation to ṭāghūt}.] As He said in the same Sūrat al-Nisā' a few verses later in His saying, Ta'ālā: {But no, by your Lord, they will not [truly] believe until they make you, [O Muḥammad], judge concerning that over which they dispute among themselves and then find within themselves no discomfort from what you have judged and submit in [full, willing] submission.} (al-Nisā' 4:65). [Meaning, if they make you their judge, they obey you inwardly, so they find no discomfort within themselves from what you have judged, and they submit to it outwardly and inwardly, surrendering to it completely without resistance, opposition, or dispute. As it is stated in the Ḥadīth: "By the One in Whose Hand is my soul, none of you truly believes until his desires are subservient to what I have brought."]"

Regarding the saying of Allāh Ta'ālā from Sūrat al-Aḥzāb, verse 36: {It is not for a believing man or a believing woman, when Allāh and His Messenger have decided a matter, that they should [thereafter] have any choice about their affair. And whoever disobeys Allāh and His Messenger has certainly strayed into clear error.} (al-Aḥzāb 33:36). Ibn Kathīr, may Allāh have mercy on him, said: "[This verse is general in all matters. That is, if Allāh and His Messenger decide something, no one has the right to oppose it, nor does anyone have any choice, opinion, or say here. This is why He warned severely against opposing that, saying: {And whoever disobeys Allāh and His Messenger has certainly strayed into clear error}.] And like His saying, Ta'ālā: {So let those beware who dissent from the Messenger's order, lest fitnah strike them or a painful punishment.} (al-Nūr 24:63)."

Imām Abū Bakr al-Jaṣṣāṣ said in his commentary on the saying of Allāh Ta‘ālā, {But no, by your Lord, they will not [truly] believe...} (al-Nisā’ 4:65), the aforementioned verse: "(This verse indicates that whoever rejects any of the commands of Allāh Ta‘ālā or His Messenger ﷺ is outside the religion of Islām, whether he rejects it due to doubt in it, or by failing to accept, submit, and refraining from surrender. This necessitates the validity of what the Companions concluded in their ruling of apostasy for those who refrained from paying Zakat)." (Aḥkām al-Qur’ān, Vol. 2, p. 212).

Imām Ibn Taymiyyah, may Allāh Ta‘ālā have mercy on him, said regarding the verse: {The only statement of the [true] believers when they are called to Allāh and His Messenger to judge between them is that they say, "We hear and we obey." And those are the successful.} (al-Nūr 24:51).

He said: "[So He, Glorified is He, clarified that whoever turns away from obedience to the Messenger and shuns his judgment is one of the hypocrites and not a believer, and that the believer is one who says, 'We hear and we obey.' If hypocrisy is established and faith is removed merely by shunning the Messenger's judgment and wishing to seek judgment from another – and this is mere abandonment, which might be caused by strong desires – then how much more so in the case of disparagement and the like?]" (al-Ṣārim al-Maslūl, p. 38).

Likewise, Shaykh al-Islām transmitted the agreement of the jurists, saying: "(And a person, whenever he deems lawful the unlawful – upon which there is consensus – or deems unlawful the lawful – upon which there is consensus – or changes the Sharī‘ah – upon which there is consensus – he is an apostate infidel by the agreement of the jurists)." (Fatāwā, Vol. 3, p. 267).

He also said in his Fatāwā (Vol. 35, p. 406): "(Whoever rules by what contradicts the Sharī‘ah of Allāh and His Messenger, knowing that, is of the same kind as the Tatars who give precedence to the judgment of the *Yassa*q over the judgment of Allāh and His Messenger)."

He also says in Minhāj al-Sunnah (Vol. 3, p. 22): "(So whoever deems it permissible to judge between people by what he sees as just, without following what Allāh has revealed, is an infidel)."

And in al-Fatāwā al-Kubrā (Vol. 4, p. 515): "(It is known by necessity from the religion of Muslims and by the agreement of all Muslims that whoever permits following a religion other than Islām or following a Sharī'ah other than that of Muḥammad ﷺ is an infidel)."

Imām Ibn al-Qayyim, may Allāh have mercy on him, says regarding the saying of Allāh Ta'ālā: {O you who have believed, obey Allāh and obey the Messenger and those in authority among you. And if you disagree over anything, refer it to Allāh and the Messenger, if you should believe in Allāh and the Last Day. That is best and most V উত্তম in result.} (al-Nisā' 4:59).

He said: "[This is conclusive proof that it is obligatory to refer matters of dispute in everything people dispute about concerning the entire religion, to Allāh and His Messenger ﷺ, not to anyone other than Allāh and His Messenger ﷺ. Whoever refers the matter to other than them has opposed the command of Allāh. And whoever, at the time of dispute, calls to a judgment other than that of Allāh and His Messenger, has called with the call of Jāhiliyyah. A servant does not enter into faith until he refers everything disputed by disputants to Allāh and His Messenger. This is why Allāh Ta'ālā said: {if you should believe in Allāh and the Last Day}. This, as mentioned earlier, is a condition that negates the conditioned upon its absence. This indicates that whoever makes someone other than Allāh and His Messenger the judge in matters of dispute is outside the requisites of faith in Allāh and the Last Day. This verse is sufficient as a decisive, conclusive statement and cure. For it is conclusive against those who oppose it, and a safeguard for those who adhere to it, exemplifying what it commands.]" (al-Risālah al-Tabūkiyyah).

Regarding this same verse (al-Nisā' 4:59), Ibn Kathīr, may Allāh have mercy on him, said: "[This shows that whoever does not seek judgment in a matter of dispute from the Book and the Sunnah, and does not refer to them in that, is not a believer in Allāh nor in the Last Day.]" (Tafsīr Ibn Kathīr).

Ibn al-Qayyim, may Allāh have mercy on him, says: "(Then He, Glorified is He, informed that whoever seeks judgment from other than what the Messenger brought has judged by ṭāghūt (false deities/tyrannical systems) and sought judgment from it. And ṭāghūt is everything by which the servant transgresses his limit, whether worshipped, followed, or obeyed. So the ṭāghūt of every people is that to which they seek judgment other than Allāh and His Messenger, or worship besides Allāh, or follow without insight from Allāh)." (I'lam al-Muwaqqi'in, Vol. 1, p. 5).

He also said in Madārij al-Sālikīn (Vol. 1, p. 337): "(If he believes that ruling by what Allāh revealed is not obligatory and that he has a choice in it, while being certain of Allāh's judgment, then this is major disbelief (kufr akbar))."

Qāḍī Abū Ya'ālā says in Uṣūl al-Dīn (p. 271): "(Whoever believes in the lawfulness of what Allāh has forbidden by explicit text, or from His Messenger, or what Muslims have unanimously agreed is forbidden, is an infidel; such as one who permits drinking alcohol and forbids prayer, fasting, and Zakat. Likewise, whoever believes in the unlawfulness of something Allāh has made lawful and permitted by explicit text, or which Allāh, Exalted and Majestic, has permitted. The reason for this is that it entails belying Allāh Ta'ālā and His Messenger in His report, and belying Muslims in their report. Whoever does that is an infidel by the consensus of Muslims)."

Imām al-Qurṭubī, in his commentary on the saying of Allāh Ta‘ālā: {And if they break their oaths after their treaty and defame your religion, then fight the leaders of disbelief. Indeed, there are no [binding] oaths for them, so that they might cease.} (al-Tawbah 9:12), said: "(Some scholars have used this verse as evidence for the obligation to kill one who defames the religion, as he is an infidel. Defamation is to attribute to it what is unfitting, or to object with scorn to what is part of the religion, given the established definitive proof of the soundness of its principles and the uprightness of its branches)." (Vol. 8, p. 82).

Look today at the speeches and statements of these leaders and their aides, and the defamation of religion and scorn for its rituals therein.

He, may Allāh have mercy on him, also said: "(If he judges by what he has, claiming it is from Allāh, then this is an alteration of it that necessitates disbelief)." (Vol. 6, p. 191).

And he said: "(If he seeks a judgment other than Allāh's, not being pleased with His, then he is an infidel)." (Tafsīr al-Qurṭubī).

We suffice with these narrations. The evidences are very numerous, from the sayings of Imāms and scholars and the texts of the Book and the Sunnah.

These clear verses and evident narrations demonstrate unequivocally that the issue pertains to two categories of people:

1. The ruler.
2. The ruled.

As for the ruled:

His obligation is to submit to the Shari‘ah of Allāh, to choose to be judged by it, and to be content with its outcome, whether for him or against him, and not to find any aversion within himself. He must submit absolutely to the judgment of Allāh. A Muslim's faith diminishes and is harmed (while the outward ruling of Islām remains upon him) to the extent that he finds dislike or aversion to this judgment. This deficiency in faith can grow according to the degree of his lack of submission to the Shari'ah of Allāh and the nature of his rejection of it, until, if it reaches the point where the ruled rejects the judgment of Allāh due to lack of faith in it, or disparagement of it, or lack of conviction in its suitability, and gives precedence and preference to human laws over it, then this nullifies faith entirely and leads its perpetrator to disbelief, may Allāh protect us.

As for the ruler:

The one who has assumed authority over the people's affairs, whom Allāh has involved in His governance, is a person in whom knowledge and the absence of ignorance are presumed. This is either inherent in him or due to the presence of commands, prohibitions, and guidance from people of knowledge and religion. Ability is also presumed in him, for he is the possessor of authority; he is not under duress, as might be the case for individual subjects. This ruler of the Muslims primarily derives his legitimacy from being the custodian entrusted with applying Allāh's Law among Muslims. Abundant evidence from the Qur'ān, the Sunnah, and the reports of the early Muslims (āthār) indicates that one who replaces Allāh's Law with human laws, turns away from it, and substitutes others in its place, is a disbeliever who must be fought until he returns to Allāh's Law, so that he governs by nothing else, neither in small matters nor in great, as we have already seen in the statement of Ibn Kathīr, may Allāh have mercy on him. Allāh, the Exalted, has attributed all descriptions of disbelief in Him to such a person in the Qur'ān, saying in Sūrat al-Mā'idah:

- {And whoever does not judge by what Allāh has revealed – then it is those who are the disbelievers.} (Al-Mā'idah/44).

- {And whoever does not judge by what Allāh has revealed – then it is those who are the transgressors.} (Al-Mā'idah/45).
- {And whoever does not judge by what Allāh has revealed – then it is those who are the wrongdoers.} (Al-Mā'idah/47).

This important creedal truth – namely, the disbelief of the ruler who governs by other than what Allāh has revealed and replaces Allāh's Law – has been subjected to such obfuscation, denial, tampering with Allāh's verses, and distortion of their meaning to satisfy the desires of sultans and kings who deviate from Allāh's Law, to an extent unparalleled by other verses and rulings. This has been the case since deficiencies and corruption began to affect the institution of ruling by what Allāh has revealed, exactly as the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) foretold. Kings and sultans who initially ruled by Allāh's Law began to evade the application of certain rulings to themselves and their close associates, due to personal whims or favoritism. This deficiency grew progressively larger until, with the fall of the Islamic Caliphate, it led to the complete replacement of Allāh's Law. The aggression against Allāh's supreme authority reached the point of usurping the right to legislate and granting it to human beings. Consequently, Muslim rulers began to legislate independently of Allāh, replacing and distorting the Sharī'ah through codification and legislation, adopting what they wished and abandoning what they wished.

This represented a new leap into disbelief, distinct from the injustice and misguidance committed by earlier kings who, despite these failings, generally ruled by the Sharī'ah. This is a lengthy subject. Contemporary scholars and Muslim writers have addressed it in detail, defending the truth of the Sharī'ah against the sophistry of the ignorant and the deceptions of falsifiers among some palace scholars, hypocritical apparatuses, and official religious institutions. These latter groups have sought to patch up the disbelief of their contemporary rulers and falsely and slanderously cloak them in the garb of Islām.

The conciseness that governs this book does not permit further evidence and details; however, I draw the Muslim reader's attention to important points for understanding the reality of the disbelief of the rulers in Muslim lands today:

First: One might ask: If the ruler who governs by other than what Allāh has revealed is a disbeliever, why did the Qur'ān use the terms "transgressors" (al-Fāsiqūn) and "wrongdoers" (al-Zālimūn) for him, and not limit itself to "disbelievers" (al-Kāfirūn) when saying: {And whoever does not judge by what Allāh has revealed – then it is those who are ...}? The answer to this, and Allāh, the Blessed and Exalted, knows best, is twofold:

1. Ruling by other than what Allāh has revealed may constitute transgression or wrongdoing that does not expel one from the fold of Islām into disbelief. Some of the early Muslims (Salaf) said this regarding their early rulers, such as some caliphs of the Umayyad and Abbasid dynasties. This applies when the instance of ruling by other than what Allāh has revealed occurs in limited cases, motivated by personal desire or favoritism, while acknowledging Allāh's judgment, knowing it, and believing in its superiority and obligation, and with the perpetrator believing himself to be a sinner falling short, without any of them openly declaring rule by other than what Allāh has revealed or its replacement by way of legislation. What is happening today has no precedent in the entire history of Muslims, except in these recent times where rulers' constitutions and laws stipulate that the rulings for theft, adultery, murder, and other matters of blood, wealth, and honor, as well as administrative laws in peace and war, judiciary, policies, etc., are not those stipulated in the Islamic Sharī'ah. Rather, they are laws they themselves have enacted and borrowed from the laws of disbelievers. This situation is a replacement of Allāh's Law and legislation independent of Allāh, not merely ruling by other than what Allāh has revealed in a limited instance. For the early Muslims, such isolated acts were transgression and wrongdoing, but this replacement and legislation is, according to their consensus, disbelief, as transmitted by Ibn Kathīr and others we have mentioned. It is disbelief that removes its perpetrator from the religion and necessitates fighting him, without any disagreement among the early and later generations, the imāms of jurisprudence and Qur’ānic commentary, and the scholars of Ḥadīth. This is the situation of the rulers of our lands today, because their constitutions and laws openly and unambiguously declare the replacement and exclusion of Allāh’s Law.

It is well-known today that most of the Sharī’ah’s prescribed punishments (ḥudūd) have been replaced by imprisonment and financial penalties in the man-made laws of Muslim countries. This is in addition to the legalization of forbidden acts such as adultery, usury, and alcohol through governmental permits and licenses.

Furthermore, domestic and foreign policies are based on rulings that contradict what Allāh has revealed, the judicial authority is built upon constitutions derived from Roman European philosophies, and the legislative authority is founded on the principle of the right to legislate independently of Allāh. This is the state of the constitutions in Islamic countries.

This has no precedent in ancient history except for what Genghis Khan and his Mongol descendants did when they ruled Muslim lands. They claimed to be Muslims, prayed, and made the call to prayer, yet they governed by the Yassa, so Muslim scholars declared them disbelievers and fought them.

A number of contemporary Muslim scholars who have experienced the reality of our rulers’ disbelief in this age have spoken on this issue. They have clarified that the legislation, replacement of Allāh’s Law, and ruling by other than what Allāh has revealed that emanates from these rulers constitutes major disbelief (kufr akbar). We shall convey here a selection of their statements:

Shaykh Muḥammad Rashīd Riḍā, may Allāh have mercy on him, says in his commentary on the Almighty's words, {And when it is said to them, "Come to what Allāh has revealed and to the Messenger," you see the hypocrites turning away from you with aversion.} (Al-Nisā'/61):

"The verse states clearly that whoever deliberately turns away and rejects the judgment of Allāh and His Messenger, especially after being called to it and reminded of it, is a hypocrite. His claims of faith and Islām are not to be considered." (Tafsīr al-Manār, vol. 5, p. 227).

Shaykh Maḥmūd al-Ālūsī says in his commentary, Rūḥ al-Ma'ānī (vol. 28, p. 20):

"There is no doubt about the disbelief of one who approves of man-made law and prefers it over the Sharī'ah, saying it is more consistent with wisdom and better for the nation, and who becomes enraged and fanatically angry if he is told that the Sharī'ah ruling on a matter is such-and-such. We have witnessed this in some of those whom Allāh has forsaken, making them deaf and blinding their sight. Therefore, one should not hesitate to declare as a disbeliever anyone who approves of what is clearly contrary to the Sharī'ah and gives it precedence over Sharī'ah rulings, thereby demeaning the truth."

Shaykh Muḥammad Amīn al-Shinqītī, may Allāh have mercy on him, says in Aḍwā' al-Bayān (vol. 2, p. 104):

"Whoever does not judge by what Allāh has revealed, in opposition to the Messengers and in annulment of Allāh's rulings, then his wrongdoing, transgression, and disbelief all expel him from the religion."

In his commentary on the ḥadīth of 'Adī ibn Ḥātim and the Prophet's (peace and blessings be upon him) statement: ("Did they not forbid for you what Allāh made lawful and make lawful for you what Allāh forbade, and you followed them?") 'Adī said,

"Yes." The Prophet said, "That was their worship of them."), Shaykh al-Shinqīṭī, may Allāh have mercy on him, says:

"This prophetic interpretation – that everyone who follows a legislator in what he permits and prohibits contrary to Allāh's legislation is worshipping him, taking him as a lord, associating him with Allāh, and disbelieving in Allāh – is a correct interpretation, with no doubt as to its correctness. Know, O brothers, that associating partners with Allāh in His rule and associating partners with Him in His worship are one and the same thing; there is absolutely no difference between them. So, one who follows a system other than Allāh's system, legislation other than Allāh's legislation, and a man-made law contrary to Allāh's Sharī'ah, turning away from the celestial light that Allāh revealed through His Messenger (peace and blessings be upon him) – whoever does this is no different in any way from one who worships an idol and prostrates to a graven image. They are both the same; both are polytheists associating partners with Allāh. One associates partners in His worship, and the other associates partners in His rule." (Aḍwā' al-Bayān).

He also says in the same commentary:

"Through these divine texts that we have mentioned, it becomes abundantly clear that those who follow man-made laws, legislated by Satan on the tongues of his allies in opposition to what Allāh, Glorified and Exalted, legislated on the tongues of His Messengers – no one doubts their disbelief except one whose insight Allāh has obliterated and whom He has blinded from the light of revelation, just like them."

He, may Allāh have mercy on him, further states:

"As for a man-made system that contradicts the legislation of the Creator of the heavens and the earth, implementing it is disbelief in the Creator of the heavens and the earth. Examples include claiming that preferring the male over the female in inheritance is not fair and that they must be equal in inheritance; claiming that polygyny is an injustice and that divorce is an injustice to women; and claiming that stoning, amputation, and the like are barbaric acts unsuitable for humans.

Implementing this type of system in the lives, properties, lineage, contracts, and religions of society is disbelief in the Creator of the heavens and the earth." (Aḍwā' al-Bayān, vol. 4, p. 84).

Shaykh Aḥmad Shākir, may Allāh have mercy on him – a contemporary imām and ḥadīth scholar who passed away in 1958 and had worked in the field of Sharī'ah judiciary in Egypt before resigning – said in his commentary and verification of Imām Aḥmad's Musnad, under ḥadīth no. 7747:

"Whoever knowingly and intentionally rules by other than what Allāh has revealed is a disbeliever. Whoever is pleased with that and approves it is a disbeliever, whether he rules by what he calls the law of the People of the Book or by what he calls man-made legislation. All of it is disbelief and apostasy from the religion. May Allāh protect us from that."

Among what has been reported from him, may Allāh have mercy on him, is:

"With this, is it permissible in Allāh's Sharī'ah for Muslims to be governed in their lands by legislation borrowed from the pagan, atheist legislations of Europe? Or rather, by legislation into which false opinions and whims are inserted, which they change and alter as they please, its drafter unconcerned whether it conforms to or contravenes the Sharī'ah of Islām? Muslims were never afflicted with this except during the era of the Tatars." He continued until he said: "I do not think that a man who knows his religion and believes in it, in its entirety and details, can do anything but affirm, without hesitation or reinterpretation, that judicial authority in this situation is fundamentally null and void, incapable of being rectified or legitimized. The matter of these man-made laws is as clear as the sun: they are blatant disbelief, with no obscurity or dissimulation, and there is no excuse for anyone affiliated with Islām, whoever they may be, to implement them or approve of them." (‘Umdat al-Tafāsīr, vol. 4, p. 171).

The terms "transgression" (fisq) and "wrongdoing" (ẓulm) in the language of the Qur’ān are often used to express explicit disbelief that contradicts faith. The evidences for this in the Qur’ān are numerous, including:

- The term "transgression" (fisq) being used for explicit disbelief, such as Allāh the Exalted’s words in Sūrat al-Kahf, verse 50: {And [mention] when We said to the angels, "Prostrate to Adam," and they prostrated, except Iblīs. He was of the jinn and departed from (fasaqa ‘an) the command of his Lord.} It is known that Iblīs disbelieved through this transgression and deserved curse and expulsion; thus, his disbelief was called "transgression."

Similarly, His words: *{And We do not send the messengers except as bringers of good tidings and warners. So, whoever believes and reforms – no fear will there be concerning them, nor will they grieve. * But those who deny Our verses – the punishment will touch them for what they were defiantly disobeying (yafsuqūn).}* (Al-An‘ām/48-49).* It is clear that one who denies Allāh’s verses has disbelieved, yet He said about them, "yafsuqūn" (they transgress).

And in Sūrat al-Baqarah, verse 99: {And We have certainly sent down to you distinct verses, and none disbelieve in them except the defiantly disobedient (al-fāsiqūn).} This needs no explanation.

The term "wrongdoing" (ẓulm) being used for polytheism (shirk) and disbelief: Allāh the Exalted says in Sūrat Luqmān: *{O my son, do not associate [anything] with Allāh. Indeed, association [with Him] is great injustice (ẓulm).}* (Luqmān/13).* This is clear; He called polytheism "wrongdoing." And His words: {And they rejected them, while their [inner] selves were convinced thereof, out of injustice (ẓulman) and haughtiness.} (Al-Naml/14). Rejection is disbelief, and He called it "wrongdoing."

Allāh has also combined the attributes of wrongdoing and transgression with disbelief and hypocrisy in more than one place, including: {Indeed, those who disbelieve and commit wrong – Allāh will never forgive them nor guide them to a path.} (Al-Nisā’/168). {And We have certainly sent down to you distinct verses, and none disbelieve in them except the defiantly disobedient (al-fāsiqūn).}* (Al-Baqarah/99).

{But those who wronged changed [the words] to a statement other than that which had been said to them, so We sent down upon those who wronged a punishment from the sky for what they were defiantly disobeying (yaḥṣuqūn).}* (Al-Baqarah/59).

In Sūrat al-Tawbah, after He ruled as disbelievers the hypocrites who mocked the religion in verse 66, He said in verses 67-68: *{They forgot Allāh, so He forgot them. Indeed, the hypocrites – it is they who are the transgressors (al-fāsiqūn). * Allāh has promised the hypocrite men and hypocrite women and the disbelievers the fire of Hell, wherein they will abide eternally.}*

The Qur’ānic evidences are numerous, and the claim that the disbelief of current rulers is mere transgression or wrongdoing is refuted. The correct view is that they are disbelievers, wrongdoers, and transgressors simultaneously. And Allāh, the Exalted, knows best.

Secondly: Among the clear evidences in the Qur’ān and Sunnah for the disbelief of one who grants himself the right to legislate – permitting and prohibiting, changing laws, and encroaching upon Allāh’s sovereignty, thereby making himself a lord to be worshipped – is what He, the Glorified, informed about the disbelief of the Jews and Christians in His statement: {They have taken their scholars and their monks as lords besides Allāh, and [also] the Messiah, the son of Mary. And they were not commanded except to worship one God; there is no deity except Him. Exalted is He above whatever they associate with Him.} (Al-Tawbah/31).

Imām Aḥmad, al-Tirmidhī, and Ibn Jarīr narrated through ‘Adī ibn Ḥātim, may Allāh be pleased with him, as Ibn Kathīr transmitted in his commentary, that when ‘Adī, who was a Christian, came to the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) to embrace Islām, he found him reciting this verse. ‘Adī said to the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him): "They did not worship them." The Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) replied: ("Indeed, they forbade for them what was lawful and permitted for them what was unlawful, and they followed them. That was their worship of them.") It is well-known that the interpretation of the Qur’ān by the authentic Sunnah is among the soundest interpretations. The indication of the verse and the ḥadīth is perfectly clear: whoever legislates, permitting and prohibiting, has made himself a lord, and whoever obeys him has worshipped him. This is the same as the worship of Pharaoh's people for Pharaoh. When he said to them: {I have not known you to have a god other than me} (Al-Qaṣaṣ/38), and {And he said, "I am your most high lord."} (Al-Nāzi‘āt/24), he did not ask them to believe that he created them, provided for them, created the universe, and managed it – for the Egyptians in his time had gods they worshipped in that capacity. Rather, they worshipped him as a legislating god through obedience. This is the same role played by Muslim rulers today, their legislators, and their disbelieving, wrongdoing, transgressing parliaments. Allāh the Exalted has said: {So he bluffed his people, and they obeyed him. Indeed, they were a transgressing people.} (Al-Zukhruf/54).

How could they not be judged as disbelievers when, in their decrees and parliaments, they permit alcohol – its manufacture, sale, and licensing – and collect fees and taxes on it? The same applies to brothels and usurious banks. They equate in the right to vote on legislation between the believer and the disbeliever, the righteous and the wicked, man and woman, the knowledgeable and the ignorant. They form forbidden alliances, conclude invalid treaties, prevent Allāh’s name from being mentioned in His mosques and strive for their ruin. In contrast, they forbid what Allāh has permitted, such as enjoining good, forbidding evil, Jihād, collecting the tribute tax (jizyah), holding people accountable, and various types of lawful trade. This is not to mention the laws that permit unjust taxes and legislate for the killing, imprisonment, and displacement of people unjustly and aggressively, and so on regarding what they have legislated, codified, permitted, and prohibited. May Allāh destroy them; how they are deluded.

Thirdly: It is worth drawing attention to an important matter: the persistence of remnants of Sharīʿah provisions and fragments of its rulings within man-made legal codes, such as some personal status laws concerning marriage, divorce, and inheritance in certain Islamic countries, does not render the governance as rule by Sharīʿah. Similarly, deception and mocking the intelligence of simple people by titling the constitution with empty, deceptive phrases like "The Islamic Sharīʿah is the source of legislation and codification," or "The Islamic Sharīʿah is the primary source of legislation," as in some countries, or even exaggerating the deceit by saying, "The Islamic Sharīʿah is the sole source of legislation and codification," and then legislating and codifying independently of Allāh under this banner, as in some countries like Saudi Arabia, Sudan, and Yemen – this does not make the governance Islamic. To Allāh is our complaint about how they belittle the intelligence of their people by using certain scholars who are agents of the ruler. Who would agree to buy a bottle of wine labeled "milk" or "oil" on the premise that it is milk or oil? Does writing on wine purify it? This is from one perspective. From another, it is known in our religion that impurity nullifies purity, and Allāh is the richest of the rich, free from any need of partners, as He informed about Himself, Glorified and Exalted, and said in the Ḥadīth Qudsī: ("Whoever performs an act in which he associates anyone else with Me, I will leave him and his polytheism.") (Reported by Muslim). Allāh only accepts that the entire religion be for Him. Allāh the Exalted said: {And fight them until there is no fitnah and [until] the religion, all of it, is for Allāh.} (Al-Anfāl/39). And He said: {Indeed, We have sent down to you the Book in truth, so worship Allāh, *[being] sincere to Him in religion. * Unquestionably, for Allāh is the pure religion.}* (Al-Zumar/2-3).

The critical issue is not the magnitude or extent of this polytheism in legislation, or the amount by which rule by other than what Allāh has revealed is mixed. Rather, it is the act of deeming this permissible, undertaking it, and transgressing against the sovereignty of Allāh, Who said: {Legislation is not but for Allāh. He has commanded that you worship not except Him.} (Yūsuf/40). The tribulation (fitnah) we are in is that the religion in our lands is no longer entirely for Allāh. Ibn Kathīr, in his commentary on the verse {And fight them until there is no fitnah and [until] the religion, all of it, is for Allāh} (Al-Anfāl/39), reports from Ibn ‘Abbās that "it means there is no polytheism." He also reports from ‘Urwah and other scholars that "until there is no fitnah" means "until no Muslim is turned away from his religion." And from Muḥammad ibn Ishāq: "And Tawhīd is purely for Allāh, with no polytheism in it, and all rivals besides Him are rejected."

Imām al-Shāṭibī, may Allāh have mercy on him, said in Al-I’tisām: "Every innovation (bid‘ah), however small, whether by adding to or subtracting from the legislation, or changing the sound original, all of that may be attached to what is legislated, thereby undermining what is legislated. If someone were to do such a thing within the Sharī‘ah itself intentionally, he would disbelieve. For addition, subtraction, or alteration in it, whether small or large, is disbelief. There is no difference between what is small or large."

Imām Ibn Taymiyyah said: "If part of the religion is for Allāh and part is for other than Allāh, fighting becomes obligatory until the religion is entirely for Allāh. This is why Allāh the Exalted said: {O you who have believed, fear Allāh and give up what remains [due to you] of interest, if you should be believers. And if you do not, then be informed of a war [against you] from Allāh and His Messenger.} (Al-Baqarah/278-279). This verse was revealed concerning the people of Ṭā’if when they entered Islām and committed to prayer and fasting but refused to abandon usury. Allāh the Exalted showed that they were at war with Him and His Messenger. If these people, who are at war with Allāh and His Messenger, must be fought through Jihād, then what about those who abandon many or most of the laws of Islām, like the Tatars? The scholars of Islām are in agreement that if a dissenting group refuses to adhere to some of the Islamic obligations, they must be fought, even if they utter the two testimonies of faith but refuse to pray, pay zakāh, fast Ramaḍān, perform pilgrimage to the Ancient House, rule among themselves by the Book and Sunnah, prohibit immoralities, alcohol, or marriage to those of prohibited degrees, or if they wrongfully consider permissible the taking of lives and property, usury, gambling, Jihād against disbelievers, or imposing the jizyah on the People of the Book, and other such laws of Islām. They are to be fought over these matters until the religion is entirely for Allāh." (Vol. 28, Issue 217).

In summary: If the religion of Allāh is mixed with the religion of another, His legislation with the legislation of another, and His rule with the rule of another, this constitutes turning away from Allāh's religion (fitnah), and fighting becomes obligatory until there is no such fitnah. This is what is happening today, and it is what our rulers have brought upon us in terms of internal corruption, external aggression, hardship in public life, and humiliation at the hands of enemies.

Our Lord, Glorified and Exalted, has called such rulers "disbelievers, transgressors, wrongdoers." Yet, agents of the sultans have come forth calling these rulers righteous Muslims and legitimate guardians. It is as if they have their own special Qur'ān in which they have written: "And whoever does not judge by what Allāh has revealed – then it is those who are the righteous, believing Muslims!"

Therefore, frankly and clearly, and by the right of bearing witness for Allāh Who commanded us with His words: {You must make it clear to the people and not conceal it} (Āl 'Imrān/187), we must say:

It is a mistake for some scholars to apply the statements of some early Muslims about the early Muslim sultans – who ruled by what Allāh revealed, strove in Jihād for Allāh's cause, enjoined good, and forbade evil, yet had some injustice and oppression, like some Umayyad and Abbasid kings – to the rulers of today.

Regarding some instances where those early rulers judged by other than what Allāh revealed, they said it was "disbelief lesser than disbelief" or "minor disbelief." It is a grave error to apply this statement to the Muslim rulers of today, whose situation, laws, and legislative authorities we have previously described!

Glory be to Allāh! How can this be when they have created specialists in man-made law, educated in the lands of the disbelieving Cross in the West, and called each one of them a "legislator" (musharriʿ), in such explicit terms? This is not to mention what these kings, presidents, and princes do in enacting laws and legislating decrees, including dissolving the legislative bodies themselves (parliaments) if it occurs to them! The ruler at times worships the legislator and demands that people worship him, at other times imprisons him, and if he wishes to kill him, he kills him! Just as idol worshippers would fashion a god from dates and then eat it, or a god from wood and then burn it to cook upon! This is aside from the other forms of disbelief they have donned, such as loyalty to disbelievers, killing believers, and various nullifiers of faith in word and deed.

Now, an important issue confronts us, concerning which some have gone to extremes, even declaring Muslims as disbelievers, while others have been negligent, even declaring disbelievers as Muslims and testifying to the Islām of apostates. This issue is: Who are the apostate disbelievers in the government of a disbelieving or apostate ruler? Allāh the Exalted says: {And whoever does not judge by what Allāh has revealed – then it is those who are the disbelievers} (Al-Mā'idah/44). As is known from the Arabic language, the word "man" (whoever) is a relative pronoun meaning "the one who," and it is a form of generality and inclusiveness. So, His statement "man lam yahkum" (whoever does not judge) means "the one who does not judge" and includes everyone who does not judge.

If the system is based on absolute individual rule, without accompanying governing institutions, as was the rule of Pharaoh and as is the rule of despotic rulers, then the disbeliever is the ruler alone, and the word "man" (the one who) pertains to him alone. As for his executive assistants, they are generally considered a "faction of disbelief or apostasy." They bear sin according to their participation, which may reach the level of disbelief or may be merely a sin.

However, if governance is through institutions that exercise rule collectively, as is the case with most governments in the world today, then the institutions directly involved in governance and their senior officials are disbelievers.

In the commonly known situation today, constitutional governments are based on three authorities:

1. The Executive Authority: The president and his deputies, and ministers and their deputies.
2. The Legislative Authority: Members of parliament, or their equivalents among those specialized in legislating decrees and enacting laws.
3. The Judicial Authority: The public prosecution, various types of judges, and different courts: general, appellate, cassation, supreme court, etc.

If the government is dictatorial (military, dynastic, party-based, etc.), then the government is based on a single institution composed of the dictatorial ruler and his direct aides who exercise governance, authority, legislation, and judiciary.

In both cases, the principle is the same: {And whoever does not judge by what Allāh has revealed – then it is those who are the disbelievers}.

Therefore:

In constitutional governments, by virtue of the generality of the term "man" (whoever), the apostate disbelievers are:

1. The Executive Authority: The President (or King) and his deputies, and Ministers and their deputies.
2. The Legislative Authority: Members of Parliament, and members of the Consultative Council (those who legislate articles of constitutions or texts of laws contrary to what Allāh has revealed, or approve them, or ratify them, or accept them).
3. The Judicial Authority: Judges who rule by other than what Allāh has revealed.

In the dictatorial case, according to the same principle, the apostate disbelievers are:

1. The dictatorial ruler and his deputies.
2. His senior direct aides and members of his government or administration or his ministers who directly exercise authority, including ruling, legislating, and judging by other than what Allāh has revealed.

Due to military coups against constitutional governments, new systems of rule have emerged, which can be called "constitutional dictatorships!" (This name we use is not in jest). They are dictatorial in reality, and constitutional in claim and in mocking the intelligence of the people. This is the situation in the countries of the Arab and Islamic world.

In this case, the principle remains the same: {And whoever does not judge by what Allāh has revealed – then it is those who are the disbelievers}. The apostate disbelievers are: the dictatorial ruler, and his direct aides who exercise authority, rule by disbelief, legislate, and judge by other than what Allāh has revealed.

This concerns the disbelief of the rulers of Muslim lands in this era, from the perspective of legislating without Allāh's permission and ruling by other than what Allāh has revealed.

However, these belligerents against Allāh and His Messenger did not content themselves with their disbelief from this aspect alone; they added to it a disbelief that is clearer and easier to prove: their loyalty to the enemies of Muslims, their assistance to the disbelievers, and their support for them against their own peoples and co-religionists. Let us consider in some brief detail the Sharī'ah ruling on this other crime of theirs.

The Doctrine of Loyalty and Disavowal (al-Walā' wa-l-Barā')

The ruling on loyalty to disbelievers, its types, and the ruling on Muslims fighting alongside disbelievers and apostates are determined irrespective of people's races, colors, languages, nations, wealth, poverty, or any other consideration. The Sharī'ah recognizes only two affiliations for them: "believer" (mu'min) and "disbeliever" (kāfir). It has established through clear texts from the Book and the Sunnah that the people of faith are brothers and constitute a single nation. Allāh the Exalted said: {The believers are but brothers} (Al-Ḥujurāt/10). It has also established that the disbelievers, despite their differing forms of disbelief, races, nations, and languages, are "one community" (millah wāḥidah). With this clarity, it is established that accountable beings, both humans and jinn, on this earth form two nations: "the people of faith" (ahl al-īmān) and "the people of disbelief" (ahl al-kufr).

Allāh, Mighty and Majestic, said: {And indeed this, your nation, is one nation} (Al-Mu'minūn/52). It established among them the bond of loyalty and its obligations, and decreed that preference among them is based on piety (taqwá). It decided that:

{Allāh is the ally of those who believe. He brings them out from darknesses into the light} (Al-Baqarah/257). It also established that the disbelievers, despite their differing forms of disbelief, races, nations, and languages, are "one community." With this clarity, it is established that accountable beings, both humans and jinn, on this earth form two nations: "the people of faith" and "the people of disbelief."

Allāh, Glorified and Exalted, has unequivocally commanded believers to ally with one another and to disavow disbelievers. Upon this is built the doctrine of loyalty and disavowal (al-walā' wa-l-barā'). This is not a subsidiary issue of faith; rather, it is a fundamental issue, linked to the foundation of Tawhīd, as faith or disbelief, and a person's affiliation to one of these two nations, is built upon it.

No other bond stands before the doctrine of loyalty and disavowal, nor is any other considered, not even the strongest ties of kinship. Allāh has severed those ties with their disbelieving counterparts. He cut the bond between our master Abraham, peace be upon him, and his disbelieving father, so he disavowed him: {And when it became clear to him that he was an enemy to Allāh, he disassociated himself from him. Indeed, Abraham was compassionate and forbearing.} (Al-Tawbah/114). He cut the bond between our master Noah, peace and blessings be upon him, and his son, saying: {He said, "O Noah, indeed he is not of your family; indeed, he is [one whose] work was other than righteous."} (Hūd/46). He also cut it between the believer Āsiyah and her disbelieving husband Pharaoh: {And Allāh presents an example of those who believed: the wife of Pharaoh, when she said, "My Lord, build for me near You a house in Paradise and save me from Pharaoh and his work and save me from the wrongdoing people."} (Al-Taḥrīm/11). He also cut it between our masters Noah and Lot, peace be upon them, and their disbelieving wives: {Allāh presents an example of those who disbelieved: the wife of Noah and the wife of Lot. They were under two of Our righteous servants but betrayed them, so those prophets did not avail them from Allāh at all, and it was said, "Enter the Fire with those who enter."} (Al-Taḥrīm/10).

Allāh the Exalted said: {You will not find a people who believe in Allāh and the Last Day having affection for those who oppose Allāh and His Messenger, even if they were their fathers or their sons or their brothers or their kindred. Those – He has decreed within their hearts faith and supported them with spirit from Him. And We will admit them to gardens beneath which rivers flow, wherein they will abide eternally. Allāh is pleased with them, and they are pleased with Him. Those are the party of Allāh. Unquestionably, the party of Allāh – they are the successful.} (Al-Mujādilah/22). And He informed by His statement: {And the believing men and believing women are allies of one another} (Al-Tawbah/71). {And those who disbelieved are allies of one another} (Al-Anfāl/73). {And the hypocrite men and hypocrite women are of one another} (Al-Tawbah/67).

Allāh the Exalted said: {And indeed, the wrongdoers are allies of one another, and Allāh is the ally of the righteous.} (Al-Jāthiyah/19). So, there are only two affiliations, two nationalities, two bonds, and two ties: a Muslim who is loyal to a Muslim, and a disbeliever and a hypocrite who are loyal to one another.

Allāh has commanded the adoption of this creed and informed us that if we do not practice it, {There will be fitnah on earth and great corruption.} (Al-Anfāl/73). One who examines the verses of the Qur’ān finds that they cover the issue of commanding loyalty to believers and its implications, and prohibiting loyalty to disbelievers and commanding disavowal of them and its implications, with utmost focus and clarity. We can briefly mention some of this by extracting the Qur’ānic rulings and principles as follows:

1. The believer is an ally of the believer:

Allāh the Exalted says: {The believing men and believing women are allies of one another. They enjoin what is right and forbid what is wrong and establish prayer and give zakāh and obey Allāh and His Messenger.} (Al-Tawbah/71).

2. The disbeliever is an ally of the disbeliever:

Allāh the Exalted says: {And those who disbelieved are allies of one another} (Al-Anfāl/73). {The hypocrite men and hypocrite women are of one another. They enjoin what is wrong and forbid what is right} (Al-Tawbah/67).

3. Prohibition of loyalty to disbelievers:

Allāh the Exalted says: {Let not believers take disbelievers as allies rather than believers. And whoever does that has nothing [to expect] from Allāh} (Āl ‘Imrān/28). And Allāh the Exalted says: {O you who have believed, do not take the disbelievers as allies instead of the believers.} (Al-Nisā’/144).

4. The believer's loyalty to the believer is loyalty to Allāh and His Messenger, and it brings victory and dominance:

Allāh the Exalted says: {Your ally is none but Allāh and His Messenger and those who have believed} (Al-Mā’idah/55). {And whoever is an ally of Allāh and His Messenger and those who have believed – then indeed, the party of Allāh – they will be the predominant.} (Al-Mā’idah/56).

5. A Muslim's loyalty to disbelievers is loyalty to Satan and entry into his party:

It is a loss and incurs wrath from Allāh the Exalted, necessitating eternal пребывание in Hellfire. Allāh the Exalted says: {Have you not seen those who make allies of a people with whom Allāh has become angry? They are neither of you nor of them, and they swear to falsehood while they know.} (Al-Mujādilah/14), until His words: {Satan has overcome them and made them forget the remembrance of Allāh. Those are the party of Satan. Unquestionably, the party of Satan – they will be the losers.} (Al-Mujādilah/19). As Allāh the Exalted also said: {You see many of them becoming allies of those who disbelieved. How wretched is that which they have put *forth for themselves in that Allāh has become angry with them, and in the punishment they will abide eternally. * And if they had believed in Allāh and the Prophet and what was revealed to him, they would not have taken them as allies; but many of them are defiantly disobedient.}* (Al-Mā'idah/80-81). And Allāh the Exalted said: {And whoever takes Satan as an ally instead of Allāh has certainly sustained a manifest loss.} (Al-Nisā'/119).

6. A Muslim's loyalty to disbelievers is flimsy, and Satan will disavow their loyalty after having embroiled them in disbelief:

Allāh the Exalted says: {The example of those who take allies other than Allāh is like that of the spider who takes a home. And indeed, the weakest of homes is the home of the spider, if they only knew.} (Al-ʿAnkabūt/41). And He said: {And [Abraham] said, "You have only taken, other than Allāh, idols as [a bond of] affection among you in worldly life. Then on the Day of Resurrection you will deny one another and curse one another, and your refuge will be the Fire, and you will have no helpers."} (Al-ʿAnkabūt/25). And He said: {Like the example of Satan when he says to man, "Disbelieve." But when he disbelieves, he says, "Indeed, I am disassociated from you. Indeed, I fear Allāh, Lord of the worlds."} (Al-Ḥashr/16).

7. A Muslim's loyalty to disbelievers makes him one of them, nullifies his deeds, and leads him to apostasy:

God Almighty states in Sūrat al-Mā'idah:

{O you who believe! Do not take the Jews and the Christians as allies; they are allies of one another. And whoever among you takes them as allies, then indeed, he is one of them. Indeed, God does not guide the wrongdoing people} (al-Mā'idah 5:51).

He then continues:

{And those who believe will say, 'Are these the ones who swore by God their strongest oaths that they were with you?' Their deeds have become worthless, and they have become losers. O you who believe! Whoever among you apostatizes from his religion—God will bring forth a people whom He loves and who love Him: humble toward the believers, strong against the disbelievers, striving in the way of God, and fearing not the blame of any critic. That is the grace of God, which He bestows upon whom He wills. And God is All-Encompassing, All-Knowing} (al-Mā'idah 5:54–51).

After stating:

{O you who believe! Do not take the disbelievers as allies instead of the believers. Do you wish to offer God a manifest case against yourselves?} (al-Nisā' 4:144),

He follows with:

{Indeed, the hypocrites will be in the lowest depths of the Fire, and you will never find for them any helper} (al-Nisā' 4:145).

8. The Prohibition of Taking Relatives, People, or Clan as Allies if They Are Disbelievers

Indeed, affection for them based on kinship, despite their disbelief, contradicts faith. Allāh the Exalted says: {O you who have believed, do not take your fathers or your brothers as allies if they have preferred disbelief over faith. And whoever among you allies himself with them—then it is those who are the wrongdoers.} (At-Tawbah 9:23). {Say, [O Muḥammad], "If your fathers, your sons, your brothers, your wives, your kindred, wealth which you have acquired, commerce wherein you fear decline, and dwellings with which you are pleased are more beloved to you than Allāh and His Messenger and Jihād in His cause, then wait until Allāh executes His command. And Allāh does not guide the defiantly disobedient people."} (At-Tawbah 9:24).

Allāh the Exalted also says: {You will not find a people who believe in Allāh and the Last Day having affection for those who oppose Allāh and His Messenger, even if they were their fathers or their sons or their brothers or their kindred. Those—He has decreed within their hearts faith and supported them with spirit from Him. And He will admit them to gardens beneath which rivers flow, wherein they abide eternally. Allāh is pleased with them, and they are pleased with Him. Those are the party of Allāh. Unquestionably, the party of Allāh—they are the successful.} (Al-Mujādilah 58:22).

9. The Prohibition of Taking Disbelievers as Confidants and Helpers When Hatred Has Become Apparent from Their Mouths

Allāh the Exalted says: {O you who have believed, do not take as intimates those other than yourselves, for they will not spare you [any] ruin. They wish you would suffer. Hatred has already appeared from their mouths, and what their breasts conceal is greater. We have certainly made clear to you the signs, if you will use reason.} (Āl ‘Imrān 3:118).

10. The Prohibition of Alliance with Those Who Fought Us and Expelled Us from Our Homes

Allāh the Exalted says: {Allāh only forbids you from those who fight you because of religion and expel you from your homes and aid in your expulsion—[He forbids] that you make allies of them. And whoever makes allies of them, then it is those who are the wrongdoers.} (Al-Mumtaḥanah 60:9).

11. The Prohibition of Alliance with Those Who Take Our Religion as Ridicule and Play

Allāh the Exalted says: {O you who have believed, do not take as allies those who take your religion in ridicule and amusement from among those who were given the

Scripture before you, nor the disbelievers. And fear Allāh, if you should be believers.}
(Al-Mā'idah 5:57).

12. The Emphasis on the Prohibition of Alliance with Jews and Christians Specifically Among the Disbelievers

One who examines the reasons for the revelation of most verses prohibiting alliance with disbelievers will find that they were revealed concerning the prohibition of alliance with Jews and Christians. Nevertheless, the Qur'ānic verses explicitly named them from among all disbelievers with whom alliance is forbidden. Allāh the Exalted says: {O you who have believed, do not take the Jews and the Christians as allies} (Al-Mā'idah 5:51). And Allāh the Exalted says: {O you who have believed, do not take as allies those who take your religion in ridicule and amusement from among those who were given the Scripture before you, nor the disbelievers, as allies} (Al-Mā'idah 5:57).

13. The Command to Follow the Religion of Abraham in Complete Disavowal of, Hatred Towards, and Enmity Against Disbelievers

Allāh the Exalted says: {There has already been for you an excellent pattern in Abraham and those with him, when they said to their people, "Indeed, we are disassociated from you and from whatever you worship other than Allāh. We have denied you, and there has appeared between us and you animosity and hatred forever until you believe in Allāh alone"—except for the saying of Abraham to his father, "I will surely ask forgiveness for you, but I have no [power to do] for you anything against Allāh." [They said], "Our Lord, upon You we have relied, and to You we have returned, and to You is the destination."} (Al-Mumtaḥanah 60:4).

14. The Qur'ānic Verses Have Specified the Excuses of Muslims Who Ally with Disbelievers and Fall into Hypocrisy: Either Seeking Honor or Fearing Harm and Calamities

The Qur'ān has refuted and nullified these excuses, and judged their proponents as hypocrites, apostates, and affiliated with the disbelievers. This is due to the disease in their hearts, and their end will be regret in this world and the Hereafter, and their destination is Hellfire. Allāh the Exalted says: {Give tidings to the hypocrites that there is for them a painful punishment—those who take disbelievers as allies instead of believers. Do they seek with them honor [through power]? But indeed, honor belongs to Allāh entirely.} (An-Nisā' 4:138-139). Allāh the Exalted also says: {O you who have believed, do not take the Jews and the Christians as allies. They are [in fact] allies of one another. And whoever is an ally to them among you—then indeed, he is [one] of them. Indeed, Allāh guides not the wrongdoing people. So you see those in whose hearts is disease hastening into [association with] them, saying, "We are afraid a misfortune may strike us." But perhaps Allāh will bring conquest or a decision from Him, and they will become, over what they have concealed within themselves, regretful.} (Al-Mā'idah 5:51-52).

Among the most dangerous manifestations of allying with disbelievers are:

1. Imitating them in dress, behavior, customs, and names out of admiration, approval, and subservience. It is narrated from the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him): "I have been sent with the sword until Allāh alone is worshipped without any partner; my provision has been placed under the shadow of my spear; and humiliation and subservience have been decreed for those who oppose my command. Whoever imitates a people is one of them." (Narrated by Aḥmad).
2. Residing with polytheists in their lands and dwellings without necessity. The Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) said: "Do not live with the polytheists, nor associate closely with them; whoever lives with them or associates closely with them is like them." (Narrated by At-Tirmidhī).

3. Celebrating their festivals and occasions, congratulating them on these occasions, and exchanging gifts with them. The scholars of Islām have been stringent regarding matters of loyalty and affection towards disbelievers.

These aforementioned matters—imitating disbelievers, residing with them without a valid Sharī‘ah necessity, and celebrating the festivals of Zoroastrians, Jews, and Christians—have become so widespread among Muslims that they seem like their own customs and religion, as if no sin or divine wrath results from them. Most Muslims today consider these to be signs of civilization and modernity, and privileges of the elite and prominent. Foreign attire, Western fashion fads, hairstyle trends, eating and drinking habits, furnishing styles, ways of standing and sitting, music and dance, and European and American behaviors have become subjects of competition among various classes of Muslims, except for those upon whom Allāh has mercy.

As for residing and settling in the lands of disbelievers, one is astonished by the sheer numbers of those who emigrate to disbelievers' countries, live with them, marry from them, and spend their lives and deaths, and the lives of their offspring, in the lands of disbelievers. Indeed, people in our countries have come to view them as fortunate and successful. People, especially the youth, compete and queue at the embassies of disbelieving nations, particularly those of Europe, America, and Australia, for one of them to obtain a work or immigration visa. Observing the lives of tens of millions of Muslims in the West, one sees astounding things, especially concerning their children and grandchildren, which are heart-rending. Marriage to disbelieving women has become common among them; indeed, even the marriage of their daughters to disbelieving men has spread, and they have found Muslim scholars who issue fatwas permitting this illicit union!

Furthermore, children are raised according to the upbringing of disbelievers in their schools and do not know the languages of their Muslim parents. Some have even joined the armies and political parties of disbelievers! Observing the conditions of 40 million Muslims in Europe, and about half that number in America and Australia, one finds that the majority did not go there due to political or security necessity or coercion, but rather to earn a living and improve their standard of life. When their need was met, they found life pleasant, became content with the life of this world, and were satisfied with it. They cared little about their own or their offspring's detachment from their religion, nor about the majority of them being assimilated among the disbelievers. As for Muslims in our countries celebrating the festivals of disbelievers, especially Christian and Western ones, this has become a prevalent custom among most Muslims in our lands. Celebrating the Christian Christmas, the Christian New Year, and festivals they invented, such as personal birthdays, Mother's Day, Father's Day, Arbor Day, wedding anniversaries, Valentine's Day, Labor Day—celebrating these by Muslims, their governments, and their media has become commonplace. Some Muslims have gone so far as to set up decorated Christmas trees in their homes, give their children gifts on that night, and celebrate it like our 'Īd al-Fiṭr and 'Īd al-Aḍḥā, or even more so.

All the preceding is forbidden in Sharī'ah; its perpetrator is sinful, and it is a manifestation of transgression and disobedience. This has come upon us as a result of psychological, spiritual, doctrinal, political, military, and economic defeat before the disbelieving West.

4. Sitting with disbelievers, apostates, and hypocrites while they mock the signs of Allāh, the rituals of His religion, and His believing servants. Allāh the Exalted says: {And it has already come down to you in the Book that when you hear the verses of Allāh [recited], they are denied by them and ridiculed; so do not sit with them until they enter into another conversation. Indeed, you would then be like them. Indeed, Allāh will gather the hypocrites and the disbelievers in Hell all together.} (An-Nisā' 4:140).

Obedying disbelievers in what Allāh has forbidden, even if a little, is a path to apostasy. Allāh the Exalted says in Sūrah Muḥammad: {Indeed, those who reverted back [to disbelief] after guidance had become clear to them—Satan enticed them and prolonged hope for them. That is because they said to those who disliked what Allāh sent down, "We will obey you in part of the matter." And Allāh knows their secrets.} (Muḥammad 47:25-26).

Thus, obedience to those who disliked the Sharīʿah of Allāh, in their command, even in a small matter, is a path to apostasy.

5. Taking disbelievers as confidants, advisors, counselors, and helpers, and placing Muslims under their command and prohibition. This is a form of alliance with them that Allāh has forbidden.
6. Advising disbelievers, guiding them to what strengthens them, and supporting them with opinions against Muslims.
7. Resorting to their laws and legislations for judgment is one of the greatest forms of alliance with them. Imam Ibn Taymiyyah said in Majmūʿ al-Fatāwā (Vol. 28, p. 199): "Part of the alliance with disbelievers, for which Allāh condemned the People of the Book and the hypocrites, is believing in some of their disbelief, or seeking judgment from them rather than from the Book of Allāh. As Allāh the Exalted says: {Have you not seen those who were given a portion of the Scripture, who believe in Jibt and Tāghūt and say about the disbelievers, "These are better guided than the believers as to the way."} (An-Nisāʾ 4:51)."

However, the most dangerous and clearest form of apostasy is:

8. Fighting alongside them, under their banner, and in service of their interests. This is the gravest form of alliance, where one sacrifices one's life for the sake of disbelievers. It is disbelief that expels one from the fold of Islām and constitutes an affiliation with them, by the explicit text of the Qur’ān: {And whoever is an ally to them among you—then indeed, he is [one] of them} (Al-Mā’idah 5:51). And Allāh has disassociated Himself from such a person: {then he is not from Allāh in anything} (Āl ‘Imrān 3:28). Allāh the Exalted has said: {Those who believe fight in the cause of Allāh, and those who disbelieve fight in the cause of Tāghūt} (An-Nisā’ 4:76). And Allāh the Exalted said: {Have you not considered those who practice hypocrisy, saying to their brothers who have disbelieved among the People of the Scripture, "If you are expelled, we will surely leave with you, and we will not obey, in regard to you, anyone—ever; and if you are fought, we will surely aid you." But Allāh testifies that they are liars.} (Al-Ḥashr 59:11).

Among the narrations that have come in the exegesis of some of the preceding Qur’ānic texts:

Ibn Ḥazm, reporting consensus, said: "It is established that the saying of Allāh the Exalted, {And whoever is an ally to them among you—then indeed, he is [one] of them}, is to be taken at its apparent meaning: that he is a disbeliever from among the disbelievers. This is a truth about which no two Muslims differ." (Al-Muḥallā, Vol. 13, p. 25).

Aṭ-Ṭabarī said in his Tafsīr (Vol. 1, p. 277): "Whoever allies himself with the Jews and Christians instead of the believers, he is one of them—that is, from their religion and creed. For no one allies himself with another unless he is pleased with him, his religion, and his ways. If he is pleased with him and his religion, he has opposed and detested what is contrary to it, and his ruling becomes the same as theirs."

Ibn Jarīr (Aṭ-Ṭabarī) said in his Tafsīr, regarding one who takes disbelievers as helpers, supporters, and backers, allying with them in their religion and supporting them against Muslims: "He is not from Allāh in anything—meaning, Allāh has disowned him due to his apostasy from his religion and his entry into disbelief." (Vol. 3, p. 228).

Ibn al-Qayyim said in his book Aḥkām Ahl adh-Dhimmah (Vol. 1, p. 67): "Allāh has decreed—and there is no better decree than His—that whoever allies himself with the Jews and Christians is one of them: {And whoever is an ally to them among you—then indeed, he is [one] of them}. If their allies are from them by the text of the Qurʾān, then they share their ruling."

Ibn Kathīr said in his commentary on Sūrah Al-Māʾidah, verses 50-53 (commenting on verses 51-52):

"Allāh, Blessed and Exalted, forbids His believing servants from allying with the Jews and Christians, who are enemies of Islām and its people—may Allāh fight them. Then He informed that some of them are allies of others. Then He threatened and warned whoever engages in that, saying: {And whoever is an ally to them among you—then indeed, he is [one] of them} (Al-Māʾidah 5:51). Ibn Abī Ḥātim narrated that ʿUmar ordered Abū Mūsā al-Ashʿarī to submit to him a record of what he had taken and given on a single parchment. Abū Mūsā had a Christian scribe, so he submitted it to him. ʿUmar was impressed and said, 'This one is indeed meticulous. Can you read to us a letter in the mosque that came from Syria?' He replied, 'He cannot.' ʿUmar asked, 'Is he in a state of major ritual impurity?' He said, 'No, rather he is a Christian.' ʿUmar then rebuked me, struck my thigh, and said, 'Expel him!' Then he recited: {O you who have believed, do not take the Jews and the Christians as allies}."

Muḥammad ibn al-Ḥasan narrated to us that ʿAbdullāh ibn ʿUtbah said: 'Let each of you beware of being a Jew or a Christian without realizing it.' He (the narrator) said: 'We thought he meant this verse.'

Ibn Kathīr continued: "And His saying, {So you see those in whose hearts is disease}, meaning doubt, uncertainty, and hypocrisy, {hastening into [association with] them}, meaning they rush to ally with them and show them affection, both inwardly and outwardly, {saying, "We are afraid a misfortune may strike us."} Meaning, they rationalize their affection and alliance with them because they fear that something might happen, such as the disbelievers triumphing over the Muslims, so that they would have established favors with the Jews and Christians which would then benefit them. At that point, Allāh the Exalted said, {But perhaps Allāh will bring conquest}. As-Suddī said: Meaning the conquest of Makkah. Others said: Meaning judgment and resolution. {Or a decision from Him}. As-Suddī said: Meaning the imposition of jizyah upon the Jews and Christians. {And they will become}, meaning those hypocrites who allied with the Jews and Christians, {over what they have concealed within themselves} of alliance, {regretful}, meaning for what they did, which availed them nothing nor averted any harm. Rather, it was the very essence of corruption. For they were exposed, and Allāh revealed their affair in this world to His believing servants, after they had been concealed and their true state unknown. When the exposing circumstances arose, their affair became clear to the believing servants of Allāh."

(It is as if this verse and its interpretation describe the condition of the rulers of Muslim lands who assist America, such as Musharraf and his Pakistani government, in their alliance with America because they believe it will triumph over the Muslims, thereby securing them a position with America. Their excuse for this is the fear of calamity and misfortune from America, and the desire to seek honor from it. They will regret this when their affair is exposed, and they face loss and punishment at the hands of the believers when Allāh's victory comes.)

Regarding the saying of Allāh the Exalted: {Let not believers take disbelievers as allies rather than believers. And whoever does that has nothing [to hope for] from Allāh} (Āl ‘Imrān 3:28).

Ibn Kathīr said: "Allāh, Blessed and Exalted, forbids His believing servants from allying with disbelievers and from taking them as allies to whom they secretly show affection instead of the believers. Then He threatened concerning that, saying: {And whoever does that has nothing [to hope for] from Allāh}, meaning whoever commits this prohibition of Allāh, Allāh has disowned him. {And Allāh warns you of Himself}, meaning, He warns you of His vengeance for opposing Him, and of His might and punishment for those who ally with His enemies and show enmity to His allies."

Regarding the saying of Allāh the Exalted from Sūrah Āl ‘Imrān: {O you who have believed, do not take as intimates those other than yourselves, for they will not spare you [any] ruin. They wish you would suffer. Hatred has already appeared from their mouths, and what their breasts conceal is greater. We have certainly made clear to you the signs, if you will use reason.} (Āl ‘Imrān 3:118).

Ibn Kathīr said: "Allāh, Blessed and Exalted, says, forbidding His believing servants from taking hypocrites as intimates—that is, informing them of their secrets and what they conceal from their enemies. The hypocrites, with all their effort and capacity, do not spare the believers any ruin—that is, they strive to oppose them and harm them in every possible way and with all the deception and trickery they can muster. They wish for what distresses, embarrasses, and burdens the believers."

As we have mentioned, the verses, Ḥadīth, narrations, and scholarly opinions are mutually supportive of these meanings. These truths are among the priorities of Islām and the fundamentals of faith, succinctly and clearly summarized by the explicit address of the Qur’ān to every Muslim: {And whoever is an ally to them among you—then indeed, he is [one] of them} and {And whoever does that has nothing

[to hope for] from Allāh}. This is clear: whoever allies with disbelievers is a disbelieving apostate like them, from whom Allāh has disowned Himself.

Sheikh Muḥammad ibn ‘Abd al-Wahhāb counted supporting disbelievers against Muslims among the ten nullifiers of Islām that he mentioned, which are:

1. Polytheism (Shirk) in the worship of Allāh; slaughtering for other than Allāh or for a grave.
2. Whoever sets up intermediaries between himself and Allāh, supplicating to them, asking for their intercession, and relying on them.
3. Whoever does not consider polytheists to be disbelievers, or doubts their disbelief, or deems their way correct... has disbelieved.
4. Whoever believes that guidance other than that of the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) is more perfect than his guidance, or that the judgment of other than him is better than his judgment, such as one who prefers the judgment of Tāghūt (false deities/systems) over his judgment, is a disbeliever.
5. Whoever detests something that the Messenger (peace and blessings be upon him) brought—even if he acts upon it—is a disbeliever.
6. Whoever mocks anything of the religion of the Messenger, or its reward or punishment, disbelieves. The proof is: {Say, "Is it Allāh and His verses and His Messenger that you were mocking?"} (At-Tawbah 9:65).
7. Sorcery; whoever practices it or is pleased with it disbelieves. {But they do not teach anyone unless they say, "We are but a trial, so do not disbelieve."} (Al-Baqarah 2:102).

8. Supporting polytheists and aiding them against Muslims: {And whoever is an ally to them among you—then indeed, he is [one] of them} (Al-Mā'idah 5:51)—this is the point of evidence.
9. Whoever believes that some people are permitted to deviate from the Sharī'ah of Muḥammad (peace and blessings be upon him), just as Al-Khiḍr deviated from the Sharī'ah of Moses (peace be upon him), is a disbeliever.
10. Whoever turns away from the religion of Allāh—neither learning it nor acting upon it. {But those who disbelieve, from that of which they are warned, are turning away.} (Al-Aḥqāf 46:3).

Sulaymān ibn 'Abdillāh, son of Sheikh Muḥammad ibn 'Abd al-Wahhāb, said: "Know, may Allāh have mercy on you, that if a person shows agreement with the polytheists in their religion out of fear of them, to appease them, or to compromise with them to ward off their evil—then he is a disbeliever like them, even if he detests their religion, hates them, and loves Islām and the Muslims. This is if nothing more than that occurs from him.

How then is it if he is in a position of strength and invites them, enters into their obedience, openly agrees with their false religion, aids them in it with support, allies with them, and severs ties of loyalty with Muslims? There is no doubt that such a person is a disbeliever, among the most hostile enemies of Allāh and His Messenger (peace and blessings be upon him). No one is exempt from this except one under duress. Scholars have unanimously agreed that whoever utters words of disbelief jokingly becomes a disbeliever, so how about one who manifests disbelief out of fear and greed?"

The Sheikh then presented twenty proofs for his statement, including: {And never will the Jews or the Christians approve of you until you follow their religion} (Al-Baqarah 2:120); {And they will not cease fighting you} (Al-Baqarah 2:217); {Let not believers take disbelievers as allies rather than believers} (Āl ‘Imrān 3:28); {And it has already come down to you in the Book that when you hear the verses of Allāh [recited], they are denied by them and ridiculed; so do not sit with them until they enter into another conversation. Indeed, you would then be like them} (An-Nisā’ 4:140); {You see many of them becoming allies of those who disbelieved. How wretched is that which they have put forth for themselves in that Allāh has become angry with them, and in the punishment they will abide eternally. And if they had believed in Allāh and the Prophet and what was revealed to him, they would not have taken them as allies; but many of them are defiantly disobedient} (Al-Mā’idah 5:80-81); and the Ḥadīth: "Whoever associates closely with a polytheist and lives with him is like him."

Sheikh Sulaymān ibn ‘Abdillāh ibn Muḥammad ibn ‘Abd al-Wahhāb said that whoever claims Islām and is with the polytheists in assembly, support, and residence, and is considered by the polytheists to be one of them, is a disbeliever like them, even if he claims Islām. This is like the people who stayed in Makkah and claimed Islām after the Hijrah, and went out for Badr. Some Companions thought they were Muslims and said, "We have killed our brothers." Then Allāh the Exalted revealed: {Indeed, those whom the angels take [in death] while wronging themselves} (An-Nisā’ 4:97).

"Whoever displays signs of hypocrisy indicative of it, such as apostatizing when factions form against the believers and abandoning them when the enemy gathers, may be called a hypocrite."

Therefore, and as a testimony for the sake of Allāh, we say:

It is among the greatest deceptions, injustices, and fabrications of lies against Allāh, and among the greatest distortions of Allāh’s verses and taking them in ridicule, and part of selling religion for worldly gain and purchasing with Allāh’s verses a paltry price, that deceivers attempt to portray this complete allegiance of Muslim rulers, and this firm alliance between them and the Jews and Christians—Americans, Europeans, and other disbelievers—as a matter of necessities and legitimate interests, or cases of duress. This is after hypocrisy has become manifest from them, and their forms of allegiance to disbelievers have diversified, indeed, reaching their peak by fighting alongside them, defending them, and supporting them against Muslims, whatever the cost in terms of the destruction of Muslim lands, the loss of their lives, the shedding of their blood, the selling of their lands, and the plundering of their wealth. This can only be described as treachery, collaboration with them, allegiance to disbelievers, and disavowal of believers.

The undeniable truth is that the apostasy resulting from this allegiance to disbelievers, which most Muslim rulers today have adopted, and into which they have dragged their regimes, governments, armies, security forces, and government employees, is one of the clearest manifestations of their disbelief and hypocrisy.

This, in addition to the explicit disbelief they have adopted by altering the laws of Islām and replacing them with the laws of disbelief and Tāghūt—from the philosophies and laws of the enemies of this religion with whom they have allied—constitutes two testimonies that brand these rulers with apostasy, disbelief, and departure from the fold of Islām.

This judgment is not refuted by the deceptions of those who have set themselves up as defenders of these traitors, despite the saying of Allāh the Exalted: {And do not be for the deceitful an advocate}. Allāh the Exalted said: {Indeed, We have revealed to you, [O Muḥammad], the Book in truth so you may judge between the people by that which Allāh has shown you. And do not be for the deceitful an advocate} up to His saying: {Here you are—those who argue on their behalf in the life of this world—but who will argue with Allāh for them on the Day of Resurrection, or who will be their defender?} (An-Nisā’ 4:105-109).

Glory be to Allāh! {Then do they not reflect upon the Qur'ān, or are there locks upon [their] hearts?} I believe it is both: locked hearts and no contemplation of the Qur'ān, because of what has covered those hearts from illicit gains and consuming the wealth of rulers. This is in accordance with the saying of the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him): "Whoever frequents the gates of rulers will be tempted. And a servant does not increase in closeness to the ruler except that he increases in distance from Allāh."

May Allāh distance them.

Thirdly: Rebelling Against the Ruler if He Apostatizes from Islām or Was a Disbeliever is an Obligation Upon Muslims by Consensus

What are the Sharī'ah implications of a Muslim ruler's disbelief or apostasy from Islām?

As mentioned earlier, all the calamities of the Muslims and the disasters that have befallen them internally are, in reality, due to the absence of Allāh's law from their lives, their being ruled by other than what Allāh revealed, the disbelief of their rulers, and their allegiance to disbelievers. The principle in Sharī'ah is that "the Imam is a shield," behind whom one fights, by whom aggression is repelled, justice and equity are established, and rights are fulfilled. Thus, the nation achieves internal balance and repels its external enemies. The corruption of the subjects is proportional to the corruption of the ruler, and the scholars are the regulators of the rulers. The corruption of the rulers is proportional to the corruption of the scholars. As stated in the narration: "There are two classes of people: if they are righteous, the people will be righteous, and if they are corrupt, the people will be corrupt—the scholars and the rulers." The reality is that discussing the issue of whether our rulers are Muslims or disbelievers and apostates, after conditions have reached what we see today, is a matter of utmost gravity and importance. This is because it is the gateway to finding a solution for the problems of Muslims today. It is a matter of our religion and our worldly life. In short, the Sharīʿah ruling on whether a ruler is a Muslim or a disbeliever entails one of two completely contradictory sets of legal implications and consequences.

Before delving into the implications of the ruler's Islām or disbelief, we must recall a very important matter, which is the decisive factor between guidance and misguidance in this issue. This matter is: the ruler's Islām or disbelief is entirely linked to the issue of his ruling by the Sharīʿah he implements. Meaning:

- If the rule belongs to Allāh, and the Sharīʿah is established, then the ruler is a Muslim, unless he nullifies his Islām.
- If the ruler is a Muslim, then one of the implications of that is that he must rule by what Allāh has revealed.

There is no ruling by what Allāh has revealed if the ruler is a disbeliever, nor is the ruler a Muslim if he rules by other than what Allāh has revealed. They are correlative:

Muslim ruler = rules by what Allāh has revealed.

And its converse is true:

Rules by other than what Allāh has revealed = disbelieving ruler.

We clarified this in the preceding section when we discussed sovereignty (ḥākimiyyah) and allegiance (walāʾ).

Implications and consequences of the ruler being a Muslim who rules by Allāh's Sharīʿah, allies with believers, and opposes disbelievers:

- The obligation to hear and obey him in everything he commands, unless it is a sin, in times of ease and hardship, and to be patient with favoritism, and not to dispute his authority. Allāh the Exalted says: {O you who have believed, obey Allāh and obey the Messenger and those in authority among you} (An-Nisā' 4:59).

- The obligation for Muslims to respect his covenants, contracts, treaties, agreements, pledges of security, and responsibilities, as long as they are within the limits of Sharī'ah.
- The obligation to mobilize with him if he calls Muslims to Jihād in the cause of Allāh against disbelievers, apostates, rebels, or those who spread corruption in the land.
- The obligation to advise him, cooperate with him in righteousness, piety, and good deeds to the extent possible, and not to act presumptuously against him unless he neglects commanding good and forbidding evil.
- The obligation to be patient with him and obey him, even if he takes your wealth and flogs your back, and even if he himself is involved in personal immorality and injustice in his rule, as long as he does not commit an act of disbelief for which there is clear proof from Allāh. The Ḥadīth indicating these matters are numerous.

All this applies as long as the ruler is a Muslim and has not committed any nullifier of faith, or an act of disbelief for which there is clear proof from Allāh, as in the authentic, agreed-upon Ḥadīth from 'Ubādah ibn aṣ-Ṣāmit, who said: "The Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) called us and we pledged allegiance to him. Among the things he took from us was that we pledged allegiance to hear and obey in times of energy and reluctance, hardship and ease, and when others are preferred over us, and not to dispute the matter with its people. The Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) said, 'Unless you see clear disbelief (kufr bawāḥ) for which you have proof from Allāh.' This is Muslim's narration.

The obligation of Jihād against the disbelieving or apostate ruler:

Imam An-Nawawī, in his commentary on Ṣaḥīḥ Muslim, when explaining this Ḥadīth, transmitted from Qāḍī 'Iyāḍ the consensus on rebelling against the ruler if he disbelieves. He said: "Qāḍī 'Iyāḍ said: The scholars have unanimously agreed that leadership (Imāmah) is not conferred upon a disbeliever, and that if disbelief befalls him, he is deposed. He also said: Likewise, if he abandons establishing prayers and calling to them. Qāḍī 'Iyāḍ said: So if disbelief, alteration of the Sharī'ah, or innovation befalls him, he departs from the position of authority, his obedience is nullified, and it becomes obligatory upon Muslims to rise against him, depose him, and install a just Imam if they are able to do so. If this is not possible except for a group, it is obligatory upon them to undertake the deposition of the disbeliever. It is not obligatory in the case of an innovator unless they believe they have the ability to do so. If inability is confirmed, rising up is not obligatory, and the Muslim should emigrate from his land and flee with his religion." (Ṣaḥīḥ Muslim bi Sharḥ An-Nawawī, Vol. 12, p. 229).

Al-Ḥāfiẓ Ibn Ḥajar said in Fatḥ al-Bārī Sharḥ Ṣaḥīḥ al-Bukhārī:

"Indeed, he—the Imam—is deposed by disbelief, by consensus. Therefore, it is obligatory upon every Muslim to act in this regard. Whoever is capable of doing so will be rewarded, whoever compromises is sinful, and whoever is incapable, emigration from that land becomes obligatory upon him." (Vol. 13, p. 154).

Abū Ya'la said: "If something occurs from him that impugns his religion, then it is considered: if he disbelieves after having believed, he has exited from leadership (Imāmah), and this is unquestionable because he has left the religion, and it becomes obligatory to kill him."

Professor 'Abd al-Qādir 'Awdah said in his book "Islām Between the Ignorance of Its Sons and the Incapacity of Its Scholars": "And that permitting what is unanimously forbidden, like adultery and intoxication, and permitting the annulment of prescribed punishments, the suspension of Sharīʿah rulings, and legislating what Allāh has not permitted, is indeed disbelief and apostasy. And that rebelling against a Muslim ruler if he apostatizes is an obligation upon Muslims, and the lowest degree of rebelling against those in authority is disobeying their commands and prohibitions that contradict the Sharīʿah."

Scholars and exegetes have deduced from the saying of Allāh the Exalted to our master Abraham (peace and blessings be upon him): {And [mention, O Muḥammad], when Abraham was tried by his Lord with commands and he fulfilled them. [Allāh] said, "Indeed, I will make you a leader for the people." [Abraham] said, "And of my descendants?" [Allāh] said, "My covenant does not include the wrongdoers."} (Al-Baqarah 2:124), that leadership (Imāmah) is not initially conferred upon a disbeliever, nor even upon a defiant sinner or an oppressor. Likewise, they deduced from the saying of Allāh the Exalted: {And never will Allāh grant to the disbelievers a way [to triumph] over the believers} (An-Nisā' 4:141), meaning Allāh will not grant disbelievers authority, subjugation, and control over believers. Among the greatest forms of authority is the leadership of a ruler, which is the supreme leadership (Imāmah ʿUẓmā), and the greatest means of obedience and subjugation. Indeed, scholars have forbidden the sale of a Muslim slave to a disbeliever, and they have also forbidden positions and offices where a Muslim would be under a disbeliever. For this reason, the marriage of a Muslim woman to a disbeliever is forbidden, because the authority in the household belongs to the husband, and the Muslim woman would be under the command of a disbeliever, whereas the reverse is permitted. In conclusion, as An-Nawawī transmitted the consensus, the leadership of a disbelieving ruler, or one who apostatizes and upon whom disbelief befalls, is null and void, and it is obligatory to rebel against him and depose him.

It is stated in the book "Al-Imāmah al-‘Uẓmā ‘inda Ahl as-Sunnah" (The Supreme Leadership According to Ahl as-Sunnah) by ‘Abdullāh Ad-Dumayjī, in the third chapter under the title "Deposing the Imam and Rebelling Against Rulers" (p. 465), from which we briefly quote the following:

"It is agreed upon among scholars that as long as the Imam fulfills his duties in managing the affairs of his subjects and is just among them, it is not permissible to depose him or rebel against him. Rather, this is something Islām has warned against and has threatened the treacherous with a painful punishment. However, there are grave matters that affect the religious and worldly lives of Muslims, some of which necessitate the deposition of the Imam who commits them. Some of these matters are agreed upon among scholars, while others are disputed. We will now review these reasons to see the scholars' opinions on them:

First: Disbelief and Apostasy after Islām:

The first and greatest reason necessitating the deposition of a ruler is apostasy and disbelief after having believed. If the Imam commits a grave crime that leads to disbelief and apostasy from the religion, he is thereby deposed and has no authority over any Muslim whatsoever.

Allāh the Exalted says: {And never will Allāh grant to the disbelievers a way [to triumph] over the believers} (An-Nisā’ 4:141). And what way is greater than the way of leadership? And in the Ḥadīth narrated by ‘Ubādah ibn aṣ-Ṣāmit, who said: 'We pledged allegiance to the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) to hear and obey in times of energy and reluctance, hardship and ease, and when others are preferred over us, and not to dispute the matter with its people, unless you see clear disbelief (kufr bawāḥ) for which you have proof from Allāh.' (Agreed upon). Al-Khaṭṭābī said: 'The meaning of bawāḥ is apparent (manifest).' Regarding 'for which you have proof from Allāh,' Al-Ḥāfiẓ Ibn Ḥajar said in Sharḥ al-Bukhārī:

'Meaning, a textual verse or an authentic report that is not open to interpretation.' An-Nawawī said in his commentary on Muslim: 'What is meant by disbelief here is disobedience, and the meaning of the Ḥadīth is: do not dispute with rulers in their authority nor object to them unless you see from them an established evil that you know from the principles of Islām.' From the implication of this Ḥadīth, it is not a condition that this ruler must announce his apostasy from Islām or his disbelief; rather, it suffices for him to manifest some actions that necessitate disbelief. Sheikh Anwar Shāh Kashmīrī said in the book 'Ikfār al-Mulḥidīn' (p. 22, Majlis al-'Ilmī edition, Karachi): 'This Ḥadīth also indicates that it is permissible to declare the people of the Qiblah as disbelievers even if they do not depart from the Qiblah, and that disbelief may be necessitated without commitment [to it] and without intending to change the religion, otherwise the observer would not need proof.'

So, the apparent meaning of the Ḥadīth is that whoever is afflicted by disbelief must be deposed, and this is the least that is obligatory upon the Ummah towards him, as it is obligatory to fight him and his blood becomes permissible due to his apostasy, based on the saying of the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him): "Whoever changes his religion, kill him."

Ad-Dumayjī then quoted the words of Qāḍī 'Iyāḍ, Ibn Ḥajar, and Qāḍī Abū Ya'lā, which we have previously mentioned. Then he said: As-Safāqusī said: 'They unanimously agreed that if the Caliph calls to disbelief or innovation, one should revolt against him.' (Irshād as-Sārī bi Sharḥ Ṣaḥīḥ al-Bukhārī, Vol. 10, p. 217).

Second: Abandoning Prayer and the Call to It. (...)

Third: Abandoning Ruling by What Allāh Revealed:

What indicates that this reason necessitates deposing the Imam—in all its forms, whether constituting disbelief or grave sin—is its unrestricted mention in the following authentic prophetic Ḥadīth:

1. From Anas ibn Mālik, who said that the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) said: "Listen and obey, even if an Abyssinian slave whose head is like a raisin is appointed over you, as long as he establishes the Book of Allāh among you." (Narrated by Al-Bukhārī).
2. From Umm al-Ḥuṣayn al-Aḥmasiyyah, who said: "I performed Ḥajj with the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him), the Farewell Pilgrimage... until she said, then I heard him say: 'If a mutilated slave'—I think she said 'black'—'is appointed over you, leading you by the Book of Allāh, then listen to him and obey.'" In the narration of At-Tirmidhī and An-Nasā'ī, she heard him say: "O people, fear Allāh, and if a mutilated Abyssinian slave is appointed over you, then listen to him and obey as long as he establishes the Book of Allāh among you."

These Ḥadīth clearly indicate that a condition for hearing and obeying is that the Imam leads his subjects by the Book of Allāh. However, if he does not rule among them by the law of Allāh, then there is no hearing or obedience for him, and this necessitates his deposition. This applies to forms of ruling by other than what Allāh revealed that constitute grave sin; as for those that constitute disbelief, they necessitate his deposition even by fighting, as previously explained under the first reason. And Allāh knows best."

End of quote.

I have come across a discussion of utmost importance, a contemporary testimony relevant to our topic. In the book Takmilah Faṭḥ al-Mulhim fī Sharḥ Ṣaḥīḥ Muslim by the Shaykh al-Islām of Pakistan, Shaykh Muhammad Taqī Usmani, in his commentary on the noble Ḥadīth:

From Junādah ibn Abī Umayyah, who said: We visited ‘Ubādah ibn aṣ-Ṣāmit while he was ill and said: "Narrate to us, may Allāh rectify you, a Ḥadīth by which Allāh may benefit us, that you heard from the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him." He said: "The Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, called us and we gave him our pledge of allegiance. Among the conditions he took from us was that we pledged to hear and obey in times of enthusiasm and reluctance, in hardship and ease, and when others are given preference over us, and that we should not dispute the authority of those in power." He said: "...unless you see manifest disbelief (kufran bawāḥan) for which you have clear proof from Allāh."

Shaykh Taqi Usmani said:

His statement, "And that we should not dispute the authority of those in power," means we should not contest the ruler in his rule. Aḥmad added, through the chain of ‘Umayr ibn Hānī’ from Junādah: "Even if you believe you have a right in the matter, do not act on that assumption; rather, listen and obey until it comes to you without rebelling against obedience." And in the narration of Ḥibbān Abī an-Naḍr, recorded by Ibn Ḥibbān and Aḥmad, it is added: "Even if they consume your wealth and strike your back," as mentioned in Fatḥ al-Bārī (13/8).

His statement, "Unless you see manifest disbelief (kufran bawāḥan)," with a fathāh on the bā’ and wāw, means apparent and evident disbelief, from their saying: "bāḥa bi ash-shay’ yabuḥu bihi bawḥan wa bawāḥan," meaning he announced it and made it manifest. In some narrations, it appears as "burāḥan" with a rā’ instead of a wāw, which is close to this meaning. The origin of barāḥ is barren land with no inhabitants or buildings. It is also said that barāḥ means clarification; it is said "baraḥa al-khafā" when obscurity becomes clear. And in al-Ṭabarānī's narration of the Ḥadīth, it is: "explicit disbelief (kufran ṣurāḥan)" with a ḍammah on the ṣād followed by a rā’. This is a summary of what is in Fatḥ al-Bārī (13/8).

The Issue of Rebelling Against Tyrannical Rulers

The majority of scholars have used this Ḥadīth as evidence that it is not permissible to rebel against a tyrannical or corrupt ruler unless he demonstrates explicit disbelief. Al-Ḥāfiẓ stated in al-Fath (13/7): "Ibn Baṭṭāl said: In the Ḥadīth is a proof for refraining from rebelling against the ruler, even if he is a tyrant. The jurists have unanimously agreed on the obligation to obey the victorious ruler and to perform Jihād with him, and that obeying him is better than rebelling against him because it preserves lives and pacifies the masses. Their evidence is this report and others that support it. They made no exception to this unless the ruler commits explicit disbelief, in which case obedience to him is not permissible; rather, it is obligatory to fight him for whoever is capable."

Some people might understand from this that it is never permissible to rebel against a tyrannical ruler as long as he calls himself by the name of Islām. However, the matter is not so absolute, especially according to the school of Imam Abū Ḥanīfah, may Allāh have mercy on him.

Imam Abū Bakr al-Jaṣṣāṣ, may Allāh have mercy on him, says in Aḥkām al-Qurʾān (1/70) under the verse {My covenant does not include the wrongdoers}: "His (meaning Abū Ḥanīfah's) position regarding fighting oppressors and tyrannical rulers was well-known. That is why al-Awzāʿī said: 'We tolerated Abū Ḥanīfah in everything until he came to us with the sword' – meaning fighting oppressors – 'then we could not tolerate him.' ... His involvement in the affair of Zayd ibn ʿAlī is famous, as is his sending wealth to him and his secret fatwa to the people on the obligation to support him and fight alongside him. Similarly, his actions concerning Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm, the sons of ʿAbd Allāh ibn Ḥasan."

As for what al-Jaṣṣāṣ alluded to regarding the case of Zayd ibn ʿAlī, historians mention that when Zayd ibn ʿAlī rebelled against the Umayyads, Imam Abū Ḥanīfah supported him with his wealth. Al-Muwaffaq transmitted with his chain of narration: "Zayd ibn ʿAlī sent a messenger to Abū Ḥanīfah, inviting him to his cause."

Abū Ḥanīfah said to the messenger: 'If I knew that people would not forsake him and would stand with him sincerely, I would follow him and fight alongside him against his opponents, for he is a rightful imam. However, I fear they will forsake him as they forsook his father. Nevertheless, I will aid him with my wealth so he may strengthen himself against his opponents.' He said to the messenger: 'Convey my excuse to him,' and sent him ten thousand dirhams." Then al-Muwaffaq said: "In another narration, he excused himself due to an illness that afflicted him in those days, so he stayed behind. In yet another narration: He was asked about Jihād with him, and he said: 'His uprising is comparable to the Messenger of Allāh's, peace and blessings be upon him, going out on the day of Badr.' He was asked: 'Why then did you stay behind?' He replied: 'Because of trusts I held for people, which I offered to Ibn Abī Laylā, but he did not accept them. I feared I would be killed with the trusts undelivered.' He used to weep whenever his [Zayd's] killing was mentioned." Refer to Manāqib al-Imām al-A'ẓam by al-Muwaffaq al-Makkī (1/260-261).

As for his story with Muḥammad al-Nafs al-Zakiyyah and his brother Ibrāhīm ibn 'Abd Allāh, they rebelled against al-Manṣūr. Al-Makkī mentioned in al-Manāqib (2/84) that Abū Ḥanīfah used to incite people to support Ibrāhīm and order them to follow him. He mentioned before that, that he considered participating in battle with him superior to fifty Ḥajj pilgrimages. Al-Kurdī mentioned in his Manāqib (2/22) that Imam Abū Ḥanīfah prevented al-Ḥasan ibn Qaḥṭabah, one of al-Manṣūr's commanders, from going out against Ibrāhīm ibn 'Abd Allāh. It is said that al-Manṣūr poisoned Abū Ḥanīfah for this reason, until he passed away, may Allāh have mercy on him.

Similarly, the story of our master al-Ḥusayn ibn 'Alī, may Allāh be pleased with him, with Yazīd ibn Mu'āwiyah is well-known, and a group of the pious rebelled against al-Ḥajjāj ibn Yūsuf.

Therefore, what appears to this humble servant, may Allāh forgive him, after reviewing the Sharī‘ah texts and the statements of jurists and Ḥadīth scholars on this subject – and Allāh knows best – is that the immorality (fisq) of an imam is of two types: The first is that which is confined to himself; this does not permit rebellion against him, and the statements of those who say it is not permissible to rebel against an immoral or tyrannical imam are understood in this context. The second type is that which is transgressive, such as promoting manifestations of disbelief, establishing its rituals, enforcing its laws, belittling the rulings of religion, and refraining from applying the Sharī‘ah of Allāh despite the ability to do so due to deeming it repugnant and preferring laws other than Allāh's over it. This is what is attached to manifest disbelief. Rebellion is then permissible under its conditions.

The best I have seen on this subject is the invaluable discussion by the Shaykh of our Shaykhs, the Sage of the Ummah, Ashraf ‘Alī al-Tahanawī, may Allāh have mercy on him, in his treatise Jazl al-Kalām fī ‘Azl al-Imām (Eloquent Discourse on the Deposition of the Imam), which is printed in the fifth volume of Imdād al-Fatāwā (pp. 119-131).

The essence of what he, may Allāh have mercy on him, mentioned in that treatise is that matters which invalidate the imamate are of seven categories:

The first category: The imam removes himself without cause. There is a difference of opinion on this, as in Sharḥ al-Maqāṣid (2/282).

The second category: Something befalls him that prevents him from performing the duties of the imamate, such as insanity, blindness, deafness, muteness, or becoming a captive whose release is not hoped for. This dissolves the contract of the imamate, and the imam is deposed in all these cases.

The third category: He commits apostasy (kufr), whether it is the disbelief of denial and rejection, or the disbelief of obstinacy and opposition, or the disbelief of belittling or deeming religious matters repugnant. In this case, the imam is deposed, and the contract of the imamate is dissolved. If he insists on remaining imam, it is obligatory for Muslims to remove him, provided they have the ability. However, it is stipulated that the disbelief must be agreed upon, based on his statement, peace be upon him (in the Ḥadīth under discussion): "...unless you see manifest disbelief for which you have clear proof from Allāh." Just as the definitiveness of the disbelief is stipulated, it is also stipulated that its commission by him must be definitive, like seeing with one's own eyes. Speculative reports are not sufficient, based on his statement, peace be upon him: "...unless you see," which means seeing with the eyes, as indicated by its transitivity to a single object.

Then, opinions may differ as to whether what emanates from the ruler constitutes disbelief, or its indication of disbelief, or its establishment through circumstantial and verbal evidence, or the definitiveness of the disbelief emanating from him. Whoever acts upon his own judgment in such a disagreement, according to what he sees between himself and Allāh, is considered a mujtahid (one exercising independent reasoning) and is excused. It is not permissible to direct arrows of blame towards him.

However, the obligation to rebel in this case is conditional upon ability and upon it not causing greater harm than the harm of such an imam remaining in power. Al-Sharīf al-Jurjānī says in Sharḥ al-Mawāqif (8/353):

"The Ummah has the right to depose and remove the imam for a cause that necessitates it, such as if he does something that causes disruption in the affairs of Muslims and a setback for religious matters.... If his removal leads to sedition (fitnah), the lesser of the two harms should be borne."

Thus, disagreement can also occur in determining the lesser of two harms, and everyone acts according to what he sees between himself and Allāh. It is not permissible for one to blame another. The differences among the Companions, the Tābi‘īn (Successors), and those after them regarding rebellion against some imams of their time are to be understood in light of such matters of ijtihād.

The fourth category: The ruler commits immorality confined to himself, such as fornication, drinking alcohol, and the like. The ruling is that he is not deposed by this act itself, but he deserves to be deposed. The Ummah should depose him unless deposition would result in sedition. It is stated in Al-Durr al-Mukhtār, in the chapter on Imamate: "It is disliked to appoint an immoral person, and he is to be deposed for it, unless it leads to sedition." Ibn ‘Ābidīn commented beneath it: "His statement: 'and he is to be deposed for it,' meaning for immorality if it occurs in him, implies that he deserves to be deposed, as you learned earlier, which is why he did not say 'he is deposed (automatically).'" Ibn al-Humām said in Al-Musāyarah: "If a just person is appointed and then becomes tyrannical and immoral, he is not deposed, even if it is not necessary, but he deserves to be deposed, if it does not entail sedition."

The gist is that it is not permissible to rebel against him in this case in a manner that involves bloodshed and incites sedition.

The fifth category: He commits immorality whose effect extends to the wealth of others, by wronging people in their wealth, but he interprets it in a way that has a semblance of permissibility, such as imposing taxes on people, interpreting it as being for the public interest. The ruling is that he is not deposed for this, obedience to him is obligatory, and rebellion against him is not permissible, as will be seen in Ibn ‘Ābidīn's statement.

The sixth category: He wrongs people in their wealth without any interpretation or semblance of permissibility. The ruling is that it is permissible for the wronged person to repel the injustice, even by fighting, and patience is also permissible, indeed rewarded. This fighting is not for rebellion against him, but for defense of property. If the imam ceases the injustice, fighting must cease. Ibn ʿĀbidīn, quoting from Fatḥ al-Qadīr, said: "It is obligatory for everyone capable of repelling to fight with the imam, unless they [the opponents] show what permits them to fight, such as his wronging them or others with an injustice in which there is no doubt.... This is unlike the case where the situation is ambiguous as to whether it is an injustice, such as imposing some taxes that the imam is permitted to take and inflicting harm thereby to repel a more general harm."

This is the ruling for the wronged person who fights to repel injustice from himself. As for others, is it permissible for them to support this wronged person against the imam? The statements of the scholars differ. It is mentioned in Fatḥ al-Qadīr that it is obligatory for those not wronged to assist this wronged person and fighter until the imam does him justice and retracts his tyranny. It is mentioned in Jāmiʿ al-Fuṣūlayn, Al-Mubtaghī, and Al-Sirāj that people should neither assist the ruler nor assist them [the wronged]. Ibn ʿĀbidīn reconciled the two opinions by stating that the obligation to assist them applies if it is possible for him [the imam] to desist from his transgression, otherwise not. Refer to Radd al-Muḥtār, chapter on Rebels (3/341).

As for patience being preferable in this situation, it is due to what the author will mention from the Ḥadīth of Ḥudhayfah ibn al-Yamān, may Allāh be pleased with them both, in which he informed about tyrannical rulers, and it contains: "I said: What should I do, O Messenger of Allāh, if I reach that time? He said: Listen and obey, even if your back is struck and your wealth is taken, listen and obey." The meaning of his statement, peace be upon him, "So listen and obey," is his prohibition of rebellion.

As for fighting to repel injustice, its permissibility is based on the Ḥadīths that permit fighting for oneself and one's property. Since this fighting resembles rebellion in form, refraining from it is preferable for the sake of preserving one's religion.

The seventh category: He commits transgressive immorality affecting people's religion, forcing them into sins. Its ruling is the ruling of coercion, detailed in its place. This coercion, in some cases, falls under disbelief, either actual or by ruling. This occurs when he insists on applying laws that contradict Islamic Sharī'ah, either preferring them over the law of Allāh, which is explicit disbelief, or due to negligence and laziness in applying the Sharī'ah of Allāh, in a way that leads to the strong assumption that continuous action contrary to the Sharī'ah will create contempt for it in people's hearts. Such negligence and laziness, even if not explicit disbelief by which its perpetrator becomes a disbeliever, is in the ruling of disbelief. This is evidenced by what the jurists mentioned: if the people of a town abandon the call to prayer (adhān), fighting them becomes permissible, because it is one of the symbols of religion, and abandoning it shows clear contempt for it. Refer to the chapter on Adhān in Radd al-Muḥtār (1/384).

At that point, this seventh category is attached to the third category, which is manifest disbelief, and rebellion becomes permissible according to the details previously mentioned in its ruling.

Then, the obligation to rebel in the third and seventh categories is conditional upon ability and strength (man'ah), and the permissibility of rebellion in them is conditional upon the hope of establishing the imamate for a righteous man who meets the conditions of imamate. However, if the situation changes from one tyrant to another, or if it necessitates something like the disbelievers gaining control over Muslims, then rebellion is not permissible in these two situations either.

What is narrated about the rebellion of our master al-Ḥusayn ibn 'Alī, may Allāh be pleased with them both, against Yazīd ibn Mu'āwiyah, and Imam Abū Ḥanīfah's support for Zayd ibn ‘Alī, Muḥammad al-Nafs al-Zakiyyah, and Ibrāhīm ibn ‘Abd Allāh in their rebellion against the imams of their time, is to be understood as falling under the third, sixth, or seventh categories. We have mentioned that opinions can differ in determining what permits rebellion, and Allāh, Exalted and Majestic, knows best.

This concludes the excerpt from Shaykh Muhammad Taqi Usmani's Takmilah Fath al-Mulhim (vol. 3, pp. 326-331).

As we have previously stated, we are facing a situation where our rulers exhibit manifest disbelief from two significant avenues of apostasy:

1. Legislating without Allāh's permission, replacing the Sharī‘ah of Allāh with human laws, and ruling by other than what Allāh has revealed.
2. Giving allegiance to disbelievers such as Jews, Christians, and others, and fighting Muslims alongside them and for their interests.

This is in addition to other forms of disbelief in word and deed they have engaged in, and other actions that cause expulsion from the community of Muslims, which necessitate rebelling against them, fighting them, and killing them by consensus, as demonstrated by the preceding evidence.

Among the implications and consequences of a ruler's disbelief, whether original or through apostasy, are:

1. The forfeiture of his authority and the invalidity of his imamate.
2. The obligation to rebel against him with arms and depose him.
3. The obligation to execute him for his apostasy. The Prophet, peace and blessings be upon him, said: "Whoever changes his religion, kill him." (Narrated by Aḥmad).

4. The obligation or permissibility of fighting his faction if they defend him with arms.
5. The obligation not to hear or obey him, nor to collect wealth for him.
6. The obligation not to assist him, nor to work for him, nor to participate with him in the crime of ruling by other than what Allāh has revealed, in any position or form.
7. The invalidity of all his covenants, pacts, treaties, and guarantees of safety, because he does not represent the Muslims.
8. The obligation to work immediately to install a Muslim imam in his place and to obey him with the aforementioned rights and duties.

The issue of a ruler's apostasy and its consequent loss of rights, corruption of governance systems regarding blood, wealth, and honor, and the resulting tyranny of disbelievers, ascendancy of oppressors, and dominance of corrupters and the immoral; the empowerment of external enemies from among disbelievers and atheists, and the collaboration of hypocrites with them; and the consequent loss of lands and people – is this a secondary, minor issue for which the Sharī'ah has no rulings, obligations, commands, or prohibitions? How can this be when Allāh Almighty says: {And We have sent down to you the Book as a clarification for all things} (An-Nahl: 89).

It is a principal issue, even if most people today, both commoners and elites, neglect it.

Attention must also be drawn to a dangerous condition prevalent among many scholars and their followers. Even if they are guided by Sharī'ah evidence to the disbelief of today's ruler – a reality that even the blind can perceive through their senses, hunger, and circumstances – these individuals do not proceed to acknowledge the aforementioned consequences of the ruler's disbelief. You see them acknowledging the ruler's disbelief, yet they work for him, accept positions, and enter his disbelieving legislative, judicial, and executive institutions. Indeed, they may even fight in his ranks and under his banner, even if it means slaughtering Muslims and killing those who enjoin justice among people!

This is a tribulation that has become widespread and overwhelming in most Muslim lands. The reasons for this, ultimately, for both common Muslims and elites, stem from either ignorance or incapacity. They do not rebel against these disbelieving rulers who support Allāh's enemies, nor do they fight them. They are either ignorant of the obligation of this fighting, or they acknowledge the obligation but claim incapacity.

Upon investigating the reasons for this and their claims of incapacity, one finds that the reality is the opposite, and the reason that emerges most clearly is what the Prophet, peace and blessings be upon him, summarized in two words: the Ummah has been afflicted by "al-wahn" (enfeeblement), about which the Prophet, peace and blessings be upon him, informed us. In the Ḥadīth narrated by Abū Dāwūd in his Sunan: "Nations are about to call one another against you just as diners call one another to a dish." A questioner asked: "Will it be because of our small number on that day?" He said: "Rather, you will be numerous on that day, but you will be like the scum of a flash flood. Allāh will remove the fear of you from the hearts of your enemies, and Allāh will cast al-wahn into your hearts." A questioner asked: "O Messenger of Allāh, what is al-wahn?" He said: "Love of the world and hatred of death." People, both commoners and elites, have come to love the world, except for those upon whom Allāh has mercy. They have come to hate death, so nations have converged upon them. This has resulted in a life of hardship at the hands of their rulers, a life from which death is more merciful, as Allāh Almighty said: {And whoever turns away from My remembrance - indeed, he will have a depressed life} (Ṭā Hā: 124).

The Rulings Concerning Lands: Are They Abodes of Islām or Abodes of Disbelief?

It is worth noting a serious matter that results from the ruler's disbelief and the absence of governance by the Sharī'ah of Allāh. This is a matter upon which the people of Islām have agreed and upon which the four Sunni schools of thought concur: that lands ruled by a disbeliever according to laws other than the Sharī'ah of Allāh lose the characteristic of being an Abode of Islām, even if the majority of their inhabitants are Muslims. A look into the classifications made by the jurists of Islām, may Allāh have mercy on them, yields a clear and concise conclusion: the ruling concerning lands – whether they are Abodes of Islām or Abodes of Disbelief – is subject to the laws that prevail over them.

If the laws of Islām prevail over them, they are Abodes of Islām (Dār al-Islām) . If the laws of disbelief prevail over them, they are Abodes of Disbelief (Dār al-kufr).

This is irrespective of the religion of their inhabitants. Among what the jurists of Islām have said in this regard:

Al-Kāsānī al-Ḥanafī said in Badā'i' aṣ-Ṣanā'i' (vol. 9, p. 4375):

"Every land is attributed either to Islām or to disbelief. A land is attributed to Islām if its rulings are applied therein, and it is attributed to disbelief if its rulings are applied therein."

Qāḍī Abū Ya'ālā al-Ḥanbalī said:

"Every land in which the rulings of disbelief prevail over the rulings of Islām is an Abode of Disbelief." (Al-Mu'tamad fī Uṣūl ad-Dīn, p. 276).

Imam Ibn al-Qayyim, may Allāh Almighty have mercy on him, said in his book Aḥkām Ahl adh-Dhimma (vol. 1, p. 166):

"The majority of scholars say: The Abode of Islām is that which Muslims inhabit and upon which the rulings of Islām are implemented. Whatever land does not have the rulings of Islām implemented upon it is not an Abode of Islām, even if it is adjacent to it."

From the perspective of Islām, lands are of two types, and each type has two categories:

1. Dār al-Islām: The majority of their inhabitants are Muslims, and they are ruled by the Sharīʿah of Allāh.
  2. Dār al-Islām: The majority of their inhabitants are disbelievers, but they are ruled by the Sharīʿah of Allāh.
  3. Dār al-kufr: The majority of their inhabitants are Muslims, but they are not ruled by the Sharīʿah of Allāh.
  4. Dār al-kufr: The majority of their inhabitants are disbelievers, and they are not ruled by the Sharīʿah of Allāh.
- The first type: Like the lands of Islām when they were under Sharīʿah rule, and like what occurred in Afghanistan under Sharīʿah rule during the Taliban government.
  - The second type: Like the lands conquered by Muslims and ruled by Islām, while their inhabitants remained upon their disbelieving religion, paying the jizyah, and being governed by the Sharīʿah of Allāh. There is no example of this today.
  - The third type: Like all Muslim lands today. The majority of their inhabitants are Muslims, but their rulers are disbelieving apostates who rule by the laws of false deities (ṭawāghīt) and ally themselves with the enemies of Allāh.

- The fourth type: Like the generality of lands of original disbelievers today; lands whose inhabitants are disbelievers and who rule themselves by various laws of disbelief, such as Europe, America, India, China, and others.

The issue of a ruler's apostasy and its consequent loss of rights, corruption of governance systems regarding blood, wealth, and honor, and the resulting tyranny of disbelievers, ascendancy of oppressors, and dominance of corrupters and the immoral; the empowerment of external enemies from among disbelievers and atheists, and the collaboration of hypocrites with them; and the consequent loss of lands and people – is this a secondary, minor issue for which the Sharī'ah has no rulings, obligations, commands, or prohibitions? How can this be when Allāh Almighty says: {And We have sent down to you the Book as a clarification for all things, a guidance, a mercy, and good tidings for the Muslims} (An-Nahl: 89).

It is a principal issue, even if most people today, both commoners and elites, neglect it. Attention must also be drawn to a dangerous condition prevalent among many scholars and their followers. Even if they are guided by Sharī'ah evidence to the disbelief of today's ruler – a reality that even the blind can perceive through their senses, hunger, and circumstances – these individuals do not proceed to acknowledge the aforementioned consequences of the ruler's disbelief. You see them acknowledging the ruler's disbelief, yet they work for him, accept positions, and enter his disbelieving legislative, judicial, and executive institutions. Indeed, they may even fight in his ranks and under his banner, even if it means slaughtering Muslims and killing those who enjoin justice among people!

This is a tribulation that has become widespread and overwhelming in most Muslim lands. The reasons for this, ultimately, for both common Muslims and elites, stem from either ignorance or incapacity. They do not rebel against these disbelieving rulers who support Allāh's enemies, nor do they fight them. They are either ignorant of the obligation of this fighting, or they acknowledge the obligation but claim incapacity.

Upon investigating the reasons for this and their claims of incapacity, one finds that the reality is the opposite, and the reason that emerges most clearly is what the Prophet, peace and blessings be upon him, summarized in two words: the Ummah has been afflicted by "al-wahn" (enfeeblement), about which the Prophet, peace and blessings be upon him, informed us. In the Ḥadīth narrated by Abū Dāwūd in his Sunan:

"Nations are about to call one another against you just as diners call one another to a dish." A questioner asked: "Will it be because of our small number on that day?" He said: "Rather, you will be numerous on that day, but you will be like the scum of a flash flood. Allāh will remove the fear of you from the hearts of your enemies, and Allāh will cast al-wahn into your hearts." A questioner asked: "O Messenger of Allāh, what is al-wahn?" He said: "Love of the world and hatred of death."

People, both commoners and elites, have come to love the world, except for those upon whom Allāh has mercy. They have come to hate death, so nations have converged upon them. This has resulted in a life of hardship at the hands of their rulers, a life from which death is more merciful, as Allāh Almighty said: {And whoever turns away from My remembrance - indeed, he will have a depressed life} (Ṭā Hā: 124).

Fourthly: Sharī'ah Rulings Establish by Consensus the Disbelief and Apostasy of Muslims Who Cooperate with Disbelievers Against Muslims, and Obligate Fighting Them

Every group and association formed among a category of people has elements that bind them together, the most important of which are: an idea they believe in, a characteristic upon which they have united, and an interest that unifies them; a leadership or head around whom they have gathered, whose command they obey, and from whose counsel they proceed; a banner under which they fight; and a common goal they strive to achieve. When such characteristics are present in a group of people, they are called a "jamā'ah" (group), or termed in Sharī'ah as a "ṭā'ifah" (faction). If they possess strength and power with which they defend themselves, they are called a "ṭā'ifah mumtani'ah dhāt shawkah" (a defiant faction possessing might). If this faction unites upon Islām and faith, it is called a "ṭā'ifah īmān wa Islām" (faction of faith and Islām). If they unite upon something that nullifies Islām, they are called a "ṭā'ifah riddah" (faction of apostasy), as was the case with the apostates during the time of Abū Bakr, may Allāh be pleased with him. If they are originally disbelievers, they are called a "ṭā'ifah kufr" (faction of disbelief). If they rebel against a legitimate imam while adhering to Islām and transgress against him, they are called a "ṭā'ifah bāghiyah" (rebellious faction). If they go out for plunder, robbery, and killing, they are called a "ṭā'ifah fasād" (faction of corruption), and so on.

It is self-evident that this faction is named by its predominant characteristic, even with the presence of individuals among them to whom its characteristics do not apply. For instance, one of them might be ignorant of them, or coerced to be with them, or a personal interest, tribal loyalty, or kinship might have brought him to them. There is no doubt that hypocrites exist within the faction of Islām who are not truly of them. This has occurred throughout most of Muslim history and even the army of the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, was not immune to it. Likewise, there may be found in the ranks of Muslims those who benefit and affiliate with Islām for worldly reasons. Similarly, within a faction of disbelief, there might be a Muslim coerced to be with them, or one ignorant of their true nature whose situation is confused. This exception of the presence of those not truly belonging to the faction applies to factions of rebels, corrupters, apostates, and disbelievers. The presence of these anomalies within the faction does not alter the ruling of the majority, or the ruling of the banner or the bond upon which it united. Neither its name nor its Sharīʿah ruling changes because of these anomalies. In the Sharīʿah ruling, each of these factions has its specific legal judgment. Towards factions of believers, loyalty and support are obligatory. Towards factions of apostasy and disbelief, disavowal and enmity are obligatory. Towards people of evil and corruption, repelling them and fighting against them is obligatory if they assault the religion, honor, property, or lives of the people of Islām, and so on.

Once the concept of a faction and its predominant ruling over the anomalies within it becomes clear to us, we move on to discuss the problem of collaborators with disbelievers and apostates from among those affiliated with Islām, who fight Muslims alongside factions of disbelief, apostasy, or otherwise. This is especially true for those working in positions of authority and its defense, who fight Muslims under the orders of apostate rulers, such as those working in their military and security apparatuses like the army, gendarmerie, police, security agencies, and the armed and semi-armed forces that follow them, as well as the subsidiary agencies that serve them.

So, what is the obligatory Sharīʿah ruling to be believed concerning these individuals who are originally affiliated with the religion of Islām, profess its faith, bear its names, and may even perform some of its rituals, yet they come to fight Muslims, pursue them, and wage war against them, implementing the orders of their masters, the apostate rulers? Their Islām does not prevent them from fighting even alongside original disbelievers under the orders of those rulers who have declared their allegiance and support for the disbelievers, their defense of their interests, and their acceptance of their commands.

We say, and Allāh is the source of help and He guides to the right path:

This soldier, security man, or policeman, who defends the false deity (ṭāghūt), works for him, and fights Muslims alongside him and his disbelieving allies, falls into one of several categories:

Firstly: This follower agrees with his disbelieving master in his enmity towards Islām, his allegiance to disbelievers, and his aggression against the Sharīʿah of Allāh, being aware of his leader's conditions, agreeing with him, and convinced of his war against Islām and Muslims.

Secondly: This follower works and fights with his master while disagreeing with his master's war against Islām and Muslims. This person falls into one of three sub-categories:

1. He is entirely ignorant of the matter, not realizing what he is doing nor understanding that it is a war against the religion and Muslims, ignorant of his master's apostasy, disbelief, and hypocrisy towards the disbelievers. He is (ignorant).
2. He is coerced into carrying out his master's orders, threatened with punishment, imprisonment, or death if he does not execute the orders – a real threat from which he cannot escape or flee. He is (coerced).
3. He is aware of his master's conditions, neither ignorant nor compelled by coercion, but has taken his position with them for a worldly interest such as gain and employment, or due to familial, partisan, or sectarian loyalty, or any worldly reason. He is (a mercenary or a partisan).

From a practical standpoint:

These four categories:

1. The knowing and intentional. 2. The coerced. 3. The ignorant. 4. The mercenary for falsehood.

They do not differ practically in what they do: warring against Allāh, His Messenger, and the believers; killing, imprisoning, pursuing, and harming those who enjoin justice among people. They kill and are killed by the orders of their masters, emirs, and leaders, and they fight their own people or others.

The summary of the Sharīʿah ruling concerning them, briefly stated so as not to exceed the conciseness of this book, divides into two issues:

First: Are these individuals still under the ruling of Islām? Or have they disbelieved and exited the religion of Islām?

Second: Is it permissible to fight them and kill them, or is it not permissible?

As for the first: The one who is convinced of what his masters are upon regarding the war against Islām and Muslims and their allegiance to disbelievers, he is like them in the Sharīʿah ruling: a hypocrite, an apostate, a disbeliever, originally and by conviction in disbelief, not merely by following his masters. This is based on the same aforementioned evidence concerning them. As for the second type: those who do not agree with their masters but fight with them – namely, the ignorant, the coerced, and the one fighting for worldly gains and connections – these individuals, by this action, commit an act of disbelief, which is fighting Muslims alongside disbelievers. Thus, they belong to the faction of apostasy if they fight under the leadership of an apostate, and to the faction of disbelief if they fight under the banner of an original disbeliever. This is established by the statement of Allāh Almighty: {Those who believe fight in the cause of Allāh, and those who disbelieve fight in the cause of ṭāghūt (false deities). So fight against the allies of Satan. Indeed, the plot of Satan has ever been weak} (An-Nisāʾ: 76). These verses prove that the believer fights in the cause of Allāh, and fighting in the cause of Allāh is a sign of belonging to the faction of faith. And that the disbeliever fights in the cause of the ṭāghūt, and fighting in the cause of the ṭāghūt is a sign of belonging to the faction of the ṭāghūt. And that the one who does this is an ally of Satan whom Allāh has commanded to be fought and has given glad tidings of victory over him. The verse is explicit and clear.

In another verse, He, Exalted is He, informed about Pharaoh and his faction, and their state of disbelief and war against the believers, saying:

{Indeed, Pharaoh and Hāmān and their soldiers were wrongdoers} (Al-Qaṣaṣ: 8). So He grouped Pharaoh, his minister and aide Hāmān, and his soldiers under the same description: "wrongdoers." It is known that Pharaoh's wrongdoing was disbelief in Allāh and war against the believers. He, Pharaoh, made himself a lord who legislates and is worshipped, and he belittled his people, so they obeyed him; indeed, they were a rebellious people. Thus, the description encompassed them.

As for the detailed ruling for these soldiers who fight today: the ignorant, the coerced, the one fighting for worldly gain knowingly. It is as follows, and Allāh Almighty knows best:

1. The genuinely ignorant, whose ignorance prevents him from understanding his situation and the situation of his leaders (this is assuming such ignorance exists). Likewise, the one genuinely and actually coerced, threatened with death and harm, unable to flee his work or emigrate from the place of his compulsion. The scholars of Ahl as-Sunnah wa al-Jamā'ah have stated that their ignorance and coercion (if genuine) are considered a Sharī'ah excuse for them. Thus, they retain their outward ruling of Islām while their general ruling (that they are from the faction of disbelief) remains because they are with them. This does not mean specific takfīr (declaring an individual a disbeliever) for every member of the faction of disbelief.
2. As for the one fighting for worldly gain, for employment, livelihood, or partisanship for his people, homeland, party, tribe, or any partisan affiliation, while knowing that he is fighting Muslims alongside a disbelieving, oppressive ruler who allies with and assists disbelievers – this soldier is neither ignorant of the matter nor coerced by threat. Rather, he is acting by choice, able to leave his work, flee from it, or not enter it in the first place if he wished. He entered it for worldly reasons. This person is a hypocrite who has bought the world with the Hereafter and fought Muslims for the sake of the world. He is a disbeliever fighting under the banner of disbelievers, with no excuse of ignorance or coercion.

As for the intention of worldly gain and benefits, these are not Sharīʿah excuses for committing disbelief. These excuses are known among Ahl as-Sunnah wa al-Jamāʿah, and they are: ignorance, coercion, misinterpretation, and unintentional action. These will be explained, Allāh willing.

Concerning such people who have bought the life of this world with the Hereafter, Allāh Almighty says: *{And [recall] when We took your covenant, [saying], "Do not shed each other's blood or evict one another from your homes." Then you acknowledged [this] while you were witnessing. * Then, you are those [same ones] who kill one another and evict a party of your people from their homes, cooperating against them in sin and aggression. And if they come to you as captives, you ransom them, although their eviction was forbidden to you. So do you believe in part of the Scripture and disbelieve in part? Then what is the recompense for those who do that among you except disgrace in worldly life; and on the Day of Resurrection they will be sent back to the severest of punishment. And Allāh is not unaware of what you do. * Those are the ones who have bought the life of this world [in exchange] for the Hereafter, so the punishment will not be lightened for them, nor will they be aided}* (Al-Baqarah: 84-86).

Imam Muslim, may Allāh have mercy on him, narrated from the Ḥadīth of Abū Hurayrah, may Allāh be pleased with him, that the Prophet, peace and blessings be upon him, said: "Whoever departs from obedience and separates from the community and dies, dies a death of jāhiliyyah (pre-Islamic ignorance). And whoever rebels against my Ummah, striking its righteous and its wicked, not sparing its believer nor fulfilling his covenant with one with whom a covenant has been made, he is not of me and I am not of him."

This is regarding their theoretical Sharī'ah ruling, whether they are judged as disbelievers or Muslims.

As for the second issue: the ruling on fighting these individuals affiliated with Islām who fight Muslims alongside disbelievers, it is, in summary, as follows, and Allāh Almighty knows best:

Anyone who fights Muslims alongside disbelievers, fighting him is obligatory upon Muslims. A Muslim is not obligated, nor has Allāh burdened him with what he cannot bear, such as distinguishing the ignorant from the intentional, nor the coerced from the deliberate.

Rather, Allāh Almighty said: {Fight in the way of Allāh those who fight you but do not transgress} (Al-Baqarah: 190). Scholars have cited the Ḥadīth of 'Ā'ishah, may Allāh be pleased with her, in which the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, informed about an army that would invade the Ka'bah, and when they reached a desert land, the first and last of them would be swallowed by the earth. 'Ā'ishah said: "O Messenger of Allāh, how will the first and last of them be swallowed by the earth when among them are their servants, their market people, and those not of them?" The Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, informed her that the first and last of them would be swallowed, and they would be resurrected on the Day of Judgment according to their intentions. In the narration of Umm Salamah, may Allāh be pleased with her, as recorded in Ṣaḥīḥ Muslim, the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, said: "A seeker of refuge will seek refuge in the House (Ka'bah), and an army will be sent against him. When they are in a desert land, they will be swallowed by the earth." I asked: "What about one who was unwilling?" The Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, said: "He will be swallowed with them, but he will be resurrected on the Day of Judgment according to his intention." Scholars have deduced from this Ḥadīth the permissibility of killing the ignorant, the coerced, and the unintentional among those who target Muslims with war alongside disbelievers; Allāh will resurrect him according to his intention, excused if he had an excuse.

Scholars said: If Allāh – Who is able, if He willed, to distinguish the coerced and the ignorant – did not distinguish him from being swallowed by the earth, how then can the servants of Allāh distinguish him from the disbelievers while he fights alongside them?!

This swallowing by the earth or his being killed with them is part of the divinely decreed punishment for a Muslim's presence in the ranks of disbelievers or oppressors; the punishment overtakes him with them, and Allāh does not wrong him, so he is resurrected according to his intention; if it was righteous, it will benefit him in the Hereafter.

In any case, one who attacks Muslims intending them harm is, in the best of circumstances, a "Muslim assailant" (muslim ṣā'il), and scholars have discussed his ruling, to which we will refer at the end of this section.

In summary:

We judge by outward appearances, and Allāh takes care of inner realities. His outward appearance is that of one fighting with disbelievers, so fighting him is obligatory or permissible. His inner reality is for Allāh; if it is righteous, it will benefit him on the Day of Judgment. Al-Bukhārī, may Allāh Almighty have mercy on him, narrated in the Book of Testimonies in his Ṣaḥīḥ from ‘Umar ibn al-Khaṭṭāb, may Allāh be pleased with him, that he said:

"People used to be judged by revelation during the time of the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him. Revelation has ceased, and now we only judge you by what is apparent to us of your actions. Whoever shows us good, we trust him and draw him near. We have nothing to do with his inner reality; Allāh will hold him accountable for his inner reality. And whoever shows us evil, we do not trust him nor believe him, even if he says his inner reality is good."

So, the general ruling for him is that he belongs to the "faction of disbelief" if he is with disbelievers, to the "faction of apostasy" if he is with apostates, and to the "faction of rebels" if he is with them, and so on. The details regarding the excuses of the coerced and the ignorant will follow in the next section, Allāh willing.

For further clarification, we say, and Allāh is the source of help:

These individuals who claim to be Muslims, bear their names, wear their clothes, and perhaps pray or fast, from among those who work in the armies, police, or intelligence services of Muslim rulers, then carry out any order issued to them by their superiors, whether lawful or unlawful, obeying them out of conviction, ignorance, or coercion, having been raised by their masters to do so and having given them oaths and covenants – they, as is known, defend disbelieving, oppressive, immoral rulers, and fight alongside the armies of disbelievers, as is happening today with the armies of Turkey, Pakistan, and some Arab and Islamic countries. They work alongside the security and intelligence agencies of Jews and Christians, such as Americans, Europeans, and other disbelievers, and they guard their military bases, diplomatic and commercial centers, and even centers for Christianizing Muslims and centers for spreading prostitution, corruption, and licentiousness. In implementing their masters' orders, they do not care whether they kill a Muslim, terrify a believer, displace a Muslim woman, orphan a child, or violate the sanctity of the homes and honor of the oppressed.

Indeed, you see them ready to fight one another and strike each other's necks in internal coups or civil wars that erupt between their tyrannical rulers in neighboring countries! For Islamic or Arab countries often fight each other. So you see these (Muslim!) soldiers diligently shedding each other's blood, capturing and annihilating one another! And they claim Islām! Their general fighting is for the authority of their kings, or over territorial disputes and policy differences, so that glory may belong to so-and-so, not for the ascendancy of truth or the defeat of falsehood, because they were raised on obedience to kings and presidents and loyalty to the homeland, nation, or party.

The clear Shari'ah truth – and Allāh Almighty knows best – is that these fighters generally have the ruling of their banners and their faction, as we previously stated. Whoever fights us under the banner of an apostate ruler, we fight them as a faction of apostasy. Whoever fights us under the banner of Americans and disbelievers, we fight them as a faction of disbelief.

Consequently, it is not permissible to offer funeral prayers for their dead, nor should they be buried with Muslims. It is very important to note, as mentioned before, that we do not declare specific takfīr upon every individual among them unless clear evidence is known about him that he is neither ignorant nor coerced but acts intentionally and deliberately. Whoever is known to agree with his apostate masters and to be loyal to their disbelieving masters, such as Americans and others, we judge him as a disbeliever and apostate, alive and dead, and the rulings thereof apply to him: his marriage to a Muslim woman is void, he does not inherit from a Muslim nor is he inherited from by a Muslim, and so on, to the end of the rulings concerning apostates.

Shaykh Aḥmad Shākir, the Ḥadīth scholar of Egypt, who passed away in 1958, says in his famous fatwa concerning fighting the English, the French, and those like them who transgressed against Muslim lands, and the ruling on Muslims who aided them, which he published in the magazine Al-Hady an-Nabawī:

"As for cooperation with the English, in any form of cooperation, whether little or much, it is rampant apostasy and explicit disbelief. No excuse is accepted for it, no interpretation benefits with it, nor does foolish partisanship, flawed politics, or hypocrisy-laden courtesy save from its ruling. This applies whether it is from individuals, governments, or leaders. They are all equal in disbelief and apostasy, except for one who was ignorant or erred, then rectified his affair and repented, and took the path of the believers. For such, perhaps Allāh will turn to them in forgiveness, if they are sincere in their hearts to Allāh, not to politics or people. Let every Muslim know, in any part of the world, that if he cooperates with the enemies of Islām, the enslavers of Muslims – such as the English, the French, their allies, and their ilk – in any type of cooperation, or makes peace with them and does not fight them with what he is able, let alone supports them with word or deed against his brothers in religion; if he does any of that, then prays, his prayer is void. Or if he purifies himself with ablution, ghusl, or tayammum, his purification is void. Or if he fasts, obligatory or voluntary, his fast is void. Or if he performs Ḥajj, his Ḥajj is void. Or if he pays the obligatory Zakat, or gives voluntary charity, his Zakat is void and rejected. Or if he worships his Lord with any act of worship, his worship is void and rejected; he gains no reward for any of it, but rather bears sin and burden. Let every Muslim know that if he embarks on this despicable path, his deeds are nullified, from every act of worship he performed for his Lord before he relapsed into the mire of this apostasy, content with it for himself. And God forbid that a Muslim true to this great description be content with it. That is because faith is a condition for the validity of every act of worship and for its acceptance, as is self-evident and necessarily known from the religion, with no Muslim disagreeing. This is because Allāh, Exalted is He, says:

{And whoever disbelieves in faith - his work has become worthless, and he, in the Hereafter, will be among the losers} (Al-Mā'idah: 5). Let every Muslim man and woman know that for those who abandon their religion and support their enemies, if any of them marries, their marriage is fundamentally void, not subject to correction, and no effects of marriage, such as establishment of lineage, inheritance, etc., result from it. And if any of them was married, his marriage is likewise nullified. And if any of them repents and returns to his Lord and his religion, fights his enemy and supports his Ummah, the woman he married during apostasy, or the woman who was in his marriage contract when he apostatized, is not his wife, nor is she under his protection. And it is obligatory for him after repentance to renew his marriage to her, by contracting a valid, Sharī'ah-compliant marriage with her, as is self-evident and clear. Let Muslim women whom Allāh has afflicted with husbands who have relapsed into the mire of this apostasy be cautious, for their marriages have become void, and they have become forbidden to these men; they are not wives to them until they repent with a true, practical repentance, and then marry them with a valid marriage. Let Muslim women know that whoever among them consents to marry a man in this state, knowing his state, or consents to remain with a husband whom she knows to be an apostate, her ruling and his ruling in apostasy are the same. And God forbid that Muslim women consent to any of this for themselves, their honor, or the lineage of their children.

Indeed, the matter is serious. So let every person look to himself, and let him be a fence for his religion against the tampering of tamperers and the treachery of traitors."

End of the relevant excerpt from the words of the Imam and Ḥadīth scholar, may Allāh have mercy on him. Quoted from his book Kalimat al-Ḥaqq - Aḥmad Shākir.

These Sharī'ah rulings, related to creed and the fundamentals of religion, concerning the principles of Allāh's sovereignty, and loyalty and disavowal for the sake of Allāh, are not secondary issues. The responsibility, as we have reiterated, rests upon the necks of the scholars of every land to explain them to the people and not conceal them, out of desire for what rulers possess or fear of what they have. This is because it is an issue of faith and disbelief that may affect hundreds of thousands of people who fight in the cause of the false deity (ṭāghūt) while thinking they are Muslims.

Important questions must be answered, truthfully, frankly, and courageously, especially by every Muslim scholar, leader, and caller to Islām:

- Do we want to revive our Ummah? Do we want to be free from our colonizers? Do we want to advance our economy, invest our wealth, and reclaim our rights? Do we want to defend ourselves against various types of disbelievers?
- And before that, do we want to rule by the Sharī'ah of Allāh? And rid ourselves of the laws of Christians and the laws of disbelievers that govern us?
- If one's answer to these questions is negative, then he is not concerned with the issues of this book that matter to Muslims. Indeed, he would not be included in the list of Muslims.
- But if the answer, as is presumed from every Muslim, is yes, then the preceding issues, foremost among them the issue of the disbelief and apostasy of rulers allied with disbelievers, and the issue of fighting them along with their allies, and consequently fighting their soldiers, come at the head of these issues and in their forefront. There is no doubt about this, neither from a Sharī'ah, rational, nor logical perspective.

It is superfluous to say, and it is known by reason and sight by necessity, that Americans today do not fight us directly, nor do they confront us on the ground with their soldiers except rarely! They deploy thousands of those affiliated with Islām – these misguided, ignorant, coerced, mercenary, and hypocritical individuals – who fight before them and behind them, on their right and on their left, by order of their apostate masters, as happened with us in Afghanistan, and is happening today with us also in Pakistan. And as happened in the Kuwait war, where Arab and Islamic armies entered, paving the way for the Americans. And as America does today in Iraq with the Iraqi army and collaborators, and with the services of the armies of the Arab Gulf states, Jordan, Pakistan, and others. As for the American pursuit of scholars and Muslim youth, every scholar, caller to Allāh, and every young mujāhid knows that the one who knocks on his door at night and drags him in his sleepwear to prison, and exposes the private areas of his house and family, is not an American but one of his own kinsmen! Is the torturer who greets him with blows, kicks, and insults in prison? Is the judge who rules against him by other than what Allāh has revealed, with execution or imprisonment? And those who carry out these sentences? Are all these previously mentioned individuals Jews and Americans? Or are they those who claim to be Muslims?! They are from the apostates and the misguided among our own people. So, shall we fight them, or shall we surrender our religion and honor to them, and permit them our wealth and blood? Consequently, the Jews, Americans, and Crusaders will strike their roots in our lands and do with us as they please.

We must fight them in defense of Allāh's religion and the oppressed. Allāh's command is clear:

{Fight in the way of Allāh those who fight you but do not transgress} (Al-Baqarah: 190).

*{And what is [the matter] with you that you fight not in the cause of Allāh and [for] the oppressed among men, women, and children who say, "Our Lord, take us out of this city whose people are oppressors and make for us from Yourself a protector and make for us from Yourself a helper"? * Those who believe fight in the cause of Allāh, and those who disbelieve fight in the cause of ṭāghūt (false deities). So fight against the allies of Satan. Indeed, the plot of Satan has ever been weak}* (An-Nisā': 75-76). We draw attention to the fact that we are here concerned with knowing the Sharī'ah ruling for fighting these individuals, and not with issues of opinion, warfare, and strategy, such as whether to fight them offensively or defensively, or whether to prioritize that over fighting Americans and disbelievers. That is left to the leaders of Jihād and the commanders of war among Muslims, according to the dictates of necessity and benefit.

Excuses of Ignorance, Coercion, Misinterpretation, and Unintentional Action for a Muslim Who Commits an Act of Disbelief, According to Ahl as-Sunnah wa al-Jamā'ah. Are These Excuses Valid for Muslim Soldiers and Notables Who Assist the Enemy?

The scholars of Ahl as-Sunnah wa al-Jamā'ah have elaborated on an issue of utmost importance: that a Muslim may commit an act of disbelief that nullifies faith, yet have a Sharī'ah-acceptable excuse that protects him from being judged a disbeliever and an apostate from the religion of Islām. As I said, we are not in this book concerned with transmitting lengthy jurisprudential discussions, but I will summarize generally that scholars have divided these Sharī'ah excuses into four categories:

1. Ignorance (Jahl): This is when the perpetrator of an act of disbelief is ignorant that his act constitutes disbelief which expels him from the Islamic religion. This is a Sharī'ah excuse as long as the ignorance is not in a matter necessarily known from the religion.

2. Coercion (Ikrāh): This is when a Muslim commits an act of disbelief, knowing it is disbelief, but does so under compulsion due to the force of a threat.
3. Misinterpretation (Ta'wīl): This is when one commits a disbelieving act, misinterpreting a Sharī'ah text to permit it, thinking the Sharī'ah allows for it. Misinterpretation is considering something that is not evidence as evidence.
4. Unintentional Commission of the Disbelieving Act ('Adam Qaṣd al-Fi'l al-Mukaffir): This is when the disbelieving act occurs without intention or knowledge, such as one who steps on the noble Qur'ān without recognizing it, thinking it is something else. He did not intend to step on the Qur'ān.

Scholars have important detailed discussions on these, which interested readers can refer to in books of jurisprudence and creed.

However, it is important to mention:

- The excuse of ignorance is nullified by knowledge and clarification. Whoever was ignorant, then learned and had it clarified to him but did not accept the truth, his ignorance is no longer an excuse.
- The excuse of coercion (if his coercion was genuine) is nullified by the cessation of coercion, or by the coerced person's ability to escape or flee from the coercion.
- The excuse of misinterpretation is nullified by the establishment of the Sharī'ah proof against the misinterpreter regarding the invalidity of his evidence. If the proof is established against him, misinterpretation is no longer an excuse for him.

- The excuse of unintentional action is nullified by clarification. If the perpetrator repeats his disbelieving act after clarification, he becomes deliberate.

In summary:

Whoever commits an act of disbelief and has no Sharīʿah excuse, or whose excuse has been nullified, is judged a disbeliever. It is very important to know that judging a specific individual as a disbeliever (takfīr al-muʿayyan) must be done by someone competent, possessing the Sharīʿah eligibility to judge and clarify rulings, understand excuses and their nullification, and have the ability to establish proof and evidence against the specific individual being judged.

What concerns us here under this heading is to examine the claim of excuse by ignorance or coercion on the part of those soldiers affiliated with Islām who fight Muslims alongside disbelievers and apostates, and under their leadership and banner. There is no need to discuss the excuse of misinterpretation or unintentional action because it does not pertain to them in this situation.

We note that discussing their excuse is for the purpose of knowing the ruling on their disbelief or their excuse, not for refraining from fighting them. Fighting them is obligatory, as we have shown the Sharīʿah evidence, merely by their intention to fight Muslims alongside disbelievers, even if they were Muslims.

1. Examining the Excuse of Ignorance for a Soldier Fighting Muslims with Disbelievers

As for the excuse of ignorance, it is, as we said, when a Muslim commits an act of disbelief, ignorant that it is a forbidden act entailing disbelief. In our example, it means this Muslim soldier fights Muslims, believing his leader is a Muslim ruler and that he is fighting non-Muslims, or Muslims deserving of being fought (rebels, corrupters), such that this ignorance of his is genuine. For instance, he might be ignorant that he is fighting alongside disbelievers, or he might think they are disbelievers who came to assist his Muslim leader against those whom it is Sharīʿah-permissible to fight.

If such hypothetical ignorance is present in this soldier, and he fights Muslims alongside disbelievers while being unaware of the true state of his leader and those with him, nor the state of the oppressed Muslims he is fighting, then he may be excused for his ignorance before Allāh; we do not specifically declare him a disbeliever if such ignorance is proven for him.

Is such ignorance plausible today for these soldiers, officers, police, and intelligence personnel who fight Muslims and mujāhidīn under the orders of these apostates, alongside and under the command of Jewish and Christian armies? Is this conceivable with the spread of various media, such as radio, television, satellite dishes, newspapers, and magazines? In addition to Muslims holding demonstrations in the streets, preachers in mosques, and people discussing these issues everywhere! So much so that it can be said today that the nature of the battle between Muslims and disbelievers, the corruption, disbelief, and immorality of the rulers, the unveiled state of their women, the scandals of their children and relatives, their ruling by other than the Sharīʿah of Islām, their allegiance to disbelievers, and their war against mosques, scholars, and young Muslim mujāhidīn, etc., have become known to everyone in all Muslim lands, including Pakistan. If among these soldiers there is one whose foolishness reaches the extent of being ignorant of these matters, then he is excused for his ignorance, and Allāh Almighty knows best. We fight him, obligatorily or permissibly, and his excuse may benefit him before Allāh, and he will be resurrected according to his intention.

2. Examining the Excuse of Coercion for a Soldier Fighting Muslims with Disbelievers

Is the soldier fighting Muslims alongside disbelievers excused by coercion?

We will pause with this excuse, with some detail – despite our desire for brevity – because it is the most important and the most common excuse. Most of these soldiers and officers working in the army, police, and security forces admit their awareness of the reality. However, they excuse themselves, or those who defend them from the label of apostasy and disbelief excuse them, by claiming they are coerced and compelled to fight Muslims under the orders of their apostate or oppressive masters, alongside and under the command of disbelievers. This has happened in some Arab and Islamic countries, where America led its slave rulers to fight Muslims, and they, in turn, led their slave soldiers to do so.

So, can the excuse of these individuals by coercion be accepted? Let us see:

Coercion (Ikrāh) in Sharī'ah:

It is compulsion, and the coerced (mukrah) is one forced to do or say something he does not want, and would not do if the coercion were removed.

Imam Ibn Hajar says in his esteemed book, Fath al-Bārī fī Sharḥ Ṣaḥīḥ al-Bukhārī, in the chapter on Coercion (vol. 12, p. 385): "Coercion is compelling another to do what he does not want. The conditions of coercion are four:

First: That the perpetrator (coercer) is capable of inflicting what he threatens, and the one ordered (coerced) is incapable of repelling it, even by fleeing.

Second: That he (the coerced) strongly believes that if he refuses, the coercer will inflict it upon him.

Third: That what he is threatened with is immediate. If he says to him: 'If you do not do such-and-such, I will beat you tomorrow,' he is not considered coerced. An exception is if he mentions a very near time, or if it is customary that he does not renege.

Fourth: That no indication of choice appears from the one ordered. Like one coerced into fornication who then initiates penetration and could have withdrawn, but says, 'I have ejaculated,' and continues until he ejaculates."

The summary of his words, may Allāh have mercy on him, is that the coerced person is: one who is forced to do what he does not want, such that:

Firstly: He does not want this act by his choice but due to real compulsion.

Secondly: He is unable to refuse, incapable of repelling the coercion.

Thirdly: He is unable to rid himself of the coercer by fleeing, emigrating, or the like.

Fourthly: He is certain of the threat occurring soon and definitively.

Fifthly: He does not persist in the act if the coercion ceases, for some benefit or desire.

Do these conditions apply to this person who claims to be a Muslim, then intends to fight Muslims, shedding their blood, violating their honor, and plundering their wealth, under the orders of apostates and in the company of Americans and disbelievers? This soldier, policeman, or security agent must be asked a few questions to determine whether he is coerced or not – questions whose answers will determine his exoneration if he is excused for this disbelieving act of his, or the judgment against him for having no excuse.

1. Did this soldier join the army, police, or intelligence services by his choice or was he compelled? This varies from one country to another; some countries conscript youth compulsorily into these forces, while in others, joining these forces is voluntary, even requiring connections and bribery due to the benefits and opportunities for bribery, plunder, and usurpation of people's wealth.

2. Can this soldier resign and withdraw from this work after seeing what he is being forced to do, or can he not?
3. Can he flee from his work if resignation is not possible, by hiding in his country, or emigrating from it if necessary, or can he not?
4. Is he actually threatened if he does not carry out orders, and certain that punishment will befall him, or not?
5. Does he persist in killing, plundering, and violating honor to achieve his desires and interests, or due to coercion?

Other Matters to Be Clarified Regarding Coercion:

Firstly: When the one claiming coercion undertook this work voluntarily – meaning he joined the army or police by choice, not through compulsory conscription – did he know that his work would entail his being coerced into doing what Allāh has forbidden, or not? If he knew he would be coerced into carrying out orders, lawful and unlawful, by virtue of the system of the army, police, and security, and was then coerced, his coercion would not be an excuse for him. This is because he willingly embarked on what he knew would involve coercion into disbelief, oppression, or what Allāh has forbidden, due to the well-known nature of these institutions and their actions! Scholars have given an example for this situation: one who enters the land of people who coerce their inhabitants into disbelief, knowing this before entering, then enters and they coerce him; the coercion would not be an excuse for him. Does one who volunteers for these forces by choice know that he will undertake these actions, or does he not know? If he knew what would be required of him before being coerced, his excuse of coercion would not be accepted, even if he was actually coerced into an act he dislikes.

Secondly: The coerced person is of two types:

The first: One who is coerced into a disbelieving statement or act that does not harm other Muslims. He only engages in what nullifies religion by his action or statement, while being averse to it, as our master ‘Ammār ibn Yāsir was coerced under torture to revile the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, after they had killed his father and mother and submerged him in a well until he was on the verge of perishing from torture. He uttered the word of disbelief, and the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, excused him and permitted it, making it a license for Muslims, saying: "If they return (to torturing you), then you return (to saying it)." He clarified that resolve and patience are better in a state of coercion and more greatly rewarded, and that coercion is an excuse for one who does it while his heart is tranquil with faith. In contrast, scholars did not accept the excuse of those who were threatened with torment but were not certain of its occurrence. Thus, Imam Aḥmad ibn Ḥanbal did not accept the excuse of the scholars who conceded to the ruler's demand to affirm the createdness of the Qur’ān when he threatened them, and they excused themselves by Allāh Almighty's statement: {except for one who is forced [to renounce his religion] while his heart is secure in faith} (An-Naḥl: 106) and by the Ḥadīth of ‘Ammār, may Allāh be pleased with him. Imam Aḥmad said: "‘Ammār was beaten, while you were told, 'We will beat you.'" When Yaḥyā ibn Ma‘īn, an esteemed Imam among Ḥadīth scholars, who had weakened under threat and complied, excused himself with this excuse, Imam Aḥmad rejected his argument and said: "He tells me he was coerced, yet not a single whip struck him." He did not speak to him for the rest of his life, nor did he return his salām when Ibn Ma‘īn greeted him while Imam Aḥmad was on his deathbed! May Allāh have mercy on him and increase the likes of him in our Ummah! It is narrated from him that he said: "There is no coercion except by the sword," and from other scholars that coercion is by threat of death, or dismemberment. Some went to say it is any unbearable torment from which one cannot flee.

Some may say, excusing the actions of the governments of Pakistan, Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, Jordan, for example, in assisting the Americans, that Allāh has permitted dissimulation (taqiyyah) from the disbeliever, and they say: "We fight with them to ward off their evil from us and our countries." This is a rejected claim. For Allāh Almighty said in Sūrat Āl ‘Imrān, verse 28: {Let not believers take disbelievers as allies rather than believers. And whoever [of you] does that has nothing with Allāh, except when taking precaution against them in prudence. And Allāh warns you of Himself, and to Allāh is the [final] destination}.

Ibn Kathīr said in its interpretation: "Meaning, except for one who, in some lands and times, fears their evil, then he may protect himself from them outwardly, not inwardly and with his intention. As al-Bukhārī narrated from Abū ad-Dardā’ that he said: 'We indeed smile in the faces of some people while our hearts curse them.' And ath-Thawrī said: 'Ibn ‘Abbās said: Taqiyyah is not by action; taqiyyah is only by the tongue.'"

The second type: One who is coerced into an act that harms other Muslims.

Such as one ordered to kill a Muslim, violate his honor, plunder his wealth, or harm him. Scholars have stated that a Muslim is not excused for inflicting harm on another if he himself is threatened with it. It is not permissible for him, if threatened with the seizure of his wealth unless he plunders that of other Muslims, to protect his wealth by plundering the wealth of another Muslim and then say, "I was coerced."

More seriously, it is not permissible for him to kill a Muslim if he is threatened with death if he does not kill him. Scholars have said: Preserving his own life is not prioritized over taking the life of a Muslim. Rather, he must not kill a Muslim even if they kill him; he should be killed while patient and seeking reward, and with this intention, he will be a martyr, Allāh willing.

Do these (allegedly coerced) soldiers do this? If this soldier refuses to kill Muslims, is he killed? Or imprisoned? Or is his salary and pension cut? Or is he merely dismissed from his job in the army or police?

So he proceeds to kill Muslims, when Allāh has made the destruction of the Ka‘bah less severe in His sight than the killing of a Muslim man, as the Prophet, peace and blessings be upon him, informed. And Allāh Almighty has said: {And whoever kills a believer intentionally, his recompense is Hell, wherein he will abide eternally, and Allāh has become angry with him and has cursed him and has prepared for him a great punishment} (An-Nisā’: 93). This is if he kills him in a quarrel over worldly matters, or due to a whim of Satan; how then about one who kills him because he is a believer, an emigrant, a mujāhid in the cause of Allāh, to please America?!

These soldiers who think themselves coerced kill Muslims so that one of them is not dismissed from his job, or does not suffer some torment. This is not the state of one who is coerced, but rather like those about whom Allāh Almighty said: {That is because they preferred the life of this world over the Hereafter and that Allāh does not guide the disbelieving people} (An-Naḥl: 107). There is a difference between one who was coerced and uttered a word of disbelief while his heart was tranquil with faith, and one whose breast was opened to disbelief, so he uttered the word of disbelief and committed the act of disbelief to preserve his share of the world. The Qur’ān has clarified this explicitly, as Allāh Almighty said in Sūrat An-Naḥl: *{He only invents falsehood who does not believe in the verses of Allāh, and it is those who are the liars. * Whoever disbelieves in Allāh after his belief... except for one who is forced [to renounce his religion] while his heart is secure in faith. But those who [willingly] open their breasts to disbelief, upon them is wrath from Allāh, and for them is a great punishment. * That is because they preferred the life of this world over the Hereafter and that Allāh does not guide the disbelieving people. * Those are the ones over whose hearts Allāh has set a seal, and over their hearing and their sight. And it is those who* *are the heedless. * Assuredly, it is they who in the Hereafter will be the losers. * Then, indeed your Lord, to those who emigrated after they had been compelled [to renounce their religion] and then fought [in the cause of Allāh] and were patient - indeed, your Lord, after that, is Forgiving and Merciful}* (An-Naḥl: 105-110). Are these soldiers in the army, police, security, and intelligence services, and the jailers and torturers who torment people to death, coerced?! We seek refuge in Allāh from speaking falsehood and bearing false witness! Are these criminals coerced? Look at their condition and behavior and judge it by the measure of Islām. Look at their prayers, their fasting, and their performance of Islamic rituals. Then look at their illicit earnings from bribes and how they oppress people, collect tolls on roads, in markets, and at the doors of houses! Then look at their competition for jobs in these oppressive, impure institutions of police, intelligence, and the administration of prisons and detention centers!

Yes, there may be some who are not involved in that, who joined the army to defend the country and fight its enemies, and it was not in his knowledge nor did it cross his mind that his masters would thrust him into fighting Muslims alongside disbelievers. But is such a person excused for fighting under the command and banner of disbelievers, the Americans and the English, to shed the blood of believers, and then say: "I am compelled, coerced!"?

Did he volunteer for the army knowing the state of its leadership and command, and their apostasy through changing laws, collaborating with disbelievers, corruption, bribery, oppression, and injustice, or not?

And did he join the army to defend the homeland, the land, and the people? None of these are in the cause of Allāh in any way unless it is for the word of Allāh to be supreme; rather, they are intentions of ignorant partisanship!

If he joined with the intention of Jihād in the cause of Allāh, because some misleading scholars deluded him that this government and its leaders are Muslims and legitimate guardians, and that their corruptions do not expel them from Islām, and this deceitful trick worked on him, then he found himself facing the new situation... this person might be excused for his ignorance for being in such an army and fighting under its banner with the intention of defending Muslims. But is he excused for his ignorance, and by coercion, in killing Muslims to please disbelievers, and under their banner and command? By Allāh, no.

His duty is to resign from this army, or at least to refuse orders of this type, and to flee from fighting even if he is imprisoned, tortured, or dismissed from his job. This punishment in his case is a mercy from Allāh that takes him out of misguidance and from Allāh's wrath upon him. If he is given a choice and forced to kill a Muslim or be killed, his duty is to choose to be killed, patient and seeking reward, rather than kill a Muslim. He is not allowed to kill a Muslim and then say, "I was coerced." This is not a Shari'ah excuse of coercion. It is not coercion to proceed to kill Muslims and violate their sanctities and then say: "If I don't do it, I will be dismissed from my job, or my salary will be cut, or financial penalties will be imposed on me!" The duty of this soldier, if he finds himself coerced into fighting Muslims by his apostate masters, or their masters the Americans, English, and disbelievers, is to turn his weapon against those who coerce him into committing disbelief, and to wage Jihād against them with his weapon and be killed as a patient, mujāhid martyr, not to be stained with the blood and honor of Muslims and think himself coerced. If he cannot escape except by fleeing the army and is unable to fight them due to his weakness or the fewness of those with him, it is obligatory for him to flee and emigrate from his country. Allāh's earth is vast, and then he will be an emigrant in the cause of Allāh, patient, fleeing from tribulation with his religion. Emigration and fleeing from a government like the one in Pakistan is obligatory for one who finds himself facing tribulation in his religion and compulsion to commit disbelief by fighting under the command and banner of Americans, if he is unable to fight this government. The Qur'ān, the noble Prophetic biography, and the texts of the Sunnah have informed about a group of Muslims who remained in Makkah after the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, emigrated to Madinah, and did not emigrate because they had interests in Makkah, such as family, homes, and trade. When the Battle of Badr occurred between the Muslims and the polytheists of Makkah, they were coerced into going out with the disbelievers of Makkah, either by compulsion or out of shame before their people.

Some of them were killed in the battle, and the Muslims regretted killing them, saying, "We have killed our brothers!" Then Allāh Almighty revealed concerning them His statement: *{Indeed, those whom the angels take [in death] while wronging themselves - [the angels] will say, "In what [condition] were you?" They will say, "We were oppressed in the land." The angels will say, "Was not the earth of Allāh spacious [enough] for you to emigrate therein?" For those, their refuge is Hell - and evil it is as a destination. * Except for the oppressed among men, women, and children who cannot devise a plan nor are they directed to a way - * For those it is expected that Allāh will pardon them, and Allāh is ever Pardoning and Forgiving. * And whoever emigrates for the cause of Allāh will find on the earth many [alternative] locations and abundance. And whoever leaves his home as an emigrant to Allāh and His Messenger and then death overtakes him - his reward has already become incumbent upon Allāh. And Allāh is ever Forgiving and Merciful}* (An-Nisā': 97-100).

These verses have explicitly clarified, as commentators have explained, important rulings, including:

1. The obligation to emigrate from the lands of disbelief and flee from their tribulations, especially for one who is exposed to tribulation, to where he will not be tried in his religion.

2. That one who was coerced and went out to fight with disbelievers, his excuse was not accepted because he should have emigrated instead of remaining until he was coerced into going out to fight Muslims with disbelievers. And that those of them who were killed, their fate was Hell, and their excuse was not accepted.
3. That Allāh excused the oppressed who did not emigrate because they had no means, nor could they find a way to emigrate, nor did they have any path to it. These are excused for not emigrating (not excused for fighting with disbelievers), and the verse promised them pardon and forgiveness for their shortcoming in not emigrating.
4. Then the Qur'ān gave glad tidings to the emigrant in the cause of Allāh of Allāh's guarantee for him of abundant provision in this world, and that if he dies, Allāh guarantees his reward in the Hereafter.

So where do these situations compare with those affiliated with these oppressive armies?

Are they coerced, threatened with death if they do not kill Muslims? No. And even if that were the case, this is not an excuse, and they must then emigrate and flee from those who coerce them.

But the bitter truth is that most of them commit this act of disbelief by fighting Muslims alongside disbelievers out of keenness for what the job in the army, police, or intelligence provides them: luxurious houses, fancy cars, high salaries plundered from the wealth of Muslims, and taxes imposed on their weak. Then they excuse themselves by saying they are in the army and police to defend the homeland, and that they are coerced into fighting Muslims by virtue of their job.

This is not coercion, neither by Sharī'ah nor by reason. Would one of them accept the excuse of being coerced into killing a Muslim? And not accept the excuse of the Muslim emigrant, the mujāhid in the cause of Allāh, for killing these individuals in self-defense, when they were the ones who intended aggression against him and came to him in the company of American soldiers and raided his house upon him, his wife, and his children?

As we have previously stated, this is not coercion but rather a state described by Allāh, Exalted is He, with His saying: {That is because they preferred the life of this world over the Hereafter and that Allāh does not guide the disbelieving people} (An-Nahl: 107).

As for the state of the Sharīʿah-excused coerced person among those who fight Muslims, it is as follows:

1. He was forcibly conscripted into an army that fights Muslims, not by his choice.
2. He was genuinely unable to flee or emigrate.
3. He must feign fighting and not extend his weapon to harm Muslims; rather, he should disable his weapon even if killed by disbelievers or Muslims. With this intention, he is a martyr, Allāh willing. If there is a soldier in the armies and police of the false deities (ṭawāghīt) who fought Muslims, or among those who did their deeds, who fits the description of this coerced person, then he is excused. Otherwise, he has no excuse.

Fifthly: Sharīʿah Rulings Establish the Obligation or Permissibility of Fighting an Assailant Attacking Muslims' Religion, Lives, Honor, or Property, Even if the Assailant is a Muslim

An obstinate person might insist, despite clear evidence, that these soldiers fighting Muslims alongside disbelievers and apostates are Muslims, who pray and fast, and bear witness that there is no god but Allāh and Muḥammad is the Messenger of Allāh, and that they do not become disbelievers by fighting Muslims. To such a person, so that we may be practical and put an end to futile debate based not on evidence but on emotions and whims, we say: Suppose that is so. Then, for a Muslim who bears arms against Muslims, out of rebellion or corruption in the land, there are rulings clarified by scholars under the heading "Repelling the Muslim Assailant (Daf' aṣ-Ṣā'il al-Muslim)." Scholars have clarified that every religion revealed by Allāh came to preserve the five necessities (religion, life, honor, intellect, and property). Therefore, it is obligatory to preserve these necessities by any legitimate means, and from here Islām legislated repelling the assailant.

Assault (ṣiyāl) in Sharī'ah, as defined by scholars, is an unlawful attack on something protected (ma'ṣūm), and the protected is life, honor, or property.

The assailant (ṣā'il), as defined by scholars, is any aggressor against what is Sharī'ah-protected, whether he is a Muslim protected by the right of Islām or protected by the covenant of Muslims (dhimmah). Fighting to repel this aggressor is legislated by Sharī'ah to defend sanctities, and indeed becomes obligatory in many cases. Allāh Almighty said: {So whoever has assaulted you, then assault him in the same way that he has assaulted you}.

As for the Assailant Against Religion:

Repelling him is obligatory, according to his statement, peace and blessings be upon him: "Whoever is killed defending his religion is a martyr." Ibn Taymiyyah, may Allāh have mercy on him, said: "As for defensive fighting, it is the most severe type of repelling an assailant against honor and religion; it is obligatory by consensus. The assaulting enemy who corrupts religion and the world, nothing is more obligatory after faith than repelling him." (Al-Fatāwā al-Kubrā, vol. 5, p. 530).

As for the Assailant Against Honor:

It is obligatory to repel him by the consensus of jurists, even if it leads to his killing, and even if he is a Muslim. Al-Nawawī said: "As for defense of the womenfolk (ḥarīm), it is obligatory without dispute." Shaykh ‘Abd Allāh ‘Azzām, may Allāh have mercy on him, said: "A questioner might ask: Is it permissible for us to kill a policeman who prays and fasts, merely because he wants to take me to the police station? He said: 'As for the opinion of the jurists by consensus, it is not permissible for anyone to surrender to a person who wants to violate his honor... All jurists unanimously agreed that repelling an assailant against honor is obligatory by consensus. So if you let the police storm your house in the dead of night, and your wife is undressed in her sleepwear, and they uncover her to search for you sleeping with her, then your honor is violated and you are sinful before your Lord, the Almighty. Here lies the oppression. The prayer and fasting of such a policeman do not prevent the issue of killing him.'" (Al-Jihād: Fiqh wa Ijtihād, vol. 3, p. 139).

As for the Assailant Against Life:

It is obligatory to repel him according to the majority of scholars. Some have opined permissibility without obligation, even if he is a Muslim. In the authentic Ḥadīth: "Whoever is killed defending his property is a martyr, whoever is killed defending his blood is a martyr, whoever is killed defending his religion is a martyr, and whoever is killed defending his family is a martyr." (Narrated by Aḥmad and Abū Dāwūd). And it is narrated from him, peace and blessings be upon him: "Whoever is killed defending against an injustice done to him is a martyr." (Narrated by an-Nasā’ī).

Imam al-Jaṣṣāṣ said after this Ḥadīth in Aḥkām al-Qur’ān (vol. 1, p. 242): "We know of no dispute that if a man draws his sword against another man to kill him unjustly, it is upon the Muslims to kill him."

Shaykh ash-Shahīd ‘Abd Allāh ‘Azzām, may Allāh have mercy on him, said: "In this case – assault – if the assailant is killed, he is in the Hellfire even if he is a Muslim. And if the just defender is killed, he is a martyr."

As for the Assailant Against Property:

The majority of Muslim scholars have permitted it [i.e., self-defense resulting in the assailant's death], and some have considered it obligatory. Abū Hurayrah (may Allāh be pleased with him) narrated that a man said: "O Messenger of Allāh, what if a man comes intending to take my wealth?" The Prophet ﷺ said, "Do not give it to him." The man asked, "What if he fights me?" The Prophet ﷺ said, "Then fight him." The man asked, "What if he kills me?" The Prophet ﷺ said, "Then you are a martyr." The man asked, "What if I kill him?" The Prophet ﷺ said, "He is in the Hellfire." Narrated by Muslim.

Imam Ibn Taymiyyah states in Majmū‘ al-Fatāwá (vol. 28, p. 45): "The Sunnah and scholarly consensus (ijmā‘) agree that if a Muslim assailant’s attack cannot be repelled except by killing him, he is to be killed, even if the wealth he seeks to take is a qīrāt [a small unit of weight] of a dinar. It is stated in the Ṣaḥīḥ [authentic collection of Ḥadīth]: "Whoever is killed defending his property is a martyr." "

Imam al-Shāfi‘ī (may Allāh have mercy on him) said: "If a man enters another man's house, day or night, armed, and is ordered to leave but does not, the owner has the right to strike him, even if it leads to the assailant's death (i.e., if the one defending himself kills the assailant)." Al-Umm, vol. 6, p. 33.

Ibn Taymiyyah (may Allāh have mercy on him) said: "The Sunnah and scholarly consensus agree that if a Muslim assailant’s attack cannot be repelled except by killing him, he is to be killed." Al-Fatāwá al-Kubrā, vol. 28.

This is a summary of the rulings on repelling a Muslim assailant who attacks individual Muslims. What, then, is the ruling concerning an assailant who comes intending to destroy religion, life, honor, or property – or all of these – under the banner and leadership of Americans and apostates?

Sixthly: Sharī'ah Rulings on the Sanctity of Muslims and the Permissibility of Aggressors' Assets

The rulings of Sharī'ah affirm the sanctity of the blood, wealth, and honor of Muslims. They also establish that all forms of presence of non-Muslim aggressors, including their blood and wealth, are permissible for Muslims to take anywhere.

The Messenger of Allāh ﷺ delivered a sermon during the Farewell Pilgrimage. Among what he said was: "What month is this?" We replied, "Allāh and His Messenger know best." He remained silent until we thought he would call it by a different name. He then asked, "Is this not Dhū al-Ḥijjah?" We said, "Yes." He asked, "And what city is this?" We replied, "Allāh and His Messenger know best." He remained silent until we thought he would call it by a different name. He then asked, "Is this not the Sacred City?" We said, "Yes." He asked, "And what day is this?" We replied, "Allāh and His Messenger know best." He remained silent until we thought he would call it by a different name. He then asked, "Is this not the Day of Sacrifice?" We said, "Yes." He then said, "Indeed, your blood, your wealth, and your honor are sacred to you, just as the sanctity of this day of yours, in this city of yours, in this month of yours. You will meet your Lord, and He will ask you about your deeds. So, do not revert to disbelief after me, striking the necks of one another. Let the one present convey this to the one absent, for perhaps some of those to whom it is conveyed will understand it better than some of those who heard it." Then he asked, "Have I conveyed the message? Have I conveyed the message?" We replied, "Yes." He said, "O Allāh, bear witness." Agreed upon.

This noble Ḥadīth, whose authenticity is agreed upon by all Muslims, summarizes the principle of the sanctity of a Muslim: his blood, his wealth, and his honor. This sanctity is absolute and can only be lifted by what is mentioned in the authentic Ḥadīth, also agreed upon by all Muslims, which is his ﷺ saying: "The blood of a Muslim who testifies that there is no god but Allāh and that I am the Messenger of Allāh is not lawful except for one of three reasons: a married adulterer, a life for a life, and one who forsakes his religion and separates from the community." Agreed upon.

Islām has greatly emphasized the sanctity of Muslims, prohibited aggression against them, and forbidden wronging them, stating that the wrongdoer will be held accountable for every major and minor transgression.

It is narrated from the Messenger of Allāh ﷺ that he said: "Indeed, men unlawfully dispose of Allāh's property; for them is the Hellfire on the Day of Resurrection."

Narrated by al-Bukhārī.

It is narrated from the Messenger of Allāh ﷺ that he said: "A Muslim is the brother of a Muslim: he does not wrong him, nor does he hand him over (to an enemy)." Agreed upon.

The Prophet ﷺ said: "A Muslim is the brother of a Muslim: he does not betray him, lie to him, or forsake him. Everything belonging to a Muslim is sacred to another Muslim: his honor, his wealth, and his blood." Narrated by al-Tirmidhī.

From Jābir (may Allāh be pleased with him), the Messenger of Allāh ﷺ said: "Beware of wrongdoing, for wrongdoing will be darkneses on the Day of Resurrection."

Narrated by Muslim.

The Prophet ﷺ said: "Beware of the supplication of the wronged, for there is no veil between it and Allāh." Agreed upon.

From Abū Umāmah Iyās ibn Tha'labah al-Ḥārithī (may Allāh be pleased with him), the Messenger of Allāh ﷺ said: "Whoever usurps the right of a Muslim by his oath, Allāh has made the Hellfire obligatory for him and forbidden Paradise for him." A man asked, "Even if it is something insignificant, O Messenger of Allāh?" He ﷺ replied, "Even if it is a twig of arāk (miswāk)." Narrated by Muslim. The arāk is the siwāk (tooth-stick).

Islām has strongly emphasized the sanctity of Muslims—their blood, wealth, and honor—which is only lifted by apostasy that removes faith from its perpetrator. In such a case, he has no sanctity; his blood may be shed, and his wealth is permissible. This is the default ruling for the blood and wealth of a non-Muslim (kāfir); scholars have stated that the default status of a non-Muslim's blood and wealth is permissibility. Conversely, the default status of a Muslim's blood and wealth is sanctity. Just as this sanctity is removed from a believer's blood and wealth by disbelief (kufr), scholars have also stated that the blood and honor of a non-Muslim are permissible, becoming inviolable only in one of two situations:

1. By entering Islām. In this case, he has the same rights and obligations as Muslims, as he becomes one of them, and his wealth, blood, and honor become inviolable, as stipulated by the verses of the Qur'ān and the Sunnah of the Prophet ﷺ.
2. By a covenant of security (amān) granted by a legitimate Islamic ruler. In this case, he becomes one of the protected non-Muslim subjects (ahl al-dhimmah), and the jizyah (poll tax) prescribed by Sharī'ah is imposed upon him if he resides among Muslims, such as the People of the Book and those in their category living in Muslim lands. Alternatively, temporary security may be granted to non-Muslims who pass through Muslim lands without residing there, for trade or temporary stay. In such cases, they pay a tax on their trade goods and are granted temporary security, protecting their blood and wealth.

Apart from these two situations of protected status (dhimmah) and security (amān), the blood and wealth of a non-Muslim are permissible for Muslims. It is self-evident that the right to grant dhimmah and amān does not belong to a non-Muslim ruler who alters the Shari‘ah, rules by other than what Allāh has revealed, and allies himself with the enemies of Allāh. Rather, this is among the rights of the legitimate Islamic ruler, the leader of the Muslims. A non-Muslim ruler himself has no security; his blood may be shed, and his wealth is permissible. It is obligatory to fight him, kill him, rebel against him, and combat his faction if one has the ability. If unable, one must emigrate from his lands or bide time and prepare to depose and fight him. How can such a ruler grant security to others when he himself is not secure within the religion of Islām and among Muslims? This is the condition of the rulers of Muslim countries today; they have forfeited the rights of a Muslim ruler due to their apostasy. Among these forfeited rights is the authority to grant dhimmah and amān. Therefore, there is no security for non-Muslims entering our lands today in any form.

They are combatants belonging to warring nations, whose objectives for being in our lands range from warfare and its purposes to spreading corruption, misguidance, and vice. The claim that they have security granted by our governments is baseless due to the fallen legitimacy of our governments, which are illegitimate to begin with. This is particularly true for those whose presence is for military, security, political, or proselytizing objectives, or any other form of corruption in Muslim lands.

In summary, the rulings concerning the blood and wealth of Muslims and non-Muslims in our lands today are as follows:

1. All Muslims in our Islamic lands today who testify that there is no god but Allāh and that Muḥammad is the Messenger of Allāh ﷺ, and who have not nullified this testimony by fighting Islām and Muslims or openly supporting enemies against them, nor explicitly nullified it by a recognized act of apostasy, have inviolable blood, wealth, and honor. Their declaration "Lā ilāha illā Allāh" (There is no god but Allāh) protects them, and their ultimate reckoning is with Allāh Almighty. Even if they are involved in sins, their reckoning is with Allāh. Abū Hurayrah (may Allāh be pleased with him) reported that the Messenger of Allāh ﷺ said: "I have been commanded to fight people until they say, 'Lā ilāha illā Allāh.' Whoever says 'Lā ilāha illā Allāh' has protected his wealth and life from me, except for its due right, and his reckoning is with Allāh." Narrated by al-Bukhārī.

2. All forms of non-Muslim presence in our lands mean their blood and wealth are permissible. They are not protected by fraudulent securities or invalid dhimmah status granted to them by their allies among our apostate rulers, whose own blood and wealth are already permissible, as we previously explained.
3. Non-Muslims in their own lands (dār al-ḥarb, lands of war) have permissible wealth and blood, as is well-known. There is no consideration for so-called international agreements, as they were not originally concluded with legitimate Muslim authorities. Furthermore, they contain invalid clauses that obstruct Jihād in the path of Allāh and grant rights to non-Muslim aggressors under the pretext of combating terrorism. Indeed, they render a Muslim's defense of his religion, life, honor, and wealth a crime and terrorism, while portraying the aggression of non-Muslims against us as justice and international order.

The Inviolability of a Muslim's Blood and its Sanctity before Allāh

Islām has strongly emphasized the inviolability of a Muslim's blood and has threatened the one who intentionally kills a Muslim with a curse – expulsion from Allāh's mercy – eternal residence in Hellfire, and a painful torment. Al-Bukhārī (may Allāh have mercy on him) narrated from Ibn ‘Umar (may Allāh be pleased with him) that the Messenger of Allāh ﷺ said: "A believer will continue to find latitude in his religion as long as he does not shed inviolable blood." That is, he still has hope for forgiveness as long as he does not intentionally and deliberately kill a Muslim. Al-Bukhārī also narrated from him that the Prophet ﷺ said: "Whoever bears arms against us is not one of us."

Sufficient regarding the sanctity of a Muslim's blood and the evil fate of one who intentionally kills him is what Allāh Almighty has said, which shakes hearts and deters anyone who has reverence for Allāh's religion in his heart from committing this heinous crime. This is His statement in Sūrat al-Nisā', verse 93: {And whoever kills a believer intentionally, his recompense is Hell, wherein he will abide eternally, and Allāh has become angry with him and has cursed him and has prepared for him a great punishment.} Among what Imam Ibn Kathīr (may Allāh Almighty have mercy on him) said in its interpretation is: "This is a severe threat and a firm warning for whoever commits this grave sin, which is equated with associating partners with Allāh Almighty in more than one verse in the Book of Allāh, as Allāh Almighty says in Sūrat al-Furqān: {And those who do not invoke with Allāh another deity or kill the soul which Allāh has forbidden [to be killed], except by right...} The verses and Ḥadīth on the prohibition of killing are very numerous."

Among them is what is established in the two Ṣaḥīḥs [al-Bukhārī and Muslim] from Ibn Mas'ūd, who said: The Messenger of Allāh ﷺ said: "The first matter to be judged between people on the Day of Resurrection will be bloodshed."

In another Ḥadīth narrated by Abū Dāwūd from 'Ubādah ibn al-Ṣāmit, the Messenger of Allāh ﷺ said: "A believer remains expansive and righteous as long as he does not shed inviolable blood. But if he sheds inviolable blood, he is ruined." And in another Ḥadīth: "The demise of the entire world is less significant to Allāh than the killing of a Muslim man."

In another Ḥadīth: "If the inhabitants of the heavens and the earth were to participate in shedding the blood of a believer, Allāh Almighty would cast them all into the Hellfire."

In another Ḥadīth: "Whoever aids in the killing of a Muslim, even with half a word, will come on the Day of Resurrection with 'Despairing of Allāh's mercy' written between his eyes."

Ibn ‘Abbās (may Allāh be pleased with him) was of the opinion that there is no repentance for one who intentionally kills a believer. Al-Bukhārī said: Ādam narrated to us... Ibn ‘Abbās said: "This verse, {And whoever kills a believer intentionally, his recompense is Hell}, was the last to be revealed, and nothing abrogated it." Sa‘īd ibn Jubayr said: "I asked Ibn ‘Abbās about His saying, {And whoever kills a believer intentionally, his recompense is Hell}. He said: 'If a man knows Islām and the laws of Islām, then intentionally kills a believer, his recompense is Hell, and he has no repentance.' I mentioned this to Mujāhid, and he said, 'Except for one who regrets.'" Sālim ibn Abī al-Ja‘d said: "We were with Ibn ‘Abbās after he had lost his sight when a man came to him and called out, 'O ‘Abdullāh ibn ‘Abbās, what is your view on a man who intentionally kills a believer?' He replied, 'His recompense is Hell, wherein he will abide eternally, and Allāh has become angry with him and has cursed him and has prepared for him a great punishment.' The man asked, 'What if he repents, does righteous deeds, and then is guided?' Ibn ‘Abbās exclaimed, 'May his mother be bereaved of him! How can he attain repentance and guidance? By Him in Whose Hand is my soul, I heard your Prophet ﷺ say: "May his mother be bereaved of him! One who intentionally kills a believer will come on the Day of Resurrection, with the victim holding him by his right or left hand, his jugular veins gushing blood, before the Throne of the Most Merciful. He will cling to his killer with his left hand, holding his own head with his other hand, saying, 'O Lord, ask this one why he killed me?" By Him in Whose Hand is the soul of ‘Abdullāh, this verse was revealed and no verse abrogated it until your Prophet ﷺ passed away."

From ‘Abdullāh ibn Mas‘ūd, from the Prophet ﷺ, who said: "The slain will come on the Day of Resurrection clinging to his killer, holding his head with his other hand, and will say, 'O Lord, ask this one why he killed me?' He [Allāh] will say [to the killer], '[Why did you kill him?]' He will reply, 'I killed him so that honor might be Yours.' He [Allāh] will say, 'Indeed, it is Mine.' Then another will come clinging to his killer and will say, 'O Lord, ask this one why he killed me?' He [Allāh] will say [to the killer], '[Why did you kill him?]' He will reply, 'I killed him so that honor might be for so-and-so.' He [Allāh] will say, 'It is not for him. Bear his sin.' Then he will plummet into the Hellfire for seventy autumns." Narrated by al-Nasā’ī.

Another Ḥadīth: Imam Aḥmad said: It was narrated to us... I heard Mu‘āwiyah (may Allāh be pleased with him) say: I heard the Prophet ﷺ say: "Every sin, Allāh may forgive, except for a man who dies as a non-Muslim or a man who intentionally kills a believer."

All this concerns a Muslim who intentionally kills another Muslim in a quarrel, a dispute over worldly matters, or in a fit of anger, satanic instigation, or pre-Islamic ignorance (jāhiliyyah). As for one who kills a Muslim because he says, "My Lord is Allāh," or kills mujāhidīn in the path of Allāh by order of his apostate superiors, or kills them under the command of Americans or other non-Muslims, his case is entirely different. This is because he has allied himself with non-Muslims and fought in their cause.

What will the soldiers of Islamic countries' armies, their police, and their security personnel – those murderers who kill believers – say when the unjustly slain believers cling to them on the Day of Resurrection, their jugular veins gushing blood, and cry out to Allāh, saying to them, "My Lord, ask this one why he killed me?" Will they say, "We killed them so that honor might be for George Bush?" Or will they say, "We killed them so that honor might be for America, or for any of the tyrants (ṭawāghīt) among Muslims?"

May their mothers be bereaved of them, and may Allāh disgrace them! If only they realized or understood in which valley of disbelief and apostasy they are wandering. Allāh Almighty said: {Indeed, those who disbelieve in the verses of Allāh and kill the prophets without right and kill those who order justice from among the people - give them tidings of a painful punishment.} (Āl ‘Imrān: 21-22).

Ibn Kathīr said in its interpretation: "Ibn Abī Ḥātim said: ... from Abū ‘Ubaydah ibn al-Jarrāḥ (may Allāh be pleased with him): I said, 'O Messenger of Allāh, who among people will have the severest punishment on the Day of Resurrection?' He said, 'A man who killed a prophet, or one who enjoined good and forbade evil.' Then the Messenger of Allāh ﷺ recited: {Indeed, those who disbelieve in the verses of Allāh...}."

As we have explained, the default for a Muslim is the inviolability of his blood and wealth, which is only lifted if he leaves the religion. And a non-Muslim's blood and wealth are permissible, not protected unless he enters the religion of Islām or is granted security by a legitimate Muslim ruler. This is when the non-Muslim is not a combatant against Muslims. What, then, if he is a combatant and an aggressor against them?

As is known today, the Americans, the British, and their European allies from NATO countries, along with others like Russia, France, Spain, Portugal, Belgium, Germany, Italy, Canada, and Australia, are in a state of declared war by America and its Jewish masters against Muslims. They kill the youth of Islām, hunt them everywhere, and commit massacres against them, without distinguishing between civilian or military, old man, child, or woman, as is happening today in Palestine, Iraq, Afghanistan, and wherever America wills. This is on one hand. On the other hand, the forms of their aggression have diversified in methods and tools. Their armies come openly by land, sea, and air. Their intelligence agencies, such as the American CIA and FBI, and their equivalents from Western countries, sometimes come openly, sometimes under the guise of commercial institutions, and sometimes under the cover of tourism or cultural projects. Their proselytizing institutions are sometimes overt and sometimes covert. Their financial and economic institutions are institutions of plunder against the Muslim economy. As for those who come for tourism and leisure, they represent the lesser forms of aggression, yet they are models of immodesty and vice, not respecting Muslim customs, religion, or traditions, and seeking to spread corruption and moral decay wherever they go. Therefore, all forms of Western presence constitute a warring presence against Islām and Muslims. Consequently, all forms of their presence in our lands, men and women, mean their blood and wealth are permissible for Muslims and may be taken. Muslim scholars issued similar fatwas regarding the British and French colonizers during the old colonial era in our lands, as well as during the Russian occupation of Afghanistan. Among these is what Imam and Ḥadīth scholar Shaykh Aḥmad Shākir said during the British occupation of Egypt, Sudan, Pakistan, and India. He said:

"It is incumbent upon Muslims to clearly understand the correct principles in the Shari'ah of Allāh regarding the rulings of combat and what pertains to it. The English have declared an overt, treacherous war of aggression and dominance against Muslims in Egypt. And they have declared a disguised war against Muslims in Sudan, cloaked in the guise of Sudan's and its people's interest, adorned with the ornament of self-rule. We have seen what the English do in the Suez Canal zone and nearby areas: killing peaceful civilians and treacherously attacking women and children. By this, they have declared their enmity explicitly and clearly, without ambiguity, courtesy, or equivocation.

Thus, their blood and wealth have become permissible for Muslims. It is obligatory for every Muslim, in any part of the world, to fight them and kill them wherever they are found – whether civilian or military – for all of them are enemies, and all are combatants. {And kill them wherever you overtake them and expel them from wherever they have expelled you} [Qur’ān 2:191]. The Messenger of Allāh ﷺ forbade us from killing women in war, a prohibition based on a clear reason: that they are non-combatants. However, now that their women are enlisted and fight alongside men, and even those not enlisted among them are masculinized, opening fire on Muslims without restraint or deterrence, killing them is permissible in defense of oneself, religion, and country, unless it is a weak woman incapable of anything. We have said: 'It is obligatory for every Muslim, in any part of the world, to fight them and kill them wherever they are found, whether civilian or military.' We mean every letter of this sentence. Wherever a Muslim may be, of any race or nation, he has the same obligation as we do in Egypt and Sudan. Even English Muslims in their own country, if they are truly Muslims, have the same obligation as other Muslims, to the extent of their ability. If they are unable, they must emigrate from enemy lands or from lands where they cannot fight the enemy as Allāh has commanded them. For Islām is a single nationality, and it nullifies racial and national distinctions among its followers. Let every Muslim in Egypt, Sudan, India, Pakistan, and every country ruled by the English enemies or falling within their sphere of influence throughout the world hear this and keep it in mind. As for cooperation with the English, in any form, whether minor or major, it is comprehensive apostasy and outright disbelief, for which no excuse is accepted, and no interpretation avails, whether from individuals, governments, or leaders; all are equal in disbelief and apostasy.

I believe no reader now doubts that it is self-evident that the French are in the same category as the English in this regard, for every Muslim on the face of the earth. The enmity of the French towards Muslims and their unbridled fanaticism in working to eradicate Islām are many times greater than that of the English. They and the English are the same in ruling: their blood and wealth are permissible everywhere. Cooperation with them carries the same ruling as cooperation with the English." End of the slightly abridged quotation from the eminent scholar Aḥmad Shākir.

Undoubtedly, the legal basis (‘illah al-ḥukm) and the point of analogy (manāṭ al-qiyās) between the Americans, Russians, Jews, and all enemies of Muslims today, and the past enmity of the French and English, are one and the same. Indeed, these, in addition to the English and French, have become allies against us. There is no doubt that their blood and wealth, men and women, are permissible to be taken everywhere, especially in our lands.

Seventhly: The Obligation to Support Muslims in Religion if Non-Muslims Attack Them, Regardless of Their Sins and Shortcomings. Legitimate Jihād Continues with Every Righteous and Sinful Muslim Leader and Commoner

In the Noble Qur’ān:

There are numerous proofs for the obligation to support Muslims. We mention among them His Almighty's saying in Sūrat al-Anfāl, verses 72 and 73, after seeking refuge with Allāh from the accursed Satan: {Indeed, those who have believed and emigrated and fought with their wealth and lives in the cause of Allāh and those who gave shelter and aided - they are allies of one another. But those who believed and did not emigrate - for you there is no alliance with them until they emigrate. And if they seek help of you in the matter of religion, then you must help, except against a people between yourselves and whom is a treaty. And Allāh is Seeing of what you do.} (Al-Anfāl: 72). Ibn Kathīr (may Allāh have mercy on him) said in his interpretation (vol. 2, p. 516) regarding the verse, {And if they seek help of you in the matter of religion, then you must help}: "Allāh Almighty says: And if these Bedouins who did not emigrate seek your help in a religious fight against an enemy of theirs, then help them. For it is obligatory upon you to help them because they are your brothers in religion." This is narrated from Ibn ‘Abbās. He continued, regarding the end of the same verse, {If you do not do so, there will be fitnah on earth and great corruption}: "Meaning, if you do not distance yourselves from the polytheists and ally yourselves with the believers, fitnah (trial, discord) will occur among people, which is the confusion of matters and the intermingling of believers with non-Muslims, leading to widespread and prolonged corruption among people." End of Ibn Kathīr's words (may Allāh have mercy on him).

Al-Qurṭubī (may Allāh have mercy on him) said in his commentary, Al-Jāmi‘ li-Aḥkām al-Qur’ān (vol. 8, p. 36), regarding Allāh Almighty's saying, {And if they seek help of you in the matter of religion}: "He means if these believers who did not emigrate from the land of war call for your assistance with forces or wealth to rescue them, then assist them. That is an obligation upon you, so do not forsake them. Except if they seek your help against a people with whom you have a treaty; then do not help them against those people, and do not break the treaty until its term is completed." Ibn al-‘Arabī said: "Unless they are weak and oppressed captives, in which case allegiance to them remains, and supporting them is obligatory, to the extent that not an eye among us blinks until we go out to rescue them if our numbers permit. Or we spend all our wealth to secure their release until no one has a single dirham left. Mālik and all scholars have said likewise. Indeed, to Allāh we belong and to Him we shall return, for what has befallen creation in their abandonment of their brothers in enemy captivity while they possess treasuries of wealth, surplus resources, ability, numbers, strength, and fortitude."

Shaykh Sayyid Quṭb (may Allāh have mercy on him) said in Fī Zilāl al-Qur’ān (vol. 3, p. 1558): "These individuals (meaning Muslims who did not emigrate with you to the Abode of Islām) are not members of the Muslim society, and therefore there is no alliance (walāyah) between them and it. However, there is the bond of creed. This bond alone does not impose responsibilities on the Muslim society towards these individuals, unless their religion is attacked, and they are, for example, tempted away from their creed. If they seek help from Muslims – in the Abode of Islām – in such a case, then Muslims must help them in this instance alone." End quote.

I say, and Allāh is the granter of success: The command to support these Muslims in religion came even though they did not emigrate and join the Muslims when their state was established. Perhaps some of them had weakness or an excuse, and perhaps among them were those concerning whom a severe warning was revealed that their abode would be Hellfire for not emigrating despite their ability to do so, as in Allāh Almighty's saying in Sūrat al-Nisā': {Indeed, those whom the angels take [in death] while wronging themselves - [the angels] will say, "In what [condition] were you?" They will say, "We were oppressed in the land." The angels will say, "Was not the earth of Allāh spacious [enough] for you to emigrate therein?" For those, their refuge is Hell - and evil it is as a destination.} (Al-Nisā': 97).

Despite their sin, which leads those without excuse into Hellfire, their right as people of "Lā ilāha illā Allāh" was not forfeited. If they seek help in religion, Muslims must support them. They have this right because they are people of "Lā ilāha illā Allāh." Indeed, Allāh has made the failure to support a Muslim lead to fitnah on earth and great corruption. This is what we witness in our times due to Muslims' inaction in supporting their religion, supporting one another, and supporting the oppressed among them, under various pretexts, including that their religion is flawed. It should be noted that all verses and Ḥadīth concerning the rights of a Muslim do not specify a particular type of Muslim according to faith, nor do they differentiate between one Muslim and another, as long as he has not left the fold of Islām. This is in the Qur'ān.

In the Sunnah:

From Abū Mūsá al-Ash‘arī (may Allāh be pleased with him), who said: The Messenger of Allāh ﷺ said: "A believer to another believer is like a solid building, one part reinforcing another," and he interlaced his fingers. Narrated by al-Bukhārī in the Book of Manners, chapter on the cooperation of believers, and by Muslim in the Book of Virtue, chapter on the mutual mercy and affection of believers.

From al-Nu‘mān ibn Bashīr (may Allāh be pleased with them both), who said: The Messenger of Allāh ﷺ said: "The similitude of believers in their mutual love, mercy, and compassion is that of a single body; if one organ complains, the rest of the body responds to it with wakefulness and fever." This is an agreed-upon Ḥadīth, found in the chapters of the previous Ḥadīth. Imam al-Nawawī (may Allāh have mercy on him) commented on this Ḥadīth in Nuzhat al-Muttaqīn Sharḥ Riyāḍ al-Ṣāliḥīn: "What is meant by mutual mercy (al-tarāḥum) is that believers should be merciful to one another and extend a hand of help and assistance to each other during hardships and calamities." (Vol. 1, p. 246).

From Ibn ‘Umar (may Allāh be pleased with them both), the Messenger of Allāh ﷺ said: "A Muslim is the brother of a Muslim; he does not wrong him nor hand him over (to an enemy). Whoever is in need of his brother, Allāh will be in his need. Whoever relieves a Muslim of a burden, Allāh will relieve him of one of the burdens of the Day of Resurrection. And whoever conceals (the faults of) a Muslim, Allāh will conceal him on the Day of Resurrection." Agreed upon.

Al-Qaṣṭallānī, in Irshād al-Sārī Sharḥ Ṣaḥīḥ al-Bukhārī (vol. 4, p. 255), commented on this Ḥadīth, saying: "('He does not wrong him') is a statement conveying a prohibition, because wronging a Muslim by another Muslim is forbidden. ('Nor does he hand him over') means he does not abandon him to one who would harm him; rather, he protects him. Al-Ṭabarānī added: 'Nor does he hand him over in a calamity that befalls him.'" (Vol. 4, p. 255).

Imam al-Nawawī explained this Ḥadīth in his commentary on Ṣaḥīḥ Muslim, saying: "As for ('nor does he forsake him'), scholars said that forsaking (al-khadhl) means abandoning help and support. Its meaning is that if a Muslim seeks his help in repelling an oppressor or the like, it is incumbent upon him to help if he is able, and he has no legitimate Sharī'ah excuse." (Cited in Irshād al-Sārī Sharḥ Muslim, on the margin of Sharḥ al-Bukhārī, vol. 9, p. 457).

We say this applies to repelling injustice from a Muslim, even if it comes from another Muslim who unjustly assails him. How much more so if it comes from an assailing non-Muslim, an apostate, or a misguided Muslim who seeks the help of non-Muslims against his Muslim brother?

It goes without saying that the Ḥadīth of the Messenger ﷺ regarding the obligation to support a Muslim, not to forsake him, and to defend him, were not specific only to the Muslims of the best generations or the best Muslims of every era. Rather, the command in the Book and the Sunnah is to support the Muslim, despite Allāh's knowledge and His Messenger's ﷺ informing us that the religion will weaken in the end times. He ﷺ said: "No time will come upon you except that the time following it will be worse, until you meet your Lord." Narrated by al-Bukhārī.

Indeed, the Companions, the Successors (Tābi'īn), and the Salaf after them continually complained about the decline of religion among people and the worsening of conditions. Nevertheless, their practice was to advise Muslims and ward off harm from them, especially repelling the evil of an assailant against religion, land, honor, and sanctities. If support were only for those who were upon the religion and condition of the best generations – a period of one hundred years at most – then Jihād, support, and defense of Muslims would not have occurred throughout Islamic history, which spans more than thirteen centuries thereafter. The books of history still narrate the corruption of Muslims' condition, such as the spread of innovations (bid'ah), deviation from the Sunnah, prevalence of sins, alcohol, singing girls, and injustices, among other things. Despite this, as we will show, we find senior Salaf and scholars calling for and undertaking military expeditions with every righteous and sinful person, repelling assailants from Islām and Muslims, rejoicing in their joys, and grieving for their calamities. This is the creed of Ahl al-Sunnah wa al-Jamā‘ah, contrary to the methodology of the Khawārij and other deviant innovators.

If the declaration "Lā ilāha illā Allāh" will save peoples before Allāh who will come in the end times not understanding anything of its meaning, as reported in Ṣaḥīḥ al-Tirmidhī from the Messenger of Allāh ﷺ, then how can they not have rights upon us, we being their brothers because of this declaration, regardless of the shortcomings they may have that do not expel them from the community of "Lā ilāha illā Allāh"? One can imagine the state of those who do not understand anything of the meaning of "Lā ilāha illā Allāh"; we have seen such people in the peripheries of the Islamic world, among some inhabitants of Turkistan, Central Asia, the Caucasus, Bosnia, and elsewhere. If this is the right of an ordinary Muslim, what then is the right of those who wage Jihād and repel the enemy from among the people of Islām, from the remnants of those steadfast upon the truth in this age? Allāh, Glorified and Exalted, says: {So fight in the cause of Allāh; you are not held responsible except for yourself. And incite the believers [to fight] that Allāh may restrain the might of those who disbelieve.} [Qur’ān 4:84]. And the Messenger of Allāh ﷺ says: "Whoever is killed defending his religion is a martyr."

We have all heard the words of Ibn Taymiyyah (may Allāh have mercy on him) and his famous fatwa on repelling an assailant, where he said: "As for defensive fighting, it is the most severe type of repelling an assailant from honor and religion, and it is obligatory by consensus (ijmā‘). The assailing enemy who corrupts religion and the world – nothing is more obligatory after faith than repelling him. No condition is stipulated for it, and he is repelled according to ability. Our scholars and others have stated this." He mentioned this in Al-Fatāwá al-Kubrā (vol. 5, p. 530).

This assailant who targets Muslim lands today, as happened recently in Iraq and before that in many parts of Muslim lands, has targeted religion, lives, wealth, and honor. The Messenger of Allāh ﷺ says: "Whoever is killed defending his blood is a martyr. Whoever is killed defending his honor is a martyr. And whoever is killed defending his wealth is a martyr." Narrated by the compilers of the four Sunan. It is also narrated from him ﷺ his saying: "Whoever is killed defending against an injustice is a martyr." Reported by al-Nasā'ī.

The scholars of the four schools of jurisprudence (madhāhib), the imams of Qur'ānic exegesis (tafsīr), and the commentators on the Sunnah have dedicated chapters to repelling an assailant, even if he is a Muslim, citing these texts. They have precious words on this topic, which we do not reproduce here for brevity. All of this concerns an assailant, even if Muslim. What then of this impure mixture of assailants today, consisting of Jews, Russians, Americans, Rāfiḍah (Shi'a), and their apostate and corrupt allies?

Perhaps some may say, "Yes, this is for defending righteous Muslims, but those today have such-and-such negative traits that we mentioned." We reiterate to this brother: the proof and agreement have already established that they are still, in my view and yours, Muslims, people of "Lā ilāha illā Allāh." Many among them may have innovations and other issues that detract from their uprightness (ʿadālah), but many are also righteous. Therefore, consider with me the position of Ahl al-Sunnah regarding fighting alongside Muslims, even if they are in these conditions, in offensive Jihād (jihād al-ṭalab), let alone defensive Jihād (jihād al-dafʿ) and repelling an assailant, for which no condition is stipulated but is done according to ability, as Ibn Taymiyyah summarized the consensus of scholars.

Upon returning to references such as books of tafsīr, Ḥadīth commentaries, jurisprudential collections of the four madhāhib, or authoritative references like the fatwas of Ibn Taymiyyah and Imam Ibn Ḥazm al-Andalusī, among others, we find in various chapters on Jihād, or Jihād and Siyar (military conduct) as it is sometimes termed, and even in the foundational texts of Ahl al-Sunnah creed, sections revolving around Jihād with every righteous and sinful person. Sometimes these are titled "Jihād with Every Amīr (Leader)" or "Jihād with the Amīrs." This discourse centers on the consensus of Ahl al-Sunnah, in contrast to the Khawārij, Rāfiḍah, and other deviant sects. I have gathered numerous texts and evidences from the references available to me. Then, Allāh facilitated that I looked into the valuable book, Kitāb al-‘Umdah fī I’ḍād al-‘Uddah (The Mainstay in Preparing Equipment [for Jihād]) by our Shaykh, Dr. ‘Abd al-Qādir ibn ‘Abd al-‘Azīz – may Allāh remember him with good, benefit through him, and secure his release. I found that he had summarized what is found in most of these references in a concise and excellent manner. This beneficial summary sufficed me from lengthy citation of evidences, as it contains the essence and is adequate. I will present what is in it and then mention some related material I found that was not included.

Here, my dear brother, is what is stated in Al-‘Umdah – may Allāh reward its author with the best reward on behalf of Islām, Muslims, and the people of preparation, emigration (hijrah), and Jihād. It is stated on pages 9-10:

"We derive many lessons from this, including that the arena of Jihād may bring together the hypocrite, the sinner, the one with corrupt intentions, and people who have no share (of good). All these types were present during the time of the Prophet ﷺ. Another lesson is that the presence of such individuals in the arena of Jihād is not a justification for refraining from Jihād under the pretext that there are flawed individuals in the ranks. Jihād was undertaken during the time of the Prophet ﷺ despite the presence of these people, and further explanation of this and Ibn Taymiyyah's fatwa on it will follow." Then he said: "If this happened during the life of the Prophet ﷺ and those with him, what then of the situation now? The Prophet ﷺ said: "No time will come upon you except that the time following it will be worse, until you meet your Lord." Narrated by al-Bukhārī."

Then he elaborated excellently on pages 58-63, in a chapter titled "The Issue of Campaigning with a Sinful Amīr." I advise the brothers to review it in its entirety and, if possible, to check the evidences he provided – may Allāh reward him – in their original sources, as some contain further detail. I will briefly convey here what is necessary to establish the matter of Jihād with Muslims and their leaders, even if they are not upright (‘adl), and are involved in innovations, immorality (fujūr), sinfulness (fisq), embezzlement from spoils (ghulūl), and other things that negate uprightness, as long as these do not expel them from the fold of Islām. This was the condition of most Muslims and their leaders for over 90% of our Islamic history spanning fourteen centuries.

It is stated in this chapter of Al-‘Umdah: "The sinner (fājir) is one who is not upright (‘adl). Uprightness (‘adālah) is: the soundness of his religious affairs; or it is said, one from whom no suspicious behavior is apparent. Two things are considered for it: Righteousness in religion, which is performing obligatory duties with their regular Sunnah acts and avoiding forbidden matters, not committing major sins nor persisting in minor ones. And employing manliness (murū’ah): by doing what beautifies and adorns him, and refraining from what defiles and disgraces him." (Manār al-Sabīl, pp. 487-488).

Then he said at the bottom of page 58: "Thirdly: If the amīr is a sinner, and no other is available, or it is not feasible to work with another, either due to ignorance of a more suitable leader's existence or extreme difficulty in joining him, and consequently, refraining from working with the sinner leads to missing a Sharī‘ah-based benefit in training or Jihād, then the discussion here has two aspects. It is based on the question: Is his sinfulness related to himself personally, or does it affect the interests of Islām and Muslims?"

"The first aspect: If his sinfulness is personal, such as one who drinks alcohol or uses drugs, embezzles from the spoils, or is characterized by sinfulness (fisq) or innovation (bid'ah) – note well that this includes being characterized by sinfulness or innovation – then one campaigns with him, as long as this sinfulness does not impair his fighting the enemy nor compromise the cause of Jihād. This is done while continuing to advise, admonish, and teach him in a manner appropriate to his situation – note that this advice should be given in a manner appropriate to his situation – so that perhaps Allāh may rectify his condition. What I have mentioned is an established principle in the creed of Ahl al-Sunnah wa al-Jamā'ah and is mentioned in the jurisprudence of Jihād. This first aspect is what is meant by campaigning with the righteous and the sinner. The evidence for what we have mentioned regarding campaigning with one whose sinfulness is personal is as follows:"

"What Ibn Qudāmah al-Ḥanbalī mentioned: He said (Issue: One campaigns with every righteous and sinful person, meaning with every imam). Abū 'Abdillāh (meaning Imam Aḥmad ibn Ḥanbal, may Allāh have mercy on him) was asked about a man who says, 'I will not campaign,' and the offspring of al-'Abbās [i.e., the Abbasid rulers] take him, arguing that this only provides spoils for them. He replied, 'Subḥān Allāh (Glory be to Allāh)! These are evil people. These are the inactive, discouraging, ignorant ones. It is said to them: Consider if all people were to sit back as you have, who would then campaign? Would not Islām have vanished? What would the Byzantines do?'"

"Abū Dāwūd narrated with his chain from Abū Hurayrah, who said: The Messenger of Allāh ﷺ said: "Jihād is obligatory upon you with every amīr, whether righteous or sinful."

"And with his chain from Anas, who said: The Messenger of Allāh ﷺ said: "Three things are from the foundation of faith: abstaining from [harming] one who says 'Lā ilāha illā Allāh' – do not declare him a disbeliever for a sin, nor expel him from Islām for an action; Jihād is ongoing since Allāh sent me until the last of my Ummah fights the Dajjāl (Antichrist); and belief in divine decree (al-aqdār)." "

"Because abandoning Jihād with the sinner leads to the cessation of Jihād, the dominance of non-Muslims over Muslims, their eradication, the ascendancy of the word of disbelief, and great corruption therein. Allāh Almighty said: {And if Allāh had not checked one set of people by means of another, the earth would have been corrupted.} (Al-Baqarah: 251)."

"This is from Al-Mughnī and Al-Sharḥ al-Kabīr, vol. 10, p. 371. End [of quotation]. I found it on page 365 in my copy."

Then the author of Al-Umdah (may Allāh release him from captivity and curse the treacherous criminals) added: "I say: Indeed, Ibn Taymiyyah mentioned from Aḥmad even stronger words than this regarding the comparison between a strong, sinful amīr and a righteous, weak one. Ibn Taymiyyah said: 'The combination of strength and trustworthiness in people is rare. This is why 'Umar ibn al-Khaṭṭāb (may Allāh be pleased with him) used to say: "O Allāh, I complain to You of the stamina of the sinner and the inadequacy of the trustworthy." The obligation in every position of authority is to appoint the most suitable person for it. If two men are considered, one with greater trustworthiness and the other with greater strength, the one more beneficial for that position is preferred, even if he has sinfulness, over the weak, incapable man, even if he is trustworthy. Imam Aḥmad was asked about two men who could be amīrs in a campaign, one strong and sinful, and the other righteous and weak: With which of them should one campaign? He replied: "The strong sinner. His strength benefits the Muslims, and his sinfulness is upon himself. As for the righteous, weak one, his righteousness is for himself, and his weakness is a detriment to the Muslims. One campaigns with the strong sinner." The Prophet ﷺ said: "Indeed, Allāh supports this religion with a sinful man," and it is narrated, "with people who have no share (of good)." If he is not sinful, he is more deserving of commanding the war than one who is more righteous than him in religion if the latter cannot fulfill the role.' This is in Majmū' al-Fatāwá, vol. 28, p. 254." Then the author of Al-'Umdah added.

"And Ibn Taymiyyah, in his fatwa on fighting the Tatars, mentioned campaigning with a sinful amīr, saying: 'If it happens that one fights them in the complete manner, this is the ultimate means of attaining Allāh's pleasure, exalting His word, establishing His religion, and obeying His Messenger. If, however, there is sinfulness and corrupt intention among them, such as fighting for leadership or transgressing against them in some matters, and the harm of abandoning the fight against them is greater for the religion than the harm of fighting them in this manner, then it is also obligatory to fight them, repelling the greater of two harms by committing the lesser. This is one of the principles of Islām that should be observed.'"

"For this reason, it is one of the principles of Ahl al-Sunnah wa al-Jamā'ah to campaign with every righteous and sinful person, for Allāh supports this religion with a sinful man and with people who have no share (of good), as the Prophet ﷺ informed. This is because if campaigning is not possible except with sinful amīrs or with an army replete with sinfulness, then one of two outcomes is inevitable:

Either abandoning the campaign with them, which necessitates the dominance of others who are more harmful to religion and the world.

Or campaigning with the sinful amīr, thereby repelling the more sinful ones and establishing most of the laws of Islām, even if it is not possible to establish all of them. This is what is obligatory in this situation and all similar ones. Indeed, much of the campaigning that occurred after the Rightly Guided Caliphs took place only in this manner. It is established from the Prophet ﷺ: "Goodness is tied to the forelocks of horses until the Day of Resurrection: reward and spoils." This authentic Ḥadīth indicates the meaning of what Abū Dāwūd narrated in his Sunan from the Prophet's ﷺ saying: "Campaigning is ongoing since Allāh sent me until the last of my Ummah fights the Dajjāl. The tyranny of a tyrant does not nullify it, nor does the justice of a just ruler." And what is widely narrated from him ﷺ that he said: "A group of my Ummah will continue to be manifest upon the truth, unharmed by those who oppose them, until the Day of Resurrection." And other such texts which Ahl al-Sunnah wa al-Jamā'ah, along with all other groups, have agreed to act upon in waging Jihād against those who deserve Jihād, with their amīrs, whether righteous or sinful, unlike the Rāfiḍah and the Khawārij who deviate from the Sunnah and the Jamā'ah."

"This is despite his ﷺ informing that: "There will come after me oppressive, treacherous, sinful amīrs. Whoever believes their lies and assists them is not of me, and I am not of him, and he will not come to the Ḥawḍ (Cistern). And whoever does not believe their lies and does not assist them in their oppression, he is of me, and I am of him, and he will come to the Ḥawḍ.""

"Thus, if a person is aware of what the Prophet ﷺ commanded regarding Jihād, which is to be carried out by amīrs until the Day of Resurrection, and what he forbade regarding assisting oppressors in their oppression, [he will realize that] the middle way, which is the pure religion of Islām, is to wage Jihād against those who deserve Jihād, such as these people in question, with every amīr and group that is more entitled to Islām than them, if Jihād against them is not possible otherwise. This involves avoiding assisting the group with whom one campaigns in any of Allāh's disobediences. Rather, one obeys them in obedience to Allāh and does not obey them in disobedience to Allāh, for there is no obedience to a creature in disobedience to the Creator."

"This is the way of the best of this Ummah, past and present. It is obligatory upon every legally responsible person (mukallaf) and is a middle path between the way of the Ḥarūriyyah (a faction of Khawārij) and their like, who follow a path of corrupt scrupulousness stemming from lack of knowledge, and the way of the Murji'ah and their like, who follow a path of absolute obedience to amīrs even if they are not righteous. We ask Allāh to grant us and our Muslim brothers success in what He loves and is pleased with, in word and deed. And Allāh knows best. May Allāh send blessings and peace upon our Prophet Muḥammad, his family, and his companions.' Majmū' al-Fatāwā, vol. 28, p. 506."

Refer to the words of Ibn Taymiyyah (may Allāh have mercy on him) at the end of page 212 of volume 28 in Majmū' al-Fatāwā.

Then the author of Al-'Umdah said: "And the commentator on Al-'Aqīdah al-Taḥāwīyyah stated regarding the saying: 'Pilgrimage (Ḥajj) and Jihād are ongoing with the Muslim rulers (ulī al-amr), their righteous and their sinful, until the establishment of the Hour. Nothing nullifies them nor abrogates them.' The commentary: The Shaykh (may Allāh have mercy on him) is referring to refuting the Rāfiḍah, who said: 'There is no Jihād in the path of Allāh until the chosen one (al-Riḍā) from the family of Muḥammad ﷺ emerges, and a caller from the heavens proclaims: Follow him!' The invalidity of this statement is too obvious to require evidence." Then the author of Al-'Umdah continues, saying:

"Imam al-Bukhārī (may Allāh have mercy on him) dedicated a separate chapter to this issue. Since the Ḥadīth that explicitly mention campaigning with the righteous and the sinner are not free from criticism, let alone meeting the conditions of authenticity, he (may Allāh have mercy on him) – following his custom of precise deduction – derived this ruling from the Ḥadīth: "Goodness is tied to the forelocks of horses." He (may Allāh have mercy on him) said in the Book of Jihād in his Ṣaḥīḥ: 'Chapter: Jihād is ongoing, even with the righteous and the sinner.'"

Then the author of Al-‘Umdah quoted Ibn Ḥajar's commentary in Al-Sharḥ [referring to Fatḥ al-Bārī] until he said: "'(Regarding the Prophet's ﷺ saying, "Horses have goodness tied..." etc.) Imam Aḥmad preceded him in using this as evidence. This is because the Prophet ﷺ mentioned the persistence of goodness in the forelocks of horses until the Day of Resurrection and interpreted it as reward and spoils. Spoils coupled with reward come from horses through Jihād, and he did not make this conditional upon the imam being just. This indicates that there is no difference in attaining this virtue whether the campaign is with a just or unjust imam. The Ḥadīth contains an encouragement to campaign on horseback and also glad tidings of the persistence of Islām and its people until the Day of Resurrection, because a necessary consequence of the persistence of Jihād is the persistence of mujāhidīn, who are Muslims. This is like the other Ḥadīth: "A group of my Ummah will continue to fight for the truth..." the Ḥadīth.' (Fatḥ al-Bārī, vol. 6, p. 56)."

Then the author of Al-‘Umdah said: "I say: Just as Jihād with a sinful amīr is obligatory, so too is praying behind him. In this regard, the commentator on Al-‘Aqīdah al-Ṭaḥāwīyyah said: 'Know, may Allāh have mercy on you and us, that it is permissible for a man to pray behind someone from whom he does not know of any innovation or sinfulness, nor should he test him by asking, "What do you believe?" Rather, he prays behind one whose condition is concealed (mastūr al-ḥāl). Even if he prays behind an innovator who calls to his innovation, or a manifest sinner who is the regular imam behind whom he can only pray, such as the imam of Jumu‘ah (Friday prayer) and ‘Īd prayers, or the imam in the Ḥajj prayer at ‘Arafah and the like, the follower prays behind him according to the general view of the Salaf and Khalaf (later scholars). Whoever abandons Jumu‘ah and congregational prayer behind a sinful imam is an innovator according to most scholars. The correct view is that he prays it and does not repeat it, for the Companions (may Allāh be pleased with them) used to pray Jumu‘ah and congregational prayers behind sinful imams and did not repeat them.' He continued, 'And it is in the Ṣaḥīḥ that when ‘Uthmān ibn ‘Affān (may Allāh be pleased with him) was besieged, a person led the people in prayer. A questioner asked ‘Uthmān, "You are the general imam, and this person who led the people in prayer is an imam of fitnah (trial)?" He replied, "O my nephew, prayer is one of the best deeds people perform. If they do well, do well with them; and if they do evil, avoid their evil." Until he said:"

"As for when refraining from praying behind him causes the follower to miss Jumu‘ah and congregational prayer, then no one refrains from praying behind him in this case except an innovator who opposes the Companions (may Allāh be pleased with them).' He continued, 'It is not permissible to repel a small corruption with a greater corruption, nor to repel the lesser of two harms by incurring the greater. For the divine laws came to achieve and perfect benefits, and to eliminate and reduce harms as much as possible. Missing Jumu‘ah and congregational prayers is a greater corruption than praying them behind a sinful imam, especially if abstaining from them does not prevent his sinfulness."

"Therefore, a Sharī‘ah-based benefit should not be abandoned without thereby repelling that harm.' Sharḥ al-Ṭaḥāwīyyah, Maktab al-Islāmī edition, pp. 422-423."

Then the author of Al-‘Umdah – may Allāh reward him – concluded with a summary, saying: "(I say: From the preceding, you realize that this issue is based on a number of texts and Sharī‘ah principles, including:

1. The principle: 'The more severe harm is removed by [tolerating] the lesser harm.' It is self-evident that if only this option is available, the non-Muslim enemy, which is the more severe harm, is repelled by [allying with] the sinful Muslim amīr, which is the lesser harm. This principle is sometimes phrased as 'the lesser of two evils is chosen.' See Majmū‘ al-Fatāwá, vol. 28, p. 212.
2. The Ḥadīth: "Actions are but by intentions, and every person will have but that which he intended." Agreed upon. So, if your intention is sound – that you are waging Jihād so that the word of Allāh may be supreme – then it does not harm you if the amīr's intention is corrupt. Each will have his intention and his reward accordingly, even if the amīr fights for partisan support, leadership, wealth, or the like.

3. And His Almighty's saying: {And cooperate in righteousness and piety, but do not cooperate in sin and aggression} (Al-Mā'idah: 2).

'So, cooperate with the sinful amīr in obedience, but do not obey him or cooperate with him in disobedience and his commission of sins. As previously stated, his sins are not a justification for you to abandon cooperating with him in an act of obedience by waging Jihād with him.' The author of Al-'Umdah noted: 'All this pertains to the first aspect, which is when Jihād is with a sinful amīr. However, if his sinfulness extends to harming Islām and Muslims, then that is the second aspect.' Then the author of Al-'Umdah – may Allāh reward him – continued, explaining that it is not permissible to wage Jihād with one whose sinfulness causes harm to Muslims or constitutes a betrayal of Islām." End [of quote from Al-'Umdah].

I say: I have found similar content in Kitāb al-Siyar al-Kabīr by Imam Muḥammad ibn al-Ḥasan al-Shaybānī, the student of Abū Ḥanīfah (may Allāh Almighty have mercy on them both). This book is one of the most extensive jurisprudential collections on the rulings of Jihād. In the first volume, in the chapter on Jihād with amīrs, there is material that supports the previously mentioned evidences. It concludes by affirming the same issue of fighting with amīrs, whether righteous or sinful, and Jihād with every righteous and sinful person, especially in Jihād against people of misguidance and polytheists. As mentioned earlier in previous volumes.

In concluding the evidences for this issue, we mention that the matter of Jihād with every Muslim amīr and group, whether righteous or sinful, applies to both offensive Jihād (jihād al-ṭalab) and defensive Jihād (jihād al-dafʿ), whether the Jihād in question is a communal obligation (farḍ kifāyah) or an individual obligation (farḍ ‘ayn). However, we note that it is more specific and more emphasized in the Jihād of repelling an assailant. The jurists of the Ummah, the four madhāhib, and the generality of Imams of Islām, tafsīr, and Ḥadīth have unanimously agreed that Jihād becomes an individual obligation upon every Muslim in several situations, the most important and emphasized of which is when the enemy invades a Muslim land. Repelling them becomes obligatory, and Jihād becomes an individual duty upon the free and the slave, the man and the woman, without permission from a master, parent, creditor, or husband. If the people of that land are unable, negligent, or remiss, the obligation falls upon those neighboring them, then those neighboring them, until it encompasses all Muslims, the nearest then the next nearest, if sufficiency is not achieved. Jihād then, with Muslims and their amīrs, whether upright or not, to repel that assailant, is more emphasized than offensive Jihād, concerning which the aforementioned scholarly opinions were stated. And Allāh knows best.

Finally, after the Sharī‘ah-based textual evidences from scholars for this first issue, we mention a historical proof, which, due to the consecutively transmitted positions of Muslim scholars and mujāhidīn throughout the ages, is considered another Sharī‘ah proof – indeed, a practical and Sharī‘ah proof, among the clearest for anyone who has a heart or who lends hearing while he is present in mind. As Imam Ibn Taymiyyah (may Allāh have mercy on him), who lived in the seventh century [AH], indeed said, much of the campaigning after the Rightly Guided Caliphs occurred only in this manner. If we wished to extract stories and evidences from history books such as Al-Bidāyah wa al-Nihāyah, Ibn al-Athīr, Tārīkh al-Ṭabarī, and Tārīkh Ibn Khaldūn, whether from history books or scattered stories of scholars' positions in Muslim campaigns and calamities found in biographical dictionaries and chronicles, we would find hundreds of clear proofs. I will mention some of them as examples and advise the brothers to return to those books to study them, for history is the life of this Ummah and the book of its Salaf's biography.

Since the Rightly Guided Caliphate ended and the Umayyad monarchy began, innovations, manifestations of corruption, and the intrusion of worldly concerns with their attendant corruption, sins, immorality, rivalry, and selfishness emerged, as the Messenger of Allāh ﷺ had foretold. It reached a point where some of the Tābi'īn in the first century would say to people, "If the Companions of Muḥammad ﷺ were to rise among you, they would disapprove of everything about you except the Qiblah." They would also tell them, "You commit acts that you consider minor sins, which we, in the time of the Prophet ﷺ, considered acts of hypocrisy." Frequently, one finds on the tongues of the Salaf and in their books, as centuries passed – the second, third, and beyond – such sentiments. I even read that al-Shāṭibī mentioned a Tābi'ī lamenting the decline of religion and the spread of innovations, to which Imam Aḥmad commented, "What if he were in our time?!" Al-Shāṭibī then remarked, "What if Aḥmad were in our time?!" May Allāh have mercy on them. Look in al-Shāṭibī's book, Al-I'tisām, where he discusses innovations and their proliferation, the complaints of the Salaf about them, and the emergence of sinfulness, disobedience, and deviations, especially among rulers and ruling families. Yet, observe their conduct (may Allāh have mercy on them) in campaigning and Jihād. I will briefly mention some examples that come to mind.

Here are the Salaf, they campaigned with al-Ḥajjāj – and what do you know of al-Ḥajjāj and his likes among the military commanders of the Umayyads? In the first century, the Berbers of North Africa apostatized multiple times, and on one occasion, Ahl al-Sunnah found no one to whom they could entrust their banner except a well-known Kharijite leader. Some people questioned this, and the slogan of the North African scholars of Ahl al-Sunnah at that time was, "We fight alongside those of the Qiblah (Muslims) against those not of the Qiblah (non-Muslims)." This was only to address that necessity. Then came the Abbasids and the trial of the creation of the Qur'ān. Al-Ma'mūn and his successors, al-Mu'taṣim, then al-Wāthiq, until the trial ended with al-Mutawakkil, along with their government and entourage of Abbasids at that time, were not mere innovators! Their innovation was the issue of the creation of the Qur'ān, and they not only called to it but also tested scholars on it, tortured them, and killed them. Did the Salaf, led by the Imam of Ahl al-Sunnah [Aḥmad ibn Ḥanbal], abandon praying behind them and fighting with them? No! Indeed, his explicit statement was that those who say such things are inactive, discouraging, ignorant people. If everyone did this, what would the Byzantines do? Islām would be on the verge of disappearing.

More astonishingly, the most severe phase of Ibn Ḥanbal's ordeal was during the reign of al-Mu'taṣim. Aḥmad (may Allāh have mercy on him) was flogged in his presence and tortured by al-Mu'taṣim himself. They wrapped him in a mat and trampled on him until, when the Imam saw the executioner, he said, "I thought relief had come!"

When al-Mu'taṣim set out to conquer Amorium in the famous story of the woman's cry for help, "Wa Mu'taṣimāh!" (Oh, al-Mu'taṣim!), and took that triumphant stand immortalized by the poet Abū Tammām in his famous ode beginning: "The sword is a truer informant than books, in its edge lies the boundary between seriousness and play." It is narrated that Imam Aḥmad encouraged fighting with them in offensive Jihād (note: not defensive Jihād), as they were the ones who attacked the Byzantines in Amorium in Anatolia. It is narrated that Imam Aḥmad said, "O Allāh, I have absolved him of the sin of flogging me," when Allāh granted victory to him and the Muslims with him. Ponder this.

Then, another leap after the Abbasids to the Seljuks. And what were the Seljuks? They were Turks, ancestors of these Afghans, Uzbeks, and Central Asians – ignorant of Allāh's religion. Some vestiges of ancient religions and Sufism had spread among them, and their hallmark was ignorance. So, scholars opened madrasahs (schools) for them, as in the time of Imam Abū Ḥāmid al-Ghazālī and Imam al-Juwaynī (may Allāh Almighty have mercy on them). They taught them, advised them, and strictly held them accountable. They prayed behind them and campaigned with them. Look at the campaigns of the Seljuks and their righteous kings like Alp Arslān and his famous battle that brings tears to one's eyes when reading its history (the Battle of Manzikert). The Seljuks were among the most ignorant dynasties that ruled Muslim lands, and the most rife with innovations, Sufism, and ignorance. Yet, Allāh preserved the domain of the people of Islām through them.

Then, another leap to the time of the Tatars. Two great Imams, among the greatest Imams of Islām, stood firm during this period. The first was Ibn Taymiyyah. He incited the people to fight them and fought himself. And with whom? With the Mamluks and Mamluk amīrs from the armies of Egypt and Syria. And what were the Mamluks? Look at their history, the spread of ignorance, innovations, Sufism, their pilgrimage to graves, and their veneration of the tomb of al-Badawī in Egypt, besides the prevalence of killing, injustice, bloodshed, usurpation of people's wealth, sinfulness, singing girls, lutes, and alcohol in their time. Some people even denounced their condition and asked Imam Ibn Taymiyyah about the ruling on fighting with the amīrs of Egypt and Syria, given their state. He said, "No one denies fighting with these except an ignorant person. What would the people of Islām do if Jihād with them were abandoned?" Indeed, in his fatwas, he considered the armies of Syria and Egypt to be the "victorious group" (al-ṭā'ifah al-manṣūrah) by which Allāh preserved His religion in that era. Nevertheless, he frequently held the Mamluk amīrs and their scholars accountable. The stories of his enjoining good and forbidding evil, and his imprisonment for it, are well-known. Indeed, he died in their prisons (may Allāh have mercy on him).

During the era of the Taifa states, when the Atabeg dynasty arose in Syria and southern Turkey, among whose mujāhidīn kings and amīrs were ‘Imād al-Dīn Zangī and his son Nūr al-Dīn, famously known as al-Malik al-Ṣāliḥ (the Righteous King) – what was their state regarding Sufism and the spread of innovations in that era? The corruptions are mentioned and exist in history books. All scholars praised them warmly and waged Jihād with them. Then came the Ayyubids after them. The righteous king Salāḥ al-Dīn (may Allāh have mercy on him) waged Jihād against the Crusaders. He was, like most kings of his era, a Shāfi‘ī Ash‘arī. The "Salafis" of that time did not condemn Jihād with him, nor did they disparage him as those who falsely attribute themselves to the methodology of the righteous Salaf do today. When he died (may Allāh have mercy on him), his sons divided the kingdom, fought each other, and some sought help from the Christians until his brother al-Malik al-‘Ādil came, deposed them, and took the kingdom. Then came his son al-Ṣāliḥ Ismā‘īl, who ruled Syria, while his uncle Najm al-Dīn Ayyūb ruled Egypt. They fought for the kingdom, and Ismā‘īl, the king of Syria, allied with the Christians and gave them Muslim fortresses. His story with the Sultan of Scholars, al-‘Izz ibn ‘Abd al-Salām, is famous, but this is not the place to narrate it for fear of length. Al-‘Izz left him after issuing a fatwa implying his deposition and illegitimacy for that reason. Shaykh al-‘Izz ibn ‘Abd al-Salām then went to Najm al-Dīn in Egypt. Was Najm al-Dīn in the condition of the best generations? No. He had the virtue of fighting the Crusaders over his treacherous nephew, the king of Syria. Al-‘Izz ibn ‘Abd al-Salām stood with him, and the Shaykh's status became great in his eyes. However, Najm al-Dīn was a tyrant, and injustices, alcohol, and sinfulness spread during his reign. The Shaykh had great stances with him in holding him accountable. As for waging Jihād against the enemy with them, it was as had always been the practice of Ahl al-Sunnah scholars. Then the Ayyubids went, and the Mamluk state arose. Al-‘Izz ibn ‘Abd al-Salām held them accountable to the extent that he sold them in the famous story to free them from slavery. But when the fight against the Tatars was imminent, what did he do (may Allāh have mercy on him)?

He incited the army and called people to fight with them, which led to the Battle of ‘Ayn Jālūt. His story of inciting the Egyptian army to confront the Tatars, culminating in the triumphant Battle of ‘Ayn Jālūt under the banner of Quṭuz and Baybars of the Mamluks, is famous. The condition of the Mamluks is well-known. It suffices to say that hardly had ‘Ayn Jālūt concluded with the Muslims' victory when Baybars killed his amīr, Quṭuz, to seize the Mamluk kingdom and take credit for the battle's victory. Then this Baybars – the killer of his amīr – campaigned against the Tatars and Crusaders. The stories of scholars holding him accountable, like the story of Imam al-Nawawī with Baybars, are famous and not the subject here.

The Mamluks went, and the Ottomans came. And what were the Ottomans? They were characterized by ignorance, injustice, and oppression. Yet Allāh preserved Islām through them and conquered Constantinople, the capital of the Byzantines, at their hands, as the Messenger of Allāh ﷺ had foretold. They raised the adhān (call to prayer) there, and it became the heartland of Islām and the capital of the Caliphate until the time of our fathers, until our Caliphate disappeared only seventy years ago! Did the Imams of Islām abandon Jihād with them because they were Ḥanafī Sufis? Did they abandon Jihād against the enemies with them, both offensively and defensively?

It is enough for the Ottomans that one of their proud achievements was that they did not allow Christian ships to pass through the Bāb al-Mandab strait from Yemen to the Gulf of Suez because they would pass near the sea of Jeddah, which is part of the sacred precinct (Ḥaram). So, the entire Red Sea was a sacred precinct for them, which Christians could not enter! Ottoman ships would receive Christian merchants' goods at Yemen, transport them to the Gulf of Suez, and hand them over in the Mediterranean. One of their last kings, Sultan Abdūlmecid in the seventeenth century [likely an error, Sultan Abdülmecid reigned in the 19th century; perhaps referring to an earlier Sultan or a general sentiment about Ottoman naval power], the Mediterranean Sea was called the Ottoman Lake. An English journalist asked him if the Mediterranean and its northern shore, all belonging to the people of the Cross, was an Ottoman lake, then what about the Black Sea, which is truly surrounded by the domain of Islām and the armies of the Ottoman Caliphate? The Ottoman Sultan replied, "The Black Sea is my palace's swimming pool!" Such was the glory of Islām at their hands. Muslims waged Jihād with them, and their stories are famous.

And so it remained until the Caliphate state disappeared, and the armies of the Byzantines (Europeans) came in the second Crusader wave in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, led by England, France, European countries, and Russia in Central Asia. Who waged Jihād against them for half a century, and who expelled them from the eastern part of the Islamic world? The Deobandi, Sufi, and Ḥanafī scholars of India and Pakistan waged Jihād. They fought the English for 130 years and expelled them. Likewise, the Ḥanafī Sufis in Afghanistan did so, and on one occasion inflicted a massacre on the English forces, annihilating a campaign of ten thousand men, or it is said thirty thousand, with only one man surviving! They let him live to tell the story to the Queen of Britain. As for the Ḥanafī Sufis in the Fergana Valley (in Central Asia, Uzbekistan), they made the Russians taste misery. Similarly, Imam Shāmil, a Shāfi'ī Ash'arī Sufi, waged Jihād against the Russians for sixty years in the Caucasus, and his story is famous (may Allāh have mercy on him).

In the Levant, Sufi Ash'arī shaykhs and scholars of the Ḥanafī and Shāfi'ī madhhabs waged Jihād against the French, then the English. In Libya, revolutions were led by Mālikī Sufi Ash'arī shaykhs, most famously 'Umar al-Mukhtār (may Allāh have mercy on him), as well as the shaykhs of the Sanūsī order before and after him. In Sudan, the Sufis led the Mahdist revolt which expelled the English. In Algeria, many revolts were led by Mālikī Ash‘arī Sufis, the most famous being the revolt of Abū ‘Amāmah and the revolt of ‘Abd al-Qādir al-Jazā’irī. Similar events occurred in Tunisia, where the scholars of Zaytūnah, who are Mālikī Ash‘arīs, rose against the French. In Morocco, ‘Abd al-Karīm al-Khaṭṭābī, a Mālikī Sufi Ash‘arī, led a revolt that ended with the establishment of an Islamic republic that lasted until 1963. Unfortunately, most people may not know this! He was victorious in his famous battles against the combined armies of five European countries and, in one of them, the famous Battle of Annual, took more than ten thousand prisoners, including one hundred generals and marshals from the European armies, until America intervened, and they said Islām had returned to conquer Europe. This man's history has been wronged. I once read, surprisingly, a statement by Mao Zedong (considered one of the most famous theorists of guerrilla warfare) in his book "Six Military Essays," saying about al-Khaṭṭābī that he was one of his greatest military teachers in guerrilla warfare! He had never met him but had studied his experiences. Meanwhile, most of our youth today have not heard of al-Khaṭṭābī, but they know Ghawār al-Ṭūshah, Star Academy celebrities, Maradona's life story, Madonna's adventures, and Fifi Abdou's jokes!

In Sub-Saharan Africa, there are great stories that have not reached us due to our ignorance of our history. Islām entered Africa from Libya, Algeria, Morocco, and Sudan through the Sufis, who fought colonialism for a long time. This is also the case in East Asian countries, Malaysia, and from the Philippines to Indonesia. Then, among the last Jihāds of Muslims was what took place in Afghanistan at the hands of the Ḥanafī Sufis, who did not much impress many of our brothers and scholars of the "tolerant" creed in the [Arabian] Peninsula and elsewhere; they were more impressed with normalization with the Jews, the American occupation of the Ḥaram [Sacred Precincts], and the rule of apostates!

Until a poet, describing the tragedy, said to them:

And among us are those who say to them... Your creed has a flaw.

God forbid, this slander... is unbearable.

O our beloved Afghans... who sacrificed and gave.

You are in life a fragrance... and we are garlic and onions.

And we, from the true Jihād... are that discouraging, reluctant one.

In the second half of the twentieth century, colonialism saw that there was no use in fighting the people of this religion, so it withdrew from our lands, leaving behind factions of apostates among kings, princes, presidents, and secular parties. They controlled us from the sixties to the nineties, until the third Crusader campaign, led by America, came upon us in 1990. One of their leaders said: "We came to correct the Lord's mistake of placing oil in lands that neither need nor appreciate it, and He – that is, the Lord, Glorified is He – should have placed it in industrial countries." Exalted is Allāh far above what this swine said!

So our scholars turned to filling satellite channels with talk about the rights of Christians and other non-Muslims in Muslim lands and laws of tolerance towards the likes of this swine! And here are the youth of Islām taking up arms, and here are their vanguard, the Arab Afghan mujāhidīn, and those of them who remain, waiting, and they have not changed in the least. And here are the Arab and non-Arab mujāhidīn groups carrying the burden in more than one place. Perhaps one of the most dangerous things is some of the distorted concepts that have crept in among us. Among the most important is this calamity we are addressing: some people's disapproval – how can we wage Jihād with people of innovations, flawed schools of thought and creeds, Sufis, and who knows what else?!

Will what we have presented of the evidences from the creed of Ahl al-Sunnah suffice these righteous brothers of ours – may Allāh forgive us and them? Will the summary we provided of the history of Islām and Muslims, campaigning with every righteous and sinful Muslim leader and commoner, both offensively and defensively, suffice them? And the principles of repelling an assailant with whatever is possible, for which no condition is stipulated by consensus, it being the most obligatory of duties after faith in Allāh? I hope that what I have narrated is sufficient and beneficial for a seeker of truth, and I hope that we will have a reward for it on the Day when neither wealth nor children will avail.

If these brothers of ours were to review what Shaykh, the martyr, the Imam of the Arab Afghan Mujāhidīn, ‘Abdullāh ‘Azzām (may Allāh have mercy on him), wrote on these matters – a precious legacy that has not been duly appreciated to this day – they would not need this repetition from me. But it is a reminder, which, Allāh willing, benefits our believing brothers. And perhaps one who carries knowledge conveys it to one who is more knowledgeable than him.

Eighthly: The Issue of Democracy and the Experiences of Islamic Awakening Movements with It

As I mentioned previously, since the last decade of the twentieth century, the Awakening (al-Ṣaḥwah), in terms of its activists and the majority of its supporters, has predominantly become political. As I said, the calculated allowance by governments and their Western masters for Islamists to practice democracy led to the politicization of the larger segment of non-political Awakening schools. Over time, the anomalous school of takfīr (declaring Muslims as disbelievers) faded or nearly disappeared, finding no roots in the Ummah or the Awakening. The phenomenon of armed Jihād was also besieged, the jihādī current fragmented, and its groups and individuals were driven into a contemporary trench. There remained no outlet for the pent-up manifestations of the Awakening – as a reaction from Muslim peoples to ongoing events – except in the realm of peaceful awakening through the available gateways of democracy, even though governments and the West had designed a specific form for it when they raised the slogan "Democracy without Islamists in Arab and Muslim countries."

Given the widespread phenomenon of Islamists' "democratic" practices, we must draw attention to this issue in this brief evaluative chapter on the Awakening.

Firstly, from the perspective of its Sharī'ah ruling in the form it has been practiced and has evolved into. Secondly, from the perspective of the results it has achieved, the price paid for it, and the position it has come to occupy, a position meticulously defined and controlled by the New World Order.

In reality, this is a topic of such importance and magnitude that many books should be written about it, and extensive research dedicated to it. Indeed, broad forums should be convened at the highest levels, inviting senior trustworthy scholars, Islamic thinkers, Awakening leaders, and those with experience and precedence in this field. This is to re-evaluate the experiences of nearly eight decades of Islamists' democratic attempts, assessing them in light of Sharī'ah rulings according to the texts of the Book and Sunnah and unbiased scholarly reasoning (ijtihād), far from partisan fanaticism and consideration of personal or factional interests, and far from the influences of governments and colonial powers. Undoubtedly, a topic of this magnitude is not the place for detailed discussion here, nor is it for me to deviate from the context and purpose of this book. This is not to mention the need for a vast amount of documents, statistics, and precise information about these experiences, which is not currently available to me.

Within the limits of this brief overview, I will summarize in key points, seeking Allāh's help:

Firstly, when we say "democracy," we are using a foreign term that denotes a specific concept according to its originators and those who defined it. We are bound by this concept. It is not permissible for us, logically or honestly, to claim – as some Islamists do – another meaning, such as saying, "We mean shūrā (consultation)," or "a type of democracy according to Islamic Sharī'ah guidelines!" This is because if we were to examine the reality of shūrā according to the concepts of legitimate Islamic governance (siyāsah shar‘iyyah), its limits, its eligible participants, and its methods of practice, we would find it to be a different system, unrelated to democracy, and indeed, contradicting it in all areas. As for assigning a specific Islamic meaning to "democracy," this transcends the bounds of logic because it divests the term of its scientifically known meaning as a legal, constitutional, and political term with its own substance.

It is self-evident that terms have specific significations, and it is not permissible to attach a meaning to them that the original term cannot bear. For example, when we say "milk," the listener understands it to refer to a specific substance. We can qualify it with terms that do not take it out of its genus, such as "full-fat milk," "pure milk," or "milk mixed with water." However, we cannot say "red milk," "carbonated milk," or "intoxicating milk." This precision is even more critical when the meaning has a specific Shari‘ah dimension.

When we say "wine" (khamr), we can say "concentrated wine" or "light wine," but we cannot say "pure wine" or "Islamic wine"! Because Allāh Almighty said: {O you who have believed, indeed, intoxicants, gambling, [sacrificing on] stone alters [to other than Allāh], and divining arrows are but defilement from the work of Satan, so avoid it that you may be successful.} (Al-Mā'idah: 90). Similarly, with usury (ribā), there is no "Islamic ribā," "legitimate ribā," or "permissible ribā." There can be "compound ribā," "simple ribā," or "ribā of delay (nasī'ah)," because Allāh Almighty says: {...But Allāh has permitted trade and has forbidden ribā...} [Qur'ān 2:275].

Is it permissible, according to Shari‘ah and logic, to accept commonly circulated terms like "Islamic democracy" or "democratic Islamists"? Perhaps the following points will help us understand the answer by examining specific areas.

What is democracy according to its inventors? How is it practiced by contemporary Western civilization? What is democracy in our context? How do governments in the Arab and Islamic world practice it? What are the forms of democratic practice by Islamists from Islamic Awakening schools in the Arab and Islamic world, and what are their concepts of it? What are the realities, conditions, and outcomes of these practices?

What are the points of agreement and contradiction between democracy and the Islamic system, which is based on the principle of Allāh's sovereignty (ḥākimiyyah) and shūrā between the ruler and the ruled?

What is the Sharī'ah ruling on Islamists' practice of democracy in its current form, and to what extent is it permissible? This is what we will attempt to briefly present in the following points, Allāh willing.

Firstly: The Origin and Concept of Contemporary Democracy and How Western Civilization Practices It

As is known, the ancient roots of the democratic system go back hundreds of years before Christ, when it emerged in Greek civilization and was then inherited by the Romans. As for Western democracy in modern times, its class-tinged experiments trace back to Britain, where a model based on the sovereignty of nobles was implemented from the fifteenth century. The principles of contemporary democracy currently practiced in the West, however, saw their ideas practically crystallized with the French Revolution and the subsequent political and social transformations, i.e., from the beginning of the eighteenth century. At that time, Western jurists and legal scholars began to propose principles and concepts such as "sovereignty of the nation," "sovereignty of the people," "the people as the source of authority," "universal suffrage," "representative system," "public liberties," "equality," "human rights," and "constitutional legitimacy." The issue began in the late Middle Ages when the conflict intensified between the Pope (religious authority) and the King (temporal authority) – that is, between the Pope in the Vatican and various European monarchs. These monarchs were weary of the Church's encroachment on their absolute powers, not to alleviate this for the sake of justice for their subjects, but to usurp the right of tyranny for clergymen. These clergymen had amassed vast feudal estates, hoarded great treasures, imposed taxes, duties, and offerings on the living and the dead, owned regions and their inhabitants, and even sold them indulgences and granted them lands in the gardens of the afterlife for exorbitant prices! This conflict led to the emergence of the concept of sovereignty and to whom it belongs in the late Middle Ages.

Legal scholars loyal to the monarchs wrote the first constitutional texts for the concept of "sovereignty," which they attributed to the royal personage, endowing it with attributes and rights known as the divine right of kings. With these concepts, which first appeared in France, they defended the king's sovereignty against external and internal disputes faced by monarchs from the Papacy abroad and from feudal nobles domestically.

French and European legal scholars defined sovereignty as: "The right to issue commands to all individuals residing in the state's territories." Bodin defined it as: "A supreme authority over citizens and subjects, not limited by law." They also said: "Sovereignty is a supreme will characterized by attributes not found in other wills." And: "The sum of these characteristics is that it is the will that determines itself. The sovereign cannot be compelled by any will external to it to act in a certain way. It is an absolute authority."

Jurists and legal scholars summarized the characteristics of this sovereignty into six:

These concepts are: 1. Absoluteness, 2. Supremacy, 3. Uniqueness and Singularity, 4. Originality, 5. Inalienability, and 6. Infallibility.

A summary of these concepts is as follows:

1. Absoluteness: The sovereign's sovereignty is absolute. No law is imposed upon the sovereign; rather, the law is an expression of the sovereign's will. No external will can compel the sovereign to act in a specific manner, as no will exists that is equal or superior to it. The sovereign's will is always commanding, and no one possesses rights before it. Its relationship with others is that of a master to subjects or a leader to followers. Subjects or followers must execute its orders, not because of their content or substance, but because they emanate from a will inherently superior to their own.
2. Supremacy: Its domain is a will that transcends all other wills and an authority that surpasses all other authorities. Within the relationships it organizes, there is no higher or equal authority.
3. Uniqueness and Singularity: There can only be one sovereignty within a single territory, for if two sovereignties existed in one territory, their affairs would be corrupted; this is self-evident. (From this, the concept of the nation-state was consolidated in Europe).
4. Originality: It is self-subsistent, not having received this supremacy from a preceding or higher will, but rather emanating intrinsically from itself.
5. Inalienability: If sovereignty is usurped by one who is not entitled to it, and this usurper imposes authority upon the people for a period, whether long or short, the usurper cannot claim legitimacy for this authority or sovereignty, no matter how much time passes. The usurpation of sovereignty is not validated by possession nor justified by the passage of time.
6. Infallibility: This theory considers the will of the sovereign equivalent to law and congruent with the principles of truth and justice. Thus, law emanating from sovereignty is attributed infallibility and superiority, even over logic and conscience, as Bazley stated: "When the law speaks, conscience must be silent."

This is how the concept of sovereignty became established among Western legal scholars, who primarily relied on French philosophy and its legislators.

As the French Revolution occurred and its principles and the writings of its early philosophers spread, this sovereignty, with all its characteristics, transferred from the monarch to the nation. Sovereignty thus came to belong to the nation, and the nation became the source of all authorities. It became the supreme authority, singularly possessing the right to create binding discourse concerning the judgment of things or actions. Or, it is the absolute supreme authority that alone possesses the right to create discourse related to citizens' actions by way of obligation or determination—obligation to act, to refrain, or to choose between them. It is the nation that possesses the power to make an act obligatory, forbidden, or permissible, and to make something a cause, a condition, or an impediment. Then, the term "democracy," meaning "rule of the people," emerged from the concept of national sovereignty to express its essence. Sovereignty is the legal expression, and democracy is the political expression; thus, national sovereignty is the legal expression of democracy. The pre-French Revolution concept that the person of the king embodied the nation and the state—as Louis XIV expressed when he said, "I am the state" or "I am France"—vanished. Sovereignty became the property of the nation, and the idea of national sovereignty found its way into French public law, from which it branched out into most of the world's constitutions.

Article Three of the Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen, issued on August 26, 1789, stipulated that sovereignty belongs to the nation and that law is the expression of the nation's will.

After the French Revolution, this theory acquired two aspects: negative and positive.

The negative aspect was that the monarch no longer possessed the right to sovereignty. The nation's will became absolute and independent of other wills. The positive aspect was the nation's exercise of this sovereignty through three powers: elections, legislation, and execution.

1. Election: This is the primary power, because the nation's will and sovereignty are established, as political literature affirms, through universal suffrage to choose the legislative authority.
2. Legislation: This is the most emphatic manifestation of sovereignty and its most prominent sign. Legislative power is absolute, unconstrained by limits or restrictions, and not bound to act in any specific way unless the entity entitled to legislate in the name of the nation wills it so, inherently from itself.
3. Execution: This authority pertains to governance and will.

When the theory stabilized in this form, it faced numerous criticisms from legal scholars and defenders of civil rights, most importantly that it:

1. Narrows the sphere of freedom.
2. Narrows the sphere of universal suffrage.

Consequently, the theory of "national sovereignty" was developed to be expressed as "popular sovereignty" to address these criticisms. This led to the adoption of the principle of "universal suffrage," whereby Western legal scholars transformed "election" from a citizen's function into a "right," thereby expanding the base of popular participation. It also provided the opportunity for direct participation in political freedom through referendums.

The summary of these stages is therefore as follows:

- The conflict between monarchs and the Church over power gave rise to the theory of sovereignty for monarchs and their sacred divine right to it.
- The conflict between monarchs and European peoples, resulting from oppression, led to the rejection of both divine authority (the Pope) and temporal authority (the King), which in turn led to attributing sovereignty to the nation.
- This then crystallized into the idea of popular sovereignty, where the people became the source of legislative, executive, and judicial authorities.
- Here, the heinous act of monarchs and popes gave birth to an even more heinous act: the birth of secularism, which was founded on the rejection of religion and belief, the denial of faith in Allāh, and the construction of life and its laws far removed from all of that. This is the essence of secularism in the Western concept, which, like all previous labyrinths, was later transmitted to Muslims.

Thus, the democratic political system was born, founded on fundamental pillars:

1. Equality among members of society in terms of political rights, such as candidacy and voting, regardless of religion, belief, race, color, language, knowledge, ignorance, gender (male or female), or any other distinction.
2. Absolute personal freedom in terms of belief, expression, and activity within the limits of the constitution and law that guarantee these freedoms.
3. The nation's exercise of popular sovereignty through elections and recourse to the majority in approving legislation and laws and forming the three authorities.
4. The principle of power rotation among political blocs and parties through suffrage and majority rule.

The political manifestation of popular sovereignty became the state's exercise of governance through three authorities:

- Legislative Authority: This is the body elected by the nation, authorized to draft the constitution, issue legislation, and enact laws in its light. It is exercised by elected representatives of the people, forming the parliament or its equivalent (such as the House of Representatives, National Assembly, or People's Assembly). This authority possesses the power to amend the constitution or add legislation to it, and to enact laws or ratify those submitted by the government to make them effective.
- Executive Authority: This is the government, headed by the head of state or the designated prime minister, whose ministries oversee the administrative and executive affairs of the state.
- Judicial Authority: This is the body entrusted with resolving disputes and conflicts arising among different segments of the populace or among the authorities themselves, in accordance with laws and legislation issued in the name of the people and national sovereignty through the nation's representatives, the majority of the nation's representatives, or via public referendum.

Thus, the West has come to recognize these systems, all of which trace back to these origins, with variations in the application of democracy from one school to another according to countries and their orientations. Those peoples have thus accepted these principles for themselves.

What the nation, through its representatives and legislators, deems permissible and sound becomes so after being voted upon by the majority. If another majority rises over time and deems what was permissible and sound to be incorrect, erroneous, and flawed, it becomes, by virtue of the majority, misguidance and crookedness punishable by law. The judicial authority, followed by the executive, then enforces these wills.

How does the West actually practice national sovereignty and the rule of the people, or what they call "democracy," from a practical standpoint?

The preceding was a summary of the theory of national sovereignty and the essence of democracy from the perspective of its theoretical origins. However, the practical application of democracy in reality differs from this picture, in every place it has been implemented, just as it varies from one country to another within the West itself. As for the democracies of the Third World, they are farces of another kind.

The democratic system in the Western world today generally relies on a system of political parties. In each country, there are political currents that, in sum, belong to the philosophies that prevailed in Europe during the last century, such as liberalism, socialism, capitalism, communism, and others. Although the constitution permits the formation of parties and makes candidacy a personal right for everyone, reality has resulted in a limited number of parties in each of these countries, not exceeding the fingers of one hand, which compete for power and rotate it among themselves. Often, the struggle boils down to the two main parties, such that if one of them secures an absolute majority as defined (e.g., two-thirds of the members, or 50% + 1), its representatives in parliament can form the government (the executive authority) independently. The party that lost the electoral race then becomes the opposition, formed by it or by the remaining small parties or independent members in parliament. In most cases, due to the similarity of parliamentary programs and platforms and people's desire for diversity, one of the two parties often wins a simple majority, compelling it to form alliances with smaller parties to secure a parliamentary majority. This, in turn, forces it to grant them some gains in the executive authority or local administrations. This game, played by political elites in Western societies, is repeated periodically every four or five years. It recurs similarly from one country to another: in Britain, the Conservatives and Labour compete; in France, the Gaullists (representing the center-right), the Socialists, and the Communist left-wing parties, and the National Front (representing the far-right); in America, the Republicans and Democrats; and in Spain, the Socialists and the capitalists (the right-wing People's Party). The same pattern is found in other countries like Germany, Canada, and Australia. Primary elections begin at the municipal level to select party candidates, followed by parliamentary elections.

The winning party then forms the executive authority, either alone or through a coalition. Meanwhile, the judicial authority consists of an independent institution whose senior members are appointed by the parliament or the head of the executive authority. In some countries, like America, people vote to elect the president separately from the parliament (Congress). They have another system that is not relevant to elaborate on here and does not affect this context, whether the system is a presidential constitutional republic as in France or Germany, or a constitutional monarchy as in Spain, Britain, Belgium, and others. This is because the monarch reigns but does not rule, serving more as a symbol of the nation than a figure of authority, with the prime minister heading the executive authority. However, the important point to which we draw attention is:

- The democratic process in the West is also relative and largely theatrical. Real policies are shaped by lobbying groups in parliament and parties. Often, Jews or members of Jewish organizations like the Freemasons, or members of extremist Christian organizations like the Trilateral Commission, and other pressure groups consisting of senior politicians, media figures, financiers, major capitalists, and sometimes crime mafias, influence electoral campaigns on public policies, while the election process itself remains largely a necessity. Bribes and money funding electoral campaigns play a significant role in buying loyalties and consciences and controlling the course of elections and promoting candidates. The system, in general, is capitalist, relying on a market economy or free economy, and society, in general, adopts a Christian identity on a broad base of atheism. Little remains of their Christianity except religious fanaticism, alcohol, pork, and some rituals and customs. The role of the Church has been marginalized to the extent that it has become more like a social institution or a cultural club, especially for young people. From time to time, the press exposes scandals of extortion and bribery, revealing the extent of the falsity of this system, which one of its leading politicians, the famous British Prime Minister Winston Churchill, described when he said: "Democracy is the worst form of Government except for all those other forms that have been tried from time to time."

Undoubtedly, when compared to dictatorial and fascist regimes, he is entitled to say what he said. However, the idea of "popular sovereignty" and national sovereignty is theoretical to the extreme. The reality is the sovereignty of capitalist political elites who control the destinies of peoples who have gained a great deal of freedom for frivolity and permissiveness and have enjoyed a luxurious consumer lifestyle compared to others, leaving their reins to those players who toy with their destiny, deceiving them in the name of democracy.

- Another important matter that has recently surfaced is the control larger states exert over the policies of smaller states, and their support for internal lobbies and parties favorable to their policies to succeed in elections and seize power. America, the leader of NATO, largely controls the policies of Western European countries, Australia, and Canada. This pressure and influence greatly increased in the post-September world and after the occupation of Iraq. Britain plays a significant role in influencing the European family in favor of American policy. Major European countries, led by France and Germany, also exert pressure and influence on the policies of EU member states and those wishing to join. The policies of Western European NATO members intersect with America in some areas and differ in others, casting their shadows on smaller European countries and their peoples, leaving clear imprints in distorting the reality of democracies. Examples of this are numerous, and detailing them would exceed the intended brevity of this period. When these internal or external lobbies wish to create a certain climate for elections, they spend money and focus media campaigns in the final days and hours on the largest electoral segment in Western societies: the "unaffiliated." This segment, in most samples, shows confusion about where to cast their votes until the last minutes. Media outlets and street interviews with people often reveal the great political illiteracy in these societies, which deceives the ignorant observer. During my emigration and residence in Western Europe for more than fourteen years—three years in France, three in Britain, and most of the remainder in Spain—I encountered many examples and living instances that prove the falsity of democratic claims in their own heartland. As I mentioned, space here is too limited to cite examples and evidence.

As for what occurs in the democracies of the Third World in Asia, Africa, and Latin America—regions newly independent and recently emerged from dictatorships—these are farces largely similar to some democratic models found in the Arab and Islāmic world. There is a difference, however, that places them lower on the scale of farce: the West has not stipulated that certain political factions, such as the Islamists in our countries, should not attain power. Instead, its influence, which can reach the level of blatant interference, extortion, and bribery, is confined to bringing its colonial protégés to power, ensuring the continued drain of the Third World's resources for the benefit of colonial powers under the guise of independence, freedom, democracy, and a free economy.

The lowest forms of democracy are those where distorted embryos have been cloned in Western intelligence study centers and by their colonial agents in our lands, to be applied to our subjugated peoples as an option that mocks their minds, already exhausted by the oppression of dictatorial regimes, despotic monarchies, and hereditary republics—the latest innovations of decrepit Arab regimes.

Before we briefly review democratic experiences in the Arab and Islāmic world, it is worth pausing on an important section concerning the concept of sovereignty and Ḥākimiyyah in Islāmic Sharī'ah and its complete contradiction with the concept of democracy and secularism. This will reveal the vast chasm between our true religion and democratic thought in its entirety, in addition to showing how the Arab and Islāmic model of democracy contradicts the very principles of democracy itself.

The Principle of Sovereignty and Ḥākimiyyah in the Islāmic Religion

In truth, it is not surprising that European peoples struggled, and that their philosophers and legal scholars racked their brains, to devise legislation that would bring them closer to truth and justice after their long suffering under monarchies, the papacy, the Church, and contemporary political tyrants, until they arrived at what they believe is the "worst form of Government except for all those other forms," as Churchill said. What is astonishing, however, is that within the Nation of Muḥammad—upon whom be peace and blessings, whom Allāh favored with the Seal of the Prophets and the final, most refined divine law, described by Him as perfect and complete in His saying:

{Today I have perfected for you your religion and completed My favor upon you and have approved for you Islām as religion} (Al-Mā'idah 5:3)—that some of its sons would exchange Allāh's favor for disbelief, lead their people to the abode of ruin, and go rummaging through the refuse of human thought to find constitutions and laws by which to govern Muslims, whom Allāh made {the best nation produced for mankind} (Āl ‘Imrān 3:110). Allāh has defined for them what sovereignty is and to whom it belongs, what Ḥākimiyyah is and to whom it belongs, what Lordship (Rubūbiyyah) and Divinity (Ulūhiyyah) are and to whom they belong, and what the right to legislate is and to whom it belongs—indeed, He has detailed everything.

Absolute sovereignty in Islām, simply and concisely, belongs to Allāh, Glorified and Exalted is He. Al-Bukhārī in Al-Adab al-Mufrad, as well as Aḥmad, Abū Dāwūd, and others, narrated—and more than one scholar authenticated—from Muṭarrif ibn ‘Abd Allāh ibn al-Shikhhīr, who said: "I went with a delegation from Banū ‘Āmir to the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him), and they said, 'You are our master (sayyidunā).' He replied, 'The Master (Al-Sayyid) is Allāh.' They said, 'And the most virtuous and greatest in speech among us.' He said, 'Then speak your words, but do not let Satan lead you astray.'"

Al-Ḥalīmī, in his explanation of "Al-Sayyid" as one of Allāh's most beautiful names, stated: "Al-Sayyid is the One Who is absolutely needed. The master of people is their head, to whom they refer, by whose command they act, from whose opinion they derive their views, and from whose speech they seek guidance. Since angels, humans, and jinn are creations of the Creator, Glorious is His praise, they cannot dispense with Him at the beginning of their existence—for if He had not brought them into existence, they would not exist—nor in their preservation after existence, nor in the contingencies that arise during their existence. It is His right, Glorious is His praise, to be the Master, and it is their right to call upon Him by this name."

Exegetes, when interpreting His blessed name, explain "Al-Sayyid" as: "He is the Master to Whom one turns in calamities and needs." This is what al-Qurṭubī favored, relying on linguists. Among the meanings of "Al-Sayyid" are: "He whose mastery has reached its peak in all types of honor and sovereignty," and "He Who is independent of everyone and Whom everyone needs." It is also said: "He Who does what He wills and decrees what He desires," and "He Who is perfect, without any defect."

Al-Qārī, in his commentary on this Ḥadīth in ʿAwn al-Maʿbūd, said: "The Master is Allāh, meaning He Who possesses the forelocks of creation, i.e., He Who takes charge of them, Glorified and Exalted is He. This does not negate their metaphorical mastery."

Thus, it does not negate the mastery of the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him), the master of the children of Adam. However, knowing this, the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) specified who the absolute Master is, saying: "The Master is Allāh." This is one of the most specific topics of creed for Muslims. This discussion is adapted from the lecture, "The Master is Allāh," from the audio publications of the Jihād Group in Egypt, 1989.

If we return to the characteristics of sovereignty established by Western legal scholars, we find that, in reality, they apply only to Allāh, the One, the Unique, the Master, the Self-Sufficient, according to the scales of Islāmic creed. Ascribing them to anyone other than Him is pure shirk with Allāh, nothing more and nothing less, whether ascribed to the people, the nation, a parliamentary majority, monarchs, or any human creature or other created being.

Therefore, I ask: Is it permissible for a Muslim to believe what is enshrined in the constitutions of most Arab and Islāmic countries, such as "The people are the source of sovereignty" and "The nation is the source of legislative, executive, and judicial authorities"?

The requirement of Allāh's religion is that whoever believes that the people, the nation, their parliamentary representatives, their monarchs, or their presidents possess any aspect of sovereignty, such that they legislate contrary to the guidance brought by Muḥammad (peace and blessings be upon him) from what Allāh Ta'ala legislated in His Book and the Sunnah of His Prophet, is a disbeliever (kāfir), an idolater (mushrik) who has cast off the yoke of Islām from his neck and joined the worshippers of idols and Ṭāghūt.

This holds true whether it is done in the name of the constitution, democracy, or any other call. This is the essence of the concept of sovereignty in Islām.

It belongs to Allāh. Whoever assigns it in its absolute sense to other than Him is a disbeliever. This is stated with all frankness and decisiveness, for the matter touches the core of creed and Tawhīd, and admits no ambiguity or equivocation.

I add: As for Ḥākimiyyah (governance/rule) in the Sharīʿah of Allāh, it belongs to Allāh alone. We have already presented in the chapter what suffices to avoid repetition here. The essence is: {Legislation is not but for Allāh. He has commanded that you worship not except Him. That is the right religion} (Yūsuf 12:40). Whoever believes that the people, the nation, their representatives, their parliaments, their monarchs, their presidents, or their judges have the right to judge in matters of blood, wealth, honor, and disputes according to what human devils and whimsical intellects have legislated, contrary to what Allāh has revealed—whether by preferring this judgment over what Allāh legislated, or by disdaining Allāh's Sharīʿah, or by believing it unfit for the modern age or contradictory to human rights and civilization, or by believing oneself to have a choice between ruling by Allāh's Sharīʿah or by other human legislations—such a person is a disbelieving (kāfir), transgressing (fāsiq), unjust (ẓālim) individual. The proofs for this have already been mentioned where we indicated. Once this is clear, we return to our topic.

Democracy in the Arab and Islāmic World

The vanguards of Western intellectual invasion reached the Islāmic world with the French campaign led by Napoleon to Egypt at the beginning of the nineteenth century. Printing presses spread, and the seeds of influence from Western intellectual doctrines began to disseminate among some intellectuals in the Arab world. Other colonial powers, especially Britain, also contributed to spreading these ideas as they went to colonize Muslims. Amidst the shock of fascination with Western civilization among Arabs and Muslims, even among some affiliated with religious scholars of that era, these ideas found some currency. Some religious scholars and reformers at that time also confronted them. However, with the collapse of the Ottoman Caliphate and the division of its legacy—the lands of the Arab and Islāmic world—among European powers, especially Britain and France, as we have discussed, the colonial powers governed Muslim lands with their own constitutions and legislations. By the end of the occupation period, the West had cultivated generations intellectually and psychologically indoctrinated, who had studied in its lands or in the universities it established and through the ideas it planted in our countries. Consequently, post-independence governments undertook the exclusion of governance by Islāmic Sharīʿah, basing their constitutions on European legislation and French or British law. Concepts of sovereignty, democracy, and their derivatives—such as national sovereignty, popular authority, the three branches of government, etc.—found their way into the constitutions and laws of Muslim countries. Islāmic Sharīʿah was sidelined, replaced by the laws of contemporary Romans, and this situation persists, as detailed in the first chapter. Little remains of the Sharīʿah in Muslim lands except for fragments of some personal status laws, such as marriage, divorce, and inheritance, albeit with distortions and abrogations that continue to afflict them to this day.

A few other countries, such as Saudi Arabia, Sudan, and Yemen, for example, have adopted a larger share of Islāmic Sharīʿah. However, much man-made legislation has found its way into many laws, regulations, and ordinances, such that it can be stated with simplicity and clarity that there is not a single state on the face of this earth today that rules by the Sharīʿah of Allāh as Allāh commanded, absolutely.

This is the truth, however harsh it may seem to some who are ignorant of it or wish for people to remain ignorant. This is an established fact that is easy to prove through a simple review of, for example, the Arab Constitutional Encyclopedia, which includes copies of the constitutions of Arab countries, or by reviewing any of the constitutions of other Islāmic countries. This is regarding legislation, codification, and the theoretical rules of governance.

As for application, just as in the West, the reality on the ground contradicts what is written in constitutions and laws, but in a manner commensurate with the extent of backwardness and the dominance of human dictatorships. In all Arab and Islāmic countries, constitutions have stipulated, contrary to the principle of separation of legislative, executive, and judicial powers, provisions that grant kings, presidents, and ruling emirs—who head the executive authority—a share of legislative power. This is done either explicitly, as in monarchical and emirate systems, such as in the Moroccan constitution ("The King has the right to issue laws"), or Jordan ("Legislative power is vested in the National Assembly and the King"), or Bahrain ("No law is issued unless approved by the National Council and assented to by the Emir"). Or it is done implicitly, as in dictatorial republics like Egypt, Syria, Tunisia, Algeria, Libya, and similar states, where constitutions stipulate that the president is the head of the executive authority and participates in or supervises the legislative authority. For example, Article 74 of the Egyptian constitution states: "If a danger threatens national unity or the safety of the homeland or impedes state institutions from performing their constitutional role, the President of the Republic may take swift measures to confront this danger, address the people, and conduct a referendum on the measures taken within 60 days of their adoption."

Furthermore, the constitutions in most Arab and Islāmic countries grant the president or king the right to dissolve parliament and suspend constitutional and parliamentary life, reopening it in the manner and at the time he pleases. This is not to mention military coups that suspend constitutions and subject many Arab and Muslim countries to emergency laws and martial law, as in Syria, where emergency law and martial law have been in effect for more than forty years, and similarly in Egypt, still in effect for 25 years!

As for the right of presidents and kings to legislate between parliamentary sessions, or the right to propose, amend, or reject legislation enacted by the legislative authority and refer it back to parliament for a new vote.

The farces of Arab and Muslim rulers are too numerous to count, even if volumes were dedicated to them. Among the quick examples that come to mind is the amendment of the Syrian constitution to lower the minimum age for the president from 40 years—as it had been since its inception—to the age of Bashar al-Assad when his father wanted to appoint him as successor, which was 36. The Syrian parliament's vote on this amendment took half an hour, and they approved it unanimously. Albright was in Damascus awaiting the result and arranging matters. After the death of Hafez al-Assad, the consolidation of power for Bashar, and the suppression of his opponents, even among the Nusayri aspirants to the throne, she told journalists as she was leaving: "America is satisfied with the transfer of power in Syria." Similarly, the Jordanian constitution was amended regarding the specifications of the crown prince to suit the current King Abdullah when his father appointed him as successor on his deathbed, sidelining his brother, Prince Hassan, Jordan's long-standing crown prince, also at America's behest.

If we were to investigate the security agencies—the de facto rulers in Arab and Islāmic countries—and their structures and three "authorities": (the authority of torture, the authority of execution, and the authority of mass graves), and their subsidiary institutions like anti-people apparatuses, demonstration suppression units, and detention institutions, not to mention their control over ministries supposedly independent of them, such as the ministry for distorting Allāh's Sharī'ah and religious affairs, and the ministry of information and propaganda for presidents and kings, then there would be other enthralling stories about the practical application of the constitutional and secular vision of the sovereignty of the oppressed people, the suppressed nation, and the "democracy of the kurbash (whip)"! I believe that the widespread news of these conditions, even through today's media, makes further examples of these tragicomic, heart-wrenching situations in those countries unnecessary.

It remains to be noted that most political oppositions in the ruling regimes of the Arab and Islāmic world are democratic in their methodology, secular in their beliefs, and "upright" in their perceptions according to Western concepts—until they assume power, only to revert to the original pattern. The defunct authorities or new oppositions then take on the role of demanding future integrity. As for the practical application of democracy and the election system in Arab and Islāmic countries—the lands of 99.99% approval in all referendums on constitutions, legislations, unity projects, second and third term projects, and projects for the succession of sons and crown princedom in "royal republics" as in Syria, with beginnings of this in Egypt, Yemen, and Libya—these are phenomena that require no discussion. I myself witnessed some municipal and parliamentary elections in Syria, Jordan, and Pakistan, and saw with my own eyes how men were bussed in from villages and poor urban neighborhoods, each carrying his personal ID card and the ID cards of some of his female relatives eligible to vote. They were transported to polling stations via intermediaries and brokers who paid, on behalf of the candidates and parties that organized these democratic spectacles, a price per vote equivalent to 10 US cents, plus a cup of tea! Some centers might even generously slaughter sheep and serve platters of rice and meat during election seasons. If the legal scholars of the French Revolution were to see this, they would demand the return of the sacred divine right of kings and would resume seeking to purchase ecclesiastical indulgences to atone for their sins of theorizing about democracy.

This is not to mention the armed clashes, assassinations, and violent incidents that accompany the democratic spirit in our Arab and Islāmic world, in addition to challenges, scandals of forgery, and fraud—for a nation that has suffered what the crow suffered when it tried to imitate the gait of the nightingale. It failed, and when it tried to return to its own gait, it had forgotten it. So it began to limp and hop, neither a crow nor resembling a nightingale, becoming a laughingstock for the birds. {And he whom Allāh humiliates - for him there is no bestower of honor} (Al-Ḥajj 22:18).

After this overview of democracy among its own people and among us—who, truth be told, are not its people—we come to our topic:

The Concept of Democracy among "Democratic Islamists" and the Experiences of the Awakening in Practicing Democracy and its Trajectory over the Last Quarter Century

It is useful to examine this phenomenon from two angles:

1. From the perspective of thought, methodology, and belief in democracy.
2. From the perspective of application and experiences.

First: Democratic Thought, Methodology, and Belief among Democratic Islamists

Through my interest in this phenomenon and my engagement in confronting it through writing and lectures since the early nineties to the present day—which necessitated following its experiences and the writings of its Islamist proponents—I can distinguish several types of Democratic Islamists. Regardless of the names of groups and individuals, a method I have adopted as much as possible in this book, contrary to my usual practice, for the primary purpose of this research, which is to rally ranks for the project of resistance, I found that the types of Democratic Islamists are as follows:

1. Democratic Islamists who believe—according to their statements and writings—that democracy does not contradict Islām. One of the leaders of this school went so far as to say, "Democracy is our merchandise returned to us." Another said, "Democracy is binding Shūrā (consultation)." A third, al-Naḥnāḥ of Algeria, who recently passed away, suggested that Islamists call their approach "Shūrācracy"! Al-Ghannūshī, one of the theorists of this school, expressed in a conversation during a dinner that brought me together with him personally in Madrid: "We have accepted democracy and ballot boxes as an arbiter between us as Islamists and our opponents from secular parties in Tunisia. If the people choose us, we will rule by Islām. We will allow disbelief (kufr) to have its parties and newspapers because Islām does not fear freedom. If the people choose secular parties, we will accept the rule of disbelief because Allāh Ta'ala said: {There shall be no compulsion in [acceptance of] the religion} (Al-Baqarah 2:256)." Our evening session was recorded on cassette! His book, "Political Liberties in Islām," is even more explicit than this, and he has many articles in this vein.

This doctrine has spread in most Islāmic countries, especially in Sudan, North Africa, and among the Islāmic Awakening in the diaspora in Europe, America, and the Western world through Islāmic centers and émigré Islāmic press.

2. Democratic Islamists who propose an "Islāmic conception" of democracy, saying they take from it and practice what does not conflict with the principles of Sharī'ah-based politics. They adopt a conciliatory, patchwork approach to produce "Islāmic-democratic" theories simultaneously. They believe it is possible to derive what they call "parliamentary jurisprudence" (fiqh barlamānī), which would constitute a theory for an Islāmic democracy with specific controls. These controls, in their view, would absolve them from the atheism, shirk, and major kufr inherent in Western political and constitutional theory of democracy. They see no harm in belonging to the legislative authority through democracy as an opposition, such that they only approve what the Sharīʿah permits (as is the view of some Islamist parliamentarians in Jordan). Among these, some see no harm in accepting ministries in the executive authority, citing, as they claim, the precedent of Joseph (peace be upon him) and his ministry under Pharaoh (as in Jordan, Kuwait, Pakistan, Turkey, and many other countries).

3. The third type explicitly states that democracy, in its fundamental concept, contradicts Islām, but that there is no Sharīʿah issue with practicing opposition in parliament. They do not permit themselves to go all the way by entering the executive authority, because that would bring them into the circle of ruling by other than what Allāh has revealed, according to the laws prevalent in most Muslim countries. They believe that Islāmic Sharīʿah permits practicing democracy within the limits of opposition and parliamentary representation, such that they approve what conforms to the Sharīʿah and disallow what does not. They would only move to exercise power if they were a majority and able to rule by the Sharīʿah. They are in parliament to establish the proof, convey the voice of truth, and achieve some legitimate interests for Muslims. This type is a minority today in the Awakening.
4. The fourth group explicitly declares that democracy is kufr in Allāh and that its principles are based on shirk with Him and atheism regarding His divinity, Glorified is He. They practice it within the limits of the states of weakness (istidʿāf) that the Awakening is experiencing. They would only enter parliament as a majority, whereupon their first actions would be to form a government that rules by Shari‘ah and to abolish democracy in its Western concept. Perhaps the clearest and most explicit example of this model is the Islamic Salvation Front (FIS) in Algeria, especially through the statements of its shaykh, ‘Alī Belḥadj—may Allāh grant him relief and a good outcome. This type of "democrat" is the least deviant and the rarest.

5. There is a final type that does not aspire to reach power and has no hope of it due to the circumstances of their country. They consider parliamentary participation a means of conveying the voice of truth to the people through this platform. They consider the authorities to be outside the Shari‘ah and democracy to be a non-Islāmic concept. They are with them in parliament to achieve whatever possible interests for Muslims, believing that nothing more is possible in such a state of weakness.

It is worth mentioning that the positions of "Democratic Islamists" vary regarding the concept of sovereignty, Ḥākimiyyah, constitutional principles and terminologies, and stances on the kufr or Islām of the ruler, as well as judgments on the system and its institutions. There is much ambiguity, vacillation, esotericism, media posturing, and private session talk. Positions on the issue fluctuate between one dialogue and another, one statement and another, depending on the atmosphere, circumstances, or personal courage. However, there is a reality worth mentioning: all Democratic Islamists, without exception, upon entering this field, affirm—either by conviction or by acquiescence to the situation—a set of things, to which the constitutional parliamentary system and election laws bind them. These include:

1. Recognition of the legitimacy of the regime and the legitimacy of the ruler, whether president, king, or emir.
2. Recognition of the country's existing constitution and swearing an oath on their honor and belief to preserve, respect, and work by it.

3. Recognition of the fundamental principles of the state and the existing system and the foundations of its formation, according to its specific situation.
4. Recognition of the principle of equality in political rights regarding candidacy, election, and voting within the council, regardless of religion, gender, belief, or any other consideration.
5. Recognition of the principle of power rotation and the right of all to compete and have parliamentary representation.
6. Recognition of the principle of commitment to majority decisions and their constitutional and legal enforceability, regardless of one's personal stance during the vote, and considering them binding on the nation once issued by majority.
7. Recognition and signing of the applicable election law in each case, in which the authorities always tailor the laws so that the results are as they desire.
8. Resorting to the constitution, official courts, and applicable laws in case of disputes or any issue between legislative, executive, and judicial authorities, or within the components of any of these authorities, with prior knowledge of the president's or king's right to dissolve parliament and suspend constitutional life for its sake, as in most cases. There are other conditions imposed on participants in the electoral process in some special cases in certain countries, such as prohibiting the formation of parties on a religious basis, as in most Arab and Islāmic countries like Egypt, or recognizing the secularism of the state as its foundation and structure, as in Turkey, for example, or recognizing the reality of direct occupation, as in cases like Palestine and Iraq today.

Second: The Practical Outcome of the Experiences of Democratic Islamists Throughout the Awakening's Trajectory

The parliamentary democratic experiences of Islamists prior to the last quarter-century are not of great significance. They were limited to a few countries where Islamists, shortly after independence, engaged in democratic activity in fledgling post-independence governments for a brief period. Matters had not yet crystallized, constitutions had not been detailed, and the experiences of these nascent governments had not matured enough to besiege Islamists and shackle them with complex election laws to paralyze their movement.

Perhaps the most important aspect of this file is the participation of the Muslim Brotherhood and some scholars and Islamists in elections and parliamentary councils in Egypt, Syria, and Pakistan in the late 1940s and during the 1950s. Soon, military coups in these countries swept away the experiment and turned the page on democracy, which only returned when the West decided to counter the Jihādī tide, or what it called "extremist Islām," with a democratic Islāmic tide, or what it called "moderate Islām," since the mid-1980s and throughout the 1990s.

During this period, experiences emerged that are worthy of contemplation and study to judge the process realistically after understanding its Sharīʿah ruling. We can draw a lesson that the ruling from its Sharīʿah perspective and from the perspective of the empirical experience of Islamists practicing democracy both lead to the same conclusion. This confirms the principle that the requirement of sound reason does not contradict the requirement of explicit textual evidence. Glory be to the All-Knowing, the All-Powerful, Who knows what He created, and He is the Subtle, the Aware.

Among the important experiences during this period in the Arab world are the experience of the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt, which practically initiated this path since the late Sadat era in the late seventies and early eighties; then the experience of the National Islāmic Front in Sudan in alliance with Nimeiry in the mid-eighties; then the experience of the Muslim Brotherhood in Jordan in the late eighties; as well as the experience of the Islāmic Tendency Movement in Tunisia, which transformed into the Ennahda Party in the same period; then the experience of the Islamic Salvation Front (FIS) in Algeria in the late eighties and early nineties; the experience of some Gulf states, notably Kuwait, in the early nineties; and the experience of the Muslim Brotherhood in Yemen in the early nineties. This is in addition to the important experiences of the Jamaat-e-Islami, Islamists, and groups of scholars in Pakistan since independence (1947) to the present day, as well as the significant experience of the National Salvation Party led by Erbakan in Turkey since the early sixties to the present day. In my current circumstances, I do not possess the documents, figures, dates, and specific facts for each of these experiences, though I had previously gathered a great deal. There is no room for detail in this research, naturally. I will suffice with mentioning generalities I know about these experiences, all of which lead to the same outcome, as we shall mention, Allāh willing. We will begin with the less significant experiences and conclude with the most important and clearest in their implications: the Algerian and Turkish experiences, as the best models of democracy and its application by Islamists in the Arab and Islāmic world, for they represent the ceiling of what Islamists have reached and dreamed of through this path.

From the Experience of the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt since the Sadat Era:

The Muslim Brotherhood entered parliament during Sadat's era. The most they achieved was 8 seats out of 52 opposition seats, while the remaining parliament seats, numbering over 460, belonged to Sadat's ruling party. They did not transcend the size of a crushed minority within an ineffective opposition minority. During Mubarak's era, their independent entry as a religious party was banned, so they entered through alliances with secular parties, adopting their identity—once with the Wafd Party and once with the Labour Party. A group of young Brotherhood members broke away and formed the "Wasat" (Center) Party, presented as a nonreligious party, and included some Christians and women. The state continued its oppression and set red lines, and the Brotherhood members moved between parliament and prisons, and they remain so to this day. They continued to make concessions and submit, even recently nominating a woman from the Brotherhood on their alliance lists in Alexandria. Their statements became increasingly deviant, but to no avail. Although the Brotherhood committed to all required recognitions, from the regime to the constitution to the election laws imposed by the government, it was all without any benefit or utility. The path of the Brotherhood remains as one of its leaders (may Allāh have mercy on him) expressed in his book titled "From Prison to Da'wah." Had he lived, he would have added "And from Da'wah to Prison," and published it under the imprint of "And So It Goes On," to complete the vicious circle.

From the Experience of the Muslim Brotherhood in Jordan:

The Muslim Brotherhood is an official, licensed party with declared offices in Amman and all Jordanian cities, operating legally and officially. The Brotherhood decided to enter elections and engage in the experiment since the late eighties. King Hussein's policy was to give them space whenever calamities befell him, until his death. The year 1990 was a peak crisis for him due to the Desert Storm war and his supportive stance towards Iraq, so he opened the field for them. The King announced that he had formed a committee of 65 "legislators and jurists" – his exact words – to write the "Jordanian National Charter," and that Jordan had overcome the pressures with which the Zionist enemy had prevented Jordan from practicing democracy.

The Brotherhood contested parliamentary elections and won a large parliamentary bloc. The Speaker of Parliament became a Muslim Brotherhood member (Abd al-Latif Arabiyat), who opened its first session by saying, "Your Majesty King Hussein the Great... You have proven that you are a genuine Hashemite, as you have always been a genuine Arab." The King formed a government including five ministers from the Muslim Brotherhood. I recall among them was the great Da'wah poet Professor Yusuf al-Azm as Minister of Social Affairs. Dr. Majid, son of Professor Abd al-Rahman Khalifa, the General Guide of the Muslim Brotherhood, took over the Ministry of Justice (i.e., the ministry of ruling by French and English law, other than what Allāh revealed!). The King's crisis passed, so he closed the field, and the Brotherhood returned to their usual size. They entered broad Islāmic alliances and formed, with other Islamists, the "Islāmic Action Front." Since then, the Front has continued its parliamentary attempts, the latest being the elections in mid-2003, where the state legislated a single-vote system per electoral district. The majority emerged as supporters of the King, and the Front secured only 15 seats. They challenged the legitimacy of the elections but remained in the challenged parliament.

During these experiences, a number of Sharī'ah doctors and Jordanian scholars wrote several books and research papers framing and theorizing contemporary parliamentary jurisprudence. Some permitted entering parliament (the legislative body) but forbade entering the executive because it involves ruling by other than what Allāh revealed. Others permitted entering the ministry because it is a job, but forbade parliament because it involves legislating apart from Allāh. A third group permitted both. A fourth group issued fatwas forbidding both, but adhered to the group's decision! The youth of the Awakening must be patient, for whoever endures patiently, Allāh will grant him patience! And religion is ease!

Experience of the Muslim Brotherhood and the Yemeni Congregation for Reform (Al-Islah) Party:

What I recall is that they contested the first elections held after unification in 1993, following major clashes and demonstrations demanding the inclusion of the phrase "Sharī'ah is the primary source of legislation" in the preamble of the secular constitution and man-made law. After more than a million armed men demonstrated protesting the constitution and marched to the presidential palace, a group of Brotherhood leaders and scholars, headed by Shaykh al-Zindani, sent the people back to their homes to prevent "fitnah" (sedition). Ali Abdullah Saleh's policy was to bring Islamists closer to break the power of the communist socialists coming from the South with unification. So, he opened the door for Islamists, and the Yemeni Congregation for Reform became the second most powerful party in the country. A system was established for ruling unified Yemen through a presidential council of 5 members, headed by Ali Abdullah Saleh, with the membership of the President of South Yemen (Ali Salem al-Beidh) and Shaykh Abd al-Majid al-Zindani.

Al-Islah's dominance led to the marginalization of Southerners in parliament. They began preparing for secession with support from Gulf Cooperation Council states and Saudi Arabia, which led to the war that resulted in the ousting of the socialists and North Yemen's control over the South, where the Brotherhood and Islamists generally played the primary role in the war effort. When President Saleh consolidated his power after the war and had achieved his objectives with them, policy shifted back to reducing the role of Islamists, and they returned to being a limited parliamentary bloc. In the 1996 elections, the General People's Congress party, headed by Ali Abdullah Saleh, won a sweeping majority of over 70%, and the size of Al-Islah significantly shrank. In the latest elections in 2003, the scenario was repeated.

In Tunisia:

The success of the Ennahda Party, winning over 86% of the seats in the preliminary elections in the late eighties, led to the dissolution of the party, the persecution of its leader Ghannouchi, and Zine El Abidine Ben Ali's return to a dictatorial regime with American support. Islamists were transformed into a hunted group in exile. And here is Zine El Abidine holding presidential elections in October 2004, in which he won, in a purely democratic fashion, with 95.96% of the vote. The people had become infatuated with him after two past terms, and now they adore him to death!

In Kuwait:

The Muslim Brotherhood, Salafists, and some independent Islamists contested the National Assembly elections and engaged in conflicts over issues of corruption and some internal matters. However, the Assembly's influence does not extend to sovereign matters of internal and external policies, which are confined to the Emiri will, subservient to the Americans. I recall that parliamentary life was suspended in Kuwait more than once, and parliament was dissolved. In the last electoral cycle in August 2003, Islamists from various factions, such as the Brotherhood and Salafists, obtained a majority in parliament. The experiment is under scrutiny in the post-September world and after the occupation of Iraq, proving what it has always proven.

In Pakistan:

The Jamaat-e-Islami has consistently played a complementary role in the struggle between the two major secular parties in Pakistan: the People's Party, formerly led by the profligate communist secularist Benazir Bhutto, and the Pakistan Muslim League, founded by Nawaz Sharif after the assassination of Zia-ul-Haq, who had suspended constitutional life. The two parties exchanged power several times, the last being Nawaz Sharif's rule, after which America orchestrated Pervez Musharraf's coup in 2000, suspending parliamentary life again. Musharraf then reinstated a form of parliamentary life, and Islamists from Sufi orders, Jamaat-e-Islami, some Deobandi scholars, some Shiites, and others gathered in the Muttahida Majlis-e-Amal (MMA). They secured the third largest bloc, as a faction of the Muslim League won the majority, followed by Bhutto's party, with the MMA coming in third. However, it won first place in the North-West Frontier Province (now Khyber Pakhtunkhwa), as Pakistan consists of four provinces federally linked to Islamabad, with provincial governments enjoying internal autonomy. The ebb and flow continues between the MMA on one hand and Musharraf on the other, for whom the government has tailored its policies. It soon fell into Musharraf's orbit and American policy, and the role of Islamists was limited to partial reforms in some simple Islāmic laws within the NWFP, and to protesting, demonstrating, and shouting in angry rallies against Musharraf's policies, which have turned Pakistan into a complete American colony. (Refer to the author's book: "Musharraf's Pakistan - The Problem, The Solution, and The Incumbent Duty").

However, the most profound lessons were in the Turkish and Algerian examples, which should have marked the end of democratic hopes among Islamists and a point for the leadership of the Islāmic Awakening to rethink the viability of the parliamentary path as a means to restore rule by what Allāh has revealed and to find solutions for the nation's participation. I experienced these two experiments closely, especially the Algerian one. Here is the summary:

The Democratic Experience of Islamists in Turkey:

The Turkish Islāmic Salvation Party, led by Professor Necmettin Erbakan, managed to win elections and reach the position of Deputy Prime Minister around 1969, as I recall. The expansion of Islamists led to a military coup that overthrew the democratic experiment in Turkey and returned the country to military rule. After some back and forth, politicians returned to power while acknowledging military dominance over public policies. However, the Salvation Party was banned, changed its name, and attempted again under the name "Welfare Party" (Refah Partisi). Over a decade of efforts, the Welfare Party managed to achieve a relative majority in the 1996 parliamentary elections, securing 21% of the total votes, while the largest secular party after it did not exceed 18%. This result caused a great uproar and was considered an alarm bell in the West. Erbakan formed a coalition government under his premiership, which lasted only one year. Despite yielding to all pressures and making terrible concessions during his tenure, such as signing a military cooperation agreement with Israel and other similar acts, this did not change the outcome. The secularists managed to orchestrate a political coup, fabricating charges against Erbakan and the Welfare Party, under which he was sentenced to removal from power, the Welfare Party was dissolved, and its top leaders, including Erbakan, were banned from political activity. The Islamists tried again, and remnants of the Welfare Party formed a new party called the "Virtue Party" (Fazilet Partisi), which contested elections a third time, became a minority, and then faced a ban and harassment for the third time.

Subsequently, Recep Tayyip Erdoğan, one of Erbakan's aides, formed the "Justice and Development Party" (AKP) on "Islāmic-secular" foundations, contested elections for a third time, and won a large majority in 2002 with 36% of parliamentary seats. He was able to form a government that still, morning and evening, proclaims its secularism and navigates the ebb and flow with American policies, which have entrenched their presence in the region. The Turkish "Islamosecular" government tries to reconcile its identity roots and the demands of the Islāmic street with external American pressures and internal threats from the military and secularists.

The Democratic Experience of Islamists in Algeria:

In 1989, Algerian President Chadli Bendjedid, after the famous "bread riots," announced a reform policy, one of its priorities being the freedom of parties and the abolition of the single-party policy. Islamists from various currents hastened to form what became known as the "Islamic Salvation Front" (FIS), which included almost the entire Islāmic spectrum. Meanwhile, two Muslim Brotherhood groups continued to operate independently: the "Muslim Brotherhood" group and the local "Islāmic Renaissance" (Nahda) group. The ruling party, the "National Liberation Front"

(FLN), had been the main force in the country since independence. During the municipal elections, the FIS swept the municipal councils with over 85% of the vote. Through its contact with the masses and its popular base exceeding 3.5 million voters, it was able to enter the parliamentary elections strongly in late 1990 and win a sweeping majority in the first round. This confirmed its overwhelming victory in the second round, scheduled for early 1991, thereby qualifying it to form an independent government. The two leaders of the Front, Abbassi Madani and Ali Belhadj, announced their intention to establish an Islāmic government ruling by Sharī'ah. The West in general, and France in particular, were alarmed, and French President Mitterrand threatened military intervention if necessary to prevent Islamists from coming to power. Hastily, the West arranged a military coup in early 1991 that crushed the FIS, imprisoned its leaders, and led tens of thousands of its supporters to desert detention camps. This triggered a widespread Jihād movement, the entry of many parties into the conflict, and the transformation of confrontations into violent acts and a bloody civil war that has claimed more than 150,000 lives to date.

Today, Western leaders in various statements articulate a single principle: "We want to implement democracy in the Arab and Islāmic world, but without Islamists or fundamentalists." After September, this evolved into: "Every Islamist is an extremist fundamentalist, and there are no moderates." The oppressive conditions intensified to the point of emptying the so-called democracy and constitutional parliamentary life of its substance in reality, yet some Islamists still see it as the only field to offer what can be offered.

(Refer to the author's books: "The Rome Symposium in the Shadow of the Vatican Cross" and "My Testimony on Jihād in Algeria 1989-1996").

Conclusion from the Practical Experiences of Islamists in Democracy:

1. Muslim peoples are experiencing a genuine Islāmic awakening, despite manifestations of corruption, decay, and types of immorality imposed or facilitated by authorities to erase religious landmarks from Muslims' lives. Experiences have proven that in any Arab or Islāmic country where Islamists contest genuine democratic elections, they will win the majority.
2. The West and its deputies among rulers in Arab and Muslim countries have proven their determination to place obstacles and red lines on the path of Islamist participation and prevent them from achieving effective blocs in the three authorities. It has also been proven that if these impediments do not succeed in curtailing the role of Islamists and marginalizing their presence, they are prepared to resort to political or military coups or conspiracies to prevent it. Thus, they prevented Islamists from reaching power in Algeria shortly before they did, overthrew them shortly after they reached it in Turkey, and succeeded in wasting their efforts in other experiments.
3. Most "Democratic Islamists" have proven their readiness to make one concession after another, without limits or controls, neither from Shari'ah nor from logic, nor from reasonable political dignity, in the face of the authorities' oppression and manipulations, in exchange for practicing what can be practiced of this "humiliating democratic farce."
4. Many Democratic Islamists have proven their willingness to be part of the authority by belonging to its legislative bodies and part of the ruling apparatus by accepting ministries, regardless of its contradiction with explicit religious tenets and its implications, for which no evidence can justify nor proof support.
5. Many "Democratic Islamists" have demonstrated their participation alongside their governments—of which they became a part, in its three branches or some of them—their readiness, under the slogan of "the interest of Da‘wah," to fight the Jihādī current and the elite resisting the rulers and their colonialist collaborators within the Ummah. Some have resorted to shameful examples that we refrain from mentioning here to maintain the methodology chosen for this book.

6. The truth of the matter is, as I had concluded and announced in my lecture titled "The Political Equation of the New World Order," delivered in Peshawar at the Al-Noor Center to a gathering of Arab mujāhidīn in the summer of 1990, Democratic Islamists have proven their readiness to be part of the forces of the New World Order and to follow in the wake of its plans, whether they were aware and intended it, or were ignorant and did not realize what they were doing due to their involvement in this dangerous democratic trap.

In conclusion here, it is fitting to present some Sharī‘ah-political insights on the subject of Islamists practicing democracy, which constitute the summary of our viewpoint on this matter:

Practicing Democracy by Islamists in the Balance of Islāmic Sharī‘ah-based Politics

In short, and based on the preceding, it can be said that "democracy," as a philosophy, intellectual belief system, and a system of governance with its details and laws, completely contradicts the creed of Islām. It clearly clashes with the essence of the creed of Tawhīd al-Ulūhiyyah (Oneness of Worship), as previously explained. This is because the creed of Islām assigns the right of legislation, permitting, prohibiting, allowing, and forbidding to Allāh, Glorified and Exalted is He. It assigns to Him alone the right of binding, enforceable judgment, obedience to which merits reward and disobedience to which incurs punishment in this world and the Hereafter. In contrast, democracy explicitly stipulates assigning this right to humans, making their judgments enforceable and obligatory by virtue of the will of the majority, which expresses the will of the people and the nation's exercise of absolute sovereignty, as we have shown. This holds whether it conforms to Allāh's Sharī'ah or opposes it. From this perspective, the principles of democracy are either kufr (disbelief) in Allāh or shirk (polytheism) with Him. This point is the basis of its prohibition and its clash with the religion of Islām, and it is from this point that all other aspects of its contradictions with the creed of Tawhīd have branched out.

As for the ways democracy contradicts the religion of Islām, they include:

First: Democracy grants every citizen freedom of belief and thought. One may believe whatever one wishes and disbelieve in whatever one wishes, and change one's beliefs and convictions according to personal desires and opinions.

This completely contradicts the concept of freedom in the Sharī'ah of Allāh. In the religion of Islām, a person is not free to disbelieve in Allāh and associate partners with Him. The ruling for a Muslim who apostatizes from Islām in the Sharī'ah of Allāh is execution, as narrated from the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) in the authentic Ḥadīth: "Whoever changes his religion, kill him." The Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) and his Rightly Guided Caliphs after him accepted from the Arabs nothing but Islām or the sword. Allāh Ta'ala commanded His Messenger and the believers to fight those who were given the Scripture until they give the jizyah willingly while they are humbled, and to give them the choice between three options: Islām, jizyah, or war. Allāh Ta'ala said:

{Fight those who do not believe in Allāh or in the Last Day and who do not consider unlawful what Allāh and His Messenger have made unlawful and who do not adopt the religion of truth from those who were given the Scripture - [fight] until they give the jizyah willingly while they are humbled} (Al-Tawbah 9:29).

And He said: {Say to those who remained behind of the bedouins, "You will be called to [fight] a people of great military might; you will fight them until they submit. Then if you obey, Allāh will give you a good reward; but if you turn away as you turned away before, He will punish you with a painful punishment"} (Al-Fatḥ 48:16).

This is not the place for elaboration, but evidence is abundant in the texts of the Qurʾān, Sunnah, Sīrah (Prophetic biography), and the history of early Islām.

Second: Democracy grants individuals the right to express whatever they wish, however they wish, whenever they wish, through all means of expression, including writing, speech, signs, press, and so on.

In contrast, Islāmic Sharīʿah regulates the right of expression with great precision and detail. A person is not permitted to openly declare kufr, nor is a Muslim or a dhimmī (non-Muslim under Muslim rule) allowed to openly attack the religion, its rituals, and its sanctities. The details are extremely numerous. In an Islāmic state, a Muslim who mocks the rituals of Islām apostatizes; he is either given a chance to repent or executed. Whoever insults the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) is executed without being asked to repent. If a dhimmī does so, his pact of protection is nullified, and he is executed. Islām does not permit, as some heretical preachers among the so-called "Islamists" claim under the pretext of political freedoms in Islām, for kufr to have its newspapers and advocates in an Islāmic state.

Libertines are not allowed to have newspapers promoting nudity and prostitution. Television stations and newspapers are not allowed to openly feature singing, music, licentiousness, intermingling of sexes, fashion shows, and so forth.

Freedom of expression is protected within the limits of Sharīʿah, what Allāh has permitted, and what He has forbidden, just like every small and large matter in an Islāmic state. The contradiction between what democracy permits and what Islām allows cannot be exhaustively detailed in these brief remarks, but it is clearer than to require further explanation here.

Third: Democracy, in its foundational principles, rests on the principle of "absolute equality" among human beings, regardless of race, gender, color, religion, knowledge, or other distinctions.

However, equality in the concept of Islām is based on preference in religion, then in piety (taqwā) and knowledge, and what Allāh has specifically granted men over women in terms of rights and duties, and other such factors.

Democracy equates people in the rights of candidacy for positions, voting on them, or on any legislation—between the disbeliever and the Muslim, the believer and the atheist, the righteous and the wicked, the moral and the immoral, the knowledgeable and the ignorant, men and women, the just and the morally corrupt, etc. But Islām has a different perspective. Allāh Ta'ala said:

*{Then will We treat the Muslims like the criminals? * What is [the matter] with you? How do you judge?}* (Al-Qalam 68:35-36).

And Allāh Ta'ala said: {Say, "Are those who know equal to those who do not know?" Only they will remember [who are] people of understanding} (Al-Zumar 39:9).

And Allāh Ta'ala said: {And the male is not like the female} (Āl 'Imrān 3:36).

And the Almighty said: {Men are in charge of women by [right of] what Allāh has given one over the other and what they spend [for maintenance] from their wealth. So righteous women are devoutly obedient, guarding in [the husband's] absence what Allāh would have them guard} (Al-Nisā' 4:34).

And it is narrated from him (peace and blessings be upon him) his saying: "Whoever changes his religion, kill him." And: "A people who entrust their affairs to a woman will never succeed."

The texts of the Sharīʿah do not permit leadership (imāmah)—any form of leadership over Muslims—for a disbeliever or an apostate, nor even initially for an unjust innovator among Muslims. Allāh Ta'ala said: {And [mention, O Muḥammad], when Abraham was tried by his Lord with commands and he fulfilled them. [Allāh] said, "Indeed, I will make you a leader for the people." [Abraham] said, "And of my descendants?" [Allāh] said, "My covenant does not include the wrongdoers"} (Al-Baqarah 2:124). His leadership is also nullified by consensus if kufr and apostasy occur to him, and by transgression and injustice according to its degree, with disagreement among scholars.

The Sharīʿah guarantees the dhimmī disbeliever his religious and personal rights, and that his blood, property, honor, and pact of protection are not violated, as long as he does not break it by aggression.

However, the Sharīʿah does not permit the employment of a disbeliever in any state affairs, nor does it allow him to be in a position where he has authority over a Muslim. Allāh Ta'ala said: {And never will Allāh grant to the disbelievers a way [to triumph] over the believers} (Al-Nisā' 4:141). Indeed, the Sharīʿah strips a Muslim who openly commits sins of his moral probity (ʿadālah) and even revokes his right to bear witness.

The administration of the state in Islām belongs to the "people who loosen and bind" (ahl al-ḥall wa al-ʿaqd) from among the Muslim leaders, scholars, and emirs who are believers. A disbeliever has no right in it, nor does a Muslim who openly commits acts of immorality. It is narrated from him (peace and blessings be upon him) his saying: "Let those of you who are mature and possess understanding be near me." Responsibilities are not even for common Muslims, let alone for the immoral and unjust among them, much less for disbelievers.

When ‘Umar (may Allāh be pleased with him) saw people from tribes and Bedouins gathered at the door of the Saqīfah of Banī Sā‘idah, while the leading Companions from the Muhājirūn and Anṣār were meeting to discuss the succession to the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him), he went out to them (may Allāh be pleased with him) and asked them why they had gathered and what had brought them. They replied that they had come to participate in the matter, the matter of leadership after him (peace and blessings be upon him). He told them: "Let the craftsman return to his craft and the worker to his work. The matter belongs to the Muhājirūn and Anṣār from the people of Madinah, and the people after that are their followers."

This is one aspect of the contradiction between Islām and democracy regarding equality.

Fourth: Democracy grants members of parliament an additional right of immunity in expressing their views and opinions, and exempts them from prosecution or legal action based on the opinions they state.

Most constitutions of democratic states, and even the barbaric dictatorial ones that claim democracy in Muslim lands, stipulate this.

Hence, every atheist, secularist, Crusader, and heretic, as long as he is a member of parliament, has the right to say whatever he wants, call for legislation of whatever he wants, deny whatever he wants, call for the sanctity of whatever he wants, and permit or prohibit according to his opinion. This clearly involves denial of the Sharī‘ah and mockery of it, directly or indirectly, and calling for the prohibition of what Allāh has permitted and the permission of what Allāh has forbidden, not to mention ridiculing religious rituals and sanctities, and so on.

So how can a Muslim member of parliament sit in these councils when Allāh Ta‘ala says: {And it has already come down to you in the Book that when you hear the verses of Allāh [recited], they are denied [by them] and ridiculed; so do not sit with them until they enter into another conversation. Indeed, you would then be like them. Indeed, Allāh will gather the hypocrites and disbelievers in Hell all together} (Al-Nisā' 4:140). There is no god but Allāh. And glory be to Him Who encompasses knowledge of the first and the last, and what was and what will be.

Fifth: The principles of democracy and the constitutional jurisprudence stemming from them stipulate that legislation derives its legitimacy from the existence of a supporting majority and an opposing minority. They stipulate that no law is constitutional without the right of opposition.

From here, legislation derives its democratic value. If the right of opposition were denied, it would become dictatorial and imposed legislation, unworthy of its constitutional status because the nation (the "sovereign and majestic" entity according to this philosophy) and its members would not have fully exercised their right to opposition. Accordingly, legislation emerges from support and opposition. This means that those who supported it participated in the legislation with their support, and those who opposed it participated with their opposition. When the majority of supporters overcame the minority of opposers, the legislation proceeded to approval and derived its legitimacy from the existence of an opposing minority.

Thus, the opposer is a partner with the supporter in making the legislation. This is what the deceased Speaker of the Egyptian Parliament, Rifaat el-Mahgoub, said to a representative of the Muslim Brotherhood in the Egyptian Parliament when the latter shouted his opposition to a piece of legislation, stating that he and his party had no connection to that legislation which violated the Sharī'ah of Allāh. The Speaker slapped him down with this rule and made him understand that he was a partner in the legislation through his opposition. May Allāh have mercy on the one who knew the language with which el-Mahgoub should be addressed, and thus took his head and deprived him of life, as he dared to obscure the judgment of Allāh Ta'ala. The mujāhidīn in Egypt killed him. Let the Islamists consider their role in approving what contradicts the Sharī'ah of Allāh despite their opposition to it.

Sixth: This point is one of the greatest manifestations of the prohibition of participating in democratic institutions, foremost among them parliament.

Democracy stipulates the commitment of all members in democratic institutions, especially parliament, to the principle of freedom to support or oppose any legislation, law, or decision put to a vote. However...

Place as many red lines as you wish under this "however":

Everyone agrees in advance to the principle of the constitutionality or legitimacy of any decision and its attainment of legislative sanctity once voted upon by the majority, and its binding nature on the nation as permissible, correct, and obligatory to implement for all members of the nation, starting from the head of state (theoretically) down to the smallest individual in the nation (practically), including the parliament members themselves, whether they supported or opposed it.

If a bill were proposed to legalize usury (ribā) or any explicit prohibition, or forbidden or treacherous policies, for example—and this example has been repeated many times in all parliaments of Arab and Islāmic countries—the "Democratic Islamists" would, of course, take a stance of opposition. Yet, all such legislations, forbidden by Sharī'ah, would win by majority vote due to the secular majority, as is always the case so far. Here, the legislation acquires its constitutional status from the supporting majority and the opposing minority, as we mentioned. The "Islamists" would have conceded, as they had previously agreed by the rules of the democratic game, to the nation being bound by this legislation, to accepting it, committing to it, and working to implement it in the nation and rule by it, contrary to what Allāh has revealed.

From where did those who call themselves "Islamists" permit this? To make the matter clearer, let us take a "heinous" example to achieve understanding through shock!

Suppose a group of men gathered to vote—democratically—on whether each one should commit adultery with the wife of another, and to make that a legislation permitting or obliging the nation to do so! And among them were "good" and "wicked" men. They agreed on freedom of voting, choice, and expression, but with the condition that everyone commits to the act if the vote results in a majority, and refrains if the opposers prevail.

What is the ruling on an honorable man joining such a session, knowing in advance that the majority of attendees are "pimps" (dayyūth)?! Is it sufficient for him to say: "I believe that the interest of Da‘wah and contributing to enacting legislation for building mosques and enjoining good from this council requires me to witness the vote on this decision!"?

Can one who accepts such a thing, commits to lending his "wife," legitimizing this abomination, and obliging Muslims to it so that promiscuity spreads among those who believe, according to the majority opinion—while retaining the "honor" of the right to refuse during the vote—can such a person be called anything but a pimp, indeed, the turbaned grand pimp?!

I hope the reader will not find the example strange! Is the atrocity of usurping the right of legislation from Allāh, Glorified is He, or the tens, indeed hundreds, of legislations and thousands of laws and decisions issued through parliament, permitting what Allāh has forbidden and forbidding what Allāh has permitted, and approving vile policies and treacherous internal and external decisions, any less atrocious to one of them than the atrocity of offering his honor on the table of voting for a majority of pimps?! Does the religion of Allāh and the honor of the Ummah not have a sanctity deserving of zealous protection?

Everyone has sworn by their honor and beliefs, and perhaps on the Qur'ān, when they ran for office and when they won membership in parliament or government, to respect the constitution, these majority laws, and their implementation.

I believe the matter is clear, indeed, abundantly clear. But it is as Allāh Ta'ala said: {For indeed, it is not eyes that are blinded, but blinded are the hearts which are within the breasts} (Al-Ḥajj 22:46).

By Allāh, I swear—without breaking my oath, Allāh willing—that the vast majority of these scholars and jurists of the Democratic Islamists know this truth that I have stated. They are the ones who taught it to us when we joined their Islāmic awakening two and a half decades ago, but today they violate it out of caprice. As Allāh Ta'ala said: {And they rejected them, while their [inner] selves were convinced thereof, out of injustice and haughtiness. So see how was the end of the corrupters} (Al-Naml 27:14).

Seventh: This is its conclusion... and its end is foul (lit. "tar")!

Parliamentary democracy, the principles of national sovereignty, popular rule, and the constitutional institution with its three "authorities"—legislative, executive, and judicial—stipulate:

Resorting to the constitution, and to the judicial authority and its institutions, including various courts, headed by the Supreme Constitutional Court, in case of disagreement among members of a single authority or multiple authorities.

This is for resolving disputes, conflicts, and challenges submitted by representatives among themselves, or between parliament and ministries, or between any level and another at the level of citizens and institutions.

It is clear and known that all constitutions are man-made and laws are secular, not religious. The adjudication between Islamists and authorities in case of disagreement will be to the constitution and to those laws tailored by enemies and adversaries, through the courts of the authorities themselves and according to their laws! No description fits this situation better than the very famous saying of al-Mutanabbī:

"O most just of people, except in your dealings with me... In you lies the dispute, and you are both the adversary and the judge."

It is not enough that they have resorted to Ṭāghūt (false objects of worship/non-Islāmic law)! And to other than what Allāh has revealed! To complete the calamity, it is a trial against the adversary and before him! Before his judiciary, his constitution, and his courts... then expecting justice to be upheld and, as they dream, to achieve the rule of Sharīʿah through these accumulated impurities that nauseate anyone with the slightest sound nature.

From here, it becomes clear to the fair-minded researcher the lack of legitimacy or logic in the terms:

"Islāmic democracy" or "Democratic Islamists."

Democracy is a complete, independent creed. Throughout ancient and modern times, it has acquired its constitutional and legal details in all aspects of political, social, cultural, religious, and other spheres of life. It is undoubtedly a "contemporary religion and way of life" that includes far clearer and more comprehensive details and pillars than the "Christian religion," let alone other pagan religions and others.

Its adherents in the world today outnumber those of any other religion. So, their saying:

"Islāmic democracy" is, logically, like saying "Islāmic Christianity," "Islāmic Judaism," or "Islāmic Buddhism" as a term.

As for using the term "Democratic Islamists," it is meaningless speech, its beginning contradicting its end, and its end contradicting its beginning. In terms of semantic logic and contradiction, it is no different from saying "Christian Islamists" or any other such impossible conflation, neither logically nor according to Sharī'ah.

Indeed, the term "Democratic Islamists," if we understand its meaning according to the denotation and content of each word, means "Muslim polytheists (mushrikīn)." This is because one who claims this attribute belongs to Islām by the testimony that there is no god but Allāh and Muḥammad is the Messenger of Allāh, then commits shirk and belongs, according to the denotation of the second part of the term, to those who associate humans with Allāh in the right of legislation, permitting, and prohibiting, according to the details we have discussed.

Because the requirement of democracy, according to its essence, is to usurp the right of sovereignty and legislation from Allāh—Glorified is He above the denial of the deniers—and give it to humans or associate them with Him in this divine right.

Thus, the adherents of this "democratic" creed have become worshippers of human ṭāghūts and have made people worship them, willingly or unwillingly.

There is a very important observation:

Indeed, some of the sayings and actions of Democratic Islamists are, with certainty, sayings of kufr and actions of kufr. As for applying the specific ruling of kufr (takfīr) to individuals who commit them, this has established controls among Ahl al-Sunnah wa al-Jamā'ah, such as establishing the proof (iqāmat al-ḥujjah), absence of ignorance (intifā' al-jahl), fulfillment of conditions (taḥaqquq al-shurūṭ), and absence of impediments (intifā' al-mawānī').

This judgment is to be made by those qualified in jurisprudence, not by laypeople, even if they are mujāhidīn or Islamic callers (du‘āt), let alone the ignorant and those who delve into matters without knowledge.

This general Sharī‘ah ruling does not imply that every individual "Islamic democrat" is an apostate in actuality.

This is the truth according to Sharī‘ah and logic, based on the implications of the religion of Islām and the true nature of democracy, however distressing this truth and frankness may seem, and however much it clashes with human desires and what people have come to sanctify today.

Perhaps the word "democracy" is one of the most circulated political terms today in the media, among political terminologies, at all discussion tables, and one of the most sanctified and respected words and principles.

There are many pretexts, numerous specious arguments, and responses raised by those who call themselves "moderate Islamists" or "democrats." I do not wish to elaborate on investigating and refuting them here.

However, the two most significant arguments are: one they use as a pretext for joining parliament, the legislative authority which vies with Allāh, the Lord of Glory, Most High, in the right to legislate. The other they use as proof for joining the executive authority and accepting ministries and official positions, thereby affiliating themselves with the ruling entity that governs by other than what Allāh has revealed.

As for the first argument:

They use Allāh Almighty's words, {and consult them in the matter} (Āl ‘Imrān: 159), and His words, {and whose affair is [determined by] consultation among themselves} (Al-Shūrā: 38), and the Sunnah of the Messenger of Allāh (peace be upon him) regarding the practice of consultation (shūrā), as evidence for the permissibility of parliament including all sorts of people: Muslims, secularists, atheists, believers, men, women, the ignorant, scholars, the upright, and the fallen. They propose this diverse group to be a consultative body for the ruler, or even a legislative body by majority. The refutation of this ridiculous specious argument is too obvious to require laborious explanation.

Allāh bless the erudite Ḥadīth scholar Aḥmad Shākir, who, in his book ‘Umdat al-Tafāsīr, explained some matters related to Allāh Almighty's saying: {and whose affair is [determined by] consultation among themselves} (Al-Shūrā: 38), and His saying: {and consult them in the matter} (Āl ‘Imrān: 159).

I will present what I find relevant from his explanation as evidence here, clarifying it as follows:

He stated that the misguided and ignorant of this age have made a mockery of these two verses to justify their misguidance, considering them proof for the participation of every righteous and wicked person, disbeliever, and heretic in the process of consultation and the right to authority under the pretext of democracy. He (may Allāh have mercy on him) clarified that the two verses are explicit, with the pronouns in "their affair" and "among them" referring to the believing Muslims who enjoin good and forbid evil. This is further elucidated by the Prophet's (peace be upon him) saying: "Let those of you who are mature and wise be near me." This means those possessing religion, character, intellect, and sound, preponderant opinion from among the prominent people. It absolutely does not include disobedient and corrupt Muslims, let alone disbelievers, atheists, and heretics such as secularists and communists. It does not even include women, not even believing women who are commanded by Allāh with dignity, elevation, chastity, and seclusion from men's gatherings, let alone female atheists who are mannish heretics.

As for the dhimīs (non-Muslim subjects under covenant) among the disbelievers, they are subjects attending to their own affairs under state supervision, deserving of justice due to their covenant, and of humility and abasement due to their disbelief. As for apostate Muslims, their place, as the Shaykh (may Allāh have mercy on him) said, is under the whip or the sword: either to be disciplined with the whip so their minds may be cured of the instigations of human and jinn devils, or to be killed to rid humanity of their evils and filth. Their place is not in consultation regarding the interests of Muslims.

This, which the Shaykh explained and I have further elaborated for those whose understanding is deficient, is from the self-evident truths of Islām and the Sharīʿah of the Most Merciful. Yet in this wretched era, which could be characterized by figures like Bush, Rumsfeld, Condoleezza Rice on one side, and certain contemporary religious figures like al-ʿUbaykān and al-Sudays on another, it has become a strange assertion.

Furthermore, consultation applies to matters of thought and independent reasoning (ijtihād), not to what is established by the texts of Sharīʿah and its rulings. The latter require submission and the declaration, "We hear and we obey." As for the heresy that circulates in the halls of parliaments in Muslim lands, it is not consultation but disbelief in Allāh and associating partners with Him (shirk). These are sessions that a Muslim is obligated to shun, declare their participants disbelievers, and oppose them. {So whoever disbelieves in tāghūt (false deities) and believes in Allāh has grasped the most trustworthy handhold} (Al-Baqarah: 256).

As for the second argument:

It is their claim that it is permissible to accept ministries and positions in the governments of pharaohs and tyrants, citing the example of our master and Prophet Yūsuf (Joseph, peace be upon him) who requested and accepted a ministry from the Pharaoh when he said to him: {Appoint me over the storehouses of the land; indeed, I will be a knowing guardian} (Yūsuf: 55). Unfortunately, our Shaykh Saʿīd Ḥawwá (may Allāh forgive him) was among the first to propagate this fabrication in his book Durūs fī al-ʿAmal al-Islāmī (Lessons in Islamic Work) in the early eighties. Then, the beads of the rosary scattered one after another. This claim is false for many reasons, and the clearest proofs of its invalidity become apparent if souls were free from desires and from the professional exploitation of Qurʾānic texts out of context. This is evident in several ways:

First, we ask these "Islamist ministers" in the governments of Arab and Islamic countries today: Do you concede that your rulers are pharaohs, disbelievers, apostates? Because your proof and claim are based on the permissibility of accepting a ministry in the government of a disbelieving pharaonic ruler. If they say no, and that their rulers are Muslims, then there is no need to cite this argument, because accepting a ministry under a Muslim ruler is permissible in principle, although distancing oneself from the wicked and oppressive among them is what is commanded by Shariʿah.

And if they say yes, then we demand that they announce this, declare the aspects of their rulers' disbelief and apostasy, then disavow it. Then they should explain their perspective on the benefit (maṣlaḥah) of working for them and the proofs for its permissibility thereafter. Let them declare, as our Prophet Yūsuf (peace be upon him) declared, that our rulers are disbelieving pharaohs. Yūsuf said: {O [my] two companions of prison, are separate lords better or Allāh, the One, the Prevailing? You worship not besides Him except [mere] names you have named them, you and your fathers, for which Allāh has sent down no authority. Legislation is not but for Allāh. He has commanded that you worship not except Him. That is the correct religion, but most of the people do not know} (Yūsuf: 39-40). So where is the statement of Yūsuf (peace be upon him) and his declaration of the foundation and basis of Tawḥīd, compared to the croaking of Islamist democrats praising pharaohs, patting them on the back, and describing them as "His Majesty the King," "His Highness the revered Emir," "His Excellency the President," and "Their Excellencies the esteemed Ministers," while obscuring their true conditions and the conditions of their disbelieving constitutions and resorting to them for judgment?

Second, if they say yes and acknowledge the disbelief of their rulers and that they are apostate pharaohs, we move to refute this argument of theirs in several ways:

1. Even if it were permissible for our master Yūsuf to do this, it would be from the laws of those before us (shar‘ man qablanā), which are not considered law for us if our Sharī‘ah has abrogated them. And our Sharī‘ah abrogates this. Allāh Almighty says: {And whoever does not judge by what Allāh has revealed - then it is those who are the disbelievers} (Al-Mā'idah: 44), in a general sense, "whoever" meaning everyone. And His saying: {Let not believers take disbelievers as allies rather than believers. And whoever does that has nothing [to do] with Allāh} (Āl 'Imrān: 28). And His saying: {And whoever is an ally to them among you - then indeed, he is [one] of them. Indeed, Allāh guides not the wrongdoing people} (Al-Mā'idah: 51). Our scholars of exegesis (mufasssirūn) have explained that one who does this is a disbeliever, an idolater, counted among the disbelievers by the explicit wording that judges him to be one of them.
2. Assuming its permissibility under its conditions and correct analogical reasoning, let us look at the details of our master Yūsuf's (peace be upon him) acceptance of that alleged ministry under Pharaoh in the books of historical reports and the sayings of the Salaf (early Muslims) among the exegetes:

Some of the Salaf reported that the Pharaoh of Egypt during the time of Yūsuf (peace be upon him) believed in the call of Prophet Yūsuf to Tawhīd when he spoke to him.

This was narrated from Mujāhid in Tafsīr al-Ṭabarī (vol. 8, p. 11): "Mujāhid said: The king who was with Yūsuf converted to Islām." Ibn Kathīr also narrated this from Mujāhid (see Ibn Kathīr's exegesis of verse 56 of Sūrat Yūsuf).

Allāh, Glorified and Exalted, explicitly mentioned that the king said to Yūsuf: {And the king said, "Bring him to me; I will appoint him exclusively for myself." And when he spoke to him, he said, "Indeed, you are today within our presence established and trustworthy"} (Yūsuf: 54). Allāh described his situation saying: {And thus We established Yūsuf in the land to settle therein wherever he willed. We touch with Our mercy whom We will, and We do not allow to be lost the reward of those who do good} (Yūsuf: 56). The Qurʾān indicated that Yūsuf was able to apply the law of Allāh in Egypt when he ruled to take his brother, as Allāh Almighty said: {Thus did We plan for Yūsuf. He could not have taken his brother under the king's law} (Yūsuf: 76). This means, according to the king's law and system. But Yūsuf applied the Sharīʿah of his religion and the religion of his fathers Yaʿqūb (Jacob), Ishāq (Isaac), and Ibrāhīm (Abraham) (peace be upon them), which is the religion of Tawhīd.

So where, then, is the analogy between the pharaonic rulers of Muslim lands, under whom these pretentious callers and scholars of the sultans serve as ministers, and the king of Egypt who either converted to Islām, as indicated by the apparent meaning of the texts and narrations from some of the Salaf, or empowered Yūsuf and handed him the reins of governance, so that he became established and trustworthy, settling in the land wherever he willed? Is this the situation of the callers who shuttle between parliament and prisons? The tyrant leaves them alone at times and removes them at others, imprisons them at times and allows them to run for office at others! They occupy prisons as the tyrant wills, whenever he wills, not like Yūsuf (peace be upon him) who settled in the land wherever he willed. Has any of these callers assumed a ministry or position of authority with the kind of empowerment in the land that Yūsuf had, so as to make his action (peace be upon him) a precedent for them?

These are the most important arguments of these deviant callers and scholars of ours, unfortunately, and their invalidity has become clear.

As for other protests and claims, among them is their argument based on the rule of the Negus of Abyssinia without the ability to govern by the Sharīʿah of Allāh. And their claim that when they swear by Allāh to respect disbelieving constitutions and laws, they secretly intend to exclude falsehood and swear only to what is true! And that they did not enter with the intention of legislating but with the intention of reform! And others; all of them are flimsy pretexts that do not stand before Sharīʿah evidence, logical interpretation, or the meanings of the Arabic language, nor even the language of Honolulu!

Space does not permit a detailed refutation of these absurdities, nor is this the place for it. I believe that what we have presented in this brief research—clarifying the reality of democracy and the essence of its principles; the reality of its application by its proponents and their contradiction with its own principles; then the reality and forms of its laughable applications in the Third World, including the Islamic and Arab world in our lands; clarifying the reality of the concept of sovereignty in democracy and secularism and its contradiction with the principles of Ḥākimiyyah (Allāh's sovereignty) in Islamic Sharīʿah; conveying some examples of the results of Islamists' experiments with democracy; and what we concluded with regarding the clash between the reality of democracy and the essence of Islām, and the reasons for the prohibition of its practice—all this is sufficient to clarify the matter. I draw attention to two important points and reiterate:

First: My belief and statement that the meaning of the term "Islamic democrats" implies "Muslim polytheists" based on the denotation of each word in the term, does not mean that I believe in the apostasy of every Islamist who claims this path and methodology and practices democracy. As for the term itself, this is its denotation according to its content, and it is not for our opinion to add or subtract from the meanings of words. As for the belief in democracy, that is another matter. As for its practice, that is a third matter. And as for the specific judgment on individuals who adhere to it, that is a fourth matter.

I hold the belief of those I knew from our Salaf, our shaykhs, and our leaders in the fundamentalist Islamic Awakening and the blessed Jihādī current: that believing in the content of democratic principles, accepting them, and prioritizing them over the Islamic system, or believing that they do not clash with Islām, or that democracy is shura and does not contradict it, and openly granting the right of sovereignty to the nation, legislation to the people, and rule to the majority regardless of its decisions—as detailed previously—constitutes an act of a disbeliever, a polytheist, an apostate. Even if he claims to be a Muslim and performs some rituals, his belief and faith in democracy have nullified the most basic realities and requirements of his testimony that there is no god but Allāh and Muḥammad is the Messenger of Allāh (peace be upon him). Then, the absence of impediments to declaring specific individuals as such is considered.

As for those who practice democracy, they are of various types and forms, and consequently, the rulings concerning them differ. However, in general, I follow the school of thought that believes that one who holds democracy to be disbelief and its philosophical content and legislations to be contradictory to the creed of Islām and the religion of Tawhīd, yet practices it out of an interpretation based on a state of weakness (istid‘āf), believing it to be the only available means to achieve hoped-for benefits for the da‘wah (call to Islām), Islām, and Muslims; or that it is the possible way to reach the implementation of Sharī‘ah in such circumstances, and then to nullify what contradicts it; or that it is the possible way to proclaim the truth, enjoin good and forbid evil, and convey the voice of truth to the Ummah—then the sincere among these are excused by interpretation for practicing democracy and entering its institutions. Although I believe they are mistaken and sinful. And Allāh Almighty knows best.

If I were to list the names of scholars who hold this opinion, it would take too long. They are prominent figures, shaykhs, leaders, and scholars of the Islamic Awakening in this era. Among them, to mention a few and not exclusively, are: the majority of contemporary exegetes such as Shaykh Amīn al-Shinqīṭī, Shaykh Aḥmad Shākir, al-Qāsimī, and al-Ālūsī. Among the scholars: all the scholars of the Da‘wah in Najd and Ḥijāz, starting from Shaykh Muḥammad ibn ‘Abd al-Wahhāb to the later ones – even the scholars of the Sultan among them – they are all alike in this matter. Likewise, contemporary scholars and callers of the Awakening in the Land of the Two Holy Sanctuaries, such as Shaykh al-Ṭurayrī, Shaykh Safar al-Ḥawālī, who explained this in his famous book Al-‘Almāniyyah (Secularism), as well as Shaykh Salmān al-‘Awdah (may Allāh grant him provision) in his books and tapes, Shaykh Muḥammad Sa‘īd al-Qaḥṭānī, and their peers like Nāṣir al-‘Umar, al-Duwaysh, and al-Tuwayjirī. From Jordan, Shaykh Muḥammad Na‘īm Yāsīn, and others. Similarly, all the scholars of the Muslim Brotherhood before their period of deviation: such as the martyr ‘Abd al-Qādir ‘Awdah from Egypt; Shaykh Sa‘īd Ḥawwá, Shaykh ‘Abd al-Fattāḥ Abū Ghuddah, and Shaykh ‘Abdullāh ‘Alwān (may Allāh have mercy on them) from Syria; Dr. Muḥammad ‘Ādil Abū Fāris, Dr. Aḥmad Nawfal, and Shaykh Muḥammad Na‘īm Yāsīn from Jordan; Professor Muḥammad Aḥmad al-Rāshid and others from Iraq; Professor Fathī Yakan from Lebanon; Shaykh al-Zindānī and the Muslim Brotherhood scholars in Yemen; Shaykh ‘Alī Belhadj from Algeria; and all Salafī scholars and callers in the Arab and Islamic world. From the scholars and callers of the Jihādī current: the martyr Sayyid Quṭb, the martyr ‘Abdullāh ‘Azzām. Also, the scholars and callers of al-Jamā‘ah al-Islāmiyyah in Egypt – before they unraveled their spun thread – headed by Dr. ‘Umar ‘Abd al-Raḥmān and Shaykh Rifā‘ī Ṭāhā; as well as Jamā‘at al-Jihād in Egypt and their esteemed Shaykh ‘Abd al-Qādir ibn ‘Abd al-‘Azīz, who was captured by Yemen, betrayed, and handed over to Egypt in March 2004. Dr. Shaykh Mujāhid Ayman al-Ẓawāhirī. From Syria, the martyr Marwān Ḥadīd and his students, and other scholars and callers. From Jordan, Shaykh Abū Muḥammad al-Maqdisī. The books and publications of the Jihādī current, with all its organizations and groups, are replete with this belief.

This is what comes to my mind, and the list of those who believe that democracy is disbelief and that its adherents are disbelievers by conviction is long.

Engaging in that is an act of disbelief, and the state of the perpetrator and their share of one of the four legally recognized excuses according to Ahl al-Sunnah wa al-Jamā‘ah are considered: ignorance, coercion, interpretation, and lack of intent. Perhaps these individuals have a share in being excused by interpretation or ignorance for what they have engaged in, which would save them from the consequence of falling into disbelief.

I believe that by this path, they are not in the position of the mujtahid (one who exerts independent reasoning) who is rewarded twice if correct and once if mistaken. Rather, they are disobedient sinners for following the path of falsehood to establish truth – if their intention is sound – and seeking to support the religion of Allāh through means Allāh has forbidden. Allāh has commanded us to worship Him through lawful means just as He has commanded us with lawful objectives. This is in general, and it has many details that are not for discussion here.

If the intention of one who claims to serve the religion of Allāh through democracy is sound, and he is free from desires and personal interests being a reason for entering this slippery slope, and he has not fallen into the pitfalls of nullifiers of faith in words or deeds, and has not become part of the ruling authority that governs by other than what Allāh has revealed by accepting a ministry or position wherein he becomes part of the apparatus ruling by other than what Allāh has revealed – if he strives to oppose every codification or legislation that explicitly contradicts the Sharīʿah of Allāh – then, and Allāh knows best, he may have an excuse through interpretation that averts the ruling of disbelief from him. However, I have no doubt that he is within the circle of sin and disobedience for contravening what Allāh has legislated of the path of guidance and the religion of truth. And Allāh Almighty knows best.

In short, I say: Whoever among the Islamists practices democracy is not a rewarded mujtahid, but rather is mistaken, falling somewhere between disbelief, sin, or excuse. And Allāh knows best.

This is confirmed by the outcome of their experiences over more than half a century: failure, regression, entrenchment of the rule of disbelief, disbelievers, apostates, and oppressors, and the facilitation of the policies of tyrants and their colonial masters. They achieved no significant benefit or result. On the contrary, their presence within the circle of the "elite" (mala') in Pharaoh's institutions served as a living, moving false testimony to the righteousness of Pharaoh and his elite, legitimizing them before the general public – the common Muslims who hold Islām, Muslims, scholars, callers, and figures of the Awakening in esteem, and consider them role models of righteousness.

I draw attention to the fact that in all the foregoing, I am following the school of thought of those scholars and callers who hold this view; I am not the one issuing the fatwa in this regard but have only detailed and conveyed it.

As for non-Islamists, the secular democrats, what we have learned from all our shaykhs and teachers whom we knew in the Islamic Awakening, then the Jihādī movement, the Muslim Brotherhood, then the Salafī trend, is that they are disbelievers, atheists, apostates. Let these aforementioned secularists – if they do not believe me – confirm this from our teachers who associate with them under the dome of parliament. The word jāma‘a here means to gather, sit with, reside with, adhere to, or accompany. It is mentioned in a Ḥadīth: "Whoever associates with a polytheist and lives with him is like him." (Narrated by Abū Dāwūd. See the explanation of the Ḥadīth in ‘Awn al-Ma‘būd.) There is a lesson in this for them. Let them ask their parliamentary associates about their opinion of them during breaks, on the sidelines of legislative meetings that occur without Allāh's sanction. Perhaps they will believe them, or perhaps they will be sung a mawwāl (a traditional song): "Still remember? That was long ago!" For these teachers of ours have a new jurisprudence for which this amusing anecdote is fitting.

Second: This explicit and direct speech, coming from people like me today, is met with surprise and disapproval by the general public, and even within circles of what is called the moderate Islamic Awakening today. This is due to the status democracy has achieved among the Muslim masses as a result of the efforts of the media and politicians from our external enemies and their hypocritical collaborators among us. Especially after claiming moderation within the Awakening became the easiest way to escape accusations of fundamentalism and extremism, and consequently terrorism, or perhaps being branded as affiliated with al-Qā‘idah or other Jihādīs (terrorists, according to their description and American classification).

But I want to recall that I knew the generality of the scholars, leaders, and prominent figures of the Awakening, and the generality of Islamic callers, when I and my peers from the youth generation joined this Islamic Awakening in general, and the Jihādī current in particular, in the late seventies and early eighties of the last century, up to the late nineties. They held this belief. We read and studied this under them in all the literature of the Islamic Awakening penned by our predecessors (may Allāh have mercy on them) from the thirties until very recently, to the end of the twentieth century. This literature still fills libraries! The implication of all that, and the belief of everyone in the Islamic and Jihādī Awakening regarding democracy, was what I have mentioned. Whoever wishes can review the writings and literature of the media of the Muslim Brotherhood's da'wah and its branches, and the movements that emerged from it. Likewise, all the scholars and callers of the Salafī Da'wah, Ahl al-Ḥadīth, the Surūrīs, Ḥizb al-Taḥrīr, and other schools of the Awakening. Also, the fatwas of respected leading Islamic scholars, especially in the heartland of Islām, the Land of the Two Holy Sanctuaries (Najd and Ḥijāz), Greater Syria (al-Shām), Egypt, Iraq, and indeed all Arab and Muslim countries. You will find them all in agreement with this belief.

Indeed, I remember perfectly that the creed of Allāh's sovereignty (Ḥākimiyyah) and its principles, which we studied as youth and taught as adults in both the Islamic Awakening and the Jihādī current, were replete with these meanings. I even recall that the word "democracy" was never mentioned in the literature of the Islamic Awakening, the books of scholars, or by Islamic callers, except as an indicator of disbelief in Allāh, associating partners with Him (shirk), and atheism concerning His Lordship, with a repugnance no less than that of words like "communism," "atheism," "existentialism," "secularism," or "heresy" (zandaqah).

I also remember when the leadership of the Muslim Brotherhood in Syria (during its management of the confrontation with the Nusayrī regime in Syria) took its unfortunate step of announcing a national alliance with secular parties and wrote a national charter to that effect. Everyone avoided using the word "democracy" to spare the Muslim Brotherhood embarrassment before their base and before Muslims, despite agreeing upon and stipulating its content, in an attempt to evade the stigma of its implication of disbelief.

Gradually, since the mid-eighties, these democratic terms and concepts began to creep in shyly, to justify some practices of Islamists who took their first steps on this misguided path as a compulsory solution imposed by the state of weakness and oppression by the authorities. The twentieth century had not ended by the year 2000 before these people broke the barrier of shyness. They began promoting "Islamic democracy," and the term "Islamic democrats" found its way into public discourse. The Salafīs and adherents of the Ahl al-Ḥadīth school had initially condemned this deviation by the Muslim Brotherhood and its branches. Then, they soon envied them for the political and da‘wah opportunities they gained, so they followed them and adopted their method. Soon after, non-political Islamists such as Sūfīs, Tablīghīs, and others entered this "festival" (mawlid), politicizing almost the entire Islamic Awakening. Most of our scholars, callers, and shaykhs, despite their differences that exhausted the Ummah, began to dance together in a collective "zār party" (a type of traditional gathering). Glory be to Him who united hearts upon parliament when they could hardly agree on anything else!

Only the Jihādīs and some independent scholars whom Allāh protected from this evil remained outside this democratic festival.

Then came the September events. The Islamic Emirate in Afghanistan fell, and the global war on terror, as they called it, began, led by America, Israel, NATO Europe, and their apostate allies, as previously mentioned. Media battles ignited across satellite channels, communication means, the internet, newspapers, books, and other platforms against Islām and Muslims, with the attack today reaching the roots of the creed and the roots of the Islamic da‘wah. Callers and Islamists fell into the trap of hostile intellectual terrorism, which screamed at them, "You are terrorists!" The reaction, under duress of oppression and liquidation, was to say, "No, we are moderates!" Then, they found no cover for movement and activity, and no claim of moderation, except the pretense of democracy, whether willingly and eagerly, or unwillingly and compelled. But all of this could not change the reality of the matter in any way.

In short and frankly, Islamic scholars and callers of the Awakening must clarify for us: Were we misguided in our belief in Ḥākimiyyah for seventy years, a belief that necessitated considering democracy as disbelief and prohibiting affiliation with its institutions? And did those of our Salaf who died, or our heroes who were martyred in Jihād holding this belief, die in misguidance and deviation? Or is it that those who detached from their fundamental principles, shed their roots, and turned against their principles to please Jews, Christians, and their allies, are the ones misguided today? If the former is true, let them justify why they misguided us. Why did they lie to us for forty years or more? And if the latter is true, let them tell us, why are they misguiding people today? Let them answer us.

What happened that would make us turn back on our heels? What are the Sharīʿah proofs for the misguidance of what we believed based on its Sharīʿah proofs at that time, which we studied and taught?

There is dangerous talk circulating today on satellite channels, international communication networks, and all media outlets. Senior scholars, Islamic callers, Awakening leaders, even retreating and surrendering Jihādī leaders, are calling for a revision of methodologies and creed. There is a war today on our methodologies and beliefs, no less fierce than the security and military war on Islām and Muslims under the pretext of combating terrorism, the war of ideas, and the revision of curricula and educational tools.

If those who have retreated and turned back on their heels find justification for their position, philosophize defeat and apostasy from principles, and find a place in the caravan of applauders for American Islām, which brought us corrected curricula, rehabilitation courses for imams and preachers in our mosques, and campaigns of intellectual revisions targeting all our symbols and constants, then there must be fronts of confrontation that affirm the constants and carry the banner of the creed.

And by the power and grace of Allāh, they will find us there, on this lofty and firm summit, by Allāh's permission.

From there, from the highest peaks of steadfastness, where the coolness of certainty meets the warmth of faith, and the mujāhidīn lean on their drawn swords, we affirm what I have previously stated. We are steadfast upon what we believe of our religion, and upon what we became aware of in this world and found our righteous Salaf of scholars and callers upon. We are upon what our righteous martyrs left us for, departing to their Lord, rejoicing in what Allāh has given them, Allāh willing. And upon what the righteous among our scholars and leaders, who are languishing in prisons and detention centers today, were upon. We are steadfast upon what the hearts of the oppressed believers among the people of truth contain today. We are upon the implications of Tawhīd al-Rubūbiyyah (Oneness of Lordship) and Tawhīd al-Ulūhiyyah (Oneness of Worship), and what they necessitate of Tawhīd al-Ḥākimiyyah (Oneness of Sovereignty/Governance).

Based on this, we declare openly:

Democracy is disbelief (kufr) and polytheism (shirk) with Allāh. Its adherents are disbelievers, atheists, or apostate heretics (zanādiqah). How can they not be disbelievers when Allāh Almighty said: {They have certainly disbelieved who say, "Allāh is the third of three." And there is no god except one God} (Al-Mā'idah: 73). So what about those who say that He – Glorified is He – is one-tenth of ten, or a partner to hundreds of parliamentarians?!

As for those Islamists who delve into it through interpretation (ta'wīl), they are of various types and forms. The ruling on each category among them depends on their level of conviction, the nature of their intention, their practices in word and deed, and their local circumstances.

This is what has reached us from those who conveyed the trust to us. And this is what we convey to those around us and to whom this message reaches.

O Allāh, bear witness. O Allāh, bear witness. O Allāh, bear witness.

I believe the matter is as clear as the sun. And there is nothing more beautiful in describing the state of Islamist democrats and admonishing them than verses of utmost splendor and magnificence, which include profoundly significant indications regarding the issue at hand. These are the following verses from Sūrat al-Nisā' and Sūrat Muḥammad (upon him be the purest prayers and most complete peace). With these, we conclude this brief overview, Allāh willing. Allāh Almighty says:

*{Indeed, those who have believed then disbelieved, then believed then disbelieved, and then increased in disbelief - never will Allāh forgive them, nor will He guide them to a way. * Give tidings to the hypocrites that there is for them a painful punishment - * Those who take disbelievers as allies instead of believers. Do they seek with them honor [through power]? But indeed, honor belongs to Allāh entirely. * And it has already come down to you in the Book that when you hear the verses of Allāh [recited], they are denied [by them] and ridiculed; so do not sit with them until they enter into another conversation. Indeed, you would then be like them. Indeed, Allāh will gather the hypocrites and disbelievers in Hell all together - * Those who wait [and watch] you. If you gain a victory from Allāh, they say, "Were we not with you?" But if the disbelievers have a share [of success], they say, "Did we not gain mastery over you and protect you from the believers?" But Allāh will judge between you on the Day of Resurrection, and never will Allāh give the disbelievers over the believers a way [to overcome them]. * Indeed, the hypocrites [think to] deceive Allāh, but He is deceiving them. And when they stand for prayer, they stand lazily, showing [themselves to] the people and not remembering Allāh except a little, * Wavering between them, [belonging] neither to these nor to those. And he whom Allāh sends astray - never will you find for him a way. * O you who have believed, do not take the disbelievers as allies* *instead of the believers. Do you wish to give Allāh against yourselves a clear case? * Indeed, the hypocrites will be in the lowest depths of the Fire - and never will you find for them a helper - * Except for those who repent, correct themselves, hold fast to Allāh, and are sincere in their religion for Allāh, for those will be with the believers. And Allāh is going to give the believers a great reward.} (Al-Nisā': 137-146).*

*And Allāh Almighty says: {So know, [O Muḥammad], that there is no deity except Allāh and ask forgiveness for your sin and for the believing men and believing women. And Allāh knows your movement and your resting place. * And those who believe say, "Why has a sūrah not been sent down?" But when a precise sūrah is revealed and fighting is mentioned therein, you see those in whose hearts is disease looking at you with a look of one overcome by death. And more appropriate for them * [Is] obedience and good words. And when the matter [of fighting] is determined, if they had been true to Allāh, it would have been better for them. * So would you perhaps, if you turned away, cause corruption on earth and sever your [ties of] kinship? * Those are the ones whom Allāh has cursed, so He deafened them and blinded their vision. * Do they not then reflect upon the Qur'ān, or are there locks upon [their] hearts? * Indeed, those who reverted back [to disbelief] after guidance had become clear to them - Satan enticed them and prolonged hope for them. * That is because they said to those who disliked what Allāh sent down, "We will obey you in part of the matter." And Allāh knows their secrets. * Then how [will it be] when the angels take them in death, striking their faces and their backs? * That is because they followed what angered Allāh and disliked [what earns] His pleasure, so He rendered their deeds worthless. * Or do those in whose hearts is disease think that Allāh will never expose their [feelings of] hatred? * And if We willed, We could show them to you, and you would know them by their mark; but you will surely know them by the tone of [their] speech. And Allāh knows your deeds. * And We will surely test you until We make known those among you who strive [for the cause of Allāh] and the patient, and We will test your affairs. * Indeed, those who disbelieved and averted [people] from the way of Allāh and opposed the Messenger after guidance* *had become clear to them - never will they harm Allāh at all, and He will render their deeds worthless. * O you who have believed, obey Allāh and obey the Messenger and do not invalidate your deeds. * Indeed, those who disbelieved and averted [people] from the path of Allāh and then died while they were disbelievers - never will Allāh forgive them. * So do not weaken and call for peace while you are superior; and Allāh is with you and will never deprive you of [the reward of] your deeds.}* (Muḥammad: 19-35).

Have the Islamist democrats sat in gatherings where they hear the verses of Allāh being denied and ridiculed? O Allāh, we bear witness by our statement: Yes! Does resorting to the opinion of the majority in parliament necessitate obeying those who disliked what Allāh revealed in some matters? O Allāh, we bear witness: Yes! Indeed, in all matters, or most matters!

The verses narrate all the wisdom of the issue, and space does not permit digression, although their magnificence tempts one to do so. Perhaps I will return to them in a separate research paper on this topic if Allāh facilitates and helps.

Ninth: The Issue of Creedal and Madhhab Differences within Ahl al-Sunnah

The Issue of the Creed of the Salaf (Early Muslims) and the Khalaf (Later Generations)

When Islām spread and Muslim armies advanced across the earth, conquering lands of previous civilizations such as Greece, Rome, Persia, Turkestan, China, India, and Sindh, Muslims came into contact with the civilizations, religions, and philosophies of those peoples. This occurred mostly during the Umayyad era and the early Abbasid era. This led to an active movement of translating the heritage of those civilizations and studying them. As much as assimilating the arts and natural sciences of those nations was beneficial – as the Muslim Ummah blended those sciences and arts, preserved the output of those civilizations, reformulated it in an Islamic style, and transmitted it to humanity as a developed civilization and body of knowledge upon which it had built – another aspect of dealing with those philosophies and beliefs had a severely negative impact on Islamic civilization and the religion and creed of Muslims. For some scholars, especially those originating from those defunct civilizations, mixing with those philosophies and beliefs led to a degree of confusion and blending between the pure Islamic creed and the philosophies of minds and absurdities of understanding, which delved, using the limited and deficient tool of reason, into the vast and limitless world of the unseen. This resulted in the emergence among Muslims of creedal schools in which religion was mixed with philosophy, and truth with falsehood. Deviant creeds arose from this, which fragmented the Ummah, muddled the purity of its creed, and confused the pure beliefs of subsequent generations, except for those whom Allāh protected and preserved.

This was most intense in the third Hijrī century when the Abbasid Caliph al-Ma'mūn became passionate about sciences, civilization, books, and translation, establishing the "House of Wisdom" (Bayt al-Ḥikmah) and its vast library. He dispatched envoys to collect Greek books and philosophies, and Roman civilization and literature. Some scholars actively translated and studied them. A segment of people became infatuated with philosophy, especially Greek philosophies, their religious interpretations, and their pagan creedal misguidance, and they embraced them. From this arose a discipline called ʿilm al-kalām (scholastic theology), a science born from the rewriting and reformulation of Greek logic and philosophy by some Muslim scholars. People delved into the fundamentals of creed and the essence of Tawhīd using philosophical methods and the approaches of deficient intellects. This led to complex scholastic theological issues that were not part of the methodology of the Salaf, the Companions, or the way of the Messenger of Allāh (peace be upon him). Consequently, some groups went astray. Creedal sects emerged, adding to the fragmentation that had already occurred among Muslims for political reasons, which had previously caused the birth of the Khawārij and Shī'ah sects.

New schools of thought emerged that relied on philosophy and scholastic theology, such as the Qadariyyah, who denied predestination; the Jabriyyah, who denied human free will; and the Mu'tazilah, who deified reason and made it an arbiter over authentic transmission and the texts of Sharī'ah. This continued to characterize the scholarly, religious, and literary life during the third, fourth, and fifth Hijrī centuries and the subsequent eras of decline and political fragmentation of the Ummah. As a reaction to these philosophies, some sincere Muslim scholars, in order to refute the deviant sects and schools of thought and those called "scholars of kalām," ventured into the field of philosophy to respond to their specious arguments using their own methods. Thus, philosophy and logic entered Islamic sciences from that time. These outstanding, sincere scholars addressed the specious arguments on sensitive topics raised by the deviants, using philosophical methods. This dealt with the most specific aspects of creed and Tawhīd in Islām, namely the Oneness of Allāh in His Lordship, Divinity, Names, and Attributes. They erred where they intended correctness and did harm where they intended good. May Allāh forgive them, accept their sincere efforts, and overlook their slips.

This led to many books of pure, divine Islamic creed, stemming from unadulterated revelation untainted by philosophies of the mind and weak understanding, losing that purity. Creedal schools emerged within Ahl al-Sunnah wa al-Jamā'ah that adopted interpretation (ta'wīl) and philosophy in dealing with Tawhīd and the characteristics of Lordship. As every deviation inevitably widens and expands over time, these strange, intrusive, nascent creedal schools developed to dominate, in most stages of Islamic history, many of the scholars' approaches in the fields of Tawhīd and creed.

While logic and rational argumentation benefited the development of jurisprudential chapters and the heritage of fiqh (jurisprudence) derivation among the schools of Ahl al-Sunnah, their harm in the sciences of Tawhīd was significant.

The clearest and most important instance was in the field known as ta'wīl – the interpretation of Allāh's Names and Attributes – explaining them and expressing them through meanings and metaphors, either to simplify understanding for the common people or with the intention of refuting philosophers' specious arguments about Allāh's Names and Attributes, such as anthropomorphism (tajsīm), assigning modality (takyīf), similitude (tashbīh), and distortion (taḥrīf). Despite the sound intentions of those scholars, there is no doubt that its harm outweighed its benefit, and its error and danger were greater than its correctness.

This creedal school and philosophical approach to Tawhīd was named the "Ash'arī" school, after one of its prominent figures, Imām Abū al-Ḥasan al-Ash'arī (may Allāh have mercy on him), who delved deeply into this school and then retracted and repented from it, as is authentically reported from him (may Allāh have mercy on him). This was also the practice of most prominent figures of that school, such as Imāms al-Juwaynī, al-Rāzī, al-Shahrastānī, and Abū Ḥāmid al-Ghazālī (may Allāh Almighty have mercy on them) and others. However, their works and writings remained; we ask Allāh to accept their turning away from its errors and forgive them for their slips.

Since the third and fourth Hijrī centuries, the Ash'arī school became the school of outstanding scholars of Ahl al-Sunnah and the school of righteous Muslim kings. Opposing it meant aligning with sects like the Khawārij and Shī'ah. Most Muslim rulers and kings established this school from the Abbasid era, through the subsequent Taifa states, up to the rise of the Ottoman Empire. The kings and sultans of the Ottoman Empire continued this methodology, and it remained prevalent in Muslim lands, despite their differing jurisprudential schools (madhhabs), which were dominated by the four main madhhabs. However, a few Islamic scholars preserved the purity of the madhhab of Ahl al-Sunnah wa al-Jamā'ah, thereby preserving the creed in its purity and splendor without mixture or adulteration.

Their madhhab became known throughout history as the "madhhab of the Salaf," and sometimes the "madhhab of Ahl al-Ḥadīth." The madhhab of the other group within Ahl al-Sunnah wa al-Jamā'ah became known as the "Ash'arī" madhhab, some of whose principles and methods were adopted by great scholars among jurists, exegetes, and masters of religious sciences within Ahl al-Sunnah. The Salafī madhhab also had prominent figures throughout history, such as Ibn Taymiyyah, al-Shātibī, Ibn al-Qayyim, Ibn Baṭṭah, Aḥmad, Sufyān, and others (may Allāh Almighty have mercy on them). However, they were a minority among the majority of Ahl al-Sunnah scholars throughout history.

Islamic history has been replete with fierce creedal battles and numerous heated debates, with arguments and counter-arguments between these two groups within Ahl al-Sunnah wa al-Jamā'ah. Refutations and counter-refutations were written, and there was much gossip, hearsay, and excessive questioning. Political circles and rulers' courts entered the disputes, with some championing one side and others strengthening themselves with the other. It was a gateway to tribulations (fitan) and animosities in Muslim history, the mention of which would be lengthy.

Like all atmospheres of tribulation that breed fanaticism and partisanship, these problems, sometimes in addition to issues of madhhab fanaticism, led to evils, fighting, and tribulations. Rulers often intervened to stop them by prohibiting discussion of such matters, thereby making things worse. This problem bequeathed to these two schools – the Ash'arī school and its offshoots, and the Salafī or Ahl al-Ḥadīth school and its offshoots – a situation where each one excluded the other from the fold of Ahl al-Sunnah wa al-Jamā'ah. Each group considered itself "Ahl al-Sunnah wa al-Jamā'ah" and believed its creed to be that of the "Saved Sect" (al-firqah al-nājiyah), and the other group to be among the "seventy-two sects" destined for Hellfire, based on the authentic Ḥadīth in which the Messenger of Allāh (peace be upon him) informed that the Ummah would split into seventy-three sects, one of which is saved and the rest are in the Fire. Although Ahl al-Ḥadīth and its commentators agree that this does not mean eternal damnation in Hellfire for all these sects and all their adherents from among the people of the Qiblah and the Muslim Ummah, these two groups each restricted affiliation with "Ahl al-Sunnah wa al-Jamā'ah" and the ownership of this title to themselves, denying it to the other group.

These problems, like others, subsided in later eras due to the Ummah's preoccupation with colonialism and its tribulations, then with "colonial independence" governments, and the resulting onslaught of contemporary secular intellectual and political doctrines, which led to a general weakening of religious practice in the Ummah during the mid-twentieth century. Thus, this problem lay dormant for a short period, only to reawaken with the emergence of contemporary Islamic Awakening schools. It returned with the rise of contemporary "Salafī current" schools and their campaign against madhhabism and Ash'arism, while most other Awakening school circles, especially reformist schools, Tablīgh and Da'wah groups, Sūfīs, and others, as well as most official scholars, imams of mosques, and most scholars of the four madhhabs, remained Ash'arī in creed.

With most Jihādīs choosing the Salafī creed, the jurisprudence of evidence (fiqh al-dalīl), and the choices of the Salafī methodology, the problem has finally reached us. This made it one of the important sections I focused on writing about while presenting the features of our creed in the call of the Global Islamic Resistance. This is because it is one of the intractable problems on the path of Jihād, resistance, and repelling the aggressor. In its final form, it constitutes a gateway to division, partisanship, and jurisprudential, then intellectual, then activist fanaticism, and causes internal conflict within Muslim ranks and resistance circles at a time when the horses of the modern-day Mongols – the Americans and Zionists – are invading us with their tank treads and roaring aircraft. Their satellites monitor our creedal whispers and daily movements, and their shells and lava rain down on our heads from the sky, land, and sea. Were it not for this, I would not have addressed this issue.

My first concern with this problem was during the days of the Arab Jihād in Afghanistan. Many Salafī Jihādī scholars were present in the arena, along with their counterparts from the other (Ash‘arī) school. The scholars of Afghanistan, Pakistan, the Indian subcontinent, Central Asia, and the general Muslims who followed them in this region were also Ash‘arīs. This caused a significant rift between the Arab mujāhidīn and all these groups, a rift that created a real problem in that arena. Intelligence agencies seized this opportunity, and the BBC began to promote the issue of "Wahhabism" in Afghanistan. Shaykh ‘Abdullāh ‘Azzām and others like him tried in vain to persuade the brothers to postpone such matters. This is not the place for details.

Then, when I became involved in supporting the Jihād in Algeria (1994-1997), led by the Armed Islamic Group (GIA) before its leadership deviated, as I explained in the first part, some Salafī students of knowledge became engrossed in supporting the GIA (which followed the Salafī methodology) and used our media platforms, which supported the cause of Jihād in Algeria, as battle lines for Salafīs against Ash‘arīs and madhhab adherents! That was another tragedy whose effects I witnessed myself.

The problem recurred during the second phase of the Arab Afghans in the Taliban era and constituted a major stumbling block between the Salafī Jihādīs from the Arab world and the legitimate Emirate in Afghanistan, its Emir, its leadership from the Taliban, and their scholars – all of whom were Ash‘arī, Ḥanafī madhhab adherents, no less fanatical about their views than many of our brothers who are, in turn, fanatical about the Salafī madhhab. This was a third experience I lived through, making me realize the importance of this dilemma, which arises at inopportune times, given the severity of the enemy's onslaught we are experiencing.

I wanted to study this problem here, in this chapter dedicated to the issue of creed in general, and the Jihādī creed of resistance in particular, in order to contribute to trying to stop its harm to our Jihādī ranks, and because it is a problem of creed and religion. So I studied it fairly and impartially to find for myself the correct belief with which I seek a creed that pleases my Lord first, and then to present my conclusions as advice to my mujāhidīn brothers and to whichever Muslims it reaches.

I have reached an opinion which I will summarize here in a few points after seeking Allāh's guidance (istikhārah) and asking Him for direction. However, I admit I was very apprehensive about declaring this opinion for two reasons: First, the matter is sensitive and touches upon the most private aspects of religion, and has historically been a field of clashes and problems. Second, the Jihādī milieu to which I belong is predominantly Salafī in madhhab, and among them are those who are fierce and fanatical in their approach to anyone who contradicts their opinion on this issue, as in most other issues.

However, two things also encouraged me: First, the necessity of unifying the ranks of Ahl al-Sunnah wa al-Jamā'ah in Jihād and resistance, and the need for this problem to cease, at least among the mujāhidīn and resistance fighters. Second, I found, and was surprised, that one of the major mujāhid scholars had previously reached the same conclusions I reached independently through my weak effort, and wrote about it frankly and clearly. Undoubtedly, he has peers among the scholars of this age whose opinions I have not come across. That man is Shaykh 'Abdullāh 'Azzām (may Allāh have mercy on him and accept him among the martyrs).

Before presenting the summary of my opinion in brief points, I will quote what he (may Allāh have mercy on him) wrote, in recognition of his virtue and precedence. I ask Allāh to inspire me with correctness and accept my good intentions, with mercy and forgiveness; indeed, He is All-Hearing, Near, Generous, Responsive.

The summary of Shaykh ‘Abdullāh ‘Azzām's (may Allāh have mercy on him) opinion on this issue can be summarized in two points:

(1) The truth and correctness lie with the madhhab of the Salaf: affirming the verses and Ḥadīths concerning Attributes as they appear, while negating modality (kayfiyyah), similitude (tashbīh), and consigning their meaning to Allāh (tafwīd). Describing the Lord, Blessed and Exalted, as He described Himself, without interpretation (ta’wīl), description, or explanation. Rather, issuing fatwas based on the Qur’ān and Sunnah and remaining silent about what is beyond that. This is the madhhab of the Companions and the Salaf, and Shaykh ‘Abdullāh clarified that this was his creed.

(2) The adherents of the second madhhab, called the madhhab of the Khalaf, or the Ash‘arīs, who resorted to interpreting the Names and Attributes, are from Ahl al-Sunnah. They are not to be excluded from belonging to Ahl al-Sunnah. Their approach of interpretation in these matters is erroneous. They have contradicted the "methodology of Ahl al-Sunnah" in these specific issues. They are from Ahl al-Sunnah, and they are considered mistaken in these specific points.

He detailed this and a number of other creedal issues in his valuable book Al-‘Aqīdah wa Atharuhā fī Binā’ al-Jīl (The Creed and Its Impact on Building the Generation) in several places. The summary of this, as found in the first volume of the comprehensive encyclopedia of his heritage, titled Mawsū‘at al-Dakhā’ir al-‘Izām fīmā Uthira ‘an al-Shaykh ‘Abdillāh ‘Azzām (Encyclopedia of Great Treasures from the Legacy of Shaykh ‘Abdullāh ‘Azzām), is as follows:

On pages 11-13, under the title "The Misery of Humanity Today Due to the Distortion of Creed," he explained the difference between creedal conception and philosophy, and the impact of scholars delving into this matter and their leading figures retracting from it.

On pages 21-22, under the title "The Attributes of Allāh, Mighty and Majestic," he explained the categories of creedal schools. He presented the view of the Mushabbihah (those who liken Allāh to creation) and Mujassimah (anthropomorphists) and refuted it. He also presented the view of the Mu'aṭṭilah (those who deny Attributes) and Jahmiyyah and refuted and criticized it. Then he explained the madhhab of the Salaf and chose its correctness and soundness. Then he explained the madhhab of the Khalaf and the Ash'arīs, pointing out their error in interpretation (ta'wīl) and explanation of the Names and Attributes, and stated that it is an error.

On page 23, he affirmed that the Ash'arīs and the adherents of the Khalaf madhhab are from Ahl al-Sunnah ("except in these matters"). He did not thereby exclude them from Ahl al-Sunnah. He made excuses for them, explained the reasons for their error, then sought forgiveness for them, had mercy on them, and mentioned that many of their leading figures retracted from it (may Allāh have mercy on them).

(The Shaykh's research is concise and valuable; I advise reading it).

This, in brief, is the summary of what I concluded from my study of a number of books on creed and my examination of some of the arguments of these two groups. I will summarize what I have been guided to regarding the issue of creed and the issue of madhhabism in the following points:

On the Issue of Creed

1. The madhhab of the Salaf in belief, which we previously explained, is the correct madhhab, and through it, I worship Allāh, Glorified and Exalted. They are Ahl al-Sunnah wa al-Jamā'ah and the Saved Sect, Allāh willing.

2. The madhhab of the Ash'arīs, or the madhhab of the Khalaf, has deviated from correctness by adopting interpretation (ta'wīl) and explanation as a methodology for the Names and Attributes, and by not affirming them as the Salaf of the Ummah affirmed them. However, they are not thereby excluded from being part of Ahl al-Sunnah wa al-Jamā'ah. Rather, they are mistaken only in what they erred. This is just as many contemporary scholars who attribute themselves to the "madhhab of the Salaf" have erred and inclined towards the madhhab of the Murji'ah, especially in matters of Ḥākimiyyah. Yet no one claimed their exclusion from Ahl al-Sunnah, as some do today, admitting and expelling people from Ahl al-Sunnah.
3. Those who have deviated from the beliefs of Ahl al-Sunnah wa al-Jamā'ah among the many sects, such as the Shī'ah, Murji'ah, Khawārij, and others who profess "Lā ilāha illallāh" (There is no god but Allāh), are part of the "Ummah of Islām" and "Ahl al-Qiblah" (People of the Qiblah). They are not declared disbelievers in general. The attribute of Islām and the attribute of Ahl al-Qiblah are not negated from them except according to specific criteria and regulations established by Ahl al-Sunnah, which their scholars have clarified, concerning the fulfillment of the conditions for disbelief and the absence of its impediments. This is the work of erudite scholars who have reached the rank of adjudicating in matters of creeds and religions, not the work of individual Muslims, let alone the ignorant and laypeople among them. Nor is it the work of one who has dedicated himself to Jihād and repelling aggressors, unless he is among the scholars who fulfill the conditions for issuing fatwas and adjudication.
4. The Victorious Group (al-Ṭā'ifah al-Manṣūrah) are the people of correct belief, disciplined knowledge, Jihād, and fighting against the enemies of Islām and Muslims. They are the elite of the Saved Sect, the people of correct belief, who are the elite of Ahl al-Sunnah wa al-Jamā'ah, who are the elite of the people of Islām, who are the generality of Ahl al-Qiblah. Thus, they are the special central circle within those wider, encompassing circles, extending to all Ahl al-Qiblah, who are all those who believe that there is no god but Allāh and Muḥammad is the Messenger of Allāh, and who face our Qiblah.

This is regarding the issue of creeds.

On the Issue of Madhhabism within Ahl al-Sunnah wa al-Jamā'ah

As for the issue of madhhabism within Ahl al-Sunnah wa al-Jamā'ah, the summary of my conclusions is as follows: Most people today, even within Islamic Awakening circles, are divided into three groups:

The First Group: Those fanatical about the idea of madhhabism. These individuals believe that not adhering to a madhhab is a defect in religion! Fanaticism among some of them reaches extremes, where they do not permit a man to deviate from an opinion within the ancillary views of his madhhab to another opinion in any matter whatsoever! Extremism sometimes reached astonishing levels, making one think they were dealing with the four madhhabs (within Ahl al-Sunnah wa al-Jamā'ah) as if they were four separate religions. It reached the point of not praying in one congregation, prohibiting marriage between a man and a woman from two different madhhabs, not to mention instances of animosity, quarreling, and fighting! History books record that this affliction has existed since ancient times. The intensity of this fanaticism has begun to decrease, though it persists in some parts of Muslim lands. We ask Allāh for well-being. I have heard of some of this in our lands, but I witnessed astounding examples of it in Afghanistan and Pakistan.

The Second Group: Those fanatical against madhhabism. These are some who belong to the contemporary Salafī current, or who sometimes call themselves "Ahl al-Ḥadīth." They advocate absolute non-madhhabism, and their fanaticism also escalates to astonishing levels of criticizing the madhhabs, even their major imams, denying their virtue, violating their sanctity, backbiting them, and disparaging them. Meanwhile, they view their contemporary shaykhs with veneration and consider the virtue of some of their later imams from contemporary "Salafī" scholars or Ahl al-Ḥadīth to be greater than the virtue of the imams of the madhhabs and scholars throughout Islamic history! In reality, the knowledge, piety, and conduct of the best among these may not even reach one-tenth of the virtue of the least of those eminent imams of the past (may Allāh Almighty have mercy on them). For example, I heard one of them say, "Imām al-Shāfi'ī is weeping in his grave for the lessons of Ibn Bāz and Ibn 'Uthaymīn that he missed!!" You can ponder that! The ailment in this school has reached a point where they have taken certain slogans, such as their call for "jurisprudence of evidence" (fiqh al-dalīl), "return to the Qur'ān and Sunnah," and "they were men, and we are men," to such an extreme of exaggeration and crookedness that it poses a danger to religion itself. It makes one perplexed and feel pity for the madhhab fanatics, who, despite their excessive partisanship, at least had a predecessor and an imam to rely on, and thus a standard that bound them with proof, even though we do not approve of their extremism either.

The Third Group: The moderates from the first two groups. I mean the moderates among both madhhab adherents and Salafīs. They hold respect for the imams of the four madhhabs and their peers among the mujtahid imams. Most of these are scholars and students of knowledge, and the majority of them follow one of the madhhabs, while also adopting an opinion from another madhhab if the preponderance of evidence becomes clear to them. They are not fanatical about a madhhab on one hand, nor do they open the door for everyone and anyone to transgress against the Sharī'ah under the pretext of acting upon the evidence of the Qur'ān and Sunnah. They believe that the default for laypeople is taqlīd (following qualified scholarship), for students of knowledge it is ittibā' (following evidence-based scholarship), and for those firmly rooted in knowledge it is ijtihād (independent reasoning) and tarjīḥ (weighing evidence).

I believe this is the middle path. I add to this a number of points for clarification and to explain my viewpoint on the matter, and Allāh is the One whose help is sought, and He guides to the path:

First: The heritage of the four madhhabs, which the Ummah has received with acceptance and approval for centuries, is a tremendous heritage and an integrated civilizational, scholarly, and Sharīʿah legacy that the Muslim Ummah has the right to be proud of before other nations. No one denies this and the virtue of the four imams, their senior students, the imams of their madhhabs, their status, and the breadth of their knowledge, except one with ulterior motives who wants to sever the Ummah from its roots, or an ignorant person who rambles about what he does not know, repeating the sayings of those with ulterior motives. Merely gaining some insight into the level of attainment of those imams in the fundamental Sharīʿah sciences, their jurisprudence, their piercing insight, their piety in seeking fatwas, their diligence in pursuing truth, their character, religiosity, and integrity, and their distance from worldly matters and the doors of rulers, reveals something of Allāh's favor upon them and His blessing upon the Ummah through them. Whoever examines the strict conditions set for issuing fatwas in that era, such as some of what is mentioned in Ibn al-Qayyim's book Iʿlām al-Muwaqqiʿin ʿan Rabb al-ʿĀlamīn (Information for Those Who Sign on Behalf of the Lord of the Worlds), which lists the conditions of the major imams of the madhhabs for issuing fatwas – including memorizing the Book of Allāh with its narrations and mastering its sciences such as exegesis, reasons for revelation, knowledge of its clear and ambiguous verses, its abrogating and abrogated verses, and other sciences; likewise, similar knowledge of Ḥadīth sciences, memorizing hundreds of thousands of Ḥadīths with their chains of narration, knowing their narrations, defects, jurisprudence, explanations, and narrators; being familiar with the Sīrah (Prophetic biography), Maghāzī (battles), and the history of imams, caliphs, and scholars; having a comprehensive knowledge of jurists' opinions and areas of disagreement between madhhabs through study and comparison; knowing the Arabic language and memorizing its poetic and prosaic heritage; being aware and cognizant of the sciences of his era and the problems of his contemporaries and predecessors; then being attested for piety, God-consciousness, forbearance, knowledge, character, chivalry, leadership, sovereignty, asceticism in worldly matters, and seeking the Hereafter with his knowledge and actions; and not being accused of frequenting the doors of sultans and currying favor with them, among other such qualities – whoever examines such things knows that the Ummah did not elevate those imams to the status of being followed, nor did it venerate their students and the bearers of their madhhabs after them, out of a vacuum or frivolity. One realizes that any attempt to compare their status with that of some later imams is merely a ridiculous comparison lacking scholarly or realistic basis, while maintaining respect and appreciation for the knowledge of every scholar and the effort of every diligent person.

Second: There were great, eminent mujtahid imams, such as Sufyān al-Thawrī, al-Awzā'ī, Ibn Mubārak, al-Sha'bī, Sa'īd ibn Jubayr, and others (may Allāh have mercy on them), who lived during that time in the second and third centuries Hijrī. They held a similar status as mujtahids, founders of jurisprudential schools and schools of ijtihād. However, their madhhabs were not preserved in writing and did not develop into formal schools as happened with the four madhhabs. Whatever has reached us of their sayings, ijtihāds, and the evidence for their views holds the same scholarly status for those qualified scholars who are capable of research and derivation.

Third: After those eminent imams, during the golden scholarly ages and up to the eighth Hijrī century, came outstanding scholars who reached the ranks of ijtihād. However, the vast majority of them performed ijtihād based on the principles of one of the four madhhabs, although they had some of their own jurisprudential choices that differed from other madhhabs or even their own. All those opinions and fatwas are also a scholarly heritage, no less in status than others. Scholars in every time and place know the value of this heritage, and they are best equipped to benefit from it, refer to it, and derive rulings from it.

Fourth: The adherence of the general Muslim populace to the four madhhabs throughout the ages – alongside what some cite as negatives, such as restricting ijtihād and closing its gate – had a great positive aspect whose value is known by anyone who observes the state of "jurisprudential chaos" (faltān fiqhī) that has occurred in the last century as a result of the undisciplined demand to "open the gate of ijtihād," "reject adherence to the four madhhabs," and return jurisprudence and fatwas (under the pretext of the "school of evidence") to "direct reliance on the Qurʾān and Sunnah," while boasting with the slogan "they were men, and we are men," and saying that "new developments require opening the gate of ijtihād wide." The Ummah's general adherence to the four madhhabs, and the prevalence of one of these madhhabs in each kingdom or region at the provincial level, was one of the factors for the Ummah's cohesion and unity in its religious opinions. This, in turn, reflected homogeneity and unity in its other affairs, at the level of governance, judiciary, and fatwas concerning religious and worldly matters. The four madhhabs shared dominance over the expanse of the Islamic world. The east of the Muslim world, from central China to Turkestan and Central Asia, to the Indian subcontinent, Pakistan, and Afghanistan, in addition to the majority of Muslims in the Soviet Union, as well as Turkey, Iraq, Greater Syria (al-Shām), and the majority of Ahl al-Sunnah in Iran, are dominated by the madhhab of Imām Abū Ḥanīfah al-Nuʿmān (may Allāh have mercy on him). In the Caucasus west of the Black Sea, and in southern Shām, Jordan, Palestine, Lebanon, to Egypt, the peripheries of Yemen, and the Arabian Peninsula, the madhhab of the esteemed Imām Muḥammad ibn Idrīs al-Shāfiʿī (may Allāh Almighty have mercy on him) prevails. The Shāfiʿī madhhab is also widespread in South and East Asia and the islands of Indonesia. The madhhab of Imām Mālik (may Allāh Almighty have mercy on him), known as the madhhab of "Ahl al-Madīnah" (the People of Madinah), prevails in North Africa from Libya to Tunisia, Algeria, Morocco, and Mauritania. From there, it spread to central Africa and is also prevalent throughout Sudan. Meanwhile, the madhhab of Imām Aḥmad ibn Ḥanbal (may Allāh Almighty have mercy on him) spread in Najd, Ḥijāz, and the general Land of the Two Holy Sanctuaries, and was followed by most adherents of the Ahl al-Ḥadīth madhhab wherever they were found. Followers of the three other madhhabs generally lived with the prevailing madhhab in each region with ease and harmony. They had their imams, scholars, mosques, and references. The four madhhabs were taught in various major schools and scholarly centers throughout history in different capitals of Islām. Matters proceeded naturally and positively, despite intermittent problems of fanaticism, satanic instigations among people from time to time, the intrusion of politics into the world of knowledge and scholars, and the inclination of some scholars towards the doors of sultans to gain support for fanaticism towards madhhabs, individuals, and opinions. However, matters remained disciplined and reflected well on the religion and worldly affairs of Muslims.

Fifth: Contemporary calls to "reject madhhabism," especially in the last century after the fall of the Caliphate and the disappearance of the Ummah's political reference point, in the manner adopted by many circles of Ahl al-Ḥadīth and what is called the "Salafī current," as it has occurred and is occurring today, have brought harms many times greater than their benefits. Among these are: Their alleged escape from dividing the Ummah into four madhhabs, and their endeavor to unite it upon the madhhab of "truth and evidence," with the Qur'ān and Sunnah as its two sources, has, despite the theoretical truth it rests upon, produced a terrifyingly counterproductive result, and reality is the greatest witness. According to this school, many scholars have come forward to issue fatwas. Even if we overlook the impossible comparison between their scholarly level and that of the early imams, or even with the later giants among the imams of the madhhabs, and even if we accept the qualification of these contemporary figures, we would find that the tear has become wider than the patch. They ventured into the field of derivation and ijtihād from the same evidences that the imams of the madhhabs addressed, and they emerged either with preferences among those opinions or with new opinions and different fatwas. Because the multiplicity of fatwas results from the multiplicity and diversity of understandings and intellects, many have emerged today here and there as imams of the "school of fiqh al-dalīl" – So-and-so, the son of So-and-so, Abū So-and-so – these famous figures today in every country and kingdom. Thus, the imams have multiplied further, and every new imam has disciples, followers, and fanatics. We found ourselves facing new fanatics for dozens of imams, instead of being divided among four madhhabs. This is aside from the fact that the process of weighing evidence between the madhhabs itself lacked scholarly rigor. It is known that a judge must be at the scholarly level of those he is judging between, or superior to them in knowledge and understanding, to rule with knowledge and truth for the preponderance of this or that. But everyone concedes that this is not available to the overwhelming majority of scholars of this age, who are inferior to those earlier imams in knowledge, piety, understanding, and religion. So where are the hoped-for benefits of solving the problem of adherence to four madhhabs by adhering to tens or hundreds?

The calamity of opening the door to returning to the evidence of the Qur'ān and Sunnah did not stop at the birth of dozens of contemporary imams, their schools, and their fanatical followers; the calamity here is relatively minor, as they are mostly scholars or possess a significant amount of knowledge, understanding, and the regulations of fatwa. However, the methodology of the contemporary Salafī current opened the door for everyone to undertake this task. What is prevalent in most Salafī circles – I say "most," not "all" – is the audacity of both senior and junior students of knowledge in this regard, in authenticating and weakening Ḥadīths, and in jarḥ wa taʿdīl (criticism and praise of narrators). This has generated the phenomenon of "those audacious towards the Hellfire," issuing fatwas without intellect, religion, or sometimes even character. We are thus facing a state of "jurisprudential chaos," as I called it, and scholarly, social, and religious fragmentation. I do not think anyone with religion or intellect would approve of this outcome. Today, we face hundreds, say thousands, say tens of thousands of alleged students of knowledge, especially in Islamic Awakening schools, particularly Arab ones (as most non-Arabs still acknowledge respect for their scholars and madhhabs, except in circles of the apparent "Ahl al-Ḥadīth" and what is called contemporary Salafism among them; Arabs have transmitted this disease to them, with both senior and junior individuals daring to issue fatwas). It is strange that in the twentieth and twenty-first centuries, we claim to be in an age of scholarly method, realism, respect for specialization, and referring matters to their experts and sciences to their masters. Yet this new, undisciplined madhhab, with its multiple schools and references, whose adherents in many cases call themselves "Salafī" – and Allāh forbid that this attribution to the Salaf of this Ummah, their knowledge, ethics, religiosity, piety, and scrupulousness, be correct – this contemporary jurisprudential madhhab has endorsed, and its pioneers among students of knowledge and the ignorant have come to accept, that anyone whatsoever can dare to open the books of Sharīʿah to extract rulings. By Allāh, I have stories and evidences that reach the level of catastrophe from my experience with this Islamic Awakening over a quarter of a century, especially some of our young followers from the Jihādī Salafī trend, who harmed our school and benefited the enemy with their ignorance. But I refrain from mentioning them due to the triviality of their stories and fear of lengthiness. Indeed, an ignorant person can cause more harm with his ignorance than a profligate person with his debauchery.

But I emphasize a point of extreme danger and importance: this clear affliction of letting everyone, qualified or not (literally "the rope-maker and the arrow-fletcher"), meddle in religious matters and fatwas, under the pretext of non-madhabism, fiqh al-dalīl, returning to the Qur'ān and Sunnah, the slogan "they were men, and we are men," and other such phrases repeated by the naive individuals of this current and those deceived by them, has had a detrimental effect on various aspects of religiosity and the facilities of the Ummah's life. However, when it reached the circles of the Islamic Awakening and the Jihādī current, which adopted "Jihādī Salafism" and initially completed its methodologies under outstanding leaders and respected scholars, the phenomenon among some of them today has reached a point that portends disaster. If these young, naive, self-proclaimed muftis dare to pronounce on ordinary religious matters such as worship, transactions, inheritance, and so on, the utmost harm that befalls people is some errors in worship or the loss of some rights in transactions. But the field of fatwa in Jihād is the most dangerous of dangerous matters. It involves judgment in five areas: (1) People's religions and creeds, and their affiliation with Islām or disbelief, apostasy or hypocrisy, innovation or corruption, etc. (2) Judgment concerning blood, and deeming permissible the killing of those whom the Sharī'ah permits or obligates to be killed. (3) Judgment concerning wealth, and what is permissible to take and what is not. (4) Judgment concerning honor, and what is permissible and what is forbidden regarding it. (5) Judgment in matters of enjoining good and forbidding evil, and the methods of removing evil, in word and deed. You can imagine the catastrophe, then, when matters are entrusted to those unqualified. And you await the Hour, most of whose minor and intermediate signs have appeared, including what we are discussing, witnessing, and suffering from.

I do not doubt for a moment that the greatest crime in this is due to the scholars' aversion to Jihād, and to enjoining good and forbidding evil, leaving its arena to sincere youth, among whom emerge those who are qualified and those who are not, to delve into what should have been the work and responsibility of the wise men of the Ummah, its scholars, and the leaders of its Awakening. This is not to mention the ugly role played by the scholars of the Sultan and the corrupt leaders of the Islamic Awakening who have professionalized sycophancy for rulers, and even for the new American colonialism today. This has the greatest impact in hindering people from the path of Allāh and emboldening unqualified youths to fill the vacuum left by the inaction of qualified scholars. And Allāh's help is sought against these calamities. How do you answer a young man whom you prevent from issuing fatwas and striving to seek knowledge and evidence because he is unqualified, if he asks you, "Who, then, will give me a fatwa?" This is a valid and shameful question for those {who have exchanged the favor of Allāh for disbelief and settled their people [in] the abode of destruction} (Ibrāhīm: 28). The righteous among scholars today are those who are silent and withdrawn. As for the evil ones among them, look for them at the doors of sultans, and at the tables of dialogues on combating terrorism and Jihād on satellite channels and in internet forum cafes! And to Allāh is the complaint. We are heading towards a world of turmoil (harj) and tribulations whose blackness rivals the darkness of night, following one another like patches of a dark night. This is one of its manifestations. And I bear witness for Allāh's sake: I have witnessed, in my association with the Jihādī current in this field, wonders that, in some experiences like the Jihād in Algeria, amounted to horrors. I witnessed some of this myself in London, or heard about it from those who witnessed what happened in Algeria. To Allāh is the complaint. And here is the post-September and post-occupation-of-Iraq world, opening with events that would turn children's hair grey and perplex the wise and rational.

Sixth: Yes, thousands of contemporary issues have arisen in these times that did not exist in the time of our predecessors, and they require the ijtihād of mujtahids. But who said that this necessitates demolishing the heritage of the madhhabs? And how will they perform ijtihād if they do not build upon the principles of their towering schools? Then, most astonishingly, this alleged contemporary Salafi current has not addressed this vacant gap of ijtihād in the jurisprudence of new developments and calamities (fiqh al-mustajaddāt wa al-nawāzil). Instead, it returns to performing ijtihād in matters of worship and some transactions about which thousands of volumes and research papers already line the shelves of Islamic libraries. Look at the heritage and fatwas of contemporary Salafi imams: where are they concerning the most important new calamities, issues of politics, governance, existing systems, fatwas on repelling aggressors, contemporary political economy, and new scientific issues, etc.? There, you will not sense a single one of them, nor hear a whisper from them. I recall once that a mujāhid student of knowledge (may Allāh have mercy on him) – he was from the Land of the Two Holy Sanctuaries and I believe he was martyred in the Qala-i-Jangi massacre in Mazar-i-Sharif during the battles for the fall of the Emirate of Afghanistan – once burst out in front of me, saying: "I pursued knowledge in Madinah and elsewhere many times and acquired knowledge in it. But I saw that most of our scholars have entered the 'bathroom' in their lessons and have not come out of it." He meant the repetition and reiteration in the jurisprudence of purification (ṭahārah) and its rulings, and repeating and adding to it and around it. For anyone who disapproves, let them count the scholarly lessons there, and follow the fatwa programs and Shari'ah lessons on satellite channels in the Land of the Two Holy Sanctuaries and other countries, and look at their books, tapes, and topics. Yes, we need contemporary ijtihād, and we need to open the gate of ijtihād. But by whom? In what? And how? Let the masters of knowledge, magnanimity, and religious rites of this age answer us that!

The conclusion I have reached on this issue, I summarize in brief points. People, as scholars have mentioned, regarding the issue of following madhhabs or ijtihād, are of three types:

Mujtahid: One who has fulfilled the conditions of ijtihād and possesses the capacity of knowledge and understanding. Such a person performs ijtihād, derives rulings, and issues fatwas based on evidence. I see them in our time, despite those who claim otherwise, as rarer than rare.

Muttabi‘ (Follower): One who follows a mujtahid and is capable of distinguishing evidence. Such a person strives with his understanding to follow what becomes clear to him as evidence attributed to an imam of known standing.

‘Āmmī (Layperson): One who is ignorant of the principles of religion. He follows the opinion of his mufti, whether the mufti is a mujtahid or a muttabi‘ conveying the fatwa and ijtihād of a mujtahid.

The good for the Ummah – according to my belief – lies in returning to the methodology of the Salaf in creed, and adhering to the jurisprudence of the four madhhabs and the jurisprudence of the previous scholars of this Ummah whom the Ummah has attested to for their firm grounding in knowledge, piety, and righteousness. Practically, I advise the youth and students of knowledge, after advising them to adopt the creed of Ahl al-Sunnah wa al-Jamā‘ah, which is the creed of the Saved Sect and the madhhab of the Companions, the Tābi‘īn, the four imams, and other eminent figures of this Ummah. I also advise them to study jurisprudence according to one of the madhhabs they choose. I advise them, especially the youth of the Awakening and Jihād, to study jurisprudence according to one of the madhhabs prevalent in their place of residence, da‘wah, work, and Jihād, so that their deviation from the jurisprudence and rulings familiar to the people does not create a barrier between them and the people. If they choose a madhhab other than the one prevalent where they live, they should at least study and understand the prevalent madhhab as well, to deal with people according to what they are accustomed to, and to guide them with kindness, mercy, and good admonition. If success and facilitation are granted to some of them and Allāh opens the way for them with knowledge, let them begin by specializing as students of knowledge, progressing in the study of the four madhhabs. Then let them ascend further, perhaps Allāh will bless this Ummah with steadfast mujtahids in this time of tribulations. This pursuit, seeking knowledge, requires long years, perseverance, and suitable conditions.

I reiterate the summary of my opinion as advice for whoever accepts it, in two phrases: I support calling the Ummah to the creed of the Salaf, while excusing and respecting those who adopt the methodology of the Khalaf, observing the etiquette of disagreement with them, considering them from Ahl al-Sunnah, and understanding that their errors are to be rejected but do not exclude them from Ahl al-Sunnah. And I support following one of the four madhhabs. Thus, I am for moderate madhhabism that does not involve fanaticism for the madhhab, and that follows what becomes clear to scholars as established evidence, even if from another madhhab of the imams of Ahl al-Sunnah, for the sake of truth, especially in cases of necessity and clear benefit, not for the sake of seeking dispensations and laxity. And Allāh is the Granter of success.

Tenth: The Issue of Takfīr, General Rulings of Takfīr, and the Issue of Declaring a Specific Individual an Apostate (Takfīr al-Mu‘ayyan)

The truth is, I reflected at length before including this issue among the matters of methodology, because it is a thorny issue that cannot be adequately covered except with detail and elaboration, which this book cannot accommodate. However, due to the danger of the problems and occasional excesses that have spread in some Jihādī circles regarding this issue, where some have expanded in takfīr, and due to the danger of the opposite phenomenon that has spread in Islamic Awakening circles and among Muslim scholars, which is excessive irjā’ (deferment of judgment, particularly political irjā’) as an escape from takfīr – because of these two calamities, I decided to address the issue. It is a matter at the core of creedal issues, and among the issues within the sphere of conflict when it concerns large throngs of people who claim Islām then bear arms against us and fight us alongside disbelieving armies, and who claim Islām then fight by all means against those who want the Ummah to live according to its dictates.

I found in what the commentator of Al-‘Aqīdah al-Ṭaḥāwiyyah (may Allāh have mercy on him) detailed, a sufficient and clear summary that includes the fundamental principles of this dangerous issue. His book (may Allāh have mercy on him) is widespread and famous, and it is one of the books for which Allāh has decreed acceptance among the majority of the Ummah throughout the centuries, especially in our current times and in various Awakening circles.

Imām Ibn Abī al-‘Izz al-Ḥanafī said in his commentary on Al-‘Aqīdah al-Ṭaḥāwiyyah: "His statement: 'And we call the people of our Qiblah Muslims and believers as long as they acknowledge what the Prophet (peace be upon him) brought, and affirm everything he said and informed of.'"

Commentary: The Messenger of Allāh, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace, said: "Whoever prays our prayer, faces our qiblah (direction of prayer), and eats our slaughtered animals is a Muslim; he has the same rights and obligations as we do." By this, the Shaykh, may Allāh have mercy on him, indicates that Islām and Īmān (faith) are one, and that a Muslim is not expelled from Islām by committing a sin, as long as he does not deem it lawful. What is meant by his statement "the people of our Qiblah" are those who claim Islām and face the Ka‘bah, even if they are from among the people of heterodox inclinations or sinners, as long as they do not deny anything that the Messenger, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace, brought.

These two meanings will be further discussed, Allāh willing, under the Shaykh’s statements: "We do not declare any of the people of the Qiblah disbelievers for any sin, as long as they do not deem it lawful," and "Islām and Īmān are one, and their people are equal in its core principle."

His statement: "We do not delve into [speculation about] Allāh, nor do we dispute the religion of Allāh."

Commentary: The Shaykh, may Allāh have mercy on him, refers to refraining from the futile discourse of the scholastic theologians and condemning their knowledge, for they speak about the Divine without knowledge or any authority that has come to them. {They follow not except assumption and what [their] souls desire, while there has already come to them from their Lord guidance} (Qur'ān 53:23). It is narrated from Abū Ḥanīfah, may Allāh have mercy on him, that he said: "It is not appropriate for anyone to utter anything about Allāh's essence; rather, he should describe Him with what He has described Himself."

His statement: "We do not argue about the Qur'ān. We testify that it is the speech of the Lord of the Worlds, brought down by the Trustworthy Spirit (Gabriel) upon the master of messengers, Muḥammad, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace. It is the speech of Allāh, Most High; no speech of created beings is comparable to it. We do not say it is created, nor do we oppose the congregation of Muslims."

Commentary: His statement, "We do not argue about the Qur'ān," potentially means that we do not speak about it as the people of deviation did, who differed and argued with falsehood to refute the truth thereby. Instead, we say it is the speech of the Lord of the Worlds, brought down by the Trustworthy Spirit, and so forth, as he stated.

Allāh, Most High, has commanded us not to argue with the People of the Book except in the best way, unless it be with those of them who do wrong. How then should it be with disputing with the people of the Qiblah? For the people of the Qiblah, generally speaking, are better than the People of the Book. Thus, it is not permissible to dispute with those among them who have not done wrong except in the best way. If one errs, it is not said that he is a disbeliever; rather, the proof should be established against him, the rejection of which the Messenger ruled to entail disbelief. Allāh, Most High, has forgiven this Ummah for unintentional error and forgetfulness. This is why the Salaf (pious predecessors) condemned the people of heterodox inclinations and mentioned that their final resort is the sword.

This meaning will be further elaborated, Allāh willing, under the Shaykh's statement: "We consider the congregation (Jamā'ah) to be true and correct, and disunity to be deviation and torment."

His statement: "We do not declare any of the people of the Qiblah disbelievers for any sin, as long as they do not deem it lawful. Nor do we say that sin does not harm the faith of one who commits it."

Commentary: By "people of the Qiblah," he means those mentioned earlier in his statement: "We call the people of our Qiblah Muslims and believers as long as they acknowledge what the Prophet, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace, brought, and accept as true all that he said and informed." With this statement, the Shaykh, may Allāh have mercy on him, intends to refute the Khawārij, who declare Muslims disbelievers for every sin.

Know, may Allāh have mercy upon you and us, that the matter of declaring disbelief (takfīr) and refraining from it is a chapter wherein tribulation and trial have become immense, disagreement has abounded, desires and opinions have become fragmented, and their evidences have conflicted. Regarding the general issue of declaring disbelief upon those who hold corrupt articles of faith and beliefs that oppose the truth with which Allāh sent His Messenger, in reality, or which oppose it in their own conviction, people are at two extremes and a middle path, similar to the disagreement concerning the pronouncement of disbelief upon perpetrators of major practical sins. One group says: "We do not declare any of the people of the Qiblah disbelievers," thus negating the pronouncement of disbelief in a general manner.

This is despite knowing that among the people of the Qiblah are hypocrites, some of whom are more disbelieving than the Jews and Christians, according to the Qur'ān, Sunnah, and consensus. Among them are also those who may manifest some of that disbelief when they are able, while outwardly professing the two testimonies of faith. Furthermore, there is no disagreement among Muslims that if a man openly denies well-established, consecutively transmitted obligations or well-established, consecutively transmitted prohibitions, and the like, he is called to repent. If he repents, well and good; otherwise, he is killed as an apostate disbeliever. Hypocrisy and apostasy are often found in conjunction with religious innovations and immorality, as al-Khallāl mentioned in his Kitāb al-Sunnah, with his chain of narration to Muḥammad ibn Sīrīn, who said: "Indeed, the quickest people to apostatize are the people of heterodox inclinations." He used to believe that this verse was revealed concerning them: {And when you see those who engage in [offensive] discourse concerning Our verses, then turn away from them until they engage in a different topic} (Qur'ān 6:68). For this reason, many Imāms refrained from making the unqualified statement, "We do not declare anyone a disbeliever for a sin." Rather, it is said: "We do not declare them disbelievers for every sin," as the Khawārij do. There is a difference between a general negation (negating the concept entirely) and a negation of generality (negating its universal application). What is required is only the negation of generality, contradicting the Khawārij who declare disbelief for every sin. This is why, and Allāh knows best, the Shaykh, may Allāh have mercy on him, qualified it with his statement, "as long as they do not deem it lawful." In his statement "as long as they do not deem it lawful," there is an indication that his intention with this general negation pertains to every practical sin, not matters of knowledge. However, this presents a difficulty, for the Lawgiver did not content Himself, in practical matters, merely with action without knowledge, nor in matters of knowledge, merely with knowledge without action.

Action is not limited to the actions of the limbs; rather, the actions of the heart are fundamental to the actions of the limbs, and the actions of the limbs are subsidiary, unless his statement "deems it lawful" is taken to imply "believes it to be so" or something similar.

His statement, "Nor do we say that sin does not harm the faith of one who commits it," to the end of his words, is a refutation of the Murji'ah, for they say that sin does not harm with faith, just as obedience does not benefit with disbelief. These are at one extreme, and the Khawārij are at the other. The Khawārij say: "We declare a Muslim a disbeliever for every sin, or for every major sin." Likewise, the Mu'tazilah say that his faith is entirely nullified by a major sin, so that nothing of faith remains with him. However, the Khawārij say he exits faith and enters disbelief. The Mu'tazilah say he exits faith but does not enter disbelief; this is the "station between two stations." By saying he exits faith, they necessitate his eternal damnation in Hellfire. Groups of scholastic theologians, jurists, and Ḥadīth scholars do not say this regarding actions, but they do regarding innovative beliefs, even if the one holding them is interpreting subjectively. They say that everyone who holds such a belief is a disbeliever, not differentiating between the mistaken mujtahid (one qualified to exercise independent reasoning) and others, or they say every innovator is a disbeliever. Such general affirmations lead these groups into grave problems. For consecutively transmitted texts have indicated that whoever has an atom's weight of faith in his heart will be brought out of the Fire. The texts promising reward, which these groups use as evidence, are contradicted by the texts threatening punishment, which the other groups use as evidence.

The discussion on the threat of punishment is detailed in its proper place, and some of it will come when discussing the Shaykh's statement: "The perpetrators of major sins from among them will not abide eternally in the Fire, if they die as monotheists (muwahḥidūn)." The point here is that religious innovations are of this kind. A man may be a believer inwardly and outwardly, but he has made an interpretation in which he erred, either as a mujtahid or as one who was negligent and sinful. It is not said that his faith is nullified merely for that reason, unless there is a Sharī'ah proof indicating so. Rather, this is akin to the view of the Khawārij and the Mu'tazilah.

We do not say that such a person is not declared a disbeliever. Rather, justice lies in the middle path: that false, innovative, forbidden statements which entail negating what the Messenger affirmed, or affirming what he negated, or commanding what he forbade, or forbidding what he commanded—the truth is stated concerning them, the threat of punishment indicated by the texts is affirmed for them, and it is clarified that they constitute disbelief. It is said that whoever utters them is a disbeliever, and so forth. This is similar to the warnings mentioned concerning injustice against oneself or others' property. Indeed, many renowned Ahl al-Sunnah scholars have declared those disbelievers who claimed the Qur'ān was created, or that Allāh will not be seen in the Hereafter, or that He does not know things before they occur. It is narrated from Abū Yūsuf, may Allāh have mercy upon him, that he said: "I debated Abū Ḥanīfah, may Allāh have mercy upon him, for a period until my opinion and his concurred that whoever says the Qur'ān is created is a disbeliever."

However, as for a specific individual, if it is asked, "Do you testify that he is among those subject to the threat of punishment and that he is a disbeliever?"—we do not testify to this except concerning a matter where testimony is permissible. For it is one of the greatest forms of transgression to testify against a specific individual that Allāh will not forgive him nor have mercy on him, but rather will cause him to abide eternally in the Fire, for this is the judgment for a disbeliever after death.

This is why Abū Dāwūd, in his Sunan, in the Book of Manners, in the chapter on the prohibition of transgression, mentioned a narration from Abū Hurayrah, may Allāh be pleased with him, who said: "I heard the Messenger of Allāh, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace, say: 'There were two men among the Children of Israel who were close companions. One of them used to sin, while the other was diligent in worship. The diligent one would constantly see the other sinning and say, "Desist!" One day, he found him committing a sin and said to him, "Desist!" The sinner replied, "Leave me to my Lord! Were you sent as a guardian over me?" The worshipper then said, "By Allāh, Allāh will not forgive you," or "Allāh will not admit you to Paradise." Then their souls were taken, and they were gathered before the Lord of the Worlds. He said to the diligent worshipper, "Were you knowledgeable of Me, or were you in control of what is in My hand?" And He said to the sinner, "Go and enter Paradise by My mercy." And He said concerning the other, "Take him to the Fire."" Abū Hurayrah said: "By Him in Whose hand is my soul, he uttered a word that ruined his worldly life and his Hereafter." This is a ḥasan (good) Ḥadīth.

Furthermore, a specific individual might be a mujtahid who erred and is forgiven. It is possible that the texts clarifying the matter did not reach him. It is also possible that he possesses great faith and good deeds that have earned him Allāh's mercy, just as Allāh forgave the man who said, "When I die, cremate me and then scatter my ashes," and Allāh forgave him due to his fear, even though he thought Allāh would not be able to gather and resurrect him, or he doubted it. However, this suspension of judgment regarding the Hereafter does not prevent us from punishing him in this world to prevent his innovation, or from calling him to repent; if he repents, fine, otherwise we may execute him.

Then, if the statement itself is disbelief, it is said that it is disbelief, and the one who says it is declared a disbeliever only if certain conditions are met and impediments are absent. This only occurs if he becomes a hypocrite or a heretic (zindīq).

Thus, it is inconceivable that anyone from the people of the Qiblah who outwardly professes Islām would be declared a disbeliever unless he is a hypocrite or a heretic.

The Book of Allāh clarifies this, for Allāh has classified creation therein into three categories: a category of disbelievers from among the polytheists and the People of the Book, who are those who do not affirm the two testimonies of faith; a category of those who are believers inwardly and outwardly; and a category of those who affirm it outwardly but not inwardly. These three categories are mentioned at the beginning of Sūrat al-Baqarah. Anyone who is proven to be a disbeliever in reality, yet outwardly professes the two testimonies, can only be a heretic, and a heretic is a hypocrite.

Here, the error of both extreme positions becomes apparent. For whoever declares everyone who utters an innovative statement a disbeliever in their inner state would necessarily declare disbelievers people who are not inwardly hypocrites, but rather inwardly love Allāh and His Messenger and believe in Allāh and His Messenger, even if they are sinners. This is established in Ṣaḥīḥ al-Bukhārī from Aslam, the freed slave of ‘Umar, may Allāh be pleased with him, from ‘Umar, who said: “During the time of the Prophet, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace, there was a man named ‘Abd Allāh, who was nicknamed Ḥimār (donkey), and he used to make the Messenger of Allāh, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace, laugh. The Messenger of Allāh, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace, had him flogged for drinking alcohol. One day, he was brought, and the Prophet ordered him to be flogged. A man from among the people said, ‘O Allāh, curse him! How often he is brought for this!’ The Messenger of Allāh, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace, said, ‘Do not curse him, for by Allāh, what I know of him is that he loves Allāh and His Messenger.’”

This is a matter of certainty regarding many groups and Imāms in knowledge and religion who may have held some views associated with the Jahmiyyah, Murji’ah, Qadariyyah, Shi‘ah, or Khawārij. However, Imāms in knowledge and religion do not typically uphold the entirety of such an innovation, but rather a branch of it. This is why adherents of these heterodox inclinations have attributed themselves to various renowned figures among the Salaf. One of the flaws of the people of innovation is that they declare one another disbelievers, whereas one of the commendable traits of the people of knowledge is that they identify errors but do not declare disbelievers.

However, an objection arises here regarding the Shaykh's statement, which is that the Lawgiver has named some sins "kufr" (disbelief). Allāh, Most High, says: {And whoever does not judge by what Allāh has revealed - then it is those who are the disbelievers} (Qur'ān 5:44). The Messenger of Allāh, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace, said: "Insulting a Muslim is wickedness (fusūq), and fighting him is disbelief (kufr)." (Agreed upon, from a Ḥadīth of Ibn Mas'ūd, may Allāh be pleased with him). He also said: "Do not revert to being disbelievers after me, striking the necks of one another." And: "If a man says to his brother, 'O disbeliever!,' then it (the charge of disbelief) returns to one of them." (Agreed upon, from a Ḥadīth of Ibn 'Umar, may Allāh be pleased with him). He also said: "There are four characteristics, whoever possesses them is a pure hypocrite, and whoever possesses one of them has a characteristic of hypocrisy until he abandons it: when he speaks, he lies; when he makes a promise, he breaks it; when he makes a covenant, he betrays it; and when he disputes, he behaves immorally." (Agreed upon, from a Ḥadīth of 'Abd Allāh ibn 'Umar, may Allāh be pleased with him). He also said: "The adulterer is not a believer while he is committing adultery, nor is the thief a believer while he is stealing, nor is the wine-drinker a believer while he is drinking wine." And repentance is available thereafter. He also said: "Between a Muslim and disbelief is the abandonment of prayer." (Narrated by Muslim from Jābir, may Allāh be pleased with him). He also said: "Whoever goes to a soothsayer and believes him, or has intercourse with a woman in her posterior, has disbelieved in what was revealed to Muḥammad." And he said: "Whoever swears by other than Allāh has committed disbelief." (Narrated by al-Ḥākim with this wording). He also said: "Two traits in my Ummah constitute disbelief in them: slandering lineage and wailing over the dead." There are many similar examples.

The answer is that Ahl al-Sunnah are all in agreement that the perpetrator of a major sin does not become a disbeliever in a way that expels him entirely from the religion, as the Khawārij claimed. For if he were to become a disbeliever in a way that expels him from the religion, he would be an apostate who must be killed under all circumstances, and the victim's kin would not be able to pardon him in cases of retaliation, nor would the prescribed legal punishments (ḥudūd) for adultery, theft, and wine-drinking be applicable. The invalidity and corruption of this view are necessarily known from the religion of Islām.

They also agree that he is not expelled from Īmān and Islām, nor does he enter disbelief, nor does he deserve eternal punishment with the disbelievers, as the Mu'tazilah claimed, for their view is also false. Allāh has indeed referred to the perpetrator of a major sin as being among the believers. Allāh, Most High, says: {O you who have believed, prescribed for you is legal retribution for those murdered...} until He says: {But whoever is pardoned by his brother for anything, then it should be followed with appropriate action} (Qur'ān 2:178). He did not exclude the murderer from "those who have believed" and made him a "brother" to the avenger of blood. What is meant is undoubtedly brotherhood in religion. Allāh, Most High, also says: {And if two factions among the believers should fight, then make settlement between the two...} until He says: {The believers are but brothers, so make settlement between your brothers} (Qur'ān 49:9-10). The texts of the Qur'ān, the Sunnah, and the consensus (ijmā') indicate that the adulterer, the thief, and the slanderer are not killed but rather have the prescribed legal punishment established upon them, which shows that they are not apostates. It is authentically narrated from the Prophet, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace, that he said: "Whoever has wronged his brother today regarding his honor or anything else, let him resolve it with him today before there is no dirham and no dīnār. If he has a good deed, some of it will be taken according to his wrongdoing. If he has no good deeds, some of his companion's (the victim's) sins will be taken and cast upon him, then he will be thrown into the Fire." (Narrated by al-Bukhārī and Muslim). This establishes that the wrongdoer may have good deeds from which the wronged person will receive his due. Similarly, it is authentically narrated from the Prophet, may Allāh bless him and grant him peace, that he said: "Whom do you count as bankrupt among you?" They said, 'The bankrupt among us is one who has no dirham and no dīnār.' He said, 'The bankrupt one is he who comes on the Day of Resurrection with good deeds like mountains, but he comes having insulted this one, taken the wealth of that one, shed the blood of this one, slandered that one, and struck that one. So this one will take from his good deeds, and that one will take from his good deeds. If his good deeds are exhausted before he settles what he owes, some of their sins will be taken and cast upon him, then he will be thrown into the Fire.'" (Narrated by Muslim). Allāh, Most High, has said: {Indeed, good deeds do away with misdeeds} (Qur'ān 11:114). This indicates that while committing misdeeds, he may also perform good deeds that erase his misdeeds. This is elaborated upon in its proper place. The Mu'tazilah agree with the Khawārij here regarding the judgment in the Hereafter, for they concur with them that the perpetrator of a major sin will abide eternally in the Fire. However, the Khawārij call him a disbeliever, while the Mu'tazilah call him a transgressor (fāsiq). The difference between them is merely semantic.

Ahl al-Sunnah also agree that he deserves the threat of punishment associated with that sin, as mentioned in the texts, not as the Murji'ah say that sin does not harm with faith, nor does obedience benefit with disbelief. If you combine the texts promising reward, which the Murji'ah use as evidence, and the texts threatening punishment, which the Khawārij and Mu'tazilah use as evidence, the falsehood of both views will become clear to you. There is no benefit in the discourse of these groups except that you learn from the words of each group the corruption of the doctrine of the other.

Then, after this agreement, it becomes clear that Ahl al-Sunnah differed semantically, a difference that does not lead to corruption. This difference is whether disbelief can be of varying degrees, such as "disbelief less than disbelief" (kufr dūna kufr), just as they differed on whether faith can be of varying degrees, "faith less than faith." This disagreement arose from their differing definitions of Īmān: whether it is statement and action, increasing and decreasing, or not, after their agreement that whoever Allāh, Most High, and His Messenger call a disbeliever, we call him a disbeliever. For it is impossible that Allāh, Glorified is He, should call the one who rules by other than what Allāh revealed a disbeliever, and His Messenger should call those mentioned earlier disbelievers, and yet we do not apply the term "disbelief" to them. However, those who said that Īmān is statement and action, increasing and decreasing, said: "It is practical disbelief, not creedal disbelief." Disbelief, according to them, is of varying degrees, "disbelief less than disbelief," just like Īmān according to them. And those who said that Īmān is affirmation (taṣdīq) and that action is not included in the definition of Īmān, and that disbelief is denial (juḥūd), and that neither increases nor decreases, said: "It is metaphorical disbelief, not actual disbelief." For actual disbelief is that which expels from the religion. Similarly, they say concerning the naming of some actions as Īmān, such as His, Most High's, statement: {And Allāh would not let your īmān (faith/prayers) be lost} (Qur'ān 2:143)—meaning your prayers towards Jerusalem—that they were called Īmān metaphorically because their validity depends on Īmān, or because they are indicative of Īmān, as they show that the one performing them is a believer. This is why a disbeliever is judged to have entered Islām if he performs our prayer. So, there is no dispute among the jurists of the Ummah regarding sinners, if they affirm inwardly and outwardly what the Messenger brought and what has been consecutively transmitted from them, that they are subject to the threat of punishment. However, the deviant views are those of groups like the Khawārij and Mu'tazilah, who claim their eternal damnation in the Fire. But the worst aspect of this is the fanaticism against those who oppose them, obligating upon those who differ with their view things that are not necessary, and denigrating them.

If we are commanded to be just in disputing with disbelievers and to argue with them in the best way, how then can we not be just with one another in such a disagreement? Allāh, Most High, says: {O you who have believed, be persistently standing firm for Allāh, witnesses in justice, and do not let the hatred of a people prevent you from being just. Be just; that is nearer to righteousness} (Qur'ān 5:8).

Here is a matter that must be understood: ruling by other than what Allāh has revealed may be disbelief that expels from the religion, or it may be a major or minor sin, and it may be metaphorical disbelief or lesser disbelief, according to the two aforementioned views. This depends on the state of the ruler. If he believes that ruling by what Allāh has revealed is not obligatory and that he has a choice in the matter, or he belittles it while being certain that it is Allāh's judgment, then this is major disbelief. If he believes in the obligation of ruling by what Allāh has revealed and knows it in this specific case, but deviates from it while acknowledging that he deserves punishment, then this person is a sinner and is called a disbeliever metaphorically, or [it is] lesser disbelief. If he is ignorant of Allāh's judgment in the matter, despite exerting his utmost effort to know the ruling, and he errs, then this person is mistaken, and he receives a reward for his ijtihād (independent reasoning), and his error is forgiven.

The Shaykh, may Allāh have mercy on him, by his statement, "Nor do we say that sin does not harm the faith of one who commits it," intended to oppose the Murji'ah. Their specious argument had occurred to some of the early Muslims, and the Companions agreed to execute them if they did not repent from it. Qudāmah ibn ‘Abd Allāh and a group with him drank wine after its prohibition, misinterpreting the verse: {There is no blame upon those who believe and do righteous deeds for what they consume as long as they fear Allāh and believe and do righteous deeds} (Qur’ān 5:93). When this was mentioned to ‘Umar ibn al-Khaṭṭāb, may Allāh be pleased with him, he, ‘Alī ibn Abī Ṭālib, and the rest of the Companions agreed that if they acknowledged the prohibition, they would be flogged, but if they persisted in deeming it lawful, they would be killed. ‘Umar said to Qudāmah: "You have dug your own grave! Had you feared Allāh, believed, and done righteous deeds, you would not have drunk wine." This is because this verse was revealed when Allāh, Glorified is He, prohibited wine—and its prohibition occurred after the Battle of Uḥud—some Companions asked, "What about our companions who died while they were drinking wine?" So Allāh revealed this verse, clarifying that whoever consumed something when it was not prohibited incurs no blame if he is among the believing, God-fearing, righteous individuals. This was similar to the matter of facing Bayt al-Maqdis (Jerusalem in prayer). Then, those who did that (i.e., Qudāmah and his group) are to be blamed for having erred and despaired of repentance. ‘Umar wrote to Qudāmah, saying: "{Ḥā. Mīm. The revelation of the Book is from Allāh, the Exalted in Might, the Knowing. The Forgiver of sin, Acceptor of repentance, Severe in punishment} (Qur’ān 40:1-3). I do not know which of your two sins is greater: your deeming lawful what is forbidden, firstly, or your despairing of Allāh’s mercy, secondly." This which the Companions agreed upon is also agreed upon among the Imāms of Islām.

His words (the commentator’s), may Allāh have mercy on him, end here. They contain sufficient clarification, rendering further explanation unnecessary.

I conclude this section with what the Proof of Islām, Imām Abū Ḥāmid al-Ghazālī, may Allāh have mercy on him, said in his book Al-Tafrīqah bayna al-Īmān wa al-Zandaqah (The Distinction between Faith and Heresy): "What is incumbent is to exercise caution in declaring disbelief (takfīr) as long as one finds a way to do so. For deeming permissible the blood of those who pray and affirm Tawhīd is an error, and erring in sparing a thousand disbelievers in life is less grave than erring in shedding the blood of a single Muslim." And Allāh, Most High, knows best.

I transmit this so that the mujāhidīn and the students of knowledge among them may increase in caution regarding their religion and their tongues when judging the religious status of people, especially the common Muslims. This is not to be an argument for the Murji'ah and their extremist followers in our time, may Allāh fight them. For in the epistles of this book of mine, there is sufficient indication of my urging for Jihād against the invading disbelievers and their apostate collaborators, their soldiers, and their helpers, with the sword and spear, and for declaring disbelievers those who legislate and rule by other than what Allāh has revealed, as well as declaring disbelievers those apostate rulers who aid the disbelievers and support them against the Muslims, or their soldiers and armies who do so. Similar to them are the imāms of disbelief from among the secularists who revile the religion of Allāh. Likewise, my urging not to neglect the Jihād against their scholars, their media outlets, and the programs of intellectual warfare they have invented, using proof and clear exposition.

In conclusion, I advise the mujāhidīn to leave delving into these complex issues to the scholars and students of knowledge who are capable of navigating their difficult depths, and to turn instead to fighting the enemies of Allāh, applying what they have become certain of regarding this obligation which is incumbent upon every Muslim today.

At the end of this chapter, I affirm that the Islamic creed, and the Jihādī creed that branches from it, is the foundation of every movement and behavior of the believing mujāhid. The level of his conduct in this life and his stances towards what he encounters in it will be commensurate with the clarity of this creed in his heart and mind.

The effects of the clarity, presence, and firmness of this creed are not hidden. It has a profound impact in producing the righteous, well-mannered believer, and the ideologically steadfast mujāhid, by the grace of Allāh. Similarly, the effects of its absence or distortion are not hidden. It has a profound impact on people's descent into the depths of immorality, misguidance, weakness, and humiliation, as we live through and witness clearly today. The beginning is from here. And may Allāh have mercy on the one who said: "The latter part of this Ummah will not be rectified except by that which rectified its first part."

Foundations of the Political Theory for the Call of Global Islamic Resistance

If we were to establish our political theory by examining the shortcomings or failures in the political propositions of previous Jihādī experiences, we would unfortunately find that most Jihādī experiences lacked detailed political theories, and in some cases, even concise ones. This is on one hand. On the other hand, we must consider the difference between the primary political objective of Jihādī organizations, which is to overthrow existing regimes and establish an Islamic system, and the objective of the call to resistance, which is to repel the invading occupier and his collaborators. Therefore, we will proceed directly to define the features of our political theory without addressing the shortcomings of previous experiences. And Allāh is the granter of success.

First: Introduction and General Principles

Before delving into the political theory of the call for Global Islamic Resistance, it is useful to present a number of political definitions and concepts that will aid in understanding our theory and the foundations upon which it is built.

1. The Status of Sharī'ah-Compliant Politics:

Politics is a science and an art that has existed since humanity began. It has evolved since ancient times until we reached these modern ages where human activity and interests revolve around it and its related aspects. Politics for non-Muslims differs from politics as we understand it. One of the most concise expressions I found regarding its reality among them was articulated by Montgomery, the famous British military commander in World War II, when he said:

"War is a dirty business... but politics, oh God!" It suffices that they based it on their saying:

"In politics, there are no permanent relationships... In politics, there are no permanent principles... In politics, there are permanent interests."

Today, with the dominance of the forces of disbelief, injustice, and tyranny in the unbelieving world, as well as in our world metaphorically termed "Islamic," politics has come to be based on Machiavellian principles, which demolish every religion, moral, and principle in the face of interests, purposes, and whims. Consequently, breaking covenants, changing positions, revoking principles, and violating the fundamentals of morality are not considered flaws, because they have become an accepted norm.

However, politics for us Muslims is something different, like all aspects of human activity on this earth. It is governed by Sharīʿah rulings and falls under His taʿala saying: {We have neglected nothing in the Book} and His, Glorified be He, saying: {And We have sent down to you the Book as an explanation of all things}. Hence, its principles, sciences, and related matters among Muslims are termed "Sharīʿah-compliant politics."

This science has occupied a prestigious position among the sciences of Sharīʿah. Books have been authored on it since the early days of Islām. Scholars have addressed its rules in statements found scattered throughout their various books, interspersed with other sciences, as was the custom of the ancients. Then, it began to be treated separately with the stabilization and development of the Islamic Caliphate, its transformation to an imperial scale in the Umayyad and then Abbasid eras and beyond, and the dealings of sultans and scholars with various issues that arose from the multiplicity of Islamic peoples, the emergence of new matters, the need for codification, and the governance of "religion and worldly affairs," as it was called among Muslims, as well as the need to deal with political disputes and problems, and so on. The sciences of Sharīʿah-compliant politics began to develop, and scholars started to compile independent, categorized books on this science. These covered all areas of ruler-ruled relations and the resulting aspects of agreement and disagreement, as well as the relations of Muslims with non-Muslims living among them, and their relations with disbelievers in states of war and peace, covenant and security, and other such matters.

They left us a tremendous heritage and wonderfully encyclopedic references that constitute an exceptionally broad point of reference, a foundation upon which contemporary jurists rely to derive rulings for recurring situations and their causes, and to lean on for independent reasoning (ijtihād), derivation, and analogy in newly arisen aspects of issues.

The rulings of Sharīʿah-compliant politics are: Sharīʿah rulings + understanding of reality and political data.

2. The Relationship Between Sharīʿah and Politics is that of the Constant and the Variable:

A legal opinion (fatwā) and ruling in matters of Sharīʿah-compliant politics, like the premises of any legal opinion, are composed of knowledge of the fixed Sharīʿah rulings, their principles, and rules; then, knowledge of the details of the incident requiring a ruling; then, applying those rulings after acquiring knowledge to that incident after understanding it. Thus, the issuer of the legal opinion arrives at the correct independent reasoning, or at least one for which he will receive either the reward of one who errs or the two rewards of one who is correct.

Sharīʿah rulings are of two types: one type is fixed, with no alteration due to the stability of causes and the bases of rulings, such as matters of worship, inheritance, and many rulings on transactions and sales, etc. Rulings in these areas do not change, neither in the past nor in the present. The other type relates to the evolution of human activities and the emergence of new issues, such as many rulings on transactions, commerce, and newly emergent financial matters, for example.

Politics is at the forefront of matters where the Sharīʿah has regulated rulings within broad outlines. Many issues therein are contingent upon the consequences of benefits and harms, and the estimations of people of opinion, experience, and expertise. Thus, an action may be permissible and lawful under certain conditions estimated by those knowledgeable in the matter, and it may be forbidden if those conditions are absent, based on the same Sharīʿah principles. Likewise, it is one of the areas where analogical reasoning (qiyās), presumption of continuity (istiṣhāb) of circumstances and conditions, juristic preference (istiḥsān), and custom (ʿurf) are widely applicable. The domain of public interest (maṣāliḥ mursalah) and rulings of necessity are also broad in this field. Therefore, those who engage in it need to combine three things:

First, knowledge of the Sharīʿah. Second, an understanding of reality. Third, a high degree of piety (taqwā) that keeps them free from personal whims. Let us give examples that people are familiar with, one of fixed rulings and the other of variable ones.

The rulings on ritual purity (ṭahārah) and acts of worship (ʿibādāt) are all fixed. Any event that nullifies ritual purity happens to a person today just as it has happened to every person since Allāh's creation; thus, the rulings are fixed. All rulings on acts of worship are based on revelation and are detailed.

Let us take an example of the variable: the rule concerning rebellion against a disbelieving ruler from whom open disbelief (kufr bawāḥ) has appeared, with explicit and authentic texts in the Qurʾān and Sunnah. However, jurists, in the well-known legal opinion transmitted from Qāḍī ʿIyāḍ, stated: If the ruler apostatizes, Muslims may rebel against him and depose him if they believe they have the ability to do so.

Who then assesses this presumed ability? Are people's understandings of it equal? How many factors intertwine and alter their assessments? How much understanding, precision, piety, and freedom from personal whim does this require? The same can be said for matters of enjoining good and forbidding evil, which is an obligation. Scholars have stipulated for this that it should result in good and not lead to a greater evil from the enjoining, otherwise it becomes forbidden. So who assesses the outcomes to permit or prohibit a form of enjoining and forbidding? Similarly, seeking assistance from non-Muslims to repel an aggressor against Muslims. All scholars, even those who forbade seeking help from non-Muslims in Jihād, like the Zāhirīs and others, agreed that if the people of Islām are on the verge of destruction, it is permissible by consensus. In other situations, some permitted it while others differed. What are the bases for rulings in such cases? They are the assessments of just, pious individuals, those of experience and expertise, people of understanding and reason, and the leaders and pious scholars of the people.

The Sharīʿah and its rulings are constant. Their application to the reality of human actions, intentions, hearts, and behaviors – all of which are variable – results in the rulings of Sharīʿah-compliant politics being flexible and variable, within the framework of the general stability of the fundamentals of Sharīʿah principles. Therefore, opining on these matters is one of the most delicate and difficult issues, and perhaps this is the most difficult and dangerous domain of jurisprudence and legal opinion-giving absolutely.

3. Resistance Activities and Their Domains: A Religious Obligation, Sharīʿah Rulings, and Political Reality:

Contemporary sociologists and political scientists have defined war as politics by violent means. This is correct. All wars and conflicts are the violent face of political relations when avenues of understanding through diplomatic and political means are severed.

They also said that wars are instruments of politics, and this is also correct. If we look at the equivalent among us Muslims from the perspective of our Sharīʿah rulings, we find this to be true. Jihād is a religious obligation and its rulings are religious, but its rules, principles, and consequences – whether it is offensive Jihād (jihād al-ṭalab) or defensive Jihād (jihād al-dafʿ) – constitute a domain for political relations with enemies and friends. Activities and relations of a political nature arise from it.

If we come to our topic, which is resistance – resistance against the encroaching colonial powers attacking us with comprehensive plans targeting all aspects of human activity and civilizational components – we would find that resistance is a political act, with all the meaning and dimensions this very brief definition entails. Resistance activities, in their comprehensive sense, cannot achieve an objective or yield results without a program for the political capitalization of Jihādī sacrifices and military actions, all of which must be programmed to be a means to an end.

The military means are for defeating the invaders, expelling them from our lands, deflecting their schemes from us, overthrowing the regimes of their allies, and establishing our independent, legitimate systems. Thus, it is a means to entirely political ends.

Because it is governed by the constants of our Sharīʿah, we define resistance as: Acts of armed Jihād to achieve legitimate political objectives: to repel the encroaching enemy, to make the word of Allāh supreme, to raise His banner, and to implement His law. Thereby, resistance becomes Jihād in the cause of Allāh, and being killed under its banner is martyrdom in the cause of Allāh, accepted by Allāh, Glorified and Exalted be He, through His mercy and grace.

4. Resistance Activities are a Form of Guerrilla Warfare and a Political Act:

The method of guerrilla warfare is a strategic art composed of military tactics that have become well-known and studied, evolving into a science with its own principles. In it, the weak employ their actions within their limited capabilities to exhaust the adversary through protracted war, aiming to place the enemy in political situations that leave them with the choice of withdrawal or internal collapse.

Guerrilla warfare, throughout its entire history, has never been about the complete destruction of the adversary's forces and armies to win the war. Indeed, most wars in modern times no longer end conflicts through the material destruction of the adversary, except in very rare cases. Instead, wars have become a means to push the enemy into political, economic, and social situations that lead to their defeat and retreat.

I am not here to digress into explaining this art. I refer the reader to a number of lectures I have recorded on this subject, which are published. The most extensive among them is a series of lectures titled "Explanation of the Book 'War of the Oppressed'," recorded on 31 tapes. The relevant conclusion here is that guerrilla warfare relies on the skillful utilization of political and media means to leverage the military efforts undertaken by guerrillas or weak resistance fighters against formidable forces superior in numbers, capabilities, and resources. Coordination in resistance activities – between military effort, media, and political tactics, through a long-term war of attrition – leads to pushing the enemy into a state of collapse due to pressure from internal or external public opinion, making it impossible for them to continue the confrontation and maintain the pillars of their existence and their internal and external relations.

In summary, military victory in resistance activities has a political character and cannot be achieved without an effective military instrument and a resistance that inflicts real strikes and losses on the ground. Discussing this would be lengthy, and this brief mention suffices here as a paragraph in the introduction.

5. Resistance and the Theory of Recruitment, Neutralization, and Dismantlement:

The arena of conflict between any two opposing parties, as well as between the resistance and its enemies, consists of the following graduated spectrum:

1. Members of the resistance.
2. Supporters and sympathizers of the resistance.
3. Neutrals between the resistance and the adversary's camp.
4. Supporters and sympathizers of the resistance's enemies.
5. Enemies actively fighting the resistance.

The efforts of outreach (da'wah) and political action for any resistance, and for any party in any conflict, are directed through media and political means, and sometimes even military means, to make the trajectory of transformation move these components from the end towards the beginning.

That is, to convert as many components, elements, and blocs as possible from the fifth rank, the enemy's direct confrontation camp, to the fourth rank, to become mere supporters of the enemy without direct involvement in fighting or aid. Then, to move this stratum from the fourth rank to the third, to become neutral in the ongoing conflict. Then, to move these to the second rank, to become supporters of the resistance without participating in its active engagement. And finally, to convert as many of these as possible into members of the resistance, through this mechanism:

Enemy camp → Enemy supporter → Neutral in the conflict → Resistance supporter → Participant in resistance.

When a set of military, political, media, or other actions leads to a reversal of this trajectory, and the leaders of the resistance, or any group engaged in any form of conflict, even a commercial company competing in the market, notice that the equation is moving in reverse – such that members defect, supporters dwindle and become neutral, neutrals shift to supporting and endorsing the enemy, and some distant supporters of the enemy join the enemy camp – then this group should know that Allāh has tested them with a leadership driving them towards failure and defeat, and that their program of action and method of operation are built on erroneous foundations.

This is the general rule, with few exceptions, in matters of mobilization in the world of politics and conflicts. The political process must be facilitated to ensure recruitment from the ranks of supporters, neutralization among the enemy's supporters, and dismantlement within the enemy's ranks. Thus, the circle of resistance and its members, and the circle of its supporters, expands. The circle of neutrality close to the enemy shrinks, and as many as possible are moved to the circle of positive neutrality in favor of the resistance. The circle of enemy supporters disintegrates and moves towards neutrality, and the largest possible number of blocs and individuals withdraw from the enemy's ranks.

6. The Theory of Mobilization, the Key to Conflict, and the Jihādī Atmosphere:

In books concerned with the components of revolutions, principles of resistance, and guerrilla warfare, one finds these terms:

The Theory of Mobilization:

This refers to the set of political and propaganda activities that provide resistance fighters with an expanding circle of supporters and sympathizers, which in turn facilitates the recruitment of new elements. It also provides them with logistical services, the ability to hide, and to be supplied with material necessities and information.

The Key to Conflict:

This is the set of slogans, objectives, and issues that the resistance presents to convince people of its cause and its justice, qualifying them to be among the mobilized supporters or members. We term this: The Key to Jihād and Resistance, to align with our Sharī'ah-based Islamic methodology and discourse.

The Revolutionary Atmosphere:

This refers to the general mood and the point at which public opinion becomes convinced that the problem with the enemy, whether a colonizer or a tyrannical, unjust government, has reached an impasse, such that armed action is the only possible solution. At this point, sacrifices become easier for people to bear, given their dire situation and practical suffering, whether due to the violation of religious sanctities, social customs and traditions, killing of individuals, threats to honor, plunder of wealth, erosion of national dignity, foreign occupation, injustice, poverty, or destitution, and so forth.

We call this "The Jihādī Atmosphere" to suit our thought and discourse.

It is the general climate in which Muslims become convinced of making sacrifices and treading the path of armed Jihād in the cause of Allāh.

7. The Boundaries of the Circle of Conflict and the Theory of the Dividing Line Between Matters of Truth and Falsehood:

Muslims are adherents of a divine religion, a comprehensive civilization, and an integrated way of life; this is well-known. Because they are the bearers, advocates, and representatives of truth, the forces of falsehood and error, and the people of whims and corruption, have throughout history been enemies of this religion and its people, or have differed with them in methodology and principles, at varying degrees of disagreement. This is in the nature of things and one of the laws of creation; as long as there is truth, there is falsehood, and there is conflict between the bearers of each. As long as there is right, there is wrong, and there is contradiction between them and divergence between their adherents.

If we were to enumerate the principles of true Islām, and the rules of guidance, aspects of correctness, and the straight path that branch from them, we would be unable to encompass them all. It is an integrated belief system and a detailed Shari‘ah. There is no matter of life on this earth, nor any aspect of human activity, for which the Shari‘ah does not have a ruling – be it commanded, prohibited, or permissible – and for which religion does not have an opinion as to whether it is truth or falsehood, or wrong or right.

Opposite every truth and correctness contained in the principles of this religion, there is a falsehood or error that contradicts and opposes it. If we were to represent this with a diagram to clarify the intended meaning, depicting the domains of truth and correctness, and falsehood and error, and the separator between them, we would find two domains separated by a dividing line as follows: [A diagram is implied here by the author, but not provided in the text.]

This applies to every issue in the areas of disagreement between Muslims, the people of truth, and their opponents, the people of falsehood. Thus, if you were to give examples and represent each issue as a point in the diagram, you would find that matters of creed for the People of the Sunnah and the Community (Ahl al-Sunnah wa al-Jamā‘ah), as well as all their actions and behaviors, are represented by points in domain (1). And you would find the creeds of the people of disbelief, as well as the people of whims and error among Muslims, and all their behaviors, represented by points in domain (2). We must assume that the dividing line between truth and falsehood does not allow any issue to exist upon it, because it is not possible for any issue, opinion, or statement to be both true and false at the same time, nor to be wrong and right simultaneously. This is not tolerated by reason or logic, and this is self-evident.

If we come to our conflict today, between the disbelieving invaders and their allies, and the resisting mujāhidīn and their allies, concerning any action, statement, or position today, we would find that the issues of conflict between us and our enemies have a defined circle within the absolute, open domain of matters of truth and falsehood. The boundaries of the circle of our conflict, as a call for global Islamic resistance and those who assist us, against the Jewish-Crusader campaigns led by America and its allies and those who stand with them, are that they are an aggressor against us, seeking to destroy our civilization and eliminate our entity and existence, representing a consolidated front. We, on the other hand, want to repel this aggressor and preserve our religion, our lives, our honor, and our resources.

So that matters of conflict and disagreement do not branch out into all issues of truth and falsehood, right and wrong, we represent the boundaries of our conflict as a resistance against our enemies with a limited circle within the domain of truth and falsehood. This circle has boundaries that define all its issues – doctrinal, intellectual, political, media-related, etc. We call it the "boundaries of the circle of conflict." The diagram representing general matters of truth and falsehood, and the issues of the conflict, would then be as follows: [Another diagram is implied here.]

The absolute domain of truth and falsehood, right and wrong.

We would find that the dividing line between truth and falsehood divides the issues within the circle of conflict into what we term (3) and (4). From here, we can classify every idea, belief, statement, opinion, action, piece of literature, poem, legal opinion, behavior, etc., to find its place in this diagram<sup>1</sup> and its four domains, and it will fall into one of four classifications:

- Matters of truth and correctness that do not fall within the circle of conflict, its boundaries, and its domain: (1)
- Matters of falsehood and error that do not fall within the circle of conflict, its boundaries, and its domain: (2)
- Matters of truth and correctness related to the issues of the resistance's conflict with its enemies and its domain: (3)
- Matters of truth and correctness related to the issues of the resistance's conflict with its enemies and its domain: (4)

We clarify this diagram to say:

For the resistance to achieve its objectives, and as a matter of prioritizing, preferring the important over the more important, procuring benefits and repelling harms, choosing the lesser of two benefits if both cannot be attained, and repelling the greater of two harms with the lesser if the choice is unavoidable; it is upon us, as a matter of specialization, to devote ourselves today in our confrontations to matters related to the issues of the "call of resistance," whether these confrontations are Jihādī military, political, media, intellectual, literary, or anything that occupies us and requires any form of effort from us, or exposes us to any form of cost. We must concern ourselves with the limited issues within the framework of the boundaries of the circle of conflict. And everyone is guided to that for which he was created.

For other domains of goodness, truth, and endeavor, there are those among Muslims who are suited for them and who have dedicated themselves to them. May Allāh assist them in what they have devoted themselves to and accept it from them.

Every idea, opinion, behavior, statement, or action that helps launch the resistance or directly nurtures its roots is an objective of the resistance, which supports it with opinion, word, and aid. Conversely, anything that obstructs the resistance, dries up its roots, and aids its enemies, the call of resistance has a stance against it, confronting it appropriately by military, political, media, or any legitimate means. Just as we must not branch out and waste our efforts on futile words and deeds, or enter into endless conflicts of truth and falsehood, right and wrong, we must also pay attention to every issue falling within the boundaries of the circle of conflict. The many forms of religious innovations (bid'ah) rampant among Muslims today, deviations, grave veneration, misguidance, manifestations of immorality (fusūq), sins, etc., are endless. All are manifestations of the absence of a legitimate Islamic leader (Imām) and the non-implementation of Sharī'ah. They appeared with its disappearance and will disappear with its appearance.

These issues fall into domain (2), and there are callers and scholars in domain (1) who address them. All forms of behavioral and moral deviation, bribery, corruption, etc., are likewise manifestations of a wretched life due to most people – rulers and ruled – turning away from the remembrance of Allāh. They are manifestations of the absence of Allāh's law and will cease with its implementation. These are also issues of domain (2), and there are those from domain (1) who address them.

However, if an issuer of legal opinions (muftī) were to opine that American armies and institutions are under a covenant of security and should not be attacked, this is an issue located in domain (4). We must confront it appropriately with the Jihād of argument and clarification, an effort from domain (3). If his institution were to promote normalization with American intellectual campaigns, misleading people and undermining the foundations of their religion – like those established in Wādī ‘Arabah on the Jordanian-Israeli border, and many others – this is an act falling within the circle of conflict in domain (4). We must deal with it by combating it, nullifying it, removing it, and assassinating those in charge of it, whether disbelievers or hypocrites among our citizens. This is achieved through acts of fighting and resistance from our domain (3), and so on.

Thus, we summarize this explanation, which we have clarified with the diagram for easier understanding:

The call of Global Islamic Resistance addresses issues related to the boundaries of the circle of conflict with the encroaching enemy and its allies, whether these are matters of the Jihād of clarification (jihād al-bayān) or the Jihād of the spear (jihād al-sinān, i.e., armed Jihād). It refrains from preoccupation with what lies beyond that, not out of disdain for truth and correctness, for all truth is sacred in itself, but as a matter of specialization, prioritization, and consolidating the Ummah's efforts, which are barely sufficient when combined to repel this great calamity afflicting us – a punishment from Allāh for some peoples, and a trial for others. We ask Allāh for success and safety.

8. The Concept of Common Denominators in Political Conflicts Between Different Parties:

Among the simple principles of modern mathematics taught today to elementary school students is what they term "Venn diagrams," named after the mathematician who pioneered the representation of sets, their elements, mathematical equations, and common denominators between different sets using diagrams. It is a simple idea that greatly helps in understanding the issue of common denominators in the world of politics among separate, different, contradictory, and even conflicting groups. The following simple example illustrates this principle:

If we have a set of numbers:  $\{S = (10, 9, 4, 3, 1)\}$ , another set:  $\{A = (10, 9, 15, 7, 3)\}$ , and a third:  $\{P = (45, 15, 9, 4)\}$ . We observe that the common numbers between (S) and (A) are (10, 9, 3). Those common between (S) and (P) are (9, 4). Those common between (A) and (P) are (15, 9). The number common to all three (S), (A), and (P) is only (9). This is expressed by a simplified diagram: [A diagram is implied by the author here.]

This simple mathematical representation gives an idea of the concept of common denominators among independent groups in the world of politics as well.

We term the section containing common elements between two or more groups the "common denominator." If we move to the world of groups in the concept of politics, ideas, principles, interests, beliefs, etc., we find that the concept of the "common denominator" is the same. For example, the "common denominator" among all Muslims who pray towards the Qiblah (Ahl al-Qiblah) is the general principles of Islām and its agreed-upon fundamental beliefs, such as belief in Allāh as Lord, belief in Muḥammad as a Prophet, in the Qur'ān as a book, prayer towards the Qiblah, and their corollaries agreed upon by those termed "Ahl al-Qiblah." This is a vast domain of beliefs and principles.

Likewise, the issues of Islām, its sanctities, its history, and so forth, are all common denominators among Muslims, forming a wide, expansive, and unencompassable field.

Confronting America and repelling its aggression against Muslims is a "common denominator" among all Ahl al-Qiblah.

America's loss and defeat, and working towards that, is a "common denominator" between them and all of America's enemies and those concerned with its defeat, even among disbelievers.

Thus, with some understanding, breadth of perspective, and conceptualization, we find that "common denominators" between different independent groups are, in political terminology, the set of shared characteristics, components, objectives, or interests, or any factor or component that logic proves to be "common."

All conflicts in the world of politics are based on a system of alliances and shared interests among those who have "common denominators," against a common adversary.

A good understanding of the term "common denominators" leads Jihādī/mujahid cadres and resistance supporters to comprehend the political decisions made by Jihād leaders to enter into direct or indirect alliances with other forces. These forces may differ in methodology or belief from resistance groups but share a common denominator with the resistance in enmity and confrontation against the enemies of legitimate resistance. Such leaders move to cooperate with those sharing these common denominators in light of the regulations of Sharī'ah-compliant politics and what the rulings of necessity permit, with clear-sightedness regarding security, political, and military calculations.

9. The Concept of Relationship, Influence and Being Influenced in Relationships, and the Network of Political Relations:

The Concept of Relationship:

We use the word "relationship" for any form of connection between two elements, groups, or entities.

The bond between brothers is called: a fraternal relationship.

The bond between a father and his children: paternity and filiation.

The bond between a husband and wife: a marital relationship.

Between adversaries: a relationship of enmity.

Between those who love each other: a relationship of love.

Between those at war: a relationship of war.

Between those with shared interests: a relationship of common interests.

Between those with no relationship at all: a non-existent relationship, or a "relationship of no relation."

And so on: a neighborly relationship, a non-aggression relationship, a diplomatic relationship, an alliance relationship, a cooperative relationship, to the end of the many terms used today, especially those relevant to political relations.

The Concept of Direct and Indirect Influence and Being Influenced Between Elements and Groups:

- Every relationship between two parties results in direct influence and being influenced by each other, to a degree that increases or decreases according to the components and characteristics of each.
- Every relationship between two parties indirectly affects these two elements and all other peripheral elements that have direct relationships with these two elements. This is clarified by an example.

In the world of commerce, for instance, if there are four companies in the market: (1), (2), (3), and (4). If there is a direct relationship between companies (1) and (2), and between companies (3) and (4).

Naturally, there is an indirect relationship among all of them, which is the relationship of existing in the same market. If a direct relationship is established between company (2) and company (4), these two companies will directly influence each other by virtue of this relationship. However, this will also lead to an indirect first-degree influence relationship between (1) and (4), and similarly a relationship between (1) and (3) due to the relationship between (3) and (4). There will be a second-degree influence relationship between them.

From this, we can say that all elements sharing a common field have interconnected relationships of influence and being influenced, of varying degrees, forming an intricate network of relations.

If we enter the world of political relations, we will find this to be exceedingly clear and exceedingly complex. Anyone involved in the battle of political action, especially political battles of a violent nature, such as what we are discussing (resistance vs. occupiers and their allies), must understand the nature of local, regional, and international networks of relations, and the nature of direct and indirect influence and being influenced, at all levels, among all these elements.

This gives rise to what is called a network of relations. If we take an example from the heart of the resistance's struggle today in the Arab and Islamic world against America and its allies, we find the data, if greatly simplified, as follows:

1. America's Axis:

- America: Has an organic and fateful relationship with Israel.
- America: Has a very strong relationship with Britain.
- America: Has a lesser-degree relationship with some Western countries, foremost among them Australia, Italy, Canada, and Japan.
- It also has a patron-client alliance relationship with other components from Eastern European countries and some countries in Asia, Africa, and South America.

- It has a Crusader alliance relationship with Russia and with all components of the Crusader world.

These relationships are not random; they are based on beliefs, ideas, treaties, agreements, alliances, interests, and pressures.

In contrast, we find another bloc also on the side warring against us, but of a different nature, which is the independent European axis.

2. Europe's Axis:

France, Germany, Russia, Spain, Belgium, along with a group of other European countries and those in their orbit, from what remains of their spheres of influence in some African and Asian countries.

3. Relations Within the Two Axes:

All components of these two axes are linked by alliances, the most important of which are:

1. NATO: Links most of the main components of these two axes and consists of (26) countries.
2. The European Union: Links the most important components of the second axis and currently consists of (25) countries with a total population exceeding 450 million. Other countries await entry, and it is expected to reach about 40 countries.

What further complicates the matter is that in the world of politics, elements are often linked by contradictory, intertwined, and highly complex relationships. For example, Japan, America, and Europe appear to be allies of the strongest kind in international and military fields, especially when it concerns conflict with Muslims. However, in many areas, particularly in the race for economic interests, they represent three quasi-warring economic axes: America's axis, Europe's axis, and the axis of Japan and East Asian countries. If we imagine a network depicting these direct and indirect relationships of all degrees, it is self-evident to imagine, as in all networks, that instability in any node of the network (a certain country) due to internal or external reasons, as well as any instability or rupture in the bond of a relationship between two nodes (two countries), will lead to the instability of all elements according to their proximity or distance from the site of instability. Sometimes, instability leads to changes in the components of some nodes or the severing of some relationships and ties. If the instability is severe or explosive, it may lead to a breach in parts of the network or its fragmentation, requiring it to be rewoven and redrawn.

This is what happens during major events, such as the collapse of the Soviet Union, which was followed by the fall of the Berlin Wall, the redrawing of Europe's map, and the establishment of the new world order.

It is also similar to what is happening today with America's drive towards its imperial dream, its turn towards Crusader campaigns, and the resulting upheavals in relations between East and West, among the components of the East itself, as well as among the components of the West, and between everyone. And so on.

If we want to influence the balances of such networks, rearrange them in our favor, or emerge from their instabilities with minimal losses, this depends on two important and interconnected factors:

- First: Our precise and detailed understanding of the nature of the game, its players, its links, its relationships, and all its components. This means understanding the composition of the two conflicting parties – our side and the enemy's side, and the neutral parties between them – and the ability to utilize that knowledge for our benefit.
- Second: The intrinsic ability, materially and morally, to effect change. This depends on the given factors and capabilities in the realm of causes. And glory be to the Causer of causes and Owner of dominion. Often, understanding is available, but the material means to transform it into effective action and movement are not, which is a form of subjugation under the rule of circumstance.

10. Strategy, Tactics, and Margins for Political Maneuvering:

These three terms are frequently used in political and military fields, and even in other areas of activity. What concerns us here is the political dimension of resistance. These terms have been defined in many ways, but I will briefly explain their essence relevant to us:

Strategy:

It comprises the main outlines of a planned program, established to achieve the objectives of that program, or what are called "strategic objectives." Strategy is characterized by being based on a set of real data and actual capabilities for its implementation.

One of its fundamental characteristics is relative stability, unlike tactics. Since it is supposedly based on the stability of general data, it must be characterized by stability, unless unforeseen events disrupt its surrounding circumstances and data. In that case, the strategy must be completely changed, and the cost of this change is often severe – materially, morally, operationally, and on every level. It requires crisis leadership capable of managing the consequences of the strategy's collapse and formulating an alternative. It is self-evident that one of the simplest costs of changing a strategy is that all efforts, expenditures, preparations, and tools allocated to it, and sometimes even personnel, often prove unsuitable for implementing the subsequent strategy, except to the extent that wreckage from a demolished structure can be used in new construction. Depending on the nature of the demolition, parts and bricks may or may not be reusable.

The Strategic Objective:

It is the primary, fundamental goal for the achievement of which the strategy and its necessitated tactics were designed. In our case:

Our strategic objective is:

To compel the invading forces in our lands, led by America and its allies, to withdraw from our countries and to end their ability to influence them, so that the conditions are prepared for overthrowing the existing client regimes in our lands, in order to establish the legitimate Islamic system that governs by what Allāh has revealed in our Arab and Islamic countries, on the ruins of those apostate regimes.

Tactics:

They are the set of phased programs, plans, operations, maneuvers, and partial practices aimed at implementing the general plan (the strategy) to achieve the strategic objective. Usually, the higher management that formulated the strategy also devises the general plans for the set of tactics intended to achieve it.

Often, the detailed plans for these tactics are left to subordinate leadership, except in cases of centralized leaderships that tend to interfere in details, which often yields poor results.

It is natural for tactical programs to be canceled, modified, or replaced by those implementing them, according to changes in the circumstances surrounding their execution. This has no impact, if incidental, on the implementation of the general plan (the strategy). However, if the general characteristic is the constant changing of tactics, this indicates a deficiency in the objectivity of their formulators and their lack of grasp of their capabilities or the circumstances surrounding the plan's implementation.

Maneuvers:

They are a set of flexible tactics that rely on evasion and deceiving the enemy to gain time, positions, or situations. These maneuvers depend on the intelligence of the leaders and elements carrying them out, as well as largely on the general surrounding circumstances.

Margins for Maneuver:

These are the surrounding circumstances that enable the aforementioned tactics of maneuvering, evasion, and gaining positions, situations, and time. They often arise unexpectedly and for limited periods. Therefore, they must be seized upon, giving a boost to the strategic plan through intelligent maneuvering tactics and swift initiative.

Initiative:

Initiative is the ability to generate action towards the general environment or towards the enemy, whether the initiative is intellectual, political, military, or media-related. The more the initiative is characterized by realism, dynamism, renewal, and comprehensiveness, the greater its impact in changing the surrounding conditions and giving a strong impetus to the program.

Seizing the Initiative:

This is the ability to control the launching of actions and the management of strategy, disrupting the enemy's strategy and forcing them into reactive postures, according to the actions of the one who has seized the initiative, whether politically, militarily, or otherwise.

11. The Theory of Construction and Destruction in Strategic Movement:

This principle is fundamental in every conflict and on every level where two adversaries contend. Starting with creed, it is impossible to believe in Allāh while acknowledging tyranny (ṭāghūt). Allāh Ta'ala said: {So whoever disbelieves in ṭāghūt and believes in Allāh has grasped the most trustworthy handhold}.

On the intellectual level, one cannot advocate for an idea without proving the falsehood of its antithesis. On the military level, the best means of defense is offense. And so it is in every competitive and confrontational sphere.

When we come to the resistance and its adversaries, we find a civilizational clash on all fronts and in all domains: doctrinal, political, intellectual, cultural, and economic. In the violent form of the clash, the military domain, we find that the principle of demolishing the forces, pillars, and claims of the adversaries' agents is a priority in the resistance's offensive strategy. This is an operation that must proceed concurrently from the very beginning of the resistance, alongside the process of building the resistance's own components on all these levels.

The strategic balance between us and our adversaries is entirely unequal from a material perspective, heavily favoring them. However, from a moral perspective, it favors us, whether concerning the Arab and Muslim masses or global public opinion as a whole.

Therefore, the resistance's doctrinal theory must be based on construction and destruction: building conviction in our general beliefs and our Jihādī creed among our supporters, and proving the falsehood of what contradicts them among the adversaries, through dialogue, argument, and clear evidence. Thus, dismantling the arguments and claims of the pro-regime jurists (fuqahā' al-sulṭān) and the scholars of colonialism ('ulamā' al-isti'mār) is a strategic axis.

On the intellectual, cultural, and social levels, the thought and culture of resistance must also be disseminated, and the thought of inaction, submission, and surrender must be combated, also through dialogue, argument, and clear evidence.

On the political and media levels, we must rely on substantiating the theories of resistance, calling for it and its symbols with argument and clear evidence, and refuting the claims of the pillars of colonialism and their agents, destroying their image and the reputation of their collaborating symbols, and invalidating their political claims and proofs, also with argument and clear evidence.

In the military domain, operations of recruitment, preparation, organization, funding, and civil society institutions supporting the roots of resistance must proceed. Simultaneously, the military wings and mujāhidīn of the resistance must destroy all enemy footholds in our land through the physical elimination of their elements and the complete destruction of their institutions by military means. The resistance also reserves the right to deterrence and to strike the enemy in its own heartland as a branch of resistance activities and an arm demonstrating the capability for reciprocity, as will be discussed.

12. The Three Adjudications of a Sharī'ah-Compliant Political-Activist

Decision:

There are three fundamental adjudications to which a Muslim must subject all his decisions, actions, aspects of his life's activities, and intended deeds. They are:

- a- The Sharī'ah adjudication (forbidden or permissible).
- b- The political adjudication of benefit and harm (beneficial or harmful).
- c- The realistic and feasibility adjudication (possible or impossible).

For example, if a Muslim trader intends to undertake a transaction, he must study it from three aspects and subject it to three adjudications and studies:

- Is this transaction permissible and lawful, or is it among the forbidden sales and transactions such as usury (ribā), buy-back sales (bay' al-ʿīnah), sales involving excessive uncertainty (gharar), fraud, and other prohibitions?
- Is this transaction commercially and materially beneficial to him, or is it harmful?
- Is this transaction possible or not from a material and realistic standpoint?

This example extends even to a Muslim intending to marry. He will consider his choice of marriage: first, is this marriage lawful, to a Muslim woman or a woman from the People of the Book whom Allāh has permitted marriage to, or is it unlawful, to those whom Allāh has forbidden marriage to? Second, is it beneficial or harmful in all its dimensions and consequences? Finally, is this marriage feasible to execute, or are there obstacles from his side or the side of his choice that make it impossible?

These adjudications assume utmost importance in the world of politics, especially when the decision relates to fateful matters such as resistance decisions and their derivative Shari'ah-compliant political, military, or media decisions, etc.

This domain is one of the most delicate that Jihadi/mujahid leaders mobilizing the resistance effort must grasp. Erroneous decisions, especially in the military field – such as poor target selection, leading the resistance into secondary battles, or confrontations that cause it to lose its distinct identity or its popular support – are critical. The same applies to political decisions or media activities. Every such decision by anyone active in the field of resistance must be subjected to these adjudications.

He must ask himself:

First: Is what he intends to do forbidden or permissible? If he is ignorant of this, he must adhere to His Ta'ala saying: {So ask the people of knowledge if you do not know}. He should then refer to someone trustworthy in his knowledge of Shari'ah and reality, who is also trustworthy in his religion, and ask him. The matter involves responsibility for lives, honor, and property.

Second: He must consider and reflect on the dimensions of his action and its consequences: Is it beneficial to the cause of resistance or harmful to it? This matter is more difficult than the previous one due to its entanglement with benefits and harms. It is not enough for the apparent ruling to be lawful and permissible for it to be actually so. If it is proven through political and realistic calculations and the opinions of experienced people, people of opinion, warfare, and strategy, that the outcome and consequences of this action will result in harm and damage, then proceeding with it becomes forbidden, according to the general principle: "No harm shall be inflicted or reciprocated; everything harmful is forbidden." If he knows this, fine; otherwise, he should return to those he trusts among the people of knowledge in matters of politics and reality, who are trustworthy in their religion, from among the people of opinion, warfare, and strategy. If its permissibility and benefit are confirmed to him, he then considers the third.

Third: He considers his capabilities to execute this action. This is best assessed by those resolved to undertake it, especially if they consult experts in the matter, under the conditions of a consultant: {Indeed, the best one you can hire is the strong and the trustworthy}. As is clear by Shari‘ah and reason, one cannot proceed with an action or decision unless it receives three approvals from the three adjudications: Shari‘ah-based, political-interest-based, and realistic-operational. Thus, it must be: permissible, beneficial, and possible.

13. The Rulings of Jihād and Shari‘ah-Compliant Politics, Their Basis in Reality, and the Phased Nature of Tactics to Achieve the Strategic Goal:

Ibn al-Qayyim (may Allāh have mercy on him) said in his book Zād al-Ma‘ād, in the chapter on the chronological sequence of the Prophet's (peace and blessings be upon him) guidance in dealing with disbelievers and hypocrites from the time he was sent until he met Allāh, Exalted and Majestic be He:

"The first thing his Lord, Blessed and Exalted, revealed to him was to read in the name of his Lord who created, and that was the beginning of his prophethood. He commanded him to read to himself and did not, at that time, command him to convey the message. Then He revealed to him: {O you who are covered! Arise and warn} [Qur‘ān 74:1-2]. So He made him a prophet by His saying {Read} and sent him as a messenger with {O you who are covered!}. Then He commanded him to warn his nearest kinsmen, then he warned his people, then he warned the Arabs around them, then he warned all the Arabs, then he warned all the worlds. He stayed for some ten years after his prophethood warning through invitation, without fighting or jizyah, and was commanded to restrain, be patient, and forgive.

Then he was permitted to migrate (Hijrah) and permitted to fight. Then He commanded him to fight those who fought him and to leave alone those who withdrew from him and did not fight him. Then He commanded him to fight the polytheists (mushrikīn) until the religion is entirely for Him. After the command for Jihād, the disbelievers with him were of three categories: people of peace and truce, people of war, and people of dhimmah (protected non-Muslims). He was commanded to fulfill the covenant for the people of treaty and peace and to honor it as long as they abided by the covenant. If he feared treachery from them, he was to renounce their covenant and not fight them until he informed them of the annulment of the covenant. He was commanded to fight those who violated their covenant. When Sūrat Barā'ah (al-Tawbah) was revealed, it came with a clarification of the ruling for all these categories. He commanded him in it to fight his enemies from the People of the Book until they give the jizyah or enter Islām, and He commanded him in it to wage Jihād against the disbelievers and hypocrites and to be harsh with them.

So he waged Jihād against the disbelievers with the sword and spear, and Jihād against the hypocrites with argument and tongue.

He commanded him in it to disavow the covenants of the disbelievers and to renounce their covenants to them. He divided the people of covenant in this regard into three categories: a category he was commanded to fight, namely those who violated their covenant and did not remain steadfast for him, so he fought them and triumphed over them. A category who had a temporary covenant which they did not violate nor did they support others against him, so He commanded him to fulfill their covenant until its term. And a category who had no covenant and did not fight him, or who had a covenant that they be granted a respite of four months; when these months elapsed, he was to fight them. These are the four months mentioned in His saying: {So travel freely in the land for four months} [Qur'ān 9:2]. These are the sacred months mentioned in His saying: {And when the sacred months have passed, then kill the polytheists} [Qur'ān 9:5]. The sacred months here are the months of free travel, the first of which is the Day of Proclamation, which is the tenth of Dhū al-

Ḥijjah, the Day of the Greater Pilgrimage, on which the proclamation occurred, and the last of which is the tenth of Rabīʿ al-Ākhir. They are not the four mentioned in His saying: {Indeed, the number of months with Allāh is twelve months in the register of Allāh [from] the day He created the heavens and the earth; of these, four are sacred} [Qurʾān 9:36]. For those consist of one separate month and three consecutive: Rajab, Dhū al-Qaʿdah, Dhū al-Ḥijjah, and Muḥarram. He did not grant the polytheists free travel in these four, for this is not possible as they are not consecutive, and he only granted them a respite of four months. Then, after their elapsing, He commanded him to fight them. So he killed the violator of his covenant and gave a respite of four months to those who had no covenant or had an absolute covenant. He commanded him to fulfill the covenant of the one who abided by his covenant until its term. All of these embraced Islām and did not persist in their disbelief until their term, and jizyah was imposed on the people of dhimmah.

So the status of the disbelievers with him after the revelation of Barāʾah settled into three categories: those at war with him, people of covenant, and people of dhimmah. Then the condition of the people of covenant and peace evolved into Islām, so they became two categories with him: those at war and people of dhimmah. Those at war with him were fearful of him. So the people of the earth with him became three categories: a Muslim believing in him, a peaceful and secure person with him, and a fearful enemy.

As for his conduct with the hypocrites, he (peace and blessings be upon him) was commanded to accept their outward declarations and entrust their inner secrets to Allāh, and to wage Jihād against them with knowledge and argument. He was commanded to turn away from them, be harsh with them, and to convey the eloquent word to their souls. He forbade him to pray over them or to stand at their graves, and informed him that if he sought forgiveness for them, Allāh would never forgive them.

This was his conduct with his enemies, both disbelievers and hypocrites." (End of quote).

The majority of scholars hold that these rulings are not all abrogated by the final stage reached, which is the state Muslims must strive for. However, if they encounter, in certain circumstances, a situation similar to those experienced by the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) in his life, they may draw analogies from it and be guided by his example (peace and blessings be upon him). As we have mentioned, the basis of rulings in Sharī'ah-compliant politics is knowledge of the Sharī'ah ruling, understanding reality, and applying the former to the latter by people of knowledge and specialization who are trustworthy in their religion and conduct.

Now, after these introductions, definitions, and necessary fundamental political concepts, we delve into the core of the subject: to examine the reality of the American campaigns and the Arab, Islamic, and international reality concerning them. After clarifying this, we will move on to outlining the general features of the desired political theory for the call of Global Islamic Resistance.

Second: A Summary of the Reality of American Campaigns and the Arab, Islamic, and International Reality Concerning Them:

The foundation for establishing the pillars of the general strategy for resistance and its political theory is to understand the features of the enemy's strategy, the composition of its parties, and its data. Then, to understand the composition of our supporters and those with us in the resistance ranks. In previous chapters (in the first part), we addressed many details of the reality of the Islamic Ummah. In this section, we present three important points whose understanding forms the basis for laying down the pillars of the political theory for the call of resistance.

1. The Nature, Axes, Objectives, and Means of American Campaigns:

The conclusion drawn from the torrent of books, studies, statements, and documents filling various media outlets today is that the new Jewish-Crusader campaigns have an integrated civilizational dimension aimed at eliminating the components of the Islamic civilizational Ummah on all fronts.

On the Doctrinal Front:

The Zionist-American campaigns aim to alter the features of the Islamic religion and its fundamental beliefs, distort them, and distance Muslims from them. They seek to present a model of a modern, secular, Americanized Islām that is little more than formalities, customs, and some rituals, while changing fundamental beliefs and abolishing key issues related to religious identity, loyalty and disavowal (al-walā' wa al-barā'), the political entity, the Muslim personality, and Islamic life on every level. Their most important means in this endeavor is relying on a vanguard of pro-regime scholars (‘ulamā’ al-sultān) and some corrupt figures from the Islamic Awakening, to recruit factions of "scholars of colonialism" and "Pentagon preachers." They are also developing an ambitious program in cooperation with governments in the Islamic world to produce batches of scholars and preachers who are "intellectually hybridized" and "American-cloned," through so-called Sharī'ah rehabilitation courses for mosque preachers, imams, exhorters, and sheikhs.

Similarly, they establish Islamic institutions under various names that call for the dissolution of Islamic identity and the distortion of religion under slogans such as "dialogue," "moderation," "discourse of the other," and "reformulating religious discourse," presenting them as non-governmental civil society institutions. The audacity and foolishness of the Americans reached such a point in mid-2004 that, in their sick ambitions to change the Islamic religion, they gathered a number of scholars and specialists, or some apostates, to abridge the Qur’ān! They produced a new, abridged Qur’ān after deleting all verses of Jihād, loyalty and disavowal, and those calling for hatred of disbelievers, dissociation from them, and Jihād against them, under the pretext that this is the basis of terrorism in the Islamic religion.

They named the new abridged Qur'ān "Furqān al-Ḥaqq" (The Criterion of Truth)!! As if our complete Qur'ān, preserved by Allāh's protection despite them, were a criterion of falsehood! Far be it from that, and {monstrous is the word that comes out of their mouths; they speak nothing but a lie} [cf. Qur'ān 18:5]. You can imagine, then, the extent to which the doctrinal dimension of this battle goes.

On the Intellectual and Cultural Front:

The campaigns aim to secularize and deconstruct the Arab and Islamic mind, and to re-mold it according to the American way. This is intended to create generations of disfigured individuals who have no religious or intellectual identity, and no connection to their historical and cultural roots. They are led by a group of agents who belong to the Ummah of Islām only in name and appearance, but are Americanized Zionists in thought, culture, and beliefs. This objective and program have many details and programs that have become well-known under the slogan of the war of ideas and curricula that America is waging against Muslims, their civilization, and their peoples to separate them from those civilizational components.

In the Political Dimension:

The campaigns aim to dismantle the existing political entities in the Arab and Islamic world and reshape them by manipulating political maps, existing ruling systems, and demographic compositions along sectarian and ethnic lines. They also aim to impose an innovative model of "colonial democracy," which mixes principles of "democratic origins," "colonial conditions," and "oppressive, arbitrary methods of dictatorial governments." This is done by imposing a set of policies to remove all forms of religious, nationalist, national, and political opposition from their path and render them ineffective. America thereby removes some regimes it previously established or supported, overthrows some, keeps others, and reshapes and creates other regimes in their place. This enables it to implement its program in our region through its project named "The Greater Middle East," extending from the borders of China to the Atlantic coasts, and from the shores of the Black Sea and Caspian Sea to the Arabian Sea and the great African desert – in short, the Arab world and most of the Islamic world.

In the Economic Dimension:

America aims for complete control over the economies and resources of this region, especially energy, particularly oil and gas. This allows it to control the economies of its allies and compel them to operate within its program. It also aims to link the region's economy to its own economy and that of Israel, through what it calls partnership agreements, the establishment of free zones, joint economic projects, and other monopolistic colonial economic tricks.

In the Social Dimension:

The campaigns aim to dismantle the social components of Arabs and Muslims and reshape them in terms of customs, traditions, and behaviors. This is done through media programs, the onslaught of satellite channels and internet networks, and what they broadcast through them, thereby manipulating people's minds to disfigure them and re-clone them according to the Western American model. This involves spreading a culture of prostitution, unveiling (sufūr), intermingling of sexes, singing, and the arts of vice, under the names of freedom, entertainment, gender equality, and women's liberation, etc. The Americans have named this scheme their "societal re-engineering programs."

In the Educational Dimension:

America is currently waging a fierce campaign against the Arab and Islamic world in the educational, intellectual, and cultural fields. This campaign is more ferocious than its military campaign, with a larger budget, and more complex in its plans, networks, and covert methods.

The Crusaders and Jews, as I mentioned in the introduction of this book under the title "Axes of Resistance," realized that the roots of resistance stem from the Ummah's religion and its doctrinal, intellectual, cultural, and moral heritage. They also realized that the means of nurturing and preserving this heritage come through educational materials and methods. Therefore, America and its allies focused their attack on this front, using the same strategy of "construction and destruction" mentioned earlier. They work to demolish our intellectual and educational heritage while building their thought, theories, and methods of their civilization and life within our Ummah.

Or so they try to do. They have worked towards this by imposing projects to change educational curricula on ministries of education in the Arab and Islamic world, at all levels from elementary to higher education. They have particularly focused on corrupting curricula in subjects such as history, national education, Islamic education, Arabic language, political and social sciences, and ethics, etc. They have also sought to prevent specialized religious education, restrict it, and impose government control over mosques, lessons, and sermons, etc.

In the Military Dimension of the Campaigns:

American campaigns work to impose their military control over the region they have named the Greater Middle East through the following strategy:

1. Direct military presence through the occupation of some areas like Afghanistan and Iraq, and other areas they plan to invade, such as Syria, Iran, Sudan, Egypt, and parts of the Arabian Peninsula.
2. Current presence in the Arabian Peninsula, as well as in Turkey, Egypt, North Africa, and Central Asian countries. In what it calls the Central Command area of operations, which includes the Arab world and most of the Islamic world, there are over a million American soldiers, excluding allied forces from NATO and others.
3. Direct military presence through land and naval bases and fleets that collectively surround this entire region and, along with their permanent bases in the heart of the Arab and Islamic world, constitute its occupation and control of the region.

4. Enhancing the capabilities of the Israeli army to be an almost sole, superior, striking strategic force in the region.
5. Dismantling the Arab and Islamic armies surrounding Israel, either by destroying them as in Iraq or by deconstructing them as happened to the armies of Egypt, Jordan, Syria, and others, which were repurposed for internal security tasks to suppress their own peoples.
6. Integrating the remaining strong, existing armies in the region into its logistical services, as the Pakistani army is doing at the time of writing these lines on the night of March 21, 2004, in its massacres targeting Arab, Uzbek, Turkestani, and Chechen mujāhidīn, and those who sheltered them in the tribal areas of Waziristan. Similarly, other Turkish and regional armies provide their services, voluntarily or involuntarily.

In the Security Dimension:

America's security strategy, in its latest form, can be summarized in the following points:

1. Deploying security units from various American intelligence and security agencies such as the CIA, FBI, and others newly created, directly through official, overt offices in Arab and Islamic capitals, and through covert offices under various covers, as well as through security sections in its embassies in the region.
2. Placing the entire intelligence apparatus of Arab and Islamic regimes in the region at its direct service, assigning them dirty work such as arrests, torture, suppression, and liquidation.

3. Placing the security forces of dozens of direct and indirect allied countries worldwide at the service of its security program, compelling these countries to implement its program and security regulations, arresting whomever it wishes, and extraditing whomever it wishes, even against the will of governments and their judicial bodies, and even after their acquittal. This occurred in the arrest of six Algerian Arab mujāhidīn in Bosnia after their acquittal by the Bosnian court, their kidnapping, and their transfer to Guantanamo, against the will of the Bosnian government and despite the foolish global public opinion captive to international Zionist media.
4. Holding regular and emergency security agreements, alliances, and conferences throughout the world.
5. Eliminating safe havens for Islamists pursued by their own countries or by America, and forcing countries to extradite them or expel them so that America can, in turn, pursue and kidnap them.
6. Drying up the financial sources of Jihādī groups and any Islamic institution it considers terrorist or supportive of terrorism, in an attempt to plunge the mujāhidīn and their families into a state of hunger, fear, and destitution, and to paralyze their ability to operate and move.
7. Destroying established military bases and visible frontlines of resistance hotspots through aerial and missile bombardment, or by assigning client forces from local armies or militias to advance on and liquidate them.
8. Liquidating resistance leaders and Jihādī figures through assassination and kidnapping.
9. Arresting Jihādī elements from everywhere, extraditing them to America or their home countries, or imprisoning them locally.

10. Practicing a policy of "preemptive strikes" and aborting supposed terrorist cells, as they claim, whereby America destroys and liquidates any institution or individual it suspects or accuses of being hostile.
11. Employing deterrence and counter-terrorism, using dominant technology and the capabilities of a superpower.
12. Recruiting agents among Islamists and planting them in supposed resistance arenas.
13. Launching a "war of ideas," as Rumsfeld called it, aimed at destroying the intellectual, religious, and cultural backgrounds that fuel the readiness for resistance, and instead implanting concepts of surrender to the enemy within the Ummah.

(This is regarding the offensive direction; as for the defensive direction, the following points can be added:)

14. Expanding the issuance of anti-terrorism legislation within America and in allied countries, regardless of civil rights and human rights.
15. Creating new internal security agencies and establishing a new ministry for them in America.
16. Internal defensive precautions and security measures that reach obsessive levels, and conducting security drills for hypothetical attacks, even with weapons of mass destruction.
17. Pressuring Arab and Islamic communities, besieging them securely, infiltrating them, and exploiting them.
18. Utilizing international organizations and UN-affiliated bodies in its anti-terrorism program, such as obligating all member states to submit reports on their achievements in combating terrorism, and providing records of banking system activities and money transfers in their countries, with the threat of sanctions for lenient states.

19. Finally, what was proposed by the old black hag and the speckled snake, Condoleezza Rice: the idea of forming local militias from friendly forces in all regions of the world to be America's local arm in combating terrorism. This is to address the apparent deficit in American manpower and its inability to meet the needs of its imperial dream.

This, in short, is what can be termed the strategy of state terrorism by the superpower, the sole global pole: America, to date. May the Almighty Avenger disgrace them.

With this, we conclude the general axes of these campaigns, which operate according to the theory of the clash of civilizations, as they have declared their objective of eliminating Islamic civilization as a path to survival and unifying their ranks.

2. The Reality of the Arab and Islamic Ummah in Confronting the Campaigns:

We will address this by examining the reality of different segments:

a. The Reality of Ruling Regimes in Arab and Islamic Countries During These Campaigns:

1. These regimes, especially in the Middle East and surrounding areas, feel threatened with removal by America if they do not comply with American demands for increased subservience and prostration, particularly in combating Islamic movements and the roots of resistance, according to American demands, which want everyone to act like the Libyan model presented by Qaddafi: surrendering everything and opening doors to all demands and concessions.

2. These regimes feel threatened with removal and revolution by their own peoples if they continue with further subservience, prostration, and compliance with endless American demands.
3. The regimes stand terrified before these two options – removal from abroad or from within – and are incapable of opening up to and cooperating with their peoples, due to a massive legacy of oppression, corruption, plunder, and crimes they have become accustomed to, along with the power and benefits they are used to.
4. It appears so far that the regimes' choice is to yield to American pressure and confront their peoples, thus heading towards an inevitable confrontation with them, in order to appease America so that it does not replace them.

b. The Reality of Muslim Scholars and Leaders of the Islamic Awakening:

Muslim scholars today are divided into two groups:

The group of hypocritical pro-regime scholars.

The group of righteous but incapacitated scholars.

Each group is further divided into two:

As for the hypocritical pro-regime scholars:

A. A faction siding with colonialism and with their rulers in their loyalty to colonialism.

B. A faction hypocritical towards their rulers but opposed to colonialism.

As for the righteous but incapacitated, they are also two groups:

C. A faction trying to hold the stick in the middle, between the rulers and the seeds of the Jihādī renaissance and the features of the coming resistance. However, whenever they practice some neutrality and demand some reform, the ruler's rod looms, along with the costs of enjoining good and forbidding evil and the ruler's wrath. So they are suppressed, and they incline towards flattery, sycophancy, muttering, and ambiguity, thereby losing the affection, love, and trust they had gained from the Muslim street. Thus, they continue to waver, belonging neither to this group nor to that, like a lost sheep straying between two flocks.

D. The second group of the righteous are reclusive and fearful. Their piety and conscience do not allow them to go along with the ruler, nor does their faith, steadfastness, and courage enable them to speak the truth and support the people of truth.

This group of "those who are silent about the truth" constitutes the best of Muslim scholars today! Incapacitated, hesitant, while people are lost, agitated, and confused in the midst of these tumultuous waves that would baffle even the forbearing. So what of the common Muslims?

There are no signs on the horizon, as of yet, of anyone from the school of Ibn Taymiyyah, Aḥmad ibn Ḥanbal, Mālik, al-Shāfiʿī, Abū Ḥanīfah, Sufyān, or al-Awzāʿī – those whose stories of steadfastness once delighted these scholars' audiences among common Muslims. And to Allāh is the complaint.

c. The Reality of the Leaders of the Islamic Awakening:

Incapacity and submission prevail among most leaders of the Islamic Awakening. They find no outlet except to vent their anger and criticism on America and its practices, especially since the regimes' discontent with American pressure has opened a window for some of them to curse colonialism, bypassing the rulers who represent and carry out its tasks in our countries. As for a program, they all call today for democracy, political reforms, and the people's choice, perhaps finding in this a sphere and an outlet. There are no signs among the senior leaders of the Awakening and its top figures today of anyone emerging to lead the resistance or call for it.

However, many of them, along with some righteous but hidden Muslim scholars, play an important role in calling the Ummah to adhere to its constants and confront the campaigns of Westernization and intellectual and civilizational colonialism, which is a very important effort in generating the groundwork for resistance.

d. The Reality of Political, Nationalist, National, and Secular Parties and Oppositions:

As a result of the global onslaught against Islām today, and the accusation of terrorism leveled against those working under its banner, secular parties and political and intellectual figures in the Arab and Islamic world found a margin of freedom, away from the possibility of being charged with "terrorism" and consequently entering the circle of liquidation through killing, kidnapping, or imprisonment. Other factors helped this current to freely propagate its ideas. Most importantly, their call for democracy, power-sharing, and opposition rights finds support from America and aligns with its projects for political reform. So they began to voice these openly without fear, taking their liberty in denouncing the rampant corruption in regimes and their practices. Here, they split into two factions:

1. A faction representing honorable opposition: These denounce the corruption of regimes and the objectives of the American campaign, stand with the Ummah, and call for resistance in a strong, cohesive manner, through a national and nationalist discourse that aligns in its propositions with the objectives of resistance and Jihād, even if the doctrinal starting point differs.
2. A faction representing treacherous, client opposition: These have intensified their attack on Islām and their call for America to enact political reform, imposing it on regimes willingly or unwillingly. They see this as an opportunity to pounce on those regimes, thoroughly exposing their disgrace and ruin. They present themselves as a third option, alongside the regimes and the forces warring against them from Islamic fundamentalism in all its forms.

This malicious option is the one poised to move on the ground today, before the invading American hordes, to topple those regimes and replace them as an option of even greater disbelief, error, subservience, treachery, and hostility towards Islām and Muslims.

Media outlets, satellite channels, and internet forums today are teeming with those who take the model of Karzai and the Iraqi opposition – who reached power on American tanks – as a model of hope for achieving their vile dreams.

e. The Reality of the Common Muslim on the Street:

The state of the common Arab person on the street can be summarized under the headings of frustration, anger, oppression, rejection of regimes, and rejection of what the programs of the invading campaigns impose.

The common peoples of Arab and Islamic countries are divided into two camps:

1. A minority that welcomes the coming change, even if on American tanks. They are weary of oppression, poverty, injustice, marginalization, and a miserable life.
2. A majority that rejects the regimes and the American campaign programs, calling for resistance and preparing for it.

Anyone observing the state of ferment in the Arab and Islamic street is optimistic, very optimistic, about the birth of resistance movements extending from the borders of China in the east to the shores of the Atlantic in the west, with their fervor reaching all corners of the globe.

f. The Reality of the Jihādī Current and the Seeds of Resistance Forces:

As mentioned earlier, the entire Jihādī current, with all its spectrums, men, and organizations, and even many of its supporters, has entered the post-September global trench, as we detailed previously. Therefore, only those whom Allāh spared have survived its men and cadres from killing, kidnapping, and imprisonment. Most of those remaining from this small number have become convinced of setting aside all previous objectives and options and adopting the option of resistance and confrontation with America and its allies.

Perhaps Allāh will guide our hands and the hands of those who remain to lay the foundations for a global resistance, which will be the solid base upon which the forces, factions, companies, and cells of resistance in the Ummah will arise.

As for the seeds of innate resistance in the Arab and Islamic street, indications suggest they are in the process of formation. The revolutionary Jihādī atmosphere is heating up at an accelerating pace. Daily events fuel it with causes for anger and sacred hatred. The media, the satellite channel revolution, and information networks play an important and wonderful role in communication, news exchange, and idea sharing. The arena is "promising" in every sense of the word.

However, the fear of matters exploding uncontrollably, with all the aforementioned contradictions, is real. We ask Allāh not to let people enter a state of chaos, tribulations, great battles, and comprehensive anarchy.

Hence the importance of the Islamic and Jihādī Awakening taking the lead in rationalizing the resistance and guiding it in the right direction.

Finally, in describing the reality of Muslims, it is necessary to point out a very important and dangerous phenomenon that requires swift treatment from minds capable of directing and rationalizing the resistance – from scholars, thinkers, writers, and media figures of the call.

This phenomenon is:

The Phenomenon of the Ummah's Elite Resisting Its Own Vanguard of Resistance

Contrary to the logic of colonial situations and resistance forces in all nations, believer and disbeliever, throughout history.

And contrary to what happened throughout our Arab and Islamic history during the first and second colonial Crusader campaigns, when the Ummah and its elite stood against the invading enemies and their allies, current conditions indicate a strange phenomenon that surrounds the resistance and resisters with danger.

In the worst cases in those previous circumstances, Arab and Islamic societies produced resistance forces. The Ummah was divided between a working, resisting, mujahid minority, and a majority that abstained from Jihād and resistance but supported it, aiding it as much as they could with material, moral, or even emotional services. Only a rare few from the segments of the Ummah deviated to lend their voice to assisting colonial powers. At the forefront of forces supporting resistance in those times were its scholars, thinkers, men of opinion, literature, and the pen. This happened in the history of Muslims and in the history of all peoples who were occupied and resisted.

But what is happening now is that many organized elite segments in Arab and Islamic societies – the ruling class, the scholarly class, the Awakening class, the political opposition class, the intellectual and thinker class – appear as if they are: acting as antibiotics against resistance, supporting the germ of new colonialism. Beyond being segments that do not resist colonialism – which targets all these classes, from the most corrupt rulers to the most wretched of the governed, with oppression, plunder, and destruction – they are rather antibiotics against the living, mujahid cells of resistance to America and its agents in the region.

Praise be to Allāh that the overwhelming majority of ordinary common Muslims, due to their sound innate compass, tend to support Jihād, the mujāhidīn, and resistance forces, as do some minorities from those elites.

In my opinion, this anomalous phenomenon, which must be remedied, is due to three reasons:

(1) The success of colonialism in its intellectual media campaign to combat "Islamic terrorism," as it termed it. This is the label they succeeded in attaching to Jihādīs, except in special cases of resistance such as in Palestine, and partially in Iraq.

(2) The convergence of interests among the aforementioned segments in confronting Jihādī resistance, for political, personal, intellectual, or material purposes.

(3) Most importantly, in my opinion:

The failure of the Jihādīs since September, for reasons that would take too long to explain, to launch a successful media and intellectual campaign capable of establishing itself as a legitimate resistance according to the standards of those circles.

While today, among the general components of Arab and Islāmic peoples—rulers and ruled of all kinds—Jihād in Palestine is viewed as legitimate resistance, and similarly, in part, some segments of the resistance in Iraq, a negative characterization prevails over all actions of Jihādīs confronting the Americans and their allies in Afghanistan and in various countries around the world. This includes operations occurring in Saudi Arabia, Jordan, Europe, and elsewhere. The Jihādīs have been branded with all negative attributes, such as ignorance, bloodthirstiness, terrorism, and more. They have been cornered into a narrow, unfavorable position that requires a swift solution to restore the truth.

This is one of the most significant challenges facing the Jihādī resistance against the Crusader-Zionist campaigns led by America, its allies, and its agents.

3. A Summary of the Power Composition in the Resistance Camp, the Occupation Camp, and the Neutral Camp Between Them:

After understanding the enemy's program, objectives, and strategy for achieving those objectives—a process that is fundamental to formulating the resistance's own program and strategy—we must now complete the data required to develop our strategy. Specifically, we need to analyze the power composition of the resistance camp, identify its internal strengths, and find ways to expand them. Similarly, we need to study the composition of the enemy and its allies so that we can work on dismantling their alliances. Finally, it is essential to understand the nature and composition of the neutral forces between us and the enemy, in order to either win them over to our side or, at the very least, ensure that they remain neutral.

Map of the Composition of Hostile Campaigns by America, Its Allies, and Its Agents:

The campaigns consist of overwhelming forces, cooperating in all military, security, political, economic, and media fields, etc. These campaigns, led by America, are composed of the following forces, in order of importance:

1 - The United States of America:

Led by political powers and media and financial lobbies that the Jews, over two centuries, have managed to infiltrate and control their direction. The United States possesses a range of data and manifestations of military, economic, and technological power that is not the place here to enumerate; they have become too famous to point out. Suffice it to say that strategic studies centers today classify America's military strength as greater than that of the next nine largest military powers combined!

2 - Israel:

It comes second in importance in these campaigns, not only due to the significance of its military capabilities, the development of which America and Europe have nurtured to high levels, but also because its rabbis, from the Sages of Zion, are the ones who direct the thinking of all these allies. Furthermore, the major financiers who own the largest financial institutions and international banks are Zionist Jews, who control global media institutions, including press, cinema, satellite channels, and publishing houses, thereby manipulating politics in major countries, let alone others. And because Israel is implanted in the heart of our Arab and Islāmic world.

3 - Britain:

It is America's natural ally religiously, as the majority of them, like Americans, adhere to the Protestant denomination with its Zionist influences. Other ties, such as language and history, also connect them with America. Moreover, the administration of both parties that alternate in power in Britain (Conservatives and Labour) is dominated by political, media, and economic lobbies, mostly Jewish or subservient to Jewish influence, similar to the (Republican and Democratic) parties in America. The importance of this ally stems from its vast historical colonial experience, especially in our Arab and Islāmic lands.

4 - North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) Countries:

This is the military alliance that has linked America and Western European countries since their victory in World War II. It has been expanded in stages, most importantly after the collapse of the Soviet Union, when most Eastern European countries that formed the dissolved Warsaw Pact joined NATO, bringing the number of these countries today to about 26. However, the most prominent and important of these allied countries from a military and general strategic standpoint are Western European nations such as France, Germany, Italy, Spain, Belgium, and Portugal, in addition to Australia and Canada.

5 - America's Allies from Countries Outside NATO:

Because America has become the sole superpower in the world through an anomalous surge unprecedented in history, and because it now holds the keys to military and political power to influence ruling regimes and states, as well as controlling the global economy and the world's energy sources, and also controlling the main media and guidance channels in the world through the dominance of global Jewish Zionist lobbies.

Therefore, most countries in the world have become part of America's list of permanent or temporary allies, voluntarily or involuntarily.

Among the most important countries on this list of America's allies from outside NATO are:

a. Japan:

Although a rival ally in the economic field, where a fierce, albeit cold, economic war rages between them, America, after Japan's defeat in World War II in 1945, managed to dismantle Japan's religious and cultural foundations, change its civilizational identity, and integrate it into the Western world.

Since the First Gulf War (Desert Storm) in 1990-1991 and the launch of the New World Order, America has managed to draw Japan into becoming a military ally, gradually entangling it in American conflict zones. After September and the invasion of Iraq, America dragged Japan into becoming a genuine field military partner in its invasions and Crusader campaigns. These days, it is luring Japan into Afghanistan.

b. Russia:

Russia remains a historical competitor to America, but its economic and political conditions have made it a plaything in the hands of NATO and its leader, America. Despite its attempts to assert its presence, especially in its surrounding sphere in Central Asia, the Baltic states, and Eastern Europe, America has managed to draw most of those countries into its alliance as well.

Russia is left only to play on the margins of competition between the axis of major European countries (Germany, France, and recently Spain) and the axis of (America, Britain, and Italy) and their tails of weak European countries, in addition to Japan. However, because all these countries, including Russia, stand against Islām and its civilization, a Crusader alliance has united them, largely cohesive in fighting us despite its internal contradictions and conflicts. Hence, Russia stands in America's alliance, like others, despite these internal contradictions and conflicts within their alliance.

c. India:

India is on its way to becoming a great power. Its human capital amounts to one billion people, constituting about 1/6th of the world's population! Its economy is growing competitively, and its vast markets form a very important arena for the global capitalist economy. Its military development—conventional, technological, and nuclear—has reached the ranks of strategic powers. Its historical conflict, with its fanatical Hindu identity, against Muslims, nominates it to be a fundamental pillar in the (Crusader-Jewish) axis of evil invading Muslims. Strategic studies indicate that by the year 2050 CE, India will become the third most powerful country militarily and economically, after China, which will occupy the first position, while the United States will move to the second position.

Talk of its entry as a permanent member with veto power in the UN Security Council is becoming increasingly clear and explicit, and European countries, including France, have called for it.

Therefore, America and Israel have not neglected attempts to draw this sleeping giant ally into their camp. The trajectories of the Indo-Pakistani conflict have revealed overt American bias in India's conflict against Pakistan, and an ever-advancing political-military alliance between them. News of joint military maneuvers between America and India has become frequent and recurrent. American officials have also declared India their primary support for stability in South and East Asia in the fight against terrorism.

d. America's Allies in Third World Countries:

America relies on important allies in the Third World, such as some Asian countries like South Korea and Taiwan, most Southeast Asian countries, most African and Latin American countries, and Eastern European countries that have not yet joined NATO. America has drawn most of these allies into the American camp due to their corrupt regimes, whose conditions are no different from those of regimes in the Arab and Islāmic world. Some of these allies have strategic importance for America, which began to take shape with their field entry into the global campaign against terrorism, as they called it. This is in addition to their significant political importance in lending an appearance of an international coalition to America's military adventures, as Korea, Poland, and some Latin American countries participate today in Iraq.

e. America's Allies and Agents within the Arab and Islāmic Ranks:

These are the most dangerous allies because they are within our internal ranks. This camp consists of apostates and hypocrites and contains the following malicious spectrum, mentioned in descending order of the importance of their role in favor of the enemy:

1. The Apostate Ruling Regimes in Arab and Islāmic Countries:

As a result of the historical corruption of these regimes, their bitter reality, and their sole focus on remaining in power at any cost, they have become playthings in the hands of the American administration. This is not the place to elaborate on the aspects of corruption of these regimes and their collaboration with enemies, as that would be lengthy and is, in any case, well-known. In short, these regimes have mortgaged their will and actions to the will of the enemies of Islām, especially America. They opened their lands—by land, sea, and air—for them to establish bases and launch wars against Muslims and exterminate them. They supplied them with oil and energy to run their war machine and poured the wealth of Muslims into their treasuries and banks. They made their security apparatuses, intelligence services, and prisons foul instruments to serve America's plans in the war against Islām, Muslims, and their Jihādī resistance vanguard. In short, they stood with America with all their political, military, and other apparatuses, against their own peoples and despite them. They did not allow these peoples to practice any support for their causes or for their Muslim brethren, and even deprived them of the simplest forms of protest and expression of opinion regarding all this injustice and darkness.

2. The Hypocrites among the Sultan's Scholars, the Colonial Jurists, and the Corrupt Leaders of the Islāmic Awakening:

This group, in short, represents the Sharī‘ah facade that bestows legitimacy on all the injustice and hardship Muslims face. Starting with the mother of all calamities, which is their ruling by the laws of their enemies, other than what Allāh has revealed, and ending with bestowing legitimacy on the occupation of Muslim lands and considering enemy soldiers to be protected persons against whom it is not permissible by Sharī‘ah to aggress. This passes through supporting normalization projects with the Jews, and last but not least, moving with all seriousness and enthusiasm in America's programs for the war of ideas. To combat Muslims, mujāhidīn, and resisters on Sharī‘ah grounds in the name of religion, and intellectually in the name of Islām. To withdraw legitimacy from Jihād and resistance, after having bestowed it upon the occupation and its allies among the apostate rulers. What has been mentioned in previous chapters of this book suffices to avoid repetition here. The most dangerous and criminal of these are their long-term programs to establish a basis for distorting religion and re-presenting it according to American specifications for combating terrorism, which consider its origin to begin with the texts of the Qur’ān and Sunnah and the heritage of the Ummah, upon which there has been consensus over the centuries regarding Ḥākimiyyah, al-Walā’ wa-l-Barā’, and the foundations of Tawhīd.

3. Ethnic and Religious Minorities in the Arab and Islāmic World:

America, benefiting from the accumulation of problems and injustices that befell many minorities, just like other segments of the Ummah on one hand, and from the accumulation of unjustified historical grudges among some minorities in many other cases, has managed to form the military and political spearhead that moves on the ground in coordination with American forces and their allies. This occurred with the Farsiwans, Turkestanis, and Shia Hazara minorities during its invasion of Afghanistan. It also happened with its use of Kurds and other minorities during its invasion of Iraq, and as it prepares them to move today in Syria, Turkey, and Iran. This is also happening with Christian Crusader political and military forces in Lebanon, and as France and America try to stir up Berber nationalist sentiments in North Africa, and so on and so forth. It also tries to play on the ticking time bomb between Sunnīs and Shīʿas in the Middle East, especially in the Gulf and the Levant. Ignorance at times, and historical grudges at other times, provided it with an opportunity to destroy the unity of the Ummah from within, which is one of the most important factors for its victory in this confrontation, after Arab nationalists and fanatical chauvinists from secular minorities provided the material for this deadly poison to tear apart the Ummah over successive decades.

4 . Westernized Immigrants with Dual Nationalities and American Loyalty:

This segment of technocrats, holders of academic degrees, and higher studies is one of the most important and dangerous. This class of immigrants and children of immigrants from Islāmic communities in Europe and America emerged due to political and economic conditions in the Arab and Islāmic world. Western intelligence agencies have co-opted tens of thousands of these individuals and their children, selecting from them those who would become politicians and leaders in various fields in their home countries. Among the clearest examples are individuals like the Afghan Pashtun businessman and oil magnate with American citizenship, Hamid Karzai, the president of Afghanistan who immigrated to America, and a certain Zāda, the Afghan-American ambassador of Farsiwani origin, also an American citizen, who was the architect of the Bonn Conference that politically mapped out the occupation of Afghanistan. Examples also include senior Iraqi opposition figures like the professional international thief Ahmed Chalabi, and his other comrades such as Allawi and Bahr al-Ulum, and others who spent a significant part of their lives in America and the West. Among them today are Libyan opposition figures and their senior symbols in America, as well as the Syrian and Iranian opposition, which are being hastily manufactured in America today. The examples are numerous, after regimes of injustice and tyranny have created diasporas of tens of millions of Muslims in Western countries since these regimes came into being. The program has become clear, repetitive, and well-known, as have its men and tools.

5. Americanized Agents from the Secular Current within the Arab and Islāmic World:

The American political offensive against the Arab and Islāmic world, under the pretext of reform and democracy, has produced a type of political opposition that has adopted American democratic and political reform projects. These are Westernized secularists, or rather Americanized individuals, who openly and without any equivocation welcome the replication of the American model of life in any way, even if it is on an American tank, following the Iraqi model. These opposition figures have even become emboldened against closed political regimes, as in Egypt, the Gulf states, and elsewhere, after sensing American protection and the weakness of regimes whose remaining days are numbered. This type, along with the previous one, are those whom America is preparing to rule us in the post-current-regimes phase.

6. The Class of Material Beneficiaries of Colonialism from among Senior Financiers and Businessmen in Our Countries:

With this comprehensive American offensive today, which includes major economic conspiracy projects, a class of merchants and capitalists is emerging in the Arab and Islāmic world. These are individuals who become partners in the American colonial project through partnership schemes, free zones, and major American and Western economic projects. Most of these are men of power and politics, and leaders of Arab and Islāmic societies, such as tribal chiefs, feudal lords, or capitalists whose interests align and intertwine with the goals and interests of the American project in what they call the Greater Middle East.

7. The Decadent and Corrupt Class from among the Sinful Common Muslims:

Most of these are from the popular segments of the general Arab and Islāmic

Ummah, who are intellectually distorted and culturally defeated. They have linked their minds to the sources of intellectual and cultural broadcasting from American and Western media outlets, and have been raised on programs like "Video Club," "Star Academy," Rotana satellite channel, and the like. Colonial powers are keen on drawing up major Westernization plans to expand this segment by opening universities, scientific and cultural centers, and sending missions to America for long periods to qualify a client cadre that is scientifically, intellectually, and culturally subservient. From them will come the applauding audience in the American Zār ceremony whose drums are beating throughout the length and breadth of our lands today.

Composition of Resistance Forces, Their Supporters, and Allies in the Arab, Islāmic, and International Arenas:

The vanguards of the nascent resistance confronting these Crusader campaigns consist of the following forces and segments, which I arrange according to their importance as follows:

- (1) Remnants of Jihādī current organizations from the Arab Afghans, al-Qā'idah, and Jihādīs in general from the remnants of groups and individuals scattered and displaced today throughout the world.
- (2) Mujāhid organizations (not from the Jihādī current) in various parts of the Islāmic world, such as the mujāhidīn in Palestine, Kashmir, the Philippines, Burma, Southeast Asia, the Horn of Africa, Chechnya, Bosnia, the Balkans, Central Asia, and elsewhere.
- (3) Supporters of the Jihādī phenomenon from among enthusiastic youth who carry Jihādī thought in the Arab and Islāmic world.
- (4) The general bases of Islāmic Awakening groups from various segments, where feelings of zeal, enthusiasm, revolutionary spirit, Jihādī orientation, and emotion are escalating, despite most of their leaders leaning towards political and da‘wah work and refraining from Jihād and resistance. This segment numbers in the millions, praise be to Allāh.

(5) Righteous independent scholars, who are many but still in a state of incapacity, leniency, and inaction. However, they are sympathetic to the resistance. I believe they will emerge when its strength grows.

(6) Righteous and honorable leaders in the Islāmic Awakening, especially in its second-tier and mid-level leadership. Most of them have begun to realize that Jihād is the solution after the futility of political paths and the increasing audacity of the colonial onslaught, especially within the Salafī current and groups holding the ideology of the Muslim Brotherhood.

(7) The ordinary Muslim on the street in the Arab and Islāmic world. This is a huge segment. Those enthusiastic for Jihād and resistance, and ready to contribute some effort to resistance in the direct (military) or (civil resistance) domain, or support with money, words, or any contribution, even if only by supplication in their absence—which is one of the most potent weapons in this battle—constitute a segment of hundreds of millions in an oppressed Ummah whose population today approaches one and a half billion Muslims.

(8) Honorable individuals and people of conscience from the nationalist, patriotic, leftist currents, and some secular opposition groups in the Arab and Islāmic world.

As for the presumed supporters and allies of the global Islāmic resistance in the external sphere, they are all enemies of the American imperialist project, its expansionist imperial program, and its imperialist Crusader campaigns.

The enemies of American imperialism in the world today are many, even in the Western world, and even within the American populace. They form a very large segment globally. Some have openly declared their position, while others have remained hidden due to fear and pressure. However, the strengthening of the Islāmic resistance, its heavy toll on American forces, and the erosion of some of its prestige will make this fearful segment, afraid of American repression, declare its position. It will also make the American alliance vulnerable to dissolution and disintegration.

The presumed supporters and allies of the resistance abroad in these circles are, according to their importance:

- a - Leftist parties in Western countries known for their history of opposing American policies.
  - b - National parties and global liberation forces in the Third World known for their history of opposing colonialism, especially American domination and imperialism.
  - c - Green parties and nationalist and patriotic political parties opposing American policy in the West.
  - d - Human rights organizations and non-governmental institutions opposing American policies in the Western world.
  - e - Secret leftist military organizations and others, known for their hostility to America or its allies, such as the Red Brigades, the Japanese Red Army, the ETA organization in Basque Spain, and organizations refusing to lay down arms from the Irish Republican Army, and the like.
  - f - Civil society institutions and organizations within the United States itself, including blocs, bodies, and personalities opposing American expansionist policy. These are circles towards which political, media, and other efforts must be directed to benefit from the common ground between us and them against American imperialist policies, each according to its capacity.
- I believe that such a move, by those who have the capabilities for it, can open up avenues for us that will confuse the enemy and completely overturn its security and strategic calculations.

The Reality of the Neutral Camp in the Conflict Between American Campaigns and Global Islāmic Resistance Forces:

Until now, the neutral camp in the conflict between America and its allies on one side, and the Islāmic resistance forces opposing them on the other, remains limited and small for three reasons:

Firstly: American political, media, economic, military, and security terrorism against all parties that declare their opposition to the American project, under penalty of being branded as supporters of terrorism.

Secondly: The lumping of the global Islāmic resistance, in all its spectrums and colors, under the label of "terrorism," and even placing them under the term "al-Qā'idah" and supporters of al-Qā'idah. Consequently, anyone who supports them is embarrassed and made to feel they are walking towards their doom.

Thirdly: The failure, so far, of the various factions of the resistance in their media and political programs, and their failure to present themselves to local and international public opinion as legitimate resistance forces. Their focus has been on incitement to action, without political and media dimensions that consider the pathways of public opinion formation.

Nevertheless, there is a spectrum of states and regional and global powers that remain in the circle of neutrality. These must be the focus of efforts by the resistance forces and their cadres, especially in the political and media fields, to convert them as much as possible to the camp supporting the resistance forces. Among these forces are:

1 - In the external sphere, there is China, which America seeks to fragment, and for which Congress has had a public program since 1995. It is a candidate to shift to the camp assisting the resistance against the Americans, if the resistance forces prove themselves, present themselves as "legitimate" resistance in the international concept, and succeed in shedding the accusation of "terrorism." There are also many Asian and African countries, and very important segments of the populations of Western countries who detest America and its programs, and have not understood the programs and objectives of the resistance in our lands. The enormity of this camp has been proven by the massive demonstrations that have roamed the streets of Western countries and capitals. These segments are not, by nature, supportive of the resistance.

2 - As for within Arab and Islāmic societies themselves:

The segments of neutral forces are still large; they detest the Americans but do not support the resistance, do not understand its message, and have distorted perceptions of it, such as religious and ethnic minorities, and many common people.

After this brief explanation of the map of forces and allies for both conflicting camps—the camp of the invading enemies and the camp of the global Islāmic resistance forces against them—we can move to the next important paragraph, which is:

Thirdly: Pillars of the General Political Strategy for the Call of Global Islāmic Resistance:

At the beginning of the discussion about the broad outlines of the strategy for global Islāmic resistance in confronting America and its allies, it is worth drawing attention to very important points:

- Strategy, as we mentioned, is characterized by relative stability, and its stability is related to the general stability of the surrounding data and general conditions. However, due to the stark imbalance in material power between the resistance forces and the forces of the American campaigns and their allies, the resistance strategy cannot be detailed.
Because the weak cannot set strategies.

This is due to their inability to impose conditions, or at least to maintain their stability. Therefore, strategies may change as a result of shifts in general conditions. It is more advisable for the resistance strategy to be a set of broad strategic lines that give it flexibility of movement and the ability to change tactics according to emerging realities.

- Resistance is a confrontational act and a project of engagement. It must be stated clearly and with an understanding of a very important fact: without a strong armed confrontation present on the ground, and without resistance that takes on the character of a general phenomenon, not just a series of uprisings, there will be no value to any political or media theory of resistance. Resistance derives its existence and life from its effective armed strength on the ground. Its political and media projects derive their value and presence from the bullets of the mujāhidīn's rifles and the roar of their operations' explosions.

Similarly, without political and media action, all military efforts are wasted and cannot be employed to achieve the goal. Because, as we have mentioned, victory in resistance is a process of political exhaustion, not the annihilation of the opponent under such circumstances. Unless Allāh grants us, or others, success in striking America in its heartland with weapons of mass destruction, or it is destroyed by meteors, earthquakes, and divine hurricanes, and humanity is relieved of its evils.

- Political strategy is part of the general strategy. It must be harmonious with the military and media strategy and other dimensions of the general strategy. All are placed in the service of the general strategic objectives.

The four strategic objectives for the call of global Islāmic resistance are:

- (1) Defeating the Jewish-Crusader campaigns led by America and its Jewish and Crusader allies, and pursuing their remnants in the Islāmic world.
- (2) Liquidating the forces of collaboration and hypocrisy that work to achieve the objectives of the invading campaigns.
- (3) Overthrowing the apostate and treacherous regimes existing in our lands due to their support for these invading campaigns.
- (4) Establishing the rule of Sharīʿah on the ruins of those apostate forces.

General Axes of the Political Strategy for the Call of Global Islāmic Resistance:

Firstly: Expanding the concept and axes of resistance to include confrontation with all aspects and axes of the American-Zionist campaigns' onslaught, which are comprehensive axes as we have shown. It should not be limited to the field of military resistance, although that is the essence and foundation of the call to resistance.

These axes are:

1 - Military Resistance:

By targeting all forms of the enemy's presence and those who support them, their projects, and their military, security, political, economic, cultural, and other institutions, according to the Sharīʿah methodological guidelines we have explained, and as we will detail in the explanation of military theory, if Allāh wills.

2 - Political Resistance:

By resisting the enemy's political projects and objectives, and its footholds in our lands, through peaceful political means. Margins of what local and international laws consider legitimate can be utilized, especially in the fields of civil society institutions and non-governmental organizations. Attention must be paid to avoiding affiliation and membership in ruling institutions established by the enemy, or ruling institutions that govern by other than what Allāh has revealed and are loyal to the enemy.

3 - Media Resistance:

This is a branch of political resistance. It involves using modern means in all their forms, especially satellite channels and the internet, to incite resistance in its various forms. It also involves corresponding with institutions, organizations, and personalities in our countries and everywhere, even in the enemy's own lands, especially circles expected to be influenced in any way in favor of our cause, to fuel the resistance and unify its ranks, and to fragment the enemy's ranks, weaken it, and refute its arguments and justifications.

4 - Civil Resistance:

By confronting the enemies and those who support them through demonstrations, sit-ins, strikes, and various forms of popular protest, such as chanting slogans, writing on walls, and disseminating materials inciting revolution against the occupiers and their collaborators, through leaflets, audio and visual statements, and by every means possible that people can employ. This is the responsibility of popular organizations such as trade unions, student unions, and community leaders, foremost among them scholars, public figures, and symbols in every field.

5 - Passive Resistance:

This and what follows represent the weakest form of faith in the Jihād against these enemies and their hypocritical supporters in our lands. This includes boycotting all transactions: not selling to them, not buying their goods, not receiving them, and not showing them hospitality. Not belonging to their institutions, and not paying them levies and taxes except under duress. To show them all forms of disavowal according to one's ability, to boycott their media and not listen to them, and to pray to Allāh against them and curse them in one's heart, and with one's tongue if able—Allāh does not burden a soul beyond its scope.

6 - Resistance by Deepening the Roots of Resistance:

This is by preserving the religious, national, intellectual, and civilizational identity of Arabs and Muslims, and confronting the campaigns in all their general cultural and educational aspects. This type of resistance, despite its ease and the fact that it does not require any practical effort from its practitioner, is very important for keeping the flame of life burning in the Ummah. This generation may not be able to push back as it should due to its weakness and circumstances, but preserving the Ummah's religious, cultural, social, and moral identity, and all its civilizational characteristics, is sufficient to preserve the spirit and roots of resistance for generations that will be more capable of giving. This is achieved by preserving the spirit of religiosity and spreading the sciences of Islām in their purity, far from the falsification carried out by American media in our lands. Here, the role of mosques, public and secret teaching circles if necessary, and the secret and public dissemination of educational books and publications becomes prominent. Domestic education and what mothers and housewives do in raising children on religion and instilling Islāmic identity in their minds from a young age are of the greatest benefit and impact.

Secondly: Doctrinal, methodological, and intellectual regulation of the starting points of the resistance and its Sharīʿah foundations, so that they are consistent with the fundamentals of the Islāmic religion, the lofty concepts of Jihād, its established Sharīʿah-based political rules and judgments, and its known Sharīʿah etiquettes. Protecting it from turning into chaos, turmoil, and an atmosphere of tribulations. Focusing on preserving the blood and wealth of Muslims, both their righteous and their wicked, and striving for their reform. Focusing on striking the enemy and its manifest supporters.

Thirdly: Extricating the global Islāmic resistance from the accusation of "blind, aimless terrorism" drawn by the media. Highlighting the true identity of the resistance as a Jihādī movement exercising the right to self-defense, a right guaranteed by religions and divine laws, as well as by human customs and laws. Attempting to win public opinion across various segments of societies and peoples at the Arab, Islāmic, and global levels.

Fourthly: Developing military and security confrontation methods to suit the state of stark imbalance with the overwhelming American onslaught and its allies. Not drawing resistance forces into exposed, unequal confrontations.

Fifthly: Building bridges with various segments and components of Arab and Islāmic societies that reject tyranny. Removing the state of social, political, and intellectual isolation between resisters and Jihādīs and those segments as much as possible, foremost among them the components of the Islāmic Awakening, its leaders, scholars, and bases. Then, all honorable gatherings, parties, personalities, and forces expressing the living conscience of the Ummah in confronting invasion and aggression from all spectrums.

Sixthly: Adopting a policy of dismantling the hostile American-Crusader-Jewish alliance to limit it to the fewest possible allies with America, Israel, and the forces of Jewish Zionism and pro-Zionist Crusaderism.

Seventhly: Highlighting the civilizational dimension of the call for Islāmic resistance as an integrated civilizational movement aimed at establishing the Islāmic state and carrying the torch of civilization and salvation for humankind, and establishing relations with other peoples on the basis of justice and excellence.

Eighthly: Adopting a strategy of confining the conflict to the circle of hostile forces and their allies. Adopting the principle of possible neutralization of different forces and possible recruitment from supporting forces to place them within the sphere of performance and resistance work.

Ninthly: Forming a resistance alliance based on three circles, on fundamental principles, which are:

- (1) Jihād with the Ahl al-Sunnah wa-l-Jamā‘ah.
- (2) Cooperation with the People of the Qiblah from among Muslims.
- (3) Seeking assistance from all sincere forces in our support from the enemies of America and its allies from among non-Muslims.

Within the controls of the rules of Shari‘ah-based governance and the data of interest and movement in light of political reality.

Tenthly: Adopting a policy of long-term war of attrition in the comprehensive confrontation with America and its allies, using the method of secret guerrilla warfare, especially the method of terrorism and deterrence through urban guerrilla warfare, and targeting the enemy's strategic presence in our lands.

Eleventh: Adopting a strategy of construction and deconstruction in confronting the campaigns. Building up the resistance forces and all their foundations, roots, cadres, and alliances. And, conversely, deconstructing the forces of the American campaigns and their allies, and paying attention to liquidating and aborting the foundations of these campaigns and their options in all political, economic, cultural, and other aspects in Muslim lands.

Twelfth: Benefiting from the camp of supporters of our cause within Western societies and other countries forming the Crusader-Zionist alliance led by America.

Thirteenth: Working on coordinating tactics between Jihādī military, political, media, and da‘wah-educational activities in the Ummah to achieve the general resistance strategy.

And forcing the enemy to be convinced that what it reaps from campaigns, occupation, and aggression is far less than the human and economic costs of its campaigns.

Fourteenth: Adopting a strategy of striving and action, and abandoning the labyrinths of stagnation and debate, for events have clarified everything, and the enemy's camp and objectives, and the resistance's camp and legitimacy, have become clear.

{And say, "Do [as you will], for Allāh will see your deeds, and [so will] His Messenger and the believers."} (Qur'ān, Al-Tawbah 9:105).

An important question may be raised about the resistance's strategy for the phase after defeating the campaigns and overthrowing their allies, and what its political, economic, cultural, and social program will be, and so on.

Here we summarize the clarification as follows:

(1) The long-term resistance phase will produce its men, cadres, scholars, callers, and symbols. Upon them will fall the task of answering this question through the legacy of the path and its constants.

(2) The new reality then—after the enemy's defeat—will produce, in addition to its new men, its new circumstances, with which those working will know how to cooperate, through our constants and their experiences. It is premature to address those future stages and circumstances of victory, if Allāh wills, with the data of the current state of retreat and defeat.

(3) The aforementioned strategic objectives, in their sequence—defeating the enemy, then liquidating its agents, overthrowing the regimes that enabled its campaigns and collaborated, then establishing the rulings of Islāmic Sharī'ah in Muslim lands according to those circumstances—remain the general program.

(4) In the general principles of Sharī'ah and its details are comprehensive answers to all issues of legislation, codification, governance, and administration, in a way that is sufficient, adequate, and obviates the need for detailing them here. Every event has its own discourse. When the oppression of tyrants is lifted from the Ummah's scholars, men of thought, and people of understanding and intellect, those men will know how to manage their affairs according to the law of Allāh and what suits their circumstances.

The important thing now is to put into effect the strategy for the phase extending from the beginning of the campaign until its defeat. This is our task now. And Allāh is the one whose help is sought.

Fourthly: Political Positions of the Call of Global Islāmic Resistance on Key Issues:

To complete the outline of the fundamental features of the political strategy for the call of global Islāmic Resistance, we will briefly state our position here, from a political perspective, on key important issues, both for the followers of the call and for all concerned:

1. The Issue of Conflict with Existing Regimes in the Arab and Islāmic World:

The policy of the resistance call is to focus on confronting the invading enemy, represented by America and those who assist and ally with it from internal and external forces. Accordingly:

It is not among the objectives of the resistance to confront the existing regimes—despite their deserving it—in order to consolidate the Ummah's efforts on the strategic objective of the resistance, which is the overthrow of the American-Zionist project. Targeting some sectors of those regimes remains to the extent of their entry into the American alliance, without turning this into local revolutions in the manner that Jihādīs used to operate.

As for defensive confrontation with the apparatuses of those regimes, it is a legitimate right and a necessary duty, to the extent of necessity.

2. The Position on Muslim Scholars from the Leaderships and Movements of the Islāmic Awakening:

We summarize this as:

a - Supporting the mujāhid scholars and leaders who proclaim the truth and defend the Ummah's causes.

b - Conciliating the hesitant and fearful, and strengthening their resolve with wisdom and good counsel, and overlooking their slips as long as they do not become a method of appeasing the aggression of rulers and occupiers.

c - Confronting the hypocritical scholars of the Sultan and the treacherous jurists of colonialism, firmly but with proof and evidence.

And not escalating this to confrontation with force and weapons under any circumstances or provocation.

3. Honorable Individuals in the Secular Current Who Resist American Campaigns:

The summary of the position, in circumstances of repelling the aggressor, is to search for points of convergence with them in confronting the enemy, and to redefine those circles through dialogue, correspondence, and meetings about Islām, its data, and its horizons as a political and civilizational option for the future of this Ummah, while paying attention to doctrinal constants and political margins.

4. Soldiers and Security Personnel in the Governments of the Arab and Islāmic World:

This was previously indicated in the fundamentals of the methodology.

Confrontation with them is defensive only, within the limits of necessity, avoiding being drawn into provocations, and pursuing a policy of winning them over to their Ummah's side in the ongoing battle of destiny.

5. The Position on the Palestinian Issue:

This was previously indicated in the general methodology, and its summary is:

1 - Palestine is the cause of Muslims, not just the cause of Arabs or Palestinians alone. No one has a license to dispose of it at the tables of international slave markets.

2 - Palestine is Arab Islāmic land from the river to the sea. We do not recognize any authority, legitimacy, or right of residence for Jews in it, except for the original Jews from there, whose number at the time of the Zionist occupation and invasion was only about 15,000, and their descendants of apes and pigs. These accursed ones are original citizens there, and Islām has guaranteed their legislated rights. The occupying immigrants must return from whence they came on the ships and planes that brought them from overseas, or await the imminent massacre of the trees and stones, if Allāh wills.

3 - We do not recognize the Palestinian Authority except as one of the Arab apostate entities weighing down on the chests of Muslims. We do not recognize any of their agreements and farces of false peace, from Oslo to the Roadmap, with shame and disgrace upon its proponents, leading to Hell, if Allāh wills.

4 - We strongly support the sincere mujāhidīn in Palestine and pledge to them our support and unity in battle and destiny.

6. The Issue of Targeting Civilians in the Lands of Countries Participating in Aggression Against Muslims:

As we have previously stated, this is only a field for reciprocal treatment and for deterring aggression, and in the narrowest of emergency situations, while considering political interests and the differing positions of states. The principle in Jihād is the saying of Allāh, the Exalted: {Fight in the way of Allāh those who fight you but do not transgress. Indeed, Allāh does not like transgressors.} (Qur’ān, Al-Baqarah 2:190), and His saying, the Exalted: {So whoever has assaulted you, then assault him in the same way that he has assaulted you.} (Qur’ān, Al-Baqarah 2:194).

7. European Governments and Peoples:

As we have clarified, we believe that America's battle with Muslims is, in its results and consequences, against European strategic interests in their entirety.

Many circles in Europe have begun to grow restless with the battle into which America is dragging them. We believe that the time remaining until Europe separates from America and frees itself from the consequences of NATO and other agreements that tie it to Europe is no longer long.

It is in the interest of the resistance forces to give the main countries in Europe a chance to withdraw from America's alliance diplomatically.

Without neglecting the precise calculations between the political and media effort that the Islāmic resistance forces can exert, and the firmness of the military deterrence policy that they must practice to compel the Europeans—especially those among them insistent on aggression—towards a policy that distances them from the American axis, and is in their interest and ours. This requires that the decision in this regard be made by the conscious leadership of the resistance.

In general, we are in favor of working to unify the direction of effort against the American-Zionist axis and whoever insists on siding with them and whose participation is active.

With a reminder to clarify that the battle is with the aggressor governments and not with the European peoples, many of whom have taken good principled stances in rejecting aggression.

8. The American Administration and the American People:

Unfortunately, official statistics and opinion polls still prove that the relationship, in terms of the strategy of aggression and the tendency for domination and control over the resources of weak peoples, between the American people and the American government, is the opposite of the situation between European peoples and their stance on the aggressive orientations of some of their governments. This is true even in Britain, where most of the people do not support their government's aggression.

Despite the exposure of the falsity of the pretexts for invading Iraq and the debunking of lies about weapons of mass destruction and other justifications, despite the Abū Ghurayb scandals, despite Israel's crimes that disgust public opinion in Europe and the world, and despite news of the American army's crimes in Afghanistan, the majority of the American people remain captive to the controlling Jewish media, and the majority still stands with Israel and with the aggression of successive American administrations against Muslims and the oppressed in the world, indeed, against all of humanity.

The biggest proof of this is the American people's re-election of the pig George Bush, by a large margin, the dull acceptance of this by his opponents, and the rallying of everyone to stand as one because they are in a state of war with Muslims.

Therefore, we believe that the war with the American administration is, by all Shari'ah and political justifications, and even according to Western and American logic itself:

A war and confrontation with America, government and people.

It seems that this criminal rabble of a people, in its overwhelming majority, as proven by its many crimes throughout its short history, must taste the evil consequences of what its successive Zionist governments inflict upon people and humanity everywhere. Starting with their genocides of America's indigenous population, passing through their nuclear massacres in World War II, and touching upon their shameful crimes in all their wars in Vietnam, Korea, Iraq, Somalia, Afghanistan, and elsewhere.

The day the American people are convinced—and I do not think they will be convinced except by force—of the enormity of their human and economic losses as a result of the aggression of their successive, varied governments against Muslims and all of humanity, then they will cease their evil, and consequently, they will not pay the price for supporting their rulers in killing people and plundering nations.

The peace-loving forces in the American people—as they claim—must assume responsibility, even through armed confrontation, for deterring their Zionist governments from aggression against all of humanity. Otherwise, it is the right of the peoples aggressed upon by America to repel American aggression with like means and by all means, including weapons of mass destruction, and the policy of breaking the enemy's back through genocide and killing civilians. This is their repeated method, and it is the very essence of justice that they be treated with it. Allāh the Exalted said: {So whoever has assaulted you, then assault him in the same way that he has assaulted you.} (Qur'ān, Al-Baqarah 2:194).

9. The Position on Religious Minorities in Muslim Lands:

We have previously referred to this issue, especially regarding Christians. Their Shari'ah rights are known within the framework of Islām, when governance is in the hands of Muslims according to what Allāh has revealed. As for now, while we are still in the stage of repelling aggression, our position towards them is not to harm them, except for those who stand in the ranks of aggression and occupation, who will be confronted for this reason, just like anyone else, even Muslims. It is in the interest of the resistance and its objectives to win over these minorities or at least neutralize them.

10. The Position on Human Rights Organizations:

In a fierce battle like the one currently raging, the positions of these organizations do not seem to be of great importance in restoring a right or deterring aggression. However, events have proven the impact of these institutions and their media stances, often in shaping global public opinion, and the impact of that public opinion in supporting causes of truth and justice, albeit in the long term. Therefore, we advise those working in the field of political and media resistance not to overlook the impact of efforts with these organizations in pressuring occupation forces and shaping public opinion in favor of our causes.

11. The United Nations, International Laws, and International Organizations:

The United Nations, in short, is an organization formed by victorious allies in World War II to ensure the division of control over the world and to codify the distribution of that control among themselves according to their military and political strength and weight.

Some propaganda margins were left for some of its institutions, for weak peoples and subservient governments to operate within, imagining it to be a margin of political influence. Many international organizations branched out from the United Nations, sharing the task of subjugating and controlling weak peoples in the fields of education, health, agriculture, and human and economic development, leaving them dependent and revolving in the orbit of colonial states. When the international balance of power was disrupted by the collapse of the Soviet Union, and America unilaterally managed the world, America inherited almost complete control over this organization, which will soon collapse and disappear as an institution from the remnants of the old world order.

This organization has testified against itself that it was behind the codification of the loss of Arab and Muslim rights in all their issues presented to it; this would require a full volume to detail. The organization recognized Israel and all its conspiracies after its establishment. Its resolutions in favor of Arabs and Muslims only succeeded in throwing dust—in the form of condemnation resolutions—in people's eyes. Now that America has inherited the organization.

This Kofi Annan has turned into a despicable employee subservient to the White House. The Security Council legitimized the invasion of Iraq, codified its occupation, and paved the way for internationalizing that occupation, as it did in Afghanistan and Bosnia previously.

In conclusion, the resistance forces must deal with these international institutions, each according to its harm and aggression, on the basis that they are the false curtain for the American-Zionist aggression and the control of its shadow government over the world. They must not be deceived by the farce of the United Nations confronting American ambitions. The utmost role of states opposing America within it is their eagerness to increase the share of wolves, hyenas, and rats from what the American lion leaves behind from its predation on our bowl and plunder of our wealth.

This is not to mention the espionage and intelligence role played by the employees of these institutions wherever they settled in our lands. We must deal with them as one of the institutions of the Zio-American aggression and occupation. We will obliterate all their presence in our lands without leniency. And Allāh is the Helper against them all.

The Theory of Integrated Education in the Call of Global Islāmic Resistance

Awakening Schools and Educational Approaches:

As I mentioned earlier regarding our methodology for generating theories of action by reviewing our experiences and the experiences of others in the course of the Islāmic and Jihādī awakening, and for generating perceptions of what is correct, or what we assume to be correct and strive for, by evaluating the lessons from errors and shortcomings.

By reviewing the integrated educational approaches for the Muslim mujāhid, we find that they encompass five aspects:

- (1) Behavioral and moral education, worship, and spiritual refinements.
- (2) Sharī‘ah knowledge in the fields of creed and various religious sciences, especially the jurisprudence of Jihād.
- (3) Political understanding or jurisprudence of the current reality and ongoing events.
- (4) Jihādī military preparation to equip the mujāhid with the necessary sciences of combat.

(5) Finally, the practical application of practicing Jihād in repelling the aggression of enemies against Muslims.

If we were to review the share of various Islāmic action schools in the Awakening, including the Jihādī school, what would we find regarding their state in the field of education?

We note that we are judging here based on the general case, and exceptions do not make the rule, as one might find an individual from one school of the Awakening who has adopted positive traits found in another school.

Firstly: Reformist and Behavioral Educational Schools:

Such as Tablighī Jamā‘at, Da‘wah groups, Sufi groups, and the like, we find that they have taken a plentiful share in the first field—worship, ethics, behavior, spiritual refinements, and various aspects of etiquette. We find that their share (generally, of course) of Sharī‘ah knowledge in matters of creed, jurisprudence, and various religious sciences is limited among their seniors and almost non-existent among their rank and file. We will find that their share of political understanding and jurisprudence of reality is also almost non-existent, except in rare cases. As for preparation for Jihād and its practice, we will find that they generally have no share in that.

Secondly: Salafī and Sharī‘ah-based Scientific Educational Schools:

Such as the various schools constituting the Salafī current and students of Sharī‘ah knowledge, we find that their share in the first field (ethics, worship, and spiritual refinements) is small, and their circles are often dominated by harshness, severity, and the effects of a lack of spiritual raising (tarbiyah). As for the second field, they have taken an abundant share of the sciences of creed, authentication of narrations, study of the Sunnah, and various religious sciences and jurisprudence. You find their seniors to be of a high caliber, and their rank and file also generally have a decent share. Like their predecessors, we find that their share in the fields of political understanding and jurisprudence of reality is small. As for preparation and Jihād, they are neither here nor there, like those previously mentioned, and they generally have no share in it except in individual cases.

Thirdly: Political Action Schools and Da‘wah, Political, and Party Organizations:

Such as Muslim Brotherhood groups, Ḥizb al-Taḥrīr, and similar political groups. We find that their share in the field of worship, spiritual refinements, and spiritual and moral education is generally small. The same applies to the field of Sharī‘ah knowledge. As for the fields of jurisprudence of reality, political science, administration, and general culture, we find their share to be plentiful. Their seniors are at a high level in this, and their rank and file are at an acceptable and good level. As for the fields of preparation and practice of Jihād, they also generally have no share in that, except in special individual cases.

Fourthly: Schools of the Jihād Current and Jihādīs:

We find them to be like their predecessors. They focused on one aspect and neglected the others. They occupied themselves and most of their time with military preparation and training, and many of them practiced Jihād and combat practically. As for the fields of preparation, behavioral and worship-related education, and the fields of ethics and spiritual refinements, you will find that the share of most of them in that is average or small, especially the later ones among them. If you come to the fields of Sharī‘ah knowledge and its pursuit, you will find it to be average. And if you come to the fields of understanding reality and politics, you will find that the share of the vast majority in that is shallow and small, except for the first generation of Jihādīs who were well-educated in Islāmic groups and circles of knowledge.

Thus, we observe that all schools of the Awakening and Islāmic action have practiced in their methodologies a state of fragmented preparation and education, focusing on one or two dimensions and neglecting the rest. If we were to represent these conditions in a table, it would be as follows:

The table shows the following distribution for different Awakening Schools:

Behavioral and Educational Reformist Schools (Sufi, Tablighī):

Ethics, Etiquette, and Worship: Good.

Sharīʿah Sciences: Weak.

Political Understanding and Jurisprudence of Reality: Very Weak.

Military Preparation: Non-existent.

Practice of Jihād: Non-existent.

Salafī and Sharīʿah-based Scientific Educational Schools:

Ethics, Etiquette, and Worship: Average or Weak.

Sharīʿah Sciences: Good.

Political Understanding and Jurisprudence of Reality: Average or Weak.

Military Preparation: Non-existent.

Practice of Jihād: Non-existent.

Political Action Schools and Daʿwah, Political, and Party Organizations:

Ethics, Etiquette, and Worship: Average or Weak.

Sharīʿah Sciences: Weak or Average.

Political Understanding and Jurisprudence of Reality: Good.

Military Preparation: Non-existent.

Practice of Jihād: Non-existent.

Jihādī Current Schools:

Ethics, Etiquette, and Worship: Weak or Average.

Sharīʿah Sciences: Weak or Average.

Political Understanding and Jurisprudence of Reality: Weak or Average.

Military Preparation: Good.

Practice of Jihād: Average.

Thus, we observe that in the Jihādī school, although we are generally in a better state, our school has generally been characterized by the same fragmentation and omission in education and preparation, by focusing on one-fourth of the educational aspects and neglecting three-fourths.

Through my immersion in the Jihādī current and my long-term field experience with it, I noticed that later Jihādīs, unlike the first generation who followed a distinguished line of education, especially those who came from other Awakening groups and schools and adopted some of their educational methods, the later ones were content with their share of military preparation and the practice of Jihād, considering that this places them at the pinnacle of Islām. This is based on a fragmented and erroneous understanding of the Ḥadīth narrated from the Prophet, peace and blessings be upon him, that "Jihād is the pinnacle of Islām," taking it out of the context of the general, comprehensive Ḥadīth that includes all the fundamentals of Islām and the collection of all aspects of goodness. The full Ḥadīth is:

"On the authority of Mu'ādh, may Allāh be pleased with him, who said: I said, 'O Messenger of Allāh, tell me of an act that will admit me to Paradise and keep me away from Hellfire.' He said, 'You have asked about something great, and indeed it is easy for whomever Allāh, the Exalted, makes it easy: Worship Allāh and associate nothing with Him, establish prayer, give Zakāh, fast Ramaḍān, and perform Ḥajj to the House if you are able to find a way. Then he said, 'Shall I not guide you to the gates of goodness? Fasting is a shield, and charity extinguishes sin as water extinguishes fire, and a man's prayer in the middle of the night.' Then he recited: {Their sides forsake their beds...} until he reached {...what they used to do} (Qur'ān, Al-Sajdah 32:16-17). Then he said, 'Shall I not tell you of the head of the matter, its pillar, and its pinnacle?' I said, 'Yes, O Messenger of Allāh.' He said, 'The head of the matter is Islām, its pillar is prayer, and its pinnacle is Jihād.' Then he said, 'Shall I not tell you of what controls all that?' I said, 'Yes, O Messenger of Allāh.' So he took hold of his tongue and said, 'Restrain this.' I said, 'O Messenger of Allāh, will we be taken to account for what we say?' He said, 'May your mother be bereaved of you! Are people thrown into Hellfire on their faces for anything other than the harvests of their tongues?'" Reported by al-Tirmidhī, who said it is a good, sound Ḥadīth.

If we return to the method of the Prophet, peace and blessings be upon him, in educating the first generation of Companions, may Allāh be pleased with them, then their method in educating the Successors, then the education of these by those who followed them in excellence, and so on, up to the practice of the Salaf, scholars, and the righteous, we find that it was all based on the comprehensive method established by the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him. He himself, peace and blessings be upon him, was an example. His character was the Qur'ān, as 'Ā'ishah narrated. And whoever's character is the Qur'ān, combines all aspects of virtue, knowledge, etiquette, and noble morals. As for his biography, peace and blessings be upon him, it is a path of firm creed connected to Allāh, Glorified and Exalted be He, and it is the source and abundant sea of Sharī'ah sciences. As for his morals, peace and blessings be upon him, it is sufficient to mention Allāh's description of him: {And indeed, you are of a great moral character} (Qur'ān, Al-Qalam 68:4). As for his preparation and Jihād, it is too famous to be pointed out. As for his method, peace and blessings be upon him, in preparation and education, it was an integrated, daily school with which the Companions lived that integration: ethics and worship, knowledge and action, understanding and preparation, Jihād and the path of martyrdom.

The Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, with his firm creed, jurisprudence, character, and Jihād, was the good example before them. His integrated method relied on instilling creeds, of which the first generation in Makkah took their largest share. He planted the creed and nurtured its tree until its roots were firm in their souls, then it grew in their spirits and bore fruit in their behavior.

As for his care for them, peace and blessings be upon him, in urging them to worship, devotion, and asceticism, and setting the highest example for them in that, the texts of the Sunnah and the accounts of the Sīrah are replete with it.

Similarly, this was the case in their care and upbringing on noble morals, such as truthfulness, trustworthiness, generosity, courage, honoring guests, mutual love, mercy and humility towards believers, mutual support, and altruism to the highest peak of praiseworthy ethics.

As for their living their reality, understanding it, and dealing with it, the evidence for this is abundant in their biographies, whether within their society or with the surrounding local and regional powers.

As for their military preparation, the Prophet, peace and blessings be upon him, urged them to train, practice archery, prepare strength, and ride horses. He witnessed their fields, races, and competition in that.

As for the practice of Jihād, his approach, peace and blessings be upon him, was the good example. He himself, peace and blessings be upon him, went out on many expeditions, and sent out detachments and armies under the command of those dearest to him to be in positions of example and danger. He himself, peace and blessings be upon him, was an example, to the extent that ‘Alī, may Allāh be pleased with him, said that the bravest among them was the closest to the enemy. He would not postpone a man if he embraced Islām, delaying him from Jihād until he was prepared and educated in Islām, as the inactive callers claim today! Rather, his slogan, peace and blessings be upon him, was, as he said to someone who wanted to join him in fighting but was not a Muslim:

"Embrace Islām, then fight."

So, the summary of his method, peace and blessings be upon him, in education was that it was integrated in its aspects and based on:

(1) Creed and knowledge. (2) Character and devotion. (3) Understanding and living reality. (4) Preparation and strength. (5) Practicing Jihād as an obligation when it occurs.

From here, we find that the Salaf, may Allāh be pleased with them, focused on these integrated aspects in their conduct, the preparation of their students, their guidance to the Ummah, and the good example they set.

I do not want to prolong the citations and evidence for what I have mentioned from the books of the Prophet's Sīrah, upon its owner be the purest prayers and peace, the biographies of the Companions, may Allāh be pleased with them, and the wonderful stories about them and those who followed them in excellence.

Masterpieces have been written about them.

From the foregoing, we discover the basic aspects of our theory upon which it must be based;

The principles of education in the call of global Islāmic resistance are:

- 1 - Creed and Sharī'ah knowledge.
- 2 - Etiquette, worship, ethics, and spiritual refinements.
- 3 - Political understanding and jurisprudence of reality.
- 4 - Military preparation.
- 5 - Directly engaging in Jihād and resistance to repel the aggressor.

These are the five pillars upon which our educational method is based. Accordingly, scholars, callers, and writers in these arts and their fields in this Ummah must strive to enrich the contemporary Islāmic library with a methodology and practical summaries that help educate the coming generation of resisters and mujāhidīn on these foundations.

The leaders and constructive cadres of the resistance must adopt such methodologies in preparing themselves and those with them. We will outline below general summaries and programs that help mujāhidīn and resisters, especially those affiliated with the call of global Islāmic resistance, to prepare themselves and their cadres, and to prepare the Ummah according to these integrated horizons, which must proceed in a balanced and simultaneous manner.

The First Field in Education: Creed and Sharī'ah Knowledge

The Status and Virtue of Knowledge:

It is stated in Riyāḍ al-Ṣāliḥīn:

Allāh the Exalted said: {And say, "My Lord, increase me in knowledge."} (Qur'ān, Ṭāhā 20:114). And He the Exalted said: {Say, "Are those who know equal to those who do not know?"} (Qur'ān, Al-Zumar 39:9). And He the Exalted said: {Allāh will raise those who have believed among you and those who were given knowledge, by degrees.} (Qur'ān, Al-Mujādilah 58:11). And He the Exalted said: {Only those fear Allāh, from among His servants, who have knowledge.} (Qur'ān, Fāṭir 35:28).

"It is narrated from Mu'āwiyah, may Allāh be pleased with him, that the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, said: 'Whomever Allāh wishes good for, He grants him understanding in the religion.' Agreed upon."

"And from Ibn Mas'ūd, may Allāh be pleased with him, who said: The Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, said: 'There is no envy except in two cases: a man whom Allāh has given wealth and he spends it in the way of truth, and a man whom Allāh has given wisdom and he judges by it and teaches it.' Agreed upon."

"And from Abū Mūsā, may Allāh be pleased with him, who said: The Prophet, peace and blessings be upon him, said: 'The likeness of the guidance and knowledge with which Allāh has sent me is like abundant rain that falls on land. Some of it was fertile soil that absorbed the water and brought forth an abundance of vegetation and grass. Some of it was barren land that retained the water, and Allāh benefited people by it; they drank from it, watered their animals, and cultivated crops. And some of it fell on another type of land, which was only a plain that neither retained water nor produced vegetation. That is the likeness of one who gains understanding in the religion of Allāh and benefits from what Allāh has sent me with, so he learns and teaches. And the likeness of one who does not pay attention to it and does not accept the guidance of Allāh with which I have been sent.' Agreed upon."

"And from Abū Hurayrah, may Allāh be pleased with him, that the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, said: 'Whoever treads a path in search of knowledge, Allāh will make easy for him a path to Paradise.' Reported by Muslim."

"And also from him, may Allāh be pleased with him, that the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, said: 'Whoever calls to guidance will have a reward similar to the rewards of those who follow him, without that diminishing any of their rewards.' Reported by Muslim."

"And from him, who said: The Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, said: 'When the son of Ādam dies, his deeds come to an end except for three: ongoing charity, knowledge from which benefit is derived, or a righteous child who prays for him.' Reported by Muslim."

"From Abū al-Dardā', may Allāh be pleased with him, who said: I heard the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, say: 'Whoever treads a path seeking knowledge, Allāh will make easy for him a path to Paradise. The angels lower their wings for the seeker of knowledge out of pleasure with what he is doing. The inhabitants of the heavens and the earth, even the fish in the water, seek forgiveness for the scholar. The superiority of the scholar over the worshipper is like the superiority of the moon over all other stars. The scholars are the heirs of the Prophets, and the Prophets did not leave behind dīnārs or dirhams, but they left behind knowledge. So whoever takes it has taken an abundant share.' Reported by Abū Dāwūd and al-Tirmidhī."

"And from Abū Hurayrah, may Allāh be pleased with him, who said: The Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, said: 'Whoever is asked about knowledge and conceals it will be bridled on the Day of Resurrection with a bridle of fire.' Reported by Abū Dāwūd and al-Tirmidhī, who said it is a good Ḥadīth."

"And from him, who said: The Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, said: 'Whoever learns knowledge by which the pleasure of Allāh, the Mighty and Majestic, is sought, but learns it only to attain some worldly benefit, will not find the fragrance of Paradise on the Day of Resurrection' – meaning its scent. Reported by Abū Dāwūd."

"And from 'Abd Allāh ibn 'Amr ibn al-ʿĀṣ, may Allāh be pleased with them both, who said: I heard the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, say: 'Indeed, Allāh does not take away knowledge by snatching it from the people, but He takes away knowledge by taking away the scholars, until, when no scholar remains, people take ignorant leaders. They are asked, and they give fatwās without knowledge, so they go astray and lead others astray.' Agreed upon."

Firstly: Creed:

It was previously mentioned in the first chapter of this second part, when discussing creed and methodology, the fundamental pillars of the creed of Ahl al-Sunnah wa-l-Jamāʿah. We presented it briefly in broad outlines. It is obligatory for the cells and detachments of the resistance that their leaderships have an educational preparation program that includes, first and foremost, the teaching of a concise book detailing the evidence for the foundations of the creed of Ahl al-Sunnah wa-l-Jamāʿah. I recommend one of two books that have found acceptance and widespread use in many Awakening movements: Sharḥ al-ʿAqīdah al-Taḥāwiyyah by Abī al-ʿIzz al-Ḥanafī, or one of the commentaries on al-ʿAqīdah al-Wāsiṭiyyah by Ibn Taymiyyah, may Allāh have mercy on them both. This is as a preliminary level because they are comprehensive, concise, easy, and accessible books.

As for the field of Jihādī creed and Jihādī thought, I included in the aforementioned first chapter a summary of the basics of Jihādī creed. It contains a paragraph with evidence for its fundamental pillars as useful material for the formation and education of resistance cells. To consolidate the Jihādī creed, I generally recommend the works of the martyr Sayyid Quṭb, may Allāh have mercy on him, and the works of Shaykh ‘Abd al-Qādir ibn ‘Abd al-‘Azīz. I also highly recommend the works of Shaykh ‘Abd Allāh ‘Azzām, who is a complete school in thought and education. I also recommend the library of Jihādī groups and organizations, including the works of Shaykh ‘Umar ‘Abd al-Raḥmān, Shaykh Ayman al-Ḍawāhirī, the works of Shaykh Abū al-Mundhir al-Sā‘idī al-Lībī, and the productions of their Jihādī groups in Egypt and Libya. Among the beneficial Jihādī intellectual libraries are the works of Shaykh Abū Muḥammad al-Maqdisī, Shaykh Muḥammad al-Fizzāzī al-Maghribī, the library of Professor Muḥammad Quṭb, may Allāh preserve him, the works of Professor Abū al-A‘lā al-Mawdūdī, may Allāh have mercy on him, and some selections from the works of Shaykh Sa‘īd Ḥawwā, may Allāh have mercy on him and forgive him, especially his book Jund Allāh Thaḳāfatan wa Akhlāqan (Soldiers of Allāh: Culture and Ethics), and his book Khuṭuwāt lil-Imām ‘alā Ṭarīq al-Jihād al-Mubārak (Steps for the Leader on the Path of Blessed Jihād), while being mindful of his slips in his later works, may Allāh have mercy on him and forgive him. This is what comes to mind now. It was supposed that I point out some observations about some of what is mentioned in some books of these honorable figures, which I believe necessary to draw attention to, but I do not find the time for that now, and perhaps I will rectify that later.

I also recommend listening to the lectures and recordings of the symbols of the Awakening in the Land of the Two Holy Sanctuaries produced between the years 1400 AH (1980 CE) and 1415 AH (1995 CE). They contain excellent doctrinal, Sharī‘ah-based scientific, and Jihādī-activist intellectual material. Especially the tapes of Shaykh ‘Abd al-Raḥīm al-Ṭaḥḥān, Shaykh Mukhtār al-Shinqīṭī, Shaykh Safar al-Ḥawālī (may Allāh grant him good repentance from what he is in and benefit through him), Shaykh Salmān al-‘Awdah (may Allāh grant him a good return to the seriousness we knew from him), Shaykh Nāṣir al-‘Umar, Shaykh ‘Abd al-Waḥhāb al-

Ṭurayrī (may Allāh strengthen their resolve), and others of their contemporaries during that period. Pay attention to the productions and fatwās of some of these during the period of repression after imprisonment and the flare-up of anti-terrorism campaigns, where methodological setbacks and dangerous positions were recorded from some of them, may Allāh forgive us and them. However, this does not diminish the value of this methodological material in their productions from that time. The task of selecting and choosing appropriate material for the youth and cells of the resistance remains the responsibility of capable guides who can select useful materials.

I also draw attention to the fact that in the production of some official scholars, in the field of creeds and Sharī'ah sciences, there is useful production of the highest quality, if we exclude from it some anomalous opinions known about them in appeasing their sultans. However, my methodology in dealing with such scholars of the Sultan and their hypocrites is to turn away from their production, if there is something to compensate for it from others whom Allāh has saved from that hypocrisy. Otherwise, their abstract sciences can be benefited from, with a warning about the points of error. The purpose of distancing from them is to warn the Ummah about them so that they do not gain a status that leads the common people to adopt their major errors in fatwās that supported the misguidance of sultans and justified the occupation by colonialists, which are grave matters that became well-known.

As I mentioned earlier, I have included in this book, al-'Aqīdah al-Jihādiyyah (The Jihādī Creed), focused ideas important for consolidating the essential creedal foundations for the mujāhid of the resistance who is familiar with research and reading.

Secondly: Sharī'ah Knowledge:

As for the chapter on Sharīʿah knowledge necessary for the mujāhid of the resistance, the Muslim mujāhid must know three matters from the chapters of Sharīʿah knowledge, which he is obligated to learn:

1 - The Sharīʿah Rulings for Acts of Worship:

Such as the jurisprudence of purification, the jurisprudence of prayer and fasting, Zakāh if he possesses wealth, and Ḥajj if he is able. Every resistance cell must prepare for its members a simplified summary of the jurisprudence of worship according to the prevailing school of thought in their region or according to the choices they make for themselves. These are straightforward matters that need not be detailed here.

2 - The Jurisprudence Specific to His Life Activities:

He must know the Sharīʿah rulings concerning his actions. If he is married, for example, he must know the jurisprudence of rulings pertaining to women and teach them to his family. If he is a merchant, he must know the jurisprudence of sales, the rulings of trade, buying and selling, and the movement of money in his type of commerce, and the Zakāh on his wealth, and so on. This is a matter that a Muslim must seek to learn to live with clear insight from the religion of his Lord. There is no need to mention anything about this here either.

In the two preceding sections (jurisprudence of worship and general jurisprudence), I advise that what a person needs to learn, as I mentioned, a Muslim should take from the rulings of the prevailing and familiar school of thought in his locality if he is from the common Muslims and is not capable of research and further study.

This is advice; otherwise, let him adhere to a school of thought or summaries that rely on jurisprudence based on evidence and its preponderant views, according to those he is convinced to follow.

3 - The Jurisprudence of Jihād and Its Rulings:

Allāh, Glorified and Exalted be He, says: {O you who have believed, when you go forth

[to fight] in the cause of Allāh, investigate.} (Qur’ān, Al-Nisā’ 4:94). The mujāhid of the resistance, and the one determined to tread this path in the way of Allāh, must know the obligation of Jihād and its ruling, which is incumbent upon every Muslim in this era, so that he may continue in it with conviction and creed. He must know the status of this obligation in the religion of Allāh, what reward from Allāh results from performing it, and what He, Glorified be He, has prepared in the stations of martyrs out of His grace and generosity.

He must know what sin and punishment from Allāh, the Exalted, result from abandoning this obligation, and what torment in this worldly life at the hands of enemies results from it, upon him and his Ummah, such as humiliation, disgrace, the violation of lands, honor, wealth, dignity, and the taking of lives.

Then, if he resolves to perform Jihād, he must know its rulings, for the matter relates to blood, wealth, and rights—what is permissible and what is forbidden. It is not permissible for him to stumble into it blindly, without knowledge of its rulings and what is lawful and unlawful.

It is even more imperative that he knows its objectives, goals, and etiquettes.

These are extensive topics, and the mujāhid must know from them according to his responsibility and ability. Every Jihādī organization, group, or detachment must have their reliable reference for matters that are unclear to them.

I have transmitted in the first chapter, which contained the fundamentals of thought and methodology for the call of global Islāmic resistance, Sharī‘ah issues that constitute fundamental material in the curriculum of Sharī‘ah education and the jurisprudence of Jihād and activism. It contained the following topics:

- Firstly: The governments of Muslim lands today are apostate and disbelieving for changing the laws and ruling by other than what Allāh has revealed, and for their loyalty to disbelievers and their betrayal of Allāh, His Messenger, and the believers.

- Secondly: Rebelling against the ruler if he apostatizes from Islām or is a disbeliever is an obligation upon Muslims by consensus.
- Thirdly: The lands of Islām are in a state of occupation by enemies, and Jihād against them is an individual obligation upon Muslims by consensus.
- Fourthly: The rulings of Sharīʿah unanimously affirm the disbelief and apostasy of whoever cooperates with disbelievers and assists them against Muslims, and mandate fighting him.
- Fifthly: The rulings of Sharīʿah affirm the obligation or permissibility of fighting an aggressor against the religion of Muslims, their lives, their honor, or their wealth, even if he is a Muslim.
- Sixthly: The rulings of Sharīʿah affirm the sanctity of the blood, wealth, and honor of Muslims. They also affirm that all forms of presence of invading disbelievers in our lands specifically, and everywhere, are lawful to kill and their wealth is forfeit.
- Seventhly: The obligation to support Muslims in religion if disbelievers aggress against them, regardless of the sins and shortcomings they may be involved in. Legitimate Jihād is ongoing with every righteous and wicked leader and commoner among Muslims.
- Eighthly: The issue of democracy and its practice by Islamists in the balance of Sharīʿah and reality.
- Ninthly: The issue of doctrinal and jurisprudential differences within Ahl al-Sunnah.
- Tenthly: The issue of Takfīr, general rulings of Takfīr, and the issue of Takfīr of a specific individual.

These are the most important fundamental principles upon which the entire thought of Jihād and resistance is built.

I will briefly transmit here some of the most important Sharī'ah rulings on some significant issues that confront the mujāhid in circumstances like ours these days:

(I have transmitted most of it from the book: Mawsū'at al-Dhakhā'ir al-'Izām min Mu'allafāt al-Shaykh 'Abd Allāh 'Azzām – may Allāh have mercy on him.

The quoted material from Shaykh 'Azzām will be presented, and my comments and brief evidentiary support for its paragraphs, where feasible, will be integrated.)

Important Sharī'ah Rulings and Issues for the Mujāhid of the Resistance:

1. Jihād Against the More Distant Enemy:

Al-Shāfi'ī said in al-Umm (4/177), as quoted by Shaykh 'Abd Allāh 'Azzām: "If the enemy's situation differs, with some being more harmful or more feared than others, the Imām should begin with the enemy that is more feared and more harmful, and there is no harm in doing so. Even if their territory is more distant, if Allāh, the Exalted, wills, such that by starting with them, one does not fear from them what one does not fear from others, for example. This would be considered a necessity, because what is not permissible in other circumstances is permissible in necessity. News reached the Prophet, peace and blessings be upon him, that al-Ḥārith ibn Abī Ḍirār was gathering forces against him, so the Prophet, peace and blessings be upon him, raided him, though there was an enemy closer than him. News also reached him that Khālīd ibn Abī Sufyān ibn Shuḥ was gathering forces against him, so he sent Ibn Unays, who killed him, though there was an enemy closer." End of quote.

2. Seeking Permission from Parents, Husband, and Creditor:

Shaykh 'Abd Allāh 'Azzām states that the ruling on seeking permission depends on the enemy's situation:

According to al-Dhakhā'ir (vol. 1, p. 128):

1 - If the enemy is in their own lands and not mobilizing on the frontiers, and there is no impact on Muslim lands, and the frontiers are manned by soldiers, then in this case, Jihād is a communal obligation (farḍ kifāyah), and permission is necessary because obedience to parents and husband is an individual obligation (farḍ 'ayn), and Jihād is a communal obligation. An individual obligation takes precedence over a communal obligation.

2 - If the enemy attacks a frontier of the Muslims or enters an Islāmic town, then, as we mentioned, Jihād becomes an individual obligation upon the people of that town and those around it. In this case, permission is waived; no one needs permission from anyone. A son may go out without his father's permission, a wife without her husband's permission, and a debtor without his creditor's permission.

The waiver of seeking permission from parents and husband continues until the enemy is expelled from Muslim lands, or until a sufficient number of people gather to expel the enemy, even if all Muslims on earth were to gather.

Jihād, which is an individual obligation, takes precedence over obedience to parents, which is also an individual obligation, because Jihād is for the protection of the religion, while obedience to parents is for the protection of the self (in the sense that Jihād is a cause of their grief and hardship). Preserving the religion takes precedence over preserving the self, as Jihād itself involves the potential loss of the mujāhid's life if he is martyred for the sake of preserving the religion. Protecting the religion is a certainty, while the harm to the parents' well-being is a probability, and certainty takes precedence over probability.

An example of individual and communal obligation:

Consider a group of people picnicking on the seashore, among whom are skilled swimmers. They see a child about to drown, crying out, "Save me!" Yet, none of the swimmers move to help. One swimmer wants to act, but his father forbids him from rescuing the child. Would any jurist, from any era, say that he must obey his father and let the child drown?

This is analogous to Afghanistan—and other occupied lands in similar situations today, such as Iraq, Palestine, Kashmir, and so forth. It cries for help: its children are slaughtered, honor is violated, innocents are killed, and body parts are strewn about. Some sincere young men want to move to rescue and assist them, but they are met with strong disapproval: "Are you going without your parents' permission?"

Rescuing the drowning child is an obligation upon all swimmers who see him. Before anyone acts, the directive to rescue is addressed to everyone. If one person moves to rescue him, the sin is lifted from the others. If no one acts, all swimmers bear the sin. Before anyone acts, parental permission is not a factor. If a father forbids his son from rescuing the drowning child, he is not to be obeyed, because a communal obligation (farḍ kifāyah), in its initial address, is like an individual obligation (farḍ ‘ayn). They differ only in the outcome: if some undertake it, the sin is lifted from the others; if no one undertakes it, all are sinful.

Ibn Taymiyyah states: "When the enemy attacks, there is no room for disagreement; repelling their harm from the religion, life, and honor is an obligation by consensus." The evidence for seeking parental permission in a communal obligation and not seeking it in an individual obligation, and the reconciliation between the following two Ḥadīth, is as follows:

First: The Ḥadīth narrated by al-Bukhārī from ‘Abdullāh ibn ‘Amr ibn al-‘Āṣ (may Allāh be pleased with them both): "A man came to the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) seeking permission for Jihād. He asked, 'Are your parents alive?' The man replied, 'Yes.' The Prophet said, 'Then strive in their service.'"

Second: Ibn Ḥibbān narrated from ‘Abdullāh ibn ‘Amr (may Allāh be pleased with them both): "A man came to the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) and asked him about the best of deeds. He said, 'Prayer.' The man asked, 'Then what?'"

He said, 'Jihād.' The man said, 'But I have parents.' The Prophet said, 'I enjoin you to be good to your parents.' The man then said, 'By Him Who sent you with the truth, I shall certainly go for Jihād and leave them.' The Prophet replied, 'You know best.'" Al-Ḥāfiẓ said: This is interpreted as referring to Jihād that is an individual obligation, to reconcile the two Ḥadīth.

Seeking Permission from the Shaykh and Educator

No jurist, early or late, has stipulated that a shaykh or educator has the right to grant permission to his student regarding acts of worship, whether they are communal or individual obligations. Whoever claims otherwise should provide us with a Sharī'ah text or clear authority. Every Muslim individual may go for Jihād without seeking permission from his shaykh or teacher, because the permission of the Lord of the Worlds takes precedence, and He has permitted, indeed obligated, Jihād.

Ibn Hubayrah said: "Among Satan's deceptions is to erect idols in meaning, worshipped besides Allāh, such as when the truth becomes clear to a person, but he says: 'This is not our school of thought,' in blind imitation of someone he venerates, whom he has placed before the truth."

If this student wanted to study engineering, medicine, or history in Western countries or America, where tribulations are like patches of a dark night, and where there is a tumultuous sea of temptations and oceans of raging desires and inflamed passions; I say, if this student went, neither the shaykh nor anyone else would object. However, if he sets out for ribāṭ (guarding the frontier) or goes for Jihād, you find tongues wagging against him from every side, asking: "How can he go without permission?" His shaykh has missed hearing the noble Prophetic words: "Guarding for one night in the cause of Allāh Almighty is better than a thousand nights spent in prayer with their days fasted." And in Ṣaḥīḥ Muslim: "Ribāṭ for a day and a night is better than fasting for a month and praying its nights. If he dies, the reward for his deeds which he used to do will continue, his provision will be bestowed upon him, and he will be safe from the Fittān (the trial of the grave)." And, "A morning or an evening spent in the cause of Allāh is better than the world and what it contains." Therefore, the shaykh and his students should hasten to good deeds and vie in virtues, and not miss the advice of the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him): "Take advantage of five before five: your life before your death, your health before your sickness, your free time before you become busy, your youth before your old age, and your wealth before your poverty." They should also heed the authentic Ḥadīth: "Standing for an hour in the line of battle in the cause of Allāh is better than standing in prayer for sixty years."

Al-Shāfi'ī said: "Muslims are in unanimous agreement that whoever has a Sunnah of the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) made clear to him, it is not permissible for him to abandon it for the saying of anyone."

Seeking Permission in an Individual Jihād

It has become clear to us that no one seeks permission to perform the obligation of Jihād when it becomes an individual duty (farḍ 'ayn), just as one does not seek permission from a parent or master to perform the dawn prayer before sunrise. Similarly, no one seeks permission to perform the obligation of Jihād. If a father and son are sleeping in the same place, and the son wants to pray Fajr while his father is asleep, would anyone say that the son must seek his father's permission to perform the obligatory prayer? Let us suppose the father has forbidden his son from getting up to pray for some reason of his own—perhaps so as not to disturb those who are sleeping (and not praying Fajr), or because the father himself does not want to pray. Should the son obey his father? The answer is clear: "Obedience is only in what is right" (agreed upon). "There is no obedience to a creature in disobedience to the Creator" (narrated by Aḥmad). "There is no obedience to one who does not obey Allāh" (narrated by Aḥmad). And abandoning Jihād is a sin. There is no obedience to a creature in disobedience to the Creator.

However, if Jihād becomes an individual obligation after the general call to arms, then seeking permission from the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) becomes a sign of hypocrisy. It is stated in the clear revelation: {Those who believe in Allāh and the Last Day would not ask permission of you to be excused from striving with their wealth and their lives. And Allāh is Knowing of the righteous. Only those would ask permission of you who do not believe in Allāh and the Last Day and whose hearts have doubted, and they, in their doubt, are hesitating.} (Qur’ān, At-Tawbah 9:44-45).

As for the Rightly Guided Caliphs—Abū Bakr, ‘Umar, ‘Uthmān, and ‘Alī (may Allāh be pleased with them)—we do not know that the Companions and the Successors used to seek their permission. Not everyone who wanted to raid or engage in Jihād would come to Abū Bakr to ask his permission. The important thing was that the banner be raised and the expedition set out. Regarding the Commanders of the Faithful after the Caliphs, we do not know that anyone intending ribāṭ or Jihād would send to them for permission. Nor do we know of any Muslim in the entire history of Islām who was punished by the Commander of the Faithful for engaging in Jihād or raiding without his permission. Rather, permission is sought from the military commander and the leader of the battle for raiding and attacking, for the sake of organization and coordination, and so that an individual attacking the enemy does not spoil the Muslims' plan. Some jurists, like al-Awzā‘ī, specified seeking permission from the Imām in the case of soldiers who receive their salaries from the military treasury. Al-Ramlī said in Nihāyat al-Muḥtāj (vol. 8, p. 60): "Raiding without the permission of the Imām or his deputy is disliked, but there is no dislike in the following cases:

1. If seeking permission would cause the objective to be missed.
2. Or if the Imām has suspended raiding.
3. Or if one strongly believes permission will not be granted, as al-Bulqīnī discussed."

We reiterate: all this applies if Jihād is a communal obligation. However, if Jihād becomes an individual obligation (farḍ ‘ayn), then there is no permission or seeking of permission. Ibn Rushd said: "Obedience to the Imām is binding, even if he is unjust, as long as he does not command a sin. Prohibiting an obligatory Jihād is a sin."

To further clarify the issue, we say: Permission and seeking permission apply to a communal obligation, that is, after the number of mujāhidīn is sufficient to fulfill the obligation. However, before sufficiency is achieved, the directive is addressed to everyone, it is obligatory upon all, and it is fulfilled by the action of some. There is no difference between a communal obligation and an individual one before sufficiency is met. Before sufficiency, there is no permission or seeking of permission; this only comes after knowing that there are enough Muslims on the battlefield to fulfill the obligation. This concludes the quoted section from Al-Dhakhā’ir.

3. Jihād in the Absence of a Single Leader

Should we engage in Jihād if we do not have a single leader? Yes, we engage in Jihād even without a unified leader. No one has said that the Muslims' lack of unity under one leader nullifies the obligation of Jihād. Indeed, we saw Muslims during the Crusades and the Tatar invasions fighting even though their leaders were disunited, with each land having one or several emirs. Aleppo had an emir, Damascus had an emir, and Egypt had more than one emir. Some of them even sought help from the Crusaders against their fellow emirs, as happened with Emir Shāwar, who sought the Crusaders' aid against another emir in Egypt, Dirghām.

No scholar has said that this situation and this disarray nullify the obligation of Jihād to defend Muslim lands; rather, it doubles their duty. The same was true in al-Andalus, about which the poet said:

"They fragmented into factions, so in every locality... there was a Commander of the Faithful and a pulpit."

No scholar said there is no Jihād in such a situation; rather, prominent scholars were at the forefront in al-Andalus.

A battle might lack a legitimate commander appointed by the general leader, as happened on the Day of Mu'tah. Khālīd ibn al-Walīd stepped forward, took the banner, and Allāh saved the Muslim army through him. The Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) approved of this and praised him.

The Imām or Commander of the Faithful may be absent, but this does not nullify the obligation to fight and defend Muslim lands. We do not wait until a major state is established and the Caliphate is resumed, because general authority and the Caliphate do not come about theoretically through culture and study. Rather, Jihād is the soundest way for specific authority—that is, the command in battle—to become general authority and a Caliphate. The mujāhidīn choose a leader for Jihād from among themselves who can manage their affairs, unite them, and restrain the strong from harming the weak. In an authentic Ḥadīth from ‘Uqbah ibn ‘Āmir, who was from his clan, he said: "The Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) sent out an expedition and armed a man with a sword. When he returned, he said: 'I have never seen the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) blame us as he did then. He said: "Were you unable, when I sent a man and he did not carry out my order, to replace him with someone who would carry out my order?"'" The Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) incited them to change the commander of the expedition to whom he had given the banner with his noble hand. So, what if there is no leader at all? The need to appoint a commander for war is even greater. This concludes the section from Al-Dhakhā'ir, vol. 1, p. 129.

4. One Person Fighting if Others Sit Back

Should a person fight alone if others sit back? Yes, he should fight, because Allāh, the Mighty and Majestic, addresses His Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him), saying: {So fight, [O Muḥammad], in the cause of Allāh; you are not held responsible except for yourself. And incite the believers [to fight] that Allāh may restrain the might of those who disbelieve. And Allāh is greater in might and stronger in punishment.} (Qur'ān, An-Nisā' 4:84). The verse commands the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) to do two obligatory things—because a command implies obligation:

1. To fight, even if alone.
2. To incite the believers.

The Lord of Glory mentions the wisdom behind fighting, which is to restrain the might of the disbelievers, because the disbelievers only fear our presence through fighting: {And fight them until there is no fitnah and [until] the religion, all of it, is for Allāh.} (Qur'ān, Al-Anfāl 8:39). (This is from Al-Dhakhā'ir, vol. 1, p. 133.)

By abandoning fighting, polytheism (shirk), which is fitnah (strife, trial), prevails, and disbelief triumphs. The Companions (may Allāh be pleased with them) understood the verse according to its apparent meaning. Abū Ishāq said: "I said to al-Barā' ibn 'Āzib (may Allāh be pleased with him): 'A man charges against the polytheists; is he throwing himself into destruction?' He replied: 'No, because Allāh sent His Messenger (peace and blessings be upon him) and said: {So fight, [O Muḥammad], in the cause of Allāh; you are not held responsible except for yourself. And incite the believers [to fight].} (Qur'ān, An-Nisā' 4:84). That [verse about destruction] refers to spending.'"

Ibn al-ʿArabī said in Aḥkām al-Qur'ān (vol. 2, p. 954): "There may be a situation where a general mobilization is obligatory if Jihād becomes an individual duty due to the enemy's conquest of a region or their presence in the homeland. In such a case, Jihād and mobilization become obligatory for all people. If they fall short, they have sinned." If the call to arms is general due to the enemy's dominance or their capture of prisoners, then the mobilization is general. It is obligatory for people to go forth, whether light or heavy, mounted or on foot, slaves or free men, whether one has a father (without his permission) or has no father, until the religion of Allāh is made manifest, the community is protected, the territory is preserved, the enemy is humiliated, and the captives are rescued. There is no disagreement on this.

So, what should one person do if everyone else sits back? He should ransom a single captive if he can, and raid himself if he is able, otherwise he should equip a raider.

Indeed, a man fighting alone pleases Allāh and He marvels at it. In a Ḥasan Ḥadīth narrated by Aḥmad and Abū Dāwūd, the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) said: "Our Lord marvels at a man who raided in the cause of Allāh, and his companions were defeated. He knew what was upon him, so he returned until his blood was shed. Allāh, the Mighty and Majestic, says to His angels: 'Look at My servant; he returned out of desire for what is with Me and out of fear of what is with Me, until his blood was shed.'" This concludes the section from Al-Dhakhā'ir, vol. 1, p. 133.

5. Jihād and Fighting Alongside the Iniquitous and Profligate

Should we fight alongside Muslims who are not at an acceptable level of Islamic upbringing? (This is from Al-Dhakhā'ir, vol. 1, p. 134.)

This question is raised by some people, some of whom are sincere. They ask: How can we fight with a people (like the Afghans) among whom are the truthful and the liars, where smoking tobacco and naswār (similar to tobacco) is widespread, and some might even sell their weapons? They are people fanatical about their Ḥanafī school of thought, and some of them wear amulets (tamā'im). Before I explain the Sharī'ah ruling, I ask: Show me a people on earth who are free from these matters. Should we then abandon the disbelievers in all Muslim lands because these things exist?

The answer is that fighting is obligatory, because fighting is based on repelling the greater of two harms. There are jurisprudential maxims for this: in the Majallat al-Aḥkām al-ʿAdliyyah, Article 26 states: "A private harm is borne to repel a public harm." Article 27: "A more severe harm is removed by a lesser harm." Article 28: "If two evils conflict, the one whose harm is greater is averted by committing the lesser." And Article 29: "The lesser of two evils is chosen."

So, the lesser of two evils must be chosen. Which is the greater evil: the Russian takeover of Afghanistan and its transformation into a land of disbelief where the Qur'ān and Islām are forbidden, or Jihād with a people among whom there are sins and mistakes?

Ibn Taymiyyah says in Majmū' al-Fatāwā (vol. 28, p. 506): "Therefore, one of the principles of Ahl al-Sunnah wa al-Jamā'ah is to raid with every righteous person and every profligate one. For Allāh supports this religion with the profligate man and with people who have no share [of good], as the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) informed. If raiding is not possible except with profligate leaders or with an army full of profligacy, then one of two things must be done:

Either abandon raiding with them, which would result in the dominance of others who are more harmful in religion and worldly affairs; or raid with the profligate leader, thereby repelling the more profligate ones and establishing most of the rites of Islām, even if not all of them can be established. This is what is obligatory in this situation and all similar ones. Indeed, much of the raiding that occurred with the Rightly Guided Caliphs happened only in this manner. And it is established from the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him): 'Goodness is tied to the forelocks of horses until the Day of Resurrection, along with reward and spoils of war.' As long as they are Muslims, fighting with them is obligatory."

The banner in Afghanistan is Islamic, and the declared goal is to establish the religion of Allāh on earth. If the Muslims had fought in Palestine, Palestine would not have been lost, despite the corruption that existed at the beginning, and before the matter was completely corrupted and George Habash, Nayef Hawatmeh, Father Capucci, and their likes emerged.

Fighting is obligatory with any group of Muslims as long as they are Muslims, regardless of their iniquity and profligacy, if the fight is against disbelievers, People of the Book, or atheists.

Al-Shawkānī says in Nayl al-Awṭār (vol. 8, p. 44): "It is permissible by consensus to seek the help of the iniquitous against the disbelievers."

Is it permissible to raid with the profligate and iniquitous?

Fatwa: Yes, one raids with every righteous and profligate person, meaning every leader. Abū ‘Abdullāh (Imām Aḥmad) was asked about a man who says, "I will not raid," and the son of al-‘Abbās takes him, for he is merely saving the spoils for them. He said: "Glory be to Allāh! These are evil people, these are the sitters-back, discouragers, ignoramuses. It is said to them: 'Do you see? If all people sat back as you have, who would raid? Would not Islām have vanished? What would the Romans have done?!'" Abū Dāwūd narrated with his chain from Abū Hurayrah, who said: The Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) said: "Jihād is obligatory upon you with every leader, whether righteous or profligate." And with his chain from Anas, who said: The Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) said: "Three things are from the root of faith: withholding from one who says 'Lā ilāha illAllāh' (There is no god but Allāh)—we do not declare him a disbeliever for a sin, nor do we expel him from Islām for an action; Jihād is ongoing since Allāh sent me until the last of my ummah fights the Dajjāl; and belief in the divine decrees." Because abandoning Jihād with the profligate leads to the cessation of Jihād, the dominance of disbelievers over Muslims and their extermination, the ascendancy of the word of disbelief, and great corruption therein. Allāh Almighty said: {And were it not for Allāh checking some people by means of others, the earth would have been corrupted.} Aḥmad said: "I do not like one to go out with a leader or commander if he is known for defeat and for causing the Muslims to be lost. One should only raid with someone who has compassion and concern for the Muslims. If the commander is known for drinking alcohol and embezzlement (ghulūl), one raids with him; that is only upon himself." It is narrated from the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him): "Indeed, Allāh supports this religion even with a profligate man."

The leader should not take with him a mukhadhdhil (one who discourages others), who is one who dissuades people from raiding and makes them averse to going out for it, fighting, and Jihād, such as by saying, "The heat and cold are severe," or "The defeat of this army is not unlikely," and the like. Nor a murjif (one who spreads alarming rumors), who says, "The Muslim expedition has perished," "They have no reinforcements," "They cannot withstand the disbelievers who have strength, reinforcements, and patience," "No one can stand against them," and the like. Nor one who aids the disbelievers against the Muslims by spying for them, informing them of Muslim vulnerabilities, writing to them with their news, guiding them to their weaknesses, or sheltering their spies. Nor one who incites enmity among Muslims and strives to cause corruption, due to the saying of Allāh Almighty: {And if they had intended to go forth, they would have prepared for it [some] preparation. But Allāh disliked their being sent, so He kept them back, and it was said, "Remain with those who remain [behind]." * Had they gone forth with you, they would not have increased you except in confusion, and they would have hurried among you, seeking [to cause] fitnah among you. And among you are those who would listen to them. And Allāh is Knowing of the wrongdoers.} (Qur'ān, At-Tawbah 9:46-47).

Because these people are harmful to the Muslims, it is necessary to prevent them [from joining]. If one of them goes out with him, he is not given a share [of the spoils] nor is he given a lesser gift, even if he feigns helping the Muslims, because it is possible that he feigned it out of hypocrisy, the evidence of which has appeared. Thus, he is purely harmful and deserves nothing of what they gained. If the leader is one of these types, it is not recommended to go out with him, because if his going out as a follower is prevented, then as a leader it is even more so, and because harm to his companions is not unlikely. This concludes the quoted section from Al-Dhakhā'ir.

6. Killing Non-Combatant Disbelievers and Destroying Their Property

Killing Women, Children, and the Elderly. (This is from Al-Dhakhā'ir, vol. 1, pp. 135-1017.)

We have previously explained that Islām does not permit killing anyone except combatants, or those who aid the polytheists and enemies of Islām with wealth or opinion, because of the verses: {Fight in the way of Allāh those who fight you...} and {And fight them until there is no fitnah and [until] the religion, all of it, is for Allāh...} (Qur'ān, Al-Baqarah, from verse 2:193).

A combatant (muqātil) implies mutual engagement from both sides. So, whoever kills or participates in combat by any means is to be killed and fought. Otherwise, there is no need to kill them. Therefore, there is no need to kill women due to their weakness, unless they fight; nor to kill children; nor to intentionally kill monks, unless they mix with the polytheists and we are unable to strike the polytheist combatants individually. In such cases, we strike the polytheists without intending the non-combatants.

Inflicting harm on offspring and the vulnerable breeds hatred, written with tears and blood, to be passed down through generations. This is what Islām does not want. Islām wants people to love it, and it wants Allāh, His Messenger, and His religion to be beloved by people. However, at the same time, Islām does not indulge people's desires, nor does it change its methodology to please their whims: {But if the Truth had followed their inclinations, the heavens and the earth and whoever is in them would have been corrupted.} (Qur'ān, Al-Mu'minūn 23:71).

Scholars have differed on this issue, holding various views:

The first view: It is not permissible to kill women and children under any circumstances. This is the view of Mālik and al-Awzā'ī. Even if the disbelievers use their children and women as human shields, it is not permissible to shoot at them. If they fortify themselves in a stronghold with their offspring, it is not permissible to bombard them with catapults or other means.

The second view: Non-combatants are not intentionally targeted in fighting unless they participate in combat or mix with combatants in such a way that we cannot fight the combatants without killing them. This is the opinion of al-Shāfi‘ī and the Ḥanafīs.

Al-Māwardī states in Al-Aḥkām al-Sulṭāniyyah (p. 41): "It is not permissible to kill women and children in war or otherwise, as long as they do not fight, due to the Prophet's (peace and blessings be upon him) prohibition against killing them."

Al-Sarakhsī states in Al-Mabsūṭ (vol. 10, p. 31): "The presence of women and children in their fortresses does not prevent burning them, nor does the presence of a Muslim captive in them prevent burning their fortresses; however, the polytheists should be the intended target."

It is permissible to kill an elderly man if he possesses sound judgment [for warfare], as the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) approved Abū ‘Āmir al-Ash‘arī's killing of Durayd ibn al-Ṣimmah, who was over one hundred years old. The Ḥadīth is in the two Ṣaḥīḥ collections.

The blind, the crippled, or the mentally disabled among the captives are not to be killed, because only those who fight are killed (and combat is mutual). There is no harm in diverting water towards a city of belligerents, burning them with fire, or bombarding them with catapults, even if there are children or Muslims among them. It is permissible to shoot at them even if they use Muslim children as human shields. The Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) clarified the reason in the Ḥadīth narrated by Aḥmad and Abū Dāwūd—although there is some debate about its chain—that the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) passed by a slain woman and said: "This one was not fighting." Therefore, the basis for killing is combat (muqātalah). Whoever is capable of fighting is killed and fought.

The Imāms differed regarding Ḥadīth that are apparently contradictory:

Mālik adopted the general meaning of the text, the narration of Ibn ‘Umar (may Allāh be pleased with them both), who said: "A woman was found killed in one of the Prophet's (peace and blessings be upon him) expeditions, so the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) forbade the killing of women and children" (narrated by the Jamā‘ah except al-Nasā’ī).

As for the Shāfi‘īs, they argue that this text is general but has a specific qualifier from the Ḥadīth of al-Ṣa‘b ibn Jaththāmah, that the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) was asked about the polytheists whose homes were attacked at night, resulting in casualties among their women and children. He said: "They are from them" (narrated by the Jamā‘ah except al-Nasā’ī; Abū Dāwūd added, and al-Zuhrī said: "Then the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) forbade the killing of women and children").

Although this is used as evidence by those who adhere to the prohibition of killing women and children under any circumstances and consider al-Zuhrī's statement as abrogating, it nevertheless supports the Shāfi‘ī and Ḥanafī view, as does the mursāl Ḥadīth narrated by al-Tirmidhī: "The Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) set up a catapult against the people of Ṭā’if."

And the Ḥadīth narrated by Salamah ibn al-Akwa‘: "We attacked Hawāzin at night with Abū Bakr al-Ṣiddīq, and the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) had appointed him as our commander" (narrated by Aḥmad).

Bayāt means raiding at night. The campaigns against Ṭā’if and Hawāzin occurred late in the life of the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him).

Preventing the Muslim army from fighting polytheists if they are mixed with their children under any circumstances would mean halting Jihād against them. This poses a danger to Muslims and harms the interests of the Muslim community, especially in these times when combat largely involves long-range projectiles from artillery, aircraft, and tanks. This would mean prohibiting the use of all these weapons and bringing them to a halt.

If the jurists have unanimously permitted the killing of Muslims when disbelievers use them as human shields, how can they not permit fighting disbelievers if their children and women are with them?

Is the sanctity of the blood of polytheist women and children greater than the sanctity of Muslim blood?

Furthermore, the prohibition against killing women today applies if the woman does not participate in war, does not join armies, and does not embrace ideologies like communism, for which she would fight and die. However, the situation has now changed, and women—in this respect—are not much different from men. Ibn Taymiyyah states in Majmū‘ al-Fatāwā (vol. 28, p. 537): "The ummah is in agreement that if disbelievers use Muslims as human shields, and it is feared that Muslims [i.e., the attackers] will suffer if they are not killed, then it is permissible to shoot at them, intending the disbelievers. Even if there is no fear for the Muslims [attackers], it is permissible to shoot those Muslims [shields] as well, according to one of the two scholarly opinions."

Ibn al-‘Arabī states in Aḥkām al-Qur’ān (vol. 1, p. 104): "Women are not killed unless they fight, due to the Prophet's (peace and blessings be upon him) prohibition against killing them. This is unless they fight; if they fight, they are killed."

The Shāfi‘īs differentiated between killing children and women, and killing monks, the elderly, and the blind. They prohibited intentionally killing women and children except out of necessity. Al-Ramlī states (vol. 8, p. 64): "It is forbidden to kill a child, an insane person, a woman—even if she is not from the People of the Book—an intersex person of ambiguous gender, and one who is on the verge of death, unless they fight or insult Allāh or one of His Messengers (peace and blessings be upon him)."

As for the monk and the elderly man, al-Ramlī states (vol. 8, p. 64): "It is permissible to kill a monk, a hired laborer, an elderly man, a blind man, and those among them who do not fight and have no [military] opinion, according to the sounder view, due to the general statement of Allāh Almighty: {...kill the polytheists...} The second view is that it is not permissible to kill them."

Killing a Monk

As for the monk, the permissibility of killing him hinges on whether he mixes with people. If he mixes with people, he is killed. If he is secluded for his worship, he is left alone. It is narrated in the Ḥadīth of Ibn ‘Abbās (may Allāh be pleased with them both): When the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) dispatched his armies, he would say: "Go forth in the name of Allāh Almighty, fighting in the cause of Allāh those who disbelieve in Allāh. Do not be treacherous, do not embezzle, do not mutilate, do not kill children, nor the occupants of hermitages" (narrated by Abū Dāwūd).

It is stated in Al-Mabsūṭ by al-Sarakhsī (vol. 10, p. 128) that Abū Yūsuf, Muḥammad, and the narration in Al-Siyar al-Kabīr from Abū Ḥanīfah hold that they are not killed. Abū Yūsuf said: "I asked Abū Ḥanīfah about the occupants of hermitages and monks, and he considered killing them to be good, saying, 'These are leaders of disbelief.'" The reconciliation between Abū Ḥanīfah's two narrations is based on mixing with people: whoever mixes is killed, and whoever does not mix is not killed.

Killing Elderly Polytheists, the Sick, the Blind, and the Chronically Ill

There are two opinions on killing elderly polytheists:

1. Some, like the Ḥanafīs and Mālik, equated the elderly with children and women. They cited the Ḥadīth narrated by Abū Dāwūd from Anas in a marfū‘ form: "Do not kill a decrepit old man or a young child." The Ḥadīth contains Khālīd ibn al-Fazr, who is not considered strong. Jurists have said that the reason for not killing them is the same as for children: they are of no benefit to the polytheists and no harm to the Muslims. Ibn Nujaym said in Al-Baḥr (vol. 5, p. 84): "A woman, a non-mukallaf (one not legally responsible), a decrepit old man, a blind man, and a crippled person are not killed, unless one of them has [military] counsel in war."

2. Others, like the Shāfi'īs—according to the sounder view—permitted killing them. They cite the Ḥadīth in the two Ṣaḥīḥ collections that Abū 'Āmir al-Ash'arī killed Durayd ibn al-Ṣimmah, who was over one hundred years old. They also cite a Ḥadīth from Aḥmad and al-Tirmidhī, authenticated by him, from Samurah: "Kill the old men of the polytheists and spare their young men" (narrated by al-Nasā'ī). Aḥmad ibn Ḥanbal explained that the Prophet's (peace and blessings be upon him) command to kill the old men was because they would hardly ever embrace Islām, whereas the young were closer to Islām. Added to this is that old men often possess [military] opinion and cunning in war; Durayd ibn al-Ṣimmah had advised Mālik ibn 'Awf not to take women and children [to battle], but he refused. Among the evidence cited by this group is the general statement: {So kill the polytheists wherever you find them.} And because he is a disbeliever whose life has no benefit, he is killed like a young man.

The summary of the matter, and what we deem most correct, Allāh knows best, is: Anyone who is of benefit to the polytheists or others [in their war effort] is killed—whether an old man, a monk, or a crippled person.

As for the senile old man, the secluded monk, and the sick person suffering from his ailments, who are of no benefit to disbelief and no harm to Muslims, it is preferable to leave them, based on the reported texts (even if there is weakness in them, because analogy supports this, alongside their lack of benefit or harm).

Abū Bakr advised Yazīd ibn Abī Sufyān, saying to him: "Do not kill a woman, a child, or a decrepit old man." (Narrated by Mālik in Al-Muwatta'; see Al-Muwatta' with Sharḥ al-Zurqānī, vol. 3, p. 290). However, the Ḥadīth is mursal.

In Al-Mabsūṭ by al-Sarakhsī (vol. 10, p. 137): Abū Yūsuf said: "I asked Abū Ḥanīfah about killing women, children, very old men who cannot fight, and those with chronic illnesses. He forbade it and disliked it."

Cutting Down Trees and Killing Animals

The majority of jurists from the four schools of thought agreed that anything beneficial to Muslims or harmful to disbelievers during battle or in preparation for it is permissible, whether this action is killing a person or an animal, cutting down trees, or destroying buildings. This is because the primary and ultimate purpose of battle is to remove fitnah, spread the call [to Islām], and elevate the religion of Allāh. If Islām permits killing humans who stand in the way of the call, then it is even more permissible to destroy their property if it harms them or compels them to submit to this religion.

As for the verse: {And when he turns away, he strives throughout the land to cause corruption therein...} (Qurʾān, Al-Baqarah 2:205), it was revealed concerning al-Akhnas ibn Shurayq when he came to the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) and declared his Islām, then, upon leaving, burned crops and hamstringed livestock. Applying this verse to a Muslim army—forced to cut down trees—has no relevance whatsoever to the issue.

We return to say: everything that serves the interest of Jihād by benefiting Muslims or harming disbelievers is to be done, because the interest of Jihād takes precedence over everything.

Killing Communist Women in Afghanistan

As for communist women in Afghanistan, they must be killed, whether they participate in war or in [offering] opinion, or not; whether they are alone or mixed [with others]; and whether it is one woman or a group. This is because they are adherents of creeds that fight against Islām and harm Islām and Muslims. It has been established that the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) said concerning two women who belonged to Banū ‘Abd al-Muṭṭalib and used to harm the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him), his family, and Islām with their words, and concerning a group of men: “Kill them, even if you find them clinging to the curtains of the Ka‘bah.”

Using Artillery, Aircraft, Mortars, and Missiles for Bombardment

We have indicated that fighting in Islām is to remove obstacles before its call and to demolish political systems that prevent Islām from reaching the peoples. If we can convey it without killing or fighting, this is what the Muslim desires: that Allāh guides one person through him (which is better for him than red camels). If we cannot, then by removing barriers through all possible means without taking the lives of the vulnerable or destroying property.

If we cannot reach the tyrants deifying themselves on earth except by killing offspring, cutting down trees, and destroying installations, then there is no harm in it, because we were forced into these actions, and they were not our intended purpose or goal.

We have already mentioned the Ḥadīth of al-Ṣa‘b ibn Jaththāmah that the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) was asked about the polytheists whose homes were attacked at night, resulting in casualties among their women and children. He said: “They are from them” (narrated by the Jamā‘ah).

Al-Zuhrī said: "Then the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) forbade the killing of women and children." Al-Zuhrī considers the killing of women and children, if not intentional, to be forbidden, and also because it is abrogated. We have responded to this with the mursāl Ḥadīth narrated by al-Tirmidhī that the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him): “Set up the catapult against the people of Ṭā’if.” Its narrators are trustworthy; see Subul al-Salām (vol. 4, p. 1352). And with the other Ḥadīth from Salamah ibn al-Akwa‘: “We attacked Hawāzin at night with Abū Bakr al-Ṣiddīq, and the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) had appointed him as our commander" (narrated by Abū Dāwūd, and al-Mundhirī remained silent about it). The campaigns against Ṭā'if and Hawāzin occurred in the final days of the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him).

Al-Tirmidhī said: "A group of scholars permitted raiding at night and attacking by night. Some disliked it. Aḥmad and Ishāq said: There is no harm in attacking the enemy by night."

Al-Ṣan'ānī said regarding the Ḥadīth about setting up the catapult: "The Ḥadīth is evidence that it is permissible to kill disbelievers with a catapult if they fortify themselves." Other cannons prepared for use in raids, as mentioned by Ṣiddīq Ḥasan, are analogous to this. This concludes the quoted section from Al-Dhakhā'ir.

7. The Ruling on Martyrdom Operations

Therefore, Jihād itself involves risking one's life. Do you not see that the young boy [in the story of the King and the Boy] killed himself for the sake of spreading the religion?

Ibn Taymiyyah states in Majmū' al-Fatāwā (vol. 28, p. 450): "The boy ordered his own killing for the benefit of the religion's manifestation. For this reason, the four Imāms permitted a Muslim to plunge into the ranks of the disbelievers even if he strongly believes they will kill him, if there is a benefit for the Muslims in doing so." It is stated in Aḥkām al-Jaṣṣāṣ (vol. 1, p. 1262): Muḥammad ibn al-Ḥasan said in Al-Siyar al-Kabīr: "If a man were to charge alone against a thousand men, I see no harm in that if he hopes for survival or to inflict casualties. Even if he does not hope for survival or to inflict casualties, but his action would intimidate the enemy, there is no harm in that, because this is the best form of inflicting casualties and it benefits the Muslims."

(This is from Al-Dhakhā'ir, vol. 1, pp. 288-294.)

Al-Jaṣṣāṣ said: "If the loss of his own life brings a benefit to the religion, this is a noble station which Allāh praised in the Companions of the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him), saying: {Indeed, Allāh has purchased from the believers their lives and their properties [in exchange] for that they will have Paradise.}" (from Al-Dhakhā'ir, vol. 1, p. 292).

Suicide is forbidden, because the soul does not belong to its owner but to Allāh, the Mighty and Majestic. Therefore, one may not dispose of one's soul except in accordance with Allāh's pleasure. The one who commits suicide deserves Hellfire. The two Shaykhs (al-Bukhārī and Muslim) narrated from Thābit ibn Qays from the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him): "Whoever swears by other than Islām falsely, he is as he said. Whoever kills himself with something will be tormented with it on the Day of Resurrection. Whoever accuses a believer of disbelief, it is like killing him. And cursing a believer is like killing him."

It is not considered suicide for a person to sacrifice himself in service to Islām, to raise the morale of Muslims, or to inflict casualties upon the enemies of Allāh, the Mighty and Majestic. It is narrated in an authentic Ḥadīth by Muslim, in the commentary on Sūrat al-Burūj, the story of the young boy whom the king was unable to kill. The boy showed the king how to kill him, saying, after gathering the people and crucifying him: "Take an arrow and say, 'In the name of the Lord of this boy, I kill this boy.'" The king killed him, and the people said, "We believe in the Lord of the boy." This and similar examples are among those about whom we believe Allāh Almighty said: {And of the people is he who sells himself, seeking means to the approval of Allāh.}

Shaykh al-Islām [Ibn Taymiyyah], Muḥammad ibn al-Ḥasan, al-Jaṣṣāṣ, and al-Sarakhsī have stated that it is permissible for a Muslim to attack a thousand disbelievers even if he is certain of his own demise and death, if there is a benefit for the Muslims in doing so, or if it inflicts casualties upon the disbelievers, or if the Muslims are weak and disheartened and he wants to strengthen their resolve and sharpen their determination. The story of al-Barā' ibn Mālīk is of this kind, when he asked the Companions to place him on a shield, raise him on the tips of their spears, and throw him into the "Garden of Death" upon the army of Musaylimah the Liar on the Day of Yamāmah. I was asked about women who threw themselves into the Kunar River in Afghanistan, fearing for their honor from the Russians who had begun to violate [women's] honor. I said: This is martyrdom, if Allāh wills, because scholars are unanimous that it is not permissible for a woman to surrender to captivity if she fears for her honor, and likewise for a beardless youth. This concludes the quoted section from Al-Dhakhā'ir.

Important Question:

What is the ruling on a man who wears an explosive belt on his body and then throws himself among a group of disbelievers or tanks, causing it to explode with him and them together? And what is the ruling on a single man who charges alone into the enemy's stronghold?

Fatwa:

Jurists have permitted sacrificing one's life for the victory of Islām, and this is not considered suicide.

There is a difference between suicide and self-sacrifice.

Suicide is killing oneself to escape the worries and pains of life. Self-sacrifice, however, is giving one's life to protect the religion of Allāh and support His Sharī'ah, without worry or grief.

(This is from Al-Dhakhā'ir, vol. 1, p. 323.)

It is stated in Aḥkām al-Jaṣṣāṣ (vol. 1, p. 262) from Aslam Abū 'Imrān, who said: "We raided Constantinople, and the commander of the group was 'Abd al-Raḥmān ibn Khālīd ibn al-Walīd. The Romans had their backs to the city wall. A man charged at the enemy. The people said, 'Stop! Stop! Lā ilāha illAllāh! He is throwing himself into destruction!' Abū Ayyūb [al-Anṣārī] said: 'This verse was revealed about us, the Anṣār, when Allāh granted victory to His Prophet and made His religion—Islām—manifest. We said: Let us stay with our properties and manage them. Then Allāh Almighty revealed: {And spend in the way of Allāh and do not throw [yourselves] with your [own] hands into destruction [by refraining]. And do good; indeed, Allāh loves the doers of good.} (Qur'ān, Al-Baqarah 2:195)."

So, throwing oneself into destruction means staying with our properties, managing them, and abandoning Jihād. (Narrated by Aḥmad and al-Tirmidhī, who said it is a ḥasan ṣaḥīḥ Ḥadīth).

As for a single man charging alone into the enemy's stronghold, Muḥammad ibn al-Ḥasan said in Al-Siyar al-Kabīr:

"If a man were to charge alone against a thousand men, I see no harm in that if he hopes for survival or to inflict casualties.

If he does not hope for survival or to inflict casualties, then I dislike it for him because he exposes himself to destruction without any benefit to the Muslims.

A man should only do this if he hopes for survival or benefit to the Muslims.

1. If he does not hope for survival or to inflict casualties, but he emboldens the Muslims thereby, so that they do as he did, killing and inflicting casualties on the enemy, then there is no harm in that, if Allāh wills. In that case, even if he does not hope for survival, I see no harm in him charging them.
2. Likewise, if he hopes that others will be [emboldened] by his charge against them, there is no harm in that, and I hope he will be rewarded for it.
3. If he does not hope for survival or to inflict casualties, but his action would intimidate the enemy, there is no harm in that, because this is the best form of inflicting casualties and it benefits the Muslims."

Al-Jaṣṣāṣ said: "If the loss of his own life brings a benefit to the religion, this is a noble matter which Allāh praised in the Companions of the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him).

{Indeed, Allāh has purchased from the believers their lives and their properties.}

(Qur'ān, At-Tawbah 9:111). {And never think of those who have been killed in the cause of Allāh as dead. Rather, they are alive with their Lord, receiving provision.}

(Qur'ān, Āl 'Imrān 3:169). {And of the people is he who sells himself, seeking means to the approval of Allāh.} (Qur'ān, Al-Baqarah 2:207).

And similar verses in which Allāh praised those who gave their lives for Allāh.

In the noble Ḥadīth: "The worst things in a man are distressing avarice and debilitating cowardice." Condemning cowardice necessitates praising boldness and courage in what benefits the religion, even if one is certain of perishing."

Ibn Taymiyyah states in Majmū' al-Fatāwā (vol. 28, p. 540):

"The boy ordered his own killing for the benefit of the religion's manifestation. For this reason, the four Imāms permitted a Muslim to plunge into the ranks of the disbelievers even if he strongly believes they will kill him, if there is a benefit for the Muslims in doing so. We have elaborated on this issue elsewhere." This concludes the quoted section from Al-Dhakhā'ir.

I say, and with Allāh is success: I asked Shaykh 'Abd al-Qādir ibn 'Abd al-'Azīz (Dr. Faḍl)—may Allāh grant him relief—about the ruling on martyrdom operations. He told me: "He did not see their permissibility due to not finding explicit textual evidence that would exclude them from the ruling on suicide. He thought about it for a long time until he found evidence for their permissibility in the Almighty's saying: {And do not kill the soul which Allāh has forbidden, except by right.} (Qur'ān, Al-An'ām 6:151). Jihād against enemies and inflicting casualties upon them is of the truest right." I found this evidence of his to be among the clearest adduced for martyrdom operations in their contemporary form, as most of the statements of the predecessors concern a man plunging into the enemy's ranks where he strongly suspects his demise, but by being killed at the hands of the enemy. As for the text our Shaykh adduced, it is general. And Allāh knows best.

8. The Ruling on Enemy Captives

The ruling on a captive differs according to gender, age, and religion. Captives are usually of three types:

(This is from Al-Dhakhā'ir, vol. 1, p. 1016.)

First: Women and children: These may not be killed during war if they are separate, and likewise, they may not be killed after capture. They become slaves (raqīq) merely by being captured.

Second: Men from the Magians and People of the Book: Jurists have differed in their opinions concerning these. Here are the details, if Allāh wills:

Some scholars, like al-Ḥasan and Mujāhid, said: It is not permissible to kill a captive. Muḥammad ibn al-Ḥasan al-Tamīmī narrated a consensus of the Companions on this.

As for the four jurists, they agreed that the Imām has a choice regarding captives between execution and enslavement. As for releasing them without ransom (mann), the Ḥanafīs forbade it, while the Shāfi'īs and Ḥanbalīs permitted it.

As for Imām Mālik, narrations from him differ regarding the permissibility or impermissibility of releasing without ransom.

As for ransoming with money (fidā'), the Mālikīs, Shāfi'īs, and Ḥanbalīs permitted it. The Ḥanafīs, however, forbade it.

It is stated in Al-Mabsūṭ by al-Sarakhsī: "I asked him about the captive: Is he killed or ransomed? He said: He is killed or made fay' (spoils)."

Al-Shāfi'ī said: He is ransomed for a large sum of money.

Muḥammad [ibn al-Ḥasan] said: He is ransomed if the Muslims are in need of money.

Abū Ḥanīfah cited the statement of Abū Bakr: "Do not ransom them, even if you are given a city full of gold for them."

Because releasing a polytheist to return to fight Muslims is a sin, and committing a sin for monetary benefit is not permissible; it is abandoning an obligation. Killing a polytheist is an obligation. If they were to give us money to abandon prayer, it would not be permissible for us, even with the need for money.

It is not permissible to strengthen polytheists with weapons, and likewise, it is not permissible to strengthen them with men. What indicates the permissibility of releasing without ransom and ransoming is His saying, Mighty and Majestic: {And either [generosity] after or ransom...} (Qur'ān, Muḥammad 47:4).

He explicitly stated the permissibility of releasing without ransom and ransoming with money.

As for the Ḥanafīs, they hold that this verse is abrogated by the Almighty's saying: {And when the sacred months have passed, then kill the polytheists wherever you find them...} (Qur'ān, At-Tawbah 9:5).

Because it was revealed after it, as Sūrat At-Tawbah was revealed after Sūrat Muḥammad (peace and blessings be upon him). However, there is no evidence for abrogation, and the actions of the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) indicate that he did release without ransom, ransomed, exchanged prisoners, killed, and enslaved.

As for releasing without ransom, in Ṣaḥīḥ Muslim from Anas: "Eighty men from Mecca descended upon the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) and his companions from Mount Tan'īm at the time of the Fajr prayer to kill them. He (peace and blessings be upon him and his family) took them captive peacefully and then freed them. Then Allāh, Mighty and Majestic, revealed: {And He is the one who withheld their hands from you and your hands from them within [the area of] Makkah...}" (Qur'ān, Al-Fatḥ 48:24).

And from Jubayr ibn Muṭ'īm, that the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) said regarding the captives of Badr: "If al-Muṭ'īm ibn 'Adī were alive and spoke to me about these foul ones, I would have released them for him" (narrated by al-Bukhārī).

In the two Ṣaḥīḥ collections, it is narrated that the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) released Thumāmah ibn Uthāl of Banū Ḥanīfah, who was the chief of the people of Yamāmah. (Nayl al-Awṭār, vol. 8, p. 140).

As for the evidence for the permissibility of ransom, it is the Ḥadīth of Ibn ‘Abbās (may Allāh be pleased with them both):

"The Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) set the ransom for the people of the Jāhiliyyah on the Day of Badr at four hundred [dirhams]" (narrated by Abū Dāwūd, about which he, al-Mundhirī, and al-Ḥāfiẓ in Al-Talkhīṣ remained silent, and its narrators are trustworthy).

As for the evidence for the exchange of prisoners:

It is narrated in Ṣaḥīḥ Muslim that the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him and his family) ransomed the man from Banū ‘Uqayl—the owner of al-‘Aḍbā’—for two Muslim men.

(Al-‘Aḍbā’ was the name of the Bedouin's she-camel which became the property of the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him and his family)).

Two narrations are reported from Abū Ḥanīfah, the more apparent of which is impermissibility. As for his two companions [Abū Yūsuf and Muḥammad], they permitted the exchange of prisoners. (Al-Mabsūṭ, vol. 10, p. 129).

The Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him and his family) killed the men of Banū Qurayẓah, numbering between six hundred and seven hundred.

And on the Day of Badr, he killed al-Naḍr ibn al-Ḥārith and ‘Uqbah ibn Abī Mu‘ayṭ—this is evidence for the permissibility of killing captives.

The Soundest Opinion on Captives:

Undoubtedly, the soundest opinion on captives is that of the majority: the Imām has discretion regarding captives based on what is in the best interest of the Muslims, choosing between execution, enslavement, release without ransom, or ransom with a Muslim or money.

This is the opinion supported by the evidence. The Imām chooses what is most beneficial for the Muslims regarding the captives.

It is stated in Al-Sharḥ al-Kabīr with Al-Mughnī (vol. 10, p. 407): "If among them there is one who has strength and can inflict harm on the Muslims, then killing him is more appropriate. If among them there is a weak person who has much wealth, then ransoming him is more appropriate. If among them there is one who has a good opinion of Muslims and whose Islām is hoped for by releasing him without ransom, or who can help Muslims by securing the release of their captives or defending them, then releasing him without ransom is more appropriate. And if among them there is one whose service can be beneficial and whose harm is not feared, then enslaving him is more appropriate, like women and children. The Imām is most knowledgeable of the best interest, so this matter is delegated to him. If this is established, then this is a choice based on benefit and ijtihād (scholarly reasoning), not a choice based on desire. Whenever he sees the benefit in one option, it is not permissible to choose another, because he acts on their behalf by considering their best interest. Thus, it is not permissible for him to abandon what is in their interest, like the guardian of an orphan. Whenever he is hesitant among these options, execution is preferable."

Mujāhid said regarding two emirs: "One of them kills captives, and he is better."

Mālik said likewise.

Ishāq said: "Inflicting heavy casualties (ithkhān) is more beloved to me, unless he is known [to be valuable] and much can be hoped for from him [through ransom]."

The Ruling on Afghan Communist Captives:

Many communists, when captured by the mujāhidīn and sensing they will be killed, pronounce the two testimonies of faith (Shahādātayn). Nevertheless, the mujāhidīn kill them. Some people objected to this action, thinking that the words of the Shahādah protect their blood. These people cited the Ḥadīth of Usāmah: "How could you kill him after he said 'Lā ilāha illAllāh'?"

The truth is that the situation in Afghanistan is different. It is the custom of the mujāhidīn, when they capture prisoners, to bring them before the judicial council of the party. They investigate them, and they know each other. When they confirm that he is a communist and the people of his village identify him as such, they kill him, whether he utters the Shahādatayn, prays, or performs Islamic rituals.

Yes, the Sharī'ah ruling on a disbeliever captive who embraces Islām is that it is not permissible to kill him; his blood becomes inviolable, and he immediately becomes a slave, having the same ruling as children: he may not be killed and becomes a slave. This is when the words "Lā ilāha illAllāh" are the differentiator between disbelief and Islām.

However, the situation in Afghanistan is completely different. Babrak Karmal and Najibullah, the leader of the Afghan Communist Party who was eradicating Islām from Afghanistan, would say, "I am a Muslim," and pray, and his picture would appear on television.

Such people are killed, and their claims are not accepted. Here is the evidence for the validity of this ruling:

1. On the day of the Conquest of Mecca, the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) said about a group: "Kill them, even if you find them clinging to the curtains of the Ka'bah." Among them were al-Muqīs ibn Şubābah, Ibn Khaṭal, and the two slave girls who used to sing satirical songs about him—even though women of belligerents are not killed, just as offspring are not killed.
2. Imām Muslim narrated: From 'Imrān ibn Ḥuşayn, who said: "Thaqīf were allies of Banū 'Uqayl. Thaqīf captured two men from the companions of the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him), a man from Banū 'Uqayl, and they captured al-'Aḍbā' with him. The Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) came upon him while he was in bonds. He said, 'O Muḥammad!' The Prophet came to him and said, 'What is your matter?' He said,

'Why did you take me and the forerunner of the pilgrims (meaning al-ʿAḍbā')?' The Prophet said, 'I took you for the crime of your allies, Thaqīf.' Then he turned away. The man called him, saying, 'O Muḥammad!' The Prophet said, 'What is your matter?' He said, 'I am a Muslim.' The Prophet said, 'Had you said it when you were in control of your affairs, you would have succeeded completely.'"

Al-Shawkānī said about this Ḥadīth: The Imām may refuse to accept the Islām of one who is known not to desire Islām but was driven to it by necessity, especially if there is a benefit for the Muslims in not accepting it.

3. The Afghan communist is either a zindīq (heretic whose disbelief is concealed) or an apostate. The ruling on a zindīq is that he is killed without being asked to repent. This is the opinion of the majority of jurists, including Mālik, Aḥmad, al-Layth, and others.

From Ibn ʿUmar (may Allāh be pleased with them both): The repentance of one who repeatedly apostatizes, like a zindīq, is not accepted, due to the Almighty's saying: {Indeed, those who disbelieve after their belief, then increase in disbelief—never will their repentance be accepted, and it is those who are the misguided.} (Qurʾān, Āl ʿImrān 3:90). In Al-Dirāyah (Ḥanafī school), there are two narrations regarding the zindīq: "It is not accepted," like the view of Mālik and Aḥmad. In another narration, it is accepted, like the view of al-Shāfiʿī.

4. As for the apostate whose apostasy has become severe by taking up arms against Islām and Muslims, it is permissible to kill him without asking him to repent.

Ibn Rushd says in Bidāyat al-Mujtahid (vol. 2, p. 344): "As for when an apostate wages war and is then overcome, he is killed for waging war (ḥirābah) and is not asked to repent, whether his warfare was in the land of Islām or after he joined the land of war, unless he embraces Islām. Islām nullifies the ḥadd (prescribed punishment) of ḥirābah for him, but his ruling regarding what crimes he committed is the ruling for an apostate who commits crimes during his apostasy in the land of Islām and then embraces Islām"—meaning he is killed in retribution (qiṣās) if he killed someone. Ibn al-Qayyim says in Zād al-Ma'ād (vol. 3, p. 464): It is permissible to kill an apostate without asking him to repent if his apostasy has become severe. ‘Abdullāh ibn Sa’d ibn Abī Sarḥ had embraced Islām and emigrated, and he used to write down the revelation for the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him). Then he apostatized and joined Mecca. When the day of the Conquest came, ‘Uthmān ibn ‘Affān brought him to the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) to pledge allegiance. The Prophet withheld from him for a long time, then accepted his pledge and said: "I only withheld so that one of you might get up and strike off his head." A man said to him, "Why did you not signal to me, O Messenger of Allāh?" He replied: "It is not befitting for a prophet to have a treacherousness of the eyes."

5. Anyone who openly insults Allāh, His Messenger (peace and blessings be upon him), or the religion of Islām is killed without being asked to repent, whether he is a Muslim or a dhimmi (protected non-Muslim). This is why when the blind man killed his umm walad (slave-mother of his child) for insulting the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him), her blood was declared lawful to be shed.

Whoever wishes to learn more about this topic should consult the book Al-Ṣārim al-Maslūl ‘alā Shātim al-Rasūl (The Drawn Sword against the Reviler of the Messenger) by Shaykh al-Islām Ibn Taymiyyah. This ruling is by consensus of the Rightly Guided Caliphs (may Allāh be pleased with them), is the implication of the texts, and is supported by more than forty Ḥadīth. This communist is known among his people for insulting Islām and showing enmity towards the Messenger (peace and blessings be upon him), and he continued to fight Islām until the very last moment.

6. Let us assume they were originally Muslims and were forcibly taken to battle and killed Muslims. They are then killed in retribution (qīṣāṣ). ‘Umar said: "If the people of Sanaa collaborated in killing one man, I would kill them all for him."

Notes on Captives:

1. Whoever captures a prisoner is not allowed to dispose of him; rather, his matter is referred to the leader. The leader in the Afghan Jihād is the leader of the organization or party. It is not permissible for one who captures a prisoner to kill him unless he refuses to walk with him or is wounded and unable to walk.
2. Wounded enemy combatants may be killed and finished off.
3. (Ellipses in original)
4. A communist woman is killed because she is an apostate. In the Ṣaḥīḥ Ḥadīth: "Whoever changes his religion, kill him." She is also killed because she participates in war, in [offering] opinion, and in inciting disbelievers against Muslims.
5. It is not permissible to mutilate a captive, nor to cut off his ears or gouge out his eyes, because the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) forbade mutilation (muthlah). It is not permissible to cut off his head or his feet. This concludes the quoted section from Al-Dhakhā'ir.

9. The Ruling on the Spy (Jāsūs)

The ruling on a spy differs according to his religion and situation. There is the disbeliever spy, the non-dhimmi, the one under a treaty (mu‘āhad), and the non-Muslim...

A spy is one who uncovers people's secrets and faults and transmits them.

The spy intended here is one who transmits Muslims' secrets to their enemies.

As for the disbeliever spy, he is killed according to the majority of jurists.

The evidence for this is the Ḥadīth in the two Ṣaḥīḥ collections from Iyās ibn Salamah ibn al-Akwaʿ, from his father, who said: "A spy from the polytheists came to the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) while he was on a journey. He sat with his companions, talking, then slipped away. The Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) said: 'Seek him out and kill him.' Ibn al-Akwaʿ killed him, and the Prophet gave him his spoils (salab)" (This is the narration of al-Bukhārī).

In Muslim's narration, the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) said: "Who killed the man?" They said, "Ibn al-Akwaʿ." He said, "His spoils are all his."

Al-Nawawī said: "This concerns the killing of a belligerent disbeliever spy, which is by agreement. As for a dhimmi under a treaty, Mālik and al-Awzāʿī said his treaty is thereby nullified. According to al-Shāfiʿī, there is a difference of opinion on this. However, if this was stipulated in his treaty, it is nullified by agreement."

As for the dhimmi: If he spies on Muslims, jurists have differed as to whether his spying nullifies his treaty, such that he is killed or becomes fay' for the Muslims, or not.

The Ḥanafīs said: This does not nullify [the treaty] unless it was stipulated against him in the contract of dhimmah or the treaty of security (amān).

It is stated in Sharḥ Siyar al-Kabīr (vol. 5, p. 2040): "Muḥammad ibn al-Ḥasan said: Likewise, if a dhimmi engages in such spying, he is severely punished and imprisoned, but this does not constitute a nullification of the treaty on his part. The same applies if a musta'min (one granted safe passage) does so among us, except that he is severely punished in all such cases."

If, when he sought safe passage, the Muslims told him, "We have granted you security if you are not a spy," and he ignored the matter, then there is no harm in killing him. If the Imām deems it appropriate to take his spoils as an example to others, there is no harm in that. And if he deems it appropriate to make him fay', there is no harm in that either, like other captives. However, it is preferable here to kill him so that others may take heed. If the person is a woman, there is no harm in killing her either, though it is disliked.

An elderly, sensible man who does not fight is also in the position of a woman; he is not made fay' nor killed.

As for the spy whose outward appearance is that of a Muslim:

Jurists have differed in their opinions concerning him.

The Ḥanafīs, Shāfi'īs, and Ḥanbalīs said: He is not killed but is given a discretionary punishment (ta'zīr). Mālik, Ibn al-Qāsim, and Ashhab of the Mālikīs said: The Imām exercises his judgment in this. Ibn al-Mājishūn of the Mālikīs said: If this is his habit, he is killed because he is a spy. Mālik has said the spy is killed, and this is correct due to the harm he causes to Muslims and his striving for corruption in the land. (Tafsīr al-Qurṭubī, vol. 18, p. 52). Al-Awzā'ī said: The Imām inflicts an exemplary punishment on him and exiles him to distant lands. (Sharḥ al-Sunnah by al-Baghawī, vol. 10, p. 71). It is stated in Al-Siyar al-Kabīr: "Muḥammad ibn al-Ḥasan said: If Muslims find a man who claims to be a Muslim acting as a spy for the polytheists against the Muslims, writing to them about their vulnerabilities, and he willingly confesses to this, he is not killed, but the Imām inflicts a severe punishment on him."

The basis for this issue is the Ḥadīth of Ḥāṭib ibn Abī Balta'ah, a Badr veteran, who wrote to the disbelievers of Mecca informing them that the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) intended to raid them. The Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) said: "What is this, O Ḥāṭib?" He replied, "Do not be hasty with me. I am a man attached to Quraysh but not one of them by lineage. The Muhājirīn with you have relatives [in Mecca] who protect their kin, but I have no relatives in Mecca. So, I wished, if I missed that [kinship], to do them a favor. By Allāh, I did not do it out of doubt in my religion, nor out of contentment with disbelief after Islām." The Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) said: "He has spoken the truth." 'Umar said, "O Messenger of Allāh, let me strike off the neck of this hypocrite." The Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) said: "He witnessed Badr. And what do you know, O 'Umar? Perhaps Allāh looked upon the people of Badr and said, 'Do as you wish, for I have forgiven you.'" Then the verse was revealed: {O you who have believed, do not take My enemies and your enemies as allies, extending to them affection...} (Qur'ān, Al-Mumtaḥanah 60:1).

It is stated in Sharḥ al-Sunnah by al-Baghawī (vol. 10, p. 74): The Imām said: In the Ḥadīth of Ḥāṭib is evidence for the ruling on one who, through interpretation (ta'awwul), deems permissible what is forbidden, as opposed to the ruling on one who deliberately considers it permissible without interpretation. And that one who commits something forbidden and then claims a plausible interpretation for it is not killed for it. And that one who spies for the disbelievers is pardoned. The majority have cited the verse: {O you who have believed, do not take My enemies and your enemies as allies...} Allāh called Ḥāṭib ibn Abī Balta'ah a believer, and a believer may not be killed nor his blood shed.

Imām Ibn al-Qayyim inclined towards the opinion of Imām Mālik. We also favor the opinion of Imām Mālik (may Allāh have mercy on him). Imām Ibn al-Qayyim said in Zād al-Ma'ād (vol. 4, p. 114): "It is established that he [the Prophet] killed a spy. 'Umar sought permission to kill Ḥāṭib, and he said: 'And what do you know, O 'Umar? Perhaps Allāh looked upon the people of Badr and said, "Do as you wish, for I have forgiven you.'" This was also used as evidence by those who hold that he [the spy] should be killed, like Imām Mālik and some of the companions of Aḥmad and others (may Allāh have mercy on them). They said this because he [the Prophet] gave a reason that prevented his killing, and he did not give a reason more specific than [being one of] the people of Badr. For if a ruling is justified by a general reason, a more specific reason has no effect. This is stronger, and Allāh knows best." This concludes the quoted section from Al-Dhakhā'ir.

I say, and Allāh knows best what is correct:

(From Al-Dhakhā'ir, vol. 1, p. 304.)

It is preferable for the mujāhidīn today to adopt the opinion of Imām Mālik and Imām Ibn al-Qayyim, and to execute spies who appear to be Muslims. This is especially so since most confrontations with our enemies are now decided by espionage and security breaches, from which the mujāhidīn and secret organizations have suffered greatly. It is sufficient to know that in the Palestinian territories, there are thousands of spies working for the Jews for decades. Indeed, the Jews give those who have spent their lives in this work a retirement pension and build special villages for them, some of which have populations of thousands of families! It is sufficient to know that Jihād in Syria, Algeria, and elsewhere has been crushed due to intelligence espionage programs. Therefore, I am inclined towards the opinion of Shaykh ‘Abdullāh ‘Azzām, who chose the school of Imām Mālik and the preference of Ibn al-Qayyim, that this [decision] rests with the Imām. I advise executing spies who claim to be Muslims, except in rare cases where the leaders of Jihād see specific circumstances similar to the example of Ḥaṭīb, in a man of proven service to Islām and Jihād whose foot slipped in a limited mistake that did not result in the death of a Muslim—if they deem it appropriate to pardon him as an exceptional case, assessed accordingly. Otherwise, the default today is the execution of spies.

May Allāh curse them and disgrace them.

10. The Prohibition of Selling to the Enemy What Strengthens Them Against Muslims

As for commercial transactions between Muslims and disbelievers during wartime, when jurists established their commercial rules, they based them on their understanding of what would benefit Muslims and restrict the disbelievers.

Imām Mālik, for example, permits importing from disbeliever lands and allows belligerent merchants to enter Muslim lands carrying their goods, because this strengthens Muslims. Meanwhile, Imām Mālik prohibits exporting to disbeliever lands because this strengthens them.

However, purchasing manufactured goods from disbelievers in the current international reality is considered strengthening the disbelievers by channeling hard currency to exporting countries. The search for commercial markets to sell products is one of the main reasons for which modern wars have been waged and colonialism was established by major powers.

In any case, the rule in the commercial field according to jurists is: "Exporting or importing anything that strengthens the disbelievers is prohibited." "Exporting or importing anything that strengthens Muslims is permitted."

For example, exporting weapons to disbeliever lands is forbidden, as is petroleum used to run weapons factories, and all instruments of war. Jurists even forbade exporting brocade and silk because war machinery components are made from them, and they forbid exporting iron from which weapons are made. It is stated in Al-Fatāwā al-Hindiyyah: "Nothing that is a staple in warfare is to be sold." In modern times, selling copper, cobalt, radium, and uranium (from which atomic bombs are made) is prohibited. Imām Mālik said in Al-Mudawwanah: "As for anything that provides strength to the people of Islām [meaning, against them if sold to the enemy], with which they strengthen themselves in their wars, such as mounts, weapons, scrap metal, goods, or anything known to be a strength in war, like copper or otherwise, these are not to be sold to them." This concludes the quoted section from Al-Dhakhā'ir.

11. Disbelievers Using Non-Combatants or Muslims as Human Shields in War

First: Disbelievers Using Their Women and Children as Human Shields

Tatarrus means to shield oneself or take cover with a turs (shield). A turs is a steel plate carried for protection against swords. So, a turs is what is used for protection in war.

(This is from Al-Dhakhā'ir, vol. 1, p. 164.)

Tatarrus here means using Muslims as a shield (what they call today: human shields) for disbelievers. Disbelievers may sometimes resort in battle to placing a Muslim captive or a group of Muslim children with them inside a fortress or castle to prevent the mujāhidīn from opening fire on them. This is because they know that the mujāhidīn fear killing their captive brothers who are in the same fortress with the disbelievers, and because Muslim blood is sacrosanct ("All of a Muslim is inviolable to another Muslim: his blood, his property..." - authentic Ḥadīth).

Disbelievers may also sometimes resort to placing their own children (disbelievers' children) with them in fortresses or camps as a pretext to prevent Muslims from launching projectiles at them, because disbelievers know that "the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) forbade the killing of women and children" (agreed upon).

This is a major problem facing the mujāhidīn in modern warfare because the brunt of war mostly involves heavy projectiles like mortars, rockets, and heavy machine guns. Some mujāhidīn, due to lack of knowledge, may hesitate to fire projectiles at a fortress containing polytheists' children or a Muslim captive. The issue becomes more complicated when we know that there is no communist center without Afghan soldiers who have been forcibly conscripted. The brothers see them in the communist centers praying and hear their call to prayer. These conscripts are sometimes numerous and have no power, as they were taken by force and placed to guard communist centers, even though these forcibly conscripted men hate communism. What is the ruling in such cases?

Cases of Communists Mingling with Their Children:

First: Islām Prohibits Killing Children if They are Separate or Can Be Distinguished. This is due to the Ḥadīth: "The Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) forbade the killing of women and children” (narrated by al-Bukhārī and Muslim). As for women, they are not killed unless they fight or apostatize after Islām, like the communist women in Afghanistan. This is the opinion of the three Imāms; the Ḥanafīs differed regarding the killing of an apostate woman, saying she should be imprisoned and not killed.

Second: If the Children of Polytheists Mingle with Their Combatants: Here, Scholars Differed on Launching Projectiles at the Fortress Where They Are, with Several Opinions:

Mālik and al-Awzā‘ī said: It is not permissible to kill women and children under any circumstances, even if the belligerents use women as human shields, or fortify themselves in a fortress or ship and place women and children with them. It is not permissible to shoot at them or burn them. (Awjaz al-Masālik, vol. 8, p. 223).

The majority of Shāfi‘īs, Ḥanafīs, and Ḥanbalīs said it is permissible to shoot at them, but one should not intend to kill the children. If children and women are killed [unintentionally], there is no harm and no blame. The majority cited the Ḥadīth of al-Ṣa‘b ibn Jaththāmah: “The Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) passed by al-Abwā’ or Waddān and was asked about attacking the polytheists’ homes at night, resulting in casualties among their women and children. He said, “They are from them”” (narrated by al-Bukhārī and Muslim).

The meaning of bayāt is attacking at night so that one cannot distinguish between a child and a man. The meaning of “they are from them” is that their ruling is like their [combatants’] ruling. Al-Nawawī said in his commentary on Muslim (vol. 12, p. 49): “What is meant is if they are not intentionally targeted without necessity. As for the previous Ḥadīth prohibiting the killing of women and children, what is meant is when they can be distinguished. This Ḥadīth we mentioned concerns the permissibility of attacking them at night and killing women and children. Attacking at night (bayāt) is our school’s view and that of Abū Ḥanīfah and the majority.” Al-

Nawawī stated similarly in Al-Minhāj. See: Zād al-Muḥtāj bi-Sharḥ al-Minhāj, vol. 4, p. 303.

Among the arguments of the Mālikīs is their claim that the Ḥadīth of al-Ṣaʿb ibn Jaththāmah is abrogated, evidenced by al-Zuhrī's statement after narrating the Ḥadīth: "Then the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) forbade the killing of women and children." The Mālikīs also argue with the Ḥadīth narrated by Mālik in Al-Muwatṭaʿ from ʿAbd al-Raḥmān ibn Kaʿb, who said: "The Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) forbade those who killed Ibn Abī al-Ḥuqayq from killing women and children. One of them said: 'The wife of Ibn Abī al-Ḥuqayq was troubling us, so I raised my sword against her, then I remembered the prohibition of the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) and refrained. Were it not for that, we would have been relieved [of her].'" (Awjaz al-Masālik, vol. 8, p. 220).

If there had been any license to kill women, he would have killed her. As the Companion said, "Were it not for that, we would have been relieved," even though she participated in defense, at least by screaming, and the Companions' lives were in danger due to her screaming because they were inside the fortress of Ibn Abī al-Ḥuqayq, the Jew.

The sounder view is that of the majority because the majority reconciled the two Ḥadīth: the prohibition of killing women and children, and the Ḥadīth of al-Ṣaʿb ibn Jaththāmah ("they are from them"). They said the Ḥadīth of Ṣaʿb ibn Jaththāmah applies when they cannot be distinguished, and the Ḥadīth of prohibition applies when they can be distinguished. If we were to adopt Imām Mālik's opinion, the door to Jihād would be closed in these times because most fighting is done by long-range projectiles, machine guns, and the like. The majority opinion is also supported by the Ḥadīth of Makḥūl that the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) set up a catapult against the people of Ṭāʿif (narrated by Abū Dāwūd). The Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him), having hurled stones with the catapult, knew that the stones might hit children and women. The siege of Ṭā'if was late in the life of the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him), at the end of 8 A.H.

Based on the foregoing: It is permissible to shoot at disbelievers along with their children and women if they cannot be distinguished. It is not permissible to kill children and women if they are separate. If women participate in fighting, even by opinion, and then become separate, they are killed.

Second: Disbelievers Using Muslims as Human Shields:

Some communist centers contain forcibly conscripted soldiers who pray and call the adhān at all times. Brothers in Jaji, in the nearby communist bases, saw people praying and calling the adhān and hesitated to fight them. They asked me about the Sharī'ah ruling on this. I say, and with Allāh is success: If we refrained from attacking these centers, the door to Jihād would be closed, disbelief would spread, fitnah would prevail, communism would rest easy, and its foothold in Afghanistan would be solidified. Therefore:

It is obligatory to fight these centers, even if these coerced Muslims are killed, for the following reasons:

1. Repelling a general harm by committing a specific harm. This is an agreed-upon Sharī'ah principle. Killing these Muslim soldiers is a specific harm, while the loss of the country is a general harm that is repelled by the specific harm.
2. The Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) said: "An army of people will raid this House (the Ka'bah). While they are in a desert land, the earth will swallow them up." It was said, "O Messenger of Allāh, among them are the coerced." He said, "They will be resurrected according to their intentions" (narrated by al-Bukhārī and Muslim).

Ibn Taymiyyah says in Majmū' al-Fatāwā (vol. 28, p. 537): "Allāh Almighty destroyed the army that intended to violate His sanctities—both the coerced and uncoerced among them—despite His ability to distinguish between them, though He will resurrect them according to their intentions. So how can it be obligatory for the believing mujāhidīn to distinguish between the coerced and others when they do not know this?"

3. The outward appearance of these individuals is against the Muslims: they are protecting communist bases that corrupt the land and destroy its inhabitants. These bases are used to cut off the paths of passing mujāhidīn, some of whom may be wounded or killed.

Their standing in the ranks of the polytheists, armed with weapons, makes their blood lawful. Muḥammad ibn al-Ḥasan says in Al-Siyar al-Kabīr (para. 2799/1446): "Likewise, it is permissible to fight a Muslim in the ranks of the polytheists if he is armed and in the polytheists' ranks, even if he has not fought any Muslims. For whoever is prepared to fight in the ranks of the polytheists, his blood is lawful, although it is recommended to ascertain his situation when possible."

The outward appearance is evidence for the mujāhidīn for the permissibility of fighting Muslims who are in the ranks of the disbelievers. It is narrated: Al-ʿAbbās ibn ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib said to the Prophet, when the Muslims captured him on the Day of Badr: "O Messenger of Allāh, I was coerced." The Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) said: "As for your outward appearance, it was against us. As for your inner state, it is up to Allāh" (Majmūʿ al-Fatāwā, vol. 28, p. 537).

Ibn Taymiyyah comments on this Ḥadīth, saying: Even if there were righteous people among them, from the best of people, and it was not possible to fight them [the enemy] except by killing these [righteous ones], they would be killed too.

When Muslims hesitated to fight the Tatars because some of them prayed and fasted, Ibn Taymiyyah said: "If you see me among them with the Qur'ān on my head, then kill me."

4. The living of these Muslim soldiers among disbelievers who fight Allāh and His Messenger and cut off the path for the mujāhidīn, and even kill mujāhidīn—the least that applies to them is the punishment for highway robbery:

{Indeed, the penalty for those who wage war against Allāh and His Messenger and strive upon earth [to cause] corruption is none but that they be killed or crucified or that their hands and feet be cut off from opposite sides or that they be exiled from the land. That is for them a disgrace in this world; and for them in the Hereafter is a great punishment.} (Qur'ān, Al-Mā'idah 5:33).

These Muslims live with the defiant group that kills Muslims and cuts off their path, so their ruling is the same as that of the polytheists when it is not possible to distinguish.

‘Alī (may Allāh be pleased with him), when he fought the people of Basra with his army, said: "Do not start fighting them until they start fighting you." His intention with this was to demonstrate that "the initiation of fighting by some of them is like its initiation by their entire group regarding the permissibility of fighting them" (Sharḥ al-Siyar al-Kabīr by Muḥammad ibn al-Ḥasan al-Ḥanafī, 2798/1446), even though all the people of Basra were Muslims.

5. Jurists are unanimous that if a disbeliever army uses Muslim captives as human shields, and harm to the Muslims [attackers] is feared if they do not fight, then they should fight, even if it leads to killing the Muslims used as shields.

The existence of these [communist] centers is a definite and certain harm, without any doubt or suspicion. Their existence is for the purpose of cutting off the Jihād and allowing the disbelievers to remain in the land.

a. It is stated in the commentary of al-Dasūqī al-Mālikī (vol. 2, p. 178): "If they use a Muslim as a shield, they are fought, and the shield [the Muslim] is not intentionally targeted by shooting if we fear for ourselves, because a Muslim's blood becomes lawful due to fear for one's own life, even if most Muslims are not feared for. If [general harm is] feared, the sanctity of the shield is lifted, and it is permissible to shoot him."

b. Al-Nawawī says in Al-Minhāj: "It is permissible to besiege disbelievers in cities and castles, divert water towards them, shoot them with fire and catapults, and attack them by night when they are unaware. If there is a Muslim captive or merchant among them, or if they engage in battle and use women and children as shields, it is permissible to shoot them. If they use them [women and children] to defend themselves and there is no necessity to shoot them, the sounder view is to leave them. If they use Muslims as shields, if there is no necessity to shoot them, we leave them; otherwise, it is permissible to shoot them according to the sounder view." (Zād al-Muḥtāj, vol. 4, p. 302).

c. It is stated in Sharḥ al-Siyar al-Kabīr (para. 2800, vol. 4, p. 1446): If they [Muslims] burn or sink a ship belonging to the polytheists, and there are Muslims on board, there is no blood money (diyah) or expiation (kaffārah) incumbent upon the Muslims, because they directly performed an action that is lawful for them according to Sharīʿah, knowing the true state of affairs. However, if we fear harm to the mujāhidīn in the case of human shields made of Muslim captives, is it permissible to shoot them? Here the four jurists differed. The Ḥanafīs permitted it, while the other three forbade it. It is stated in Fatḥ al-Qadīr (vol. 9, p. 198) by Ibn al-Humām al-Ḥanafī: "If they use Muslim captives and their children as shields, whether it is known that if they refrain from shooting them, the Muslims will be defeated, or this is not known, but they only intend to shoot the disbelievers—if any Muslim is hit, there is no blood money or expiation."

According to the three Imāms, it is not permissible to shoot them in the case of human shields unless refraining from shooting them in this situation would lead to the defeat of the Muslims. This is also the view of al-Ḥasan ibn Ziyād. The fatwā of the three jurists is based on the situation where Jihād is a collective obligation (farḍ kifāyah), as when Muslims are conquering new lands. However, in a situation like Afghanistan, where Muslim lands have been usurped, their religion is threatened with extinction, and these Muslim soldiers are deployed to protect the disbelievers and perpetuate the usurpation and violation of honor, I do not believe any jurist would rule that fighting them is impermissible.

We must be careful in our intentions not to kill Muslims:

We must intend to fight the polytheists and not to kill Muslims, even if we cannot distinguish between them in our fighting. As for intention, it is within our capacity and ability.

There is no blood money (diyah) or expiation (kaffārah) for Muslims killed in the ranks of the polytheists:

Al-Marghīnānī states in Al-Hidāyah: "If they use Muslim children or prisoners as human shields, one should not refrain from shooting at them," for the reason we have explained, "and they should aim their fire at the disbelievers." This is because if distinguishing them physically is impossible, it is possible by intention, and obedience is according to one's capacity. For any of them (Muslims) they hit, there is no blood money or expiation upon them, because Jihād is an individual obligation (farḍ 'ayn), and financial penalties are not conjoined with obligations (See Fath al-Qadīr 5/198). Al-Ḥasan ibn Ziyād said that killing a Muslim in this situation entails blood money and expiation. According to the Shāfi'īs, there is one opinion regarding expiation and two opinions regarding blood money.

6. Among the evidence for the permissibility of fighting when Muslims are present with them is what al-Bukhārī narrated from ‘Ikrimah, who said: Ibn ‘Abbās informed me: "Some people were with the polytheists, swelling their numbers. An arrow would be shot, hitting one of them, or he would be struck and killed. So Allāh revealed: {Indeed, those whom the angels take [in death] while they are unjust to themselves - [the angels] will say, "In what [condition] were you?" They will say, "We were oppressed in the land." The angels will say, "Was not Allāh's earth spacious [enough] for you to emigrate therein?" For those, their refuge is Hell - and evil it is as a destination.} (Qur’ān, Al-Nisā’: 97). This is the ruling concerning the oppressed believers in Makkah who did not emigrate to protect their wealth and were killed in Badr. So, what is the ruling concerning the oppressed Afghans who swell the ranks of the apostate Afghan communists? Their ruling is more severe, and their punishment is harsher, and Allāh knows best.
7. Fighting these polytheists who have Muslims among them is an act of repelling an aggressor (ṣā’il). Repelling a Muslim aggressor is obligatory (farḍ) according to the majority of jurists, and permissible according to some. No Muslim has ever said that repelling an aggressor is disliked or forbidden, even if the aggressor is among the best of Muslims.
8. The interest of preserving the religion takes precedence over the interest of preserving life. Killing these Muslims in the ranks of the polytheists serves the interest of preserving the religion, even if it entails the loss of the interest of preserving life.

Ibn Taymiyyah says in Majmū‘ al-Fatāwā (28/540): "The Sunnah and scholarly consensus agree that if an aggressor cannot be repelled except by killing, he is to be killed, even if the property he is taking is worth a qīrāṭ of a dīnār, as the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) said in the authentic Ḥadīth: "Whoever is killed defending his property is a martyr, whoever is killed defending his life is a martyr, and whoever is killed defending his family is a martyr." So how much more so is the case of fighting these polytheists who have Muslims with them, who are assaulting the religion, honor, life, and property? There is no doubt or uncertainty that it is more fitting and more obligatory. Even if everyone in the (enemy) base were Muslim, it would be obligatory to fight them if they did not withdraw on their own, because they are aggressors against Muslim land and their religion."

Summary of the Matter:

If we can distinguish Muslims who are intermingled with the disbelieving army and know they are coerced, it is not permissible to fight them. However, if we conquer a fortress and find Muslim soldiers therein after gaining power over them, then if they had killed a Muslim, they are to be killed in retribution (qīṣāṣ).

As for when they are mixed with the polytheists and we cannot distinguish them, and we do not know who is coerced nor are we able to differentiate, then if we kill them by Allāh's command, we are rewarded and excused for that, and they will be judged according to their intentions. Whoever was coerced and could not resist will be resurrected on the Day of Judgment according to his intention, as stated in al-Fatāwā 28/540 and Al-Dhakhā'ir, pp. 1022-1026.

Here, I wish to draw attention to a very important issue related to this matter:

An Important Note on the Issue of Infidels Using Muslims as Human Shields:

I say, and Allāh is the one whose help is sought:

As we can see, all the preceding statements by scholars on the issue of using Muslims as human shields pertain to one of two situations:

The first is when infidels take some Muslim prisoners or detainees and place them among their ranks to prevent Muslim mujāhidīn from attacking, out of reluctance to kill their brothers. We have seen that the summary conclusion in this regard is the preference for the permissibility of attacking them, even if it leads to the killing of the detained Muslims, if it is feared that the Muslims will be defeated if they do not do so, or if the harm resulting from not attacking them is greater than the harm of killing some Muslim prisoners and detainees. Nevertheless, some jurists have been strict on this issue and prohibited the killing of Muslims, due to the sanctity and status of preserving Muslim blood.

The second issue is that of those coerced into fighting in the ranks of the infidels (such as Muslims forcibly conscripted into the infidel army). The ruling, as has passed, is the permissibility of killing them if they cannot be distinguished, and that Allāh will not wrong them – far be it from Him, Blessed and Exalted is He – and that they will be resurrected according to their intentions.

However, new situations have arisen these days, posing an issue of utmost precision, difficulty, and sensitivity. The forces of the invading occupiers have entered our lands with capabilities that the mujāhidīn cannot confront openly in two distinct, opposing lines – as is the case in Iraq, Afghanistan, Palestine, Kashmir, Chechnya, and elsewhere. Their military, security, and civilian presence has taken various forms among the Muslim populace within cities and residential areas. Guerrilla warfare, hit-and-run tactics have become the primary method of confronting them, and the use of explosives by the mujāhidīn has become common, whether through remote detonation, martyrdom operations, or other methods of using explosives. The same applies to the presence of apostates from among the tyrants loyal to the enemies of Allāh, the invaders who wage war against Allāh, His Messenger, and the Muslims. Their intermingling, and the intermingling of their soldiers, security forces, guards, and the guards of their infidel allies with Muslims, and their spread among residential areas and their movement in Muslim markets and places of congregation, has meant that targeting these enemies of Allāh with various explosive methods leads to many casualties among innocent Muslims – killed and wounded – and the destruction of their homes, properties, and wealth.

It has become common in some statements by the mujāhidīn to draw an analogy between these situations and the ruling on human shields (tars), and the permissibility of killing Muslims whom the enemies use as shields in war. I believe there is no clear, direct relationship between the issue of human shields and many of these cases. I also believe that taking this matter lightly and applying it indiscriminately without careful examination, detail, controls, or conditions is not free from flaws that could make some mujāhidīn bear the sin of shedding innocent Muslim blood, destroying property, and violating the sanctities of protected Muslims, which are not permissible – and Allāh knows best – in this absolute manner, which is not justified by relying on the ruling concerning infidels using Muslims as human shields in war. I draw attention to a number of points as a reminder:

(1) I am not advocating for stopping the fight against the invading infidels or their allies and collaborators from among the tyrants who wage war against Allāh, His Messenger, and the believers, if they are completely intermingled with Muslims. This is because such a cessation would lead to their establishment in our lands and consequently the corruption of the Muslims' religion and worldly affairs, which is what the enemies of Allāh desire. And Allāh forbid that I should call for that.

(2) The mujāhidīn must exert themselves in studying the repercussions of every operation from a Sharī'ah and political perspective, just as they exert themselves in studying it militarily and from a security standpoint. Among the most important aspects of this is what we are discussing: the issue of which Muslims will be killed by the mujāhidīn's bombings. It is obligatory to strive to avoid them by all means, to calculate the operation's returns and importance, and the proportion of Muslims who might be mistakenly and unintentionally harmed, relative to the expected damage inflicted upon the infidels and its impact on them. We have found in some operations that bombs are placed in a crowded Muslim market, intending to kill a few individuals from an infidel military patrol, or a car bomb at the gate of an American consulate, outside the fence enclosing a garden, behind which are offices where most of the occupants are not Americans. In such an operation, no sane person would expect a single American to be harmed! Yet, the few targeted enemies may be killed or injured, or perhaps not harmed at all, while dozens of Muslims, including children, women, and innocent people, are killed or injured, and their property destroyed. This outcome is known to every sane person through simple calculation and study of the location and the likelihood of Muslims being present. I believe this is not permissible.

There is a significant difference that must be taken into account between using explosives in the lands and capitals of infidels, such as Tel Aviv, Washington, and London, and using them in the capitals and lands of Muslims.

We have previously discussed at length a section titled "The Sanctity of Muslim Blood, its Inviolability, Property, and Honor," from which we recall the Prophet's (peace and blessings be upon him) saying in the Ḥadīth narrated by Muslim in his Ṣaḥīḥ: "Whoever abandons obedience and separates from the community and dies, dies a death of jāhiliyyah (pre-Islamic ignorance). Whoever fights under a banner of blindness, becoming angry for partisanship, calling to partisanship, or supporting partisanship, and is killed, his death is one of jāhiliyyah. And whoever rebels against my ummah, striking its righteous and its wicked, not sparing its believer, nor fulfilling his covenant with one who has a covenant, he is not of me and I am not of him."

Striking the wicked and the disbeliever does not justify failing to avoid harming the believer and one who has a dhimmah (covenant of protection) or a valid Sharī'ah covenant. Similarly, what is narrated from him (peace and blessings be upon him) in the Ḥadīth reported by al-Bayhaqī from al-Barā' ibn 'Āzib: "The demise of the entire world is lesser in Allāh's sight than the killing of a believer. If the inhabitants of His heavens and His earth were to participate in shedding the blood of a believer, Allāh Almighty would cast them into the Fire." And his saying, addressing the honored Ka'bah while looking at it: "Indeed, you have a great status with Allāh, yet your demise is lesser in Allāh's sight than the killing of a Muslim man." Or as he (peace and blessings be upon him) said.

So, does the mere possibility of eliminating some infidel brutes or their collaborators, who are worthless and change nothing in the course of the long-term battle we are waging, justify the certain or highly probable demise of dozens of believing souls? I believe that this intention and aim do not justify such an act in all these cases.

Many Qur'ānic and noble Prophetic texts have passed concerning the gravity of the sanctity of a Muslim soul, sufficient for the mujāhidīn in the path of Allāh to reflect upon and scrutinize their actions.

(3) Some mujāhidīn may think that their mere intention of targeting infidels, and not intending to kill any Muslims who might be killed, is sufficient to deem all such actions permissible. I believe that the soundness of intention and purpose alone is not enough. Allāh does not accept from a servant except that which is purely for His sake and is correct. Correctness means following the Book and the Sunnah as explained by the scholars, and this undoubtedly includes avoiding the shedding of the blood of believers and those protected by Sharī'ah in combat, as much as one is able.

(4) If the target intended by the mujāhidīn is (based on a strong probability) certain to inflict significant damage on the enemies, contributing to the defeat of the enemy and the victory of the Muslims – such as an important enemy leader, or inflicting a heavy, impactful loss on the infidel ranks – and the mujāhidīn have exerted their utmost effort to keep Muslims away from the scene of the event, to avoid them, and to choose times when their presence is rare, and so on, to the extent of all possible precautions, and then something happens by fate, unintentionally causing some Muslims to be harmed despite these precautions, then I hope that Allāh will forgive them for that, due to their exertion of effort and the soundness of their intention and purpose.

(5) I have heard from some mujāhidīn, during discussions of this emergent issue, statements that suggest their disregard for losses among the Muslim common folk, such as saying that most of these afflicted Muslims are sinners, or those who sit back and do not engage in Jihād, or that they are innovators whose beliefs are largely corrupted, and other such descriptions which may or may not be accurate. However, this talk is baseless. The fact that their fundamental status is Islām protects them and necessitates avoiding them. No one of repute among the people of Islām has ever permitted the shedding of the blood of such individuals. The blood of a Muslim is not lawful except according to known rulings. However, I have seen in some cases that the psychological state some mujāhidīn reach, due to pressure from the enemies of Allāh on one hand, and the public's reluctance to support Allāh's religion on the other, along with the corrupt conditions they might be involved in, has led some to belittle the issue of genuine avoidance. This is dangerous and impermissible.

(6) Finally, I advise every organization or detachment of mujāhidīn to have a Sharī'ah reference to whom they can present confusing matters in these calamitous emergent issues, despite my knowledge of the scarcity of those whose knowledge can be trusted or who are prepared to support the mujāhidīn with their knowledge, if available in this era. And to Allāh we complain of what 'Umar (may Allāh be pleased with him) complained: the audacity of the sinner and the helplessness of the trustworthy. And there is no might nor power except with Allāh, the Most High, the Most Great.

12. The Ruling on Residing in the Lands of Polytheists

Shaykh ‘Abd Allāh ‘Azzām (may Allāh have mercy on him) said:

Residing in the lands of polytheists is forbidden except in cases of extreme necessity.

In the ḥasan Ḥadīth narrated by Abū Dāwūd from Samurah, attributed to the Prophet (marfū‘): "Whoever associates with a polytheist and lives with him is like him." And in the ḥasan Ḥadīth narrated by al-Nasā‘ī: "Allāh does not accept any deed from a polytheist after he has embraced Islām until he separates from the polytheists."

The crux of the ruling revolves around the principle of preserving one's religion, honor, and property. Wherever a place is found that is safer for the integrity of one's religion and honor, one must choose it as a residence.

The author of al-Mi‘yār (in Mālikī jurisprudence) says about residing in the lands of disbelief: "It is a prohibition definitively established in the religion, like the prohibition of blood, pork, and killing a soul without right, and similar universal principles among the five essentials that the people of all religions and faiths have agreed upon prohibiting." Al-Qurṭubī said: "Based on this, it is not permissible for a Muslim to enter the land of disbelief for trade or other purposes except for a religious necessity, such as entering to ransom a Muslim. Imām Mālik invalidated the testimony of one who entered the land of war for trade." Responsibility is according to capacity, and necessity is assessed by its measure. And praise be to Allāh, Lord of the worlds. (End of quote from Al-Dhakhā’ir, vol. 1, p. 1022).

And I say, and Allāh is the one whose help is sought:

The prohibition of residing in the lands of disbelievers and polytheists is a general ruling agreed upon by the scholars of Islām and all their schools of thought, due to the tribulation (fitnah) it entails in religion, the absorption of polytheistic customs, the familiarity with them which, over time, leads to the affection that Allāh has forbidden with them, and the intermingling of the nascent offspring with their children and learning their many vile and corrupt customs. This is not to mention the distance from Islamic customs and the norms of believers, the absence of mosques, reminders of Allāh, and those who enjoin good and forbid evil. Furthermore, there is the attempt by disbelievers to harm Muslims, persecute them, and test them in their religion. Allāh decreed that I be compelled to live in European countries for a long period: during the years (1983-1997), due to security conditions that forced people like me to emigrate and flee from the rule of tyrants. I resided in those countries, studied there, and worked in various fields of life, from commerce to journalism and more. It was decreed for me to stay for about three years in France, nearly eight years in Spain, and over three years in Britain. I visited many European countries such as Germany, the Scandinavian countries, Italy, Belgium, Holland, and others, and I worked among the diverse Islamic awakening circles there. I practically concluded, through what I saw, that the prohibition by the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) for Muslims to reside in the lands of disbelievers and polytheists is, in truth, one of the miracles of prophethood. This is due to the events, scenes, and conditions I witnessed among Muslims – their righteous and their wicked, their believers, their sinners, and their disbelievers – and even those who attributed themselves to working for the Islamic awakening, and even those Jihādīs who had reached Europe!

Those countries affected them and their offspring, all of them without any exception. The only difference was in the degrees of influence and corruption, from gradual sinfulness to rampant apostasy, may Allāh protect us.

There is no space here to record a summary of what I saw and heard of conditions that make the heart bleed and break with sorrow for the state of Muslims, their religion, their customs, and what has befallen them there. Perhaps if I have the opportunity, I will record that in a separate treatise. The overwhelming majority of those called "Muslims" in the lands of disbelief, numbering tens of millions in Europe alone (it is said more than 45 million "Muslims!"), and similarly in America,

Canada, Australia, and other parts of the world, east and west, do not establish prayer, nor pay Zakāh, nor perform most of the rituals of Islām. Nothing remains of their fathers' religion except fragments of customs and traditions that dissolve over time in their children and grandchildren. Their women and daughters are unveiled, mingling with Muslim and non-Muslim men, studying in their schools, and working among them. Their youth are mostly sinners, many of whom drink alcohol, and many eat pork. Adultery and debauchery have become rampant among them, even among many of their women. The prevalence of marriage to non-Muslim women (most of whom are atheists whose marriage is not permissible in the first place because they are not People of the Book, having no religion, like most Western youth today who openly declare and boast of this) has led to the birth of offspring who do not know the language of their Arab or Muslim fathers and live according to the ways of their mothers! Indeed, recently, the marriage of Muslim daughters to non-Muslim men through civil marriage has become widespread, and some misguided, Westernized scholars of evil have even permitted some forms of this forbidden marriage. This is not to mention the various Western forms of illicit cohabitation, different types of fornication, and moral decay that have become customary in those Western circles. So much so that many Muslim daughters cohabit with men and boyfriends with the knowledge of their fathers, who cannot even reprimand them, lest they leave home! Let alone the daughters of "Muslims!" who have taken up cheap prostitution, as in Central European countries! As for other European customs, holidays, occasions, and ways of life regarding food, drink, and dress, you can find no difference between the disbelievers and those who, if you ask them about their religion, will enthusiastically reply that they are "Muslims!!" This is the state of the overwhelming majority. I tried to imagine the number of worshippers in some of the countries I lived in, based on the total number who attend Friday prayers (most of whom do not pray the five daily prayers), and I found it to be a small percentage of the total Muslim communities. Perhaps I would not be mistaken if I said that the percentage of those who pray Friday prayers does not exceed 1% or 2% of the total, at best!

As for the circles of the committed, the attendees of mosques and Islamic centers, one can understand their ideas and conditions by following some satellite channels that cover their news, such as (Iqra Channel) and others. The summary of what I found is that these people have created for themselves a European-American religion under the pretext of necessities, dispensations, moderation, winning hearts, and being gentle with Muslims to call them to Islām. I can testify – with knowledge – quite simply that what remains in their new Western Islamic religion of the religion of Muḥammad (peace and blessings be upon him) is a modest amount of creedal principles and some acts of worship and customs. Most of the activities of these centers and mosques are confined to providing (ḥalāl) meat, arranging Friday prayers, Islamic marriage contracts, matters of the deceased and funerals, holding lectures, and some celebrations and occasions for which they have found Western Islamic methods compatible with claims of moderation, centrism, and non-extremism! This is for this minority clinging to their religion in those communities whose majority of members have – practically and realistically – apostatized, and there is no might nor power except with Allāh, the Most High, the Most Great.

Distorted, deviant ideas have spread among those they call "Islamic thinkers!!" and some who are attributed to scholars in the West, concerning interfaith dialogue, religious tolerance, dialogue of civilizations, Islamic-Christian dialogue, and what they call dialogue with the "other"!!, and refuting the accusation of terrorism from the religion. "Islamic" ideas and fatwās of extreme heresy and deviation have spread, requiring a separate study to investigate and refute them. One example of these oddities is what I heard from some of those they call Muslim thinkers, with their plucked or shaved beards, white caps, and (cravats) – the tie of humiliation or (the halter of civilization!) as one of our shaykhs called it. They said: The rising of the sun from the West before the Day of Judgment means the Islām of Europeans and Americans from the West, which is the rising of the sun of Islām in its West! Where Americans and the West will carry the call of Islām and come to our lands as conquerors with Islām (which "rose in the West")! Because they possess military power, and they will possess the banner of Islām! This is similar to what happened with the Tatars who came to us as conquerors then embraced Islām, and (Tamerlane) and his descendants from the Muslim Tatars returned and conquered our lands and others with Islām!

You can imagine how much distortion, triviality, and disregard for the explicit details of Prophetic Ḥadīths, their explanations, and their detailed sensory evidence in authentic Ḥadīths are contained in this contrived nonsense. This is not to mention what these opinions indicate of ignorance of history and the state of disbelief of those Tatars – whom they cite as evidence – after their claim of Islām and their corruption in the land, and the Jihād of our Muslim ancestors against them.

But this is the state of minds when they are inverted, fall, and are debased from the heads of their owners, to babble these inanities. As for the political sycophancy today, speak of it and there is no end. From the call for integration into Western societies, joining their political parties, forming lobbying groups to pressure governments, and conforming to prevailing social customs, and other such religious calamities.

With the exception of a very small minority of Islamists and Jihādīs fleeing with their religion from their countries and forced to seek refuge through political asylum in some Western countries – a rare minority living in compounded alienation (may Allāh grant them patience) – the alienation of religion and homeland, alienation among disbelievers, and alienation among those Muslims whose condition we have described. Most of those Islamic circles, including imams and Islamic centers, view these young men with suspicion, apprehension, and disapproval of their conduct and beliefs, to the extent that some expel them from mosques and prevent them from entering, fearing the spread of the "infection" of their righteousness to the corruption of the corrupt and the complacent. With the exception of this rare minority, the conditions of the communities are as I have briefly described.

I have many stories and testimonies of strange, wondrous, and painful incidents that I witnessed myself, not to mention what I heard from trustworthy sources about the conditions of Muslims, their ways of life, and the religion of the imams of their mosques and the directors of their "Islamic!" centers. There is no space for them here, and I leave their mention for a treatise related to this important topic, if Allāh facilitates it.

However, since the contemporary Crusader campaigns began in 1990, and with them what was called the global war on terrorism, the conditions of Muslims in the West began to take another dimension, reaching its peak today after the events of September 2001, after the occupation of Iraq, and America and its allies' announcement of their projects in the Greater Middle East! And the explicit launching of their Crusader campaigns.

A wave of racist practices and campaigns against Muslims began to spread among Western populations in Europe, America, and elsewhere. This manifested in attacks on mosques and Islamic centers by burning and bombing, and in aggression against Muslims, their children, and their women, especially those distinguished by the ḥijāb. The matter was not limited to attacks by fanatics and racists, who are very numerous and increasing, as a result of the state of war and what the mujāhidīn are doing in their war. But aggression against Muslims now extends to being the policy of Western governments themselves. All Western countries have enacted new legislation restricting Muslims under the pretext of combating extremism and terrorism. A law was passed to ban the ḥijāb in France, and similar measures are being considered in other countries. Laws were issued to monitor mosque sermons and expel preachers who do not comply with arbitrary government directives. Most worshippers, especially the youth, were placed under surveillance and in the circle of suspicion, and many were summoned for investigations. Intelligence agencies recruited thousands of spies among mosque attendees. This is in Europe. As for America, the arbitrary measures are severe and aggressive, where hatred is mixed with security procedures. This news is repeated daily in the media today, making elaboration unnecessary.

However, it is worth noting and emphasizing that these conditions and pressures are now pushing many Muslims residing in the West to commit forbidden acts and to utter statements that threaten their religion and creed in order to ward off the accusation – the accusation of terrorism and extremism – from themselves, and to demonstrate their distance from their religion, such as abandoning the ḥijāb or attending mosques, or openly stating their religion or belief. Some have even resorted to openly committing sins and forbidden acts for the same purpose. More egregious than all this is what the imams of Muslims, directors of centers, and heads of Islamic communities are doing in terms of dangerous concessions due to these pressures. It has reached the point of showing explicit loyalty to disbelievers and explicit disavowal of believers, especially the mujāhidīn in the path of Allāh, even cursing and reviling them openly in the media. This is not to mention issuing misleading fatwās and opinions that contradict the requirements of religion and the fundamentals of creed. Whoever follows the media will encounter such statements and practices that make one blush with shame.

If you look at the reasons for this, you will see very clearly that the summary of the reasons is the adherence of those "Muslims!" to their residence in the lands of disbelievers for the sake of the worldly benefits they obtain, for which they sacrifice their religion and the religion of their offspring, most of whom become disbelievers over time. This residence was originally forbidden even before these pressures and this aggression from the disbelievers, the inhabitants of those lands, befell them. So what about after these unjust campaigns?

But the truth is that most of those people have become content with the worldly life there and are at ease with it.

Before concluding this section, we must remind those Muslims and draw their attention to two matters of utmost importance:

First: Everyone in whose heart there is concern for his religion and for obedience to Allāh and His Messenger should know the Sharīʿah ruling concerning their situation, which is the prohibition of residence in the lands of disbelief and disbelievers for anyone not compelled by necessity, and the obligation to return to his country (Muslim lands) despite the injustice, poverty, and other difficulties therein, if there is no danger to him from the rulers of his country. If there is, then he must seek refuge in Muslim lands. Emigration from the land of disbelief to the land of Islām is obligatory if it exists. If it does not exist, then to Muslim lands where he feels safe for his religion, honor, self, and property, and he must seek the best, then the next best, and the least corrupt, then the next least corrupt. As for worldly life, wealth, and sustenance, Allāh Almighty has guaranteed them. Work, trade, and seeking a comfortable life are not excuses for remaining in the lands of disbelievers, especially when conditions have deteriorated to this extent.

It is not permissible to remain in the West or other lands of disbelief except under duress for one who is overcome and finds no other recourse, or for a legitimate Sharīʿah interest, such as Jihād against the disbelievers in their lands to repel them from Muslim lands, which is an individual obligation (farḍ ʿayn) on every Muslim, as we explained earlier in the first chapter of this section. It is also permissible for scholars or callers to Allāh whom Muslims there need to remain, provided that it does not harm them or their families in their religion, that they are able to call to Allāh freely, and that they do not engage in the hypocrisy that has spread in those circles out of desire for or fear of the disbelievers and their lackeys. And Allāh is the Watcher over hearts and intentions.

Second: We draw the attention of Muslims in Western lands and other countries at war with Muslims and allied with America in its invasion of our lands, that the war has begun and will be prolonged, and it is intensifying. The vanguards of the mujāhidīn and resisters have begun to confront America and its allies, both in our lands and in theirs. This situation, which will naturally escalate, will lead to the disbelievers taking revenge on them and increasing pressure on them. I do not think any sane person would demand that the mujāhidīn in the path of Allāh abandon their Jihād against the enemies of Allāh who occupy our lands, slaughter our children, women, and men, plunder our wealth, and subject us to all forms of torment, for the sake of preserving the interests of herds of Muslims who have chosen to live among the feet of disbelievers and polytheists and under their heels for the sake of their worldly life and their existence amidst that filth, causing many of them to apostatize, while most of those remaining are sinners! So, the obligation (of Jihād) should not be abandoned for the sake of these people, the overwhelming majority of whom are disobedient to their Lord, turning away from the clear and explicit commands and warnings of their Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) regarding his disavowal of them if they reside in the lands of disbelievers.

Those who have assumed religious leadership for these communities must explain these rulings and their details to the Muslims around them. And the scholars of Islām must declare to them the ruling on their residence and its consequences, especially now that the Crusader wars have convened and flared up with all clarity.

13. Prohibition of Mutilation, Disfigurement, and Dealing with the Corpses of Polytheists

Islām is a religion that rises above baseness, despicable acts, and petty grudges that manifest in taking revenge on the bodies of the dead. Even the custodians of Jāhiliyyah (pre-Islamic ignorance) refrained from this act, and if it occurred from their juniors, they would disavow it.

Mutilation (muthlah) is the disfigurement of a corpse, such as cutting off the limbs of the slain, gouging out an eye, or cutting off an ear, nose, or any other limb.

Jurists have differed regarding mutilation, holding two opinions:

1. The first opinion: The view of the Ḥanafīs and Ḥanbalīs, who do not permit mutilation initially but allow it if it is by way of retribution and reciprocal treatment.
2. The second opinion: The view of the Shāfi'īs and Mālikīs, who deem mutilation disliked (makrūh), whether initiated or as reciprocal treatment.
(End of quote from Al-Dhakhā'ir, vol. 1, p. 167).

Shaykh 'Abd Allāh 'Azzām (may Allāh have mercy on him) said:

Among the etiquettes of Jihād is the burial of the corpses of the slain polytheists. If they wish to take them and pay a price, it is better not to take the price. The Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) cast the bodies of the Quraysh leaders into the well (al-Qalīb) on the day of Badr, and he had trenches dug for Banū Qurayẓah when they were killed. Ibn Ishāq mentioned in al-Maghāzī that the polytheists asked the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) to sell them the body of Nawfal ibn 'Abd Allāh ibn al-Mughīrah, who had stormed the trench. The Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) said: "We have no need for his price nor his body."

We prefer the view of the Shāfi'īs and Mālikīs, which prohibits mutilation because it aligns with the general principles of Islām and is consistent with the spirit that pervades the teachings of this religion. (End of quote from Al-Dhakhā'ir, vol. 1, p. 169).

14. The Pledge of Allegiance in War

Shaykh ‘Abd Allāh [‘Azzām] (may Allāh have mercy on him) said:

1. It is narrated from Ibn ‘Umar (may Allāh be pleased with them both) who said: "We returned the following year, and no two of us could agree on the tree under which we had pledged allegiance. It was a mercy from Allāh. He was asked: For what did he take their pledge? For death? He said: No, he took their pledge for patience." (Narrated by al-Bukhārī).

The pledge of allegiance (bay‘ah) in war is a Sunnah transmitted from the Chosen One (peace and blessings be upon him) to steady hearts and remind them of a covenant they made with themselves before the battle.

"The tree under which we pledged allegiance": The tree under which the Pledge of Ridwān took place in the year 6 AH. In the following year, 7 AH, no two of us knew the location of the tree. This was a mercy from Allāh so that the tree would not become something sacred, leading to the spread of innovations and superstitions through its existence, and so that people would not come to seek blessings from it. The Ḥadīth of Jābir in Muslim states: "We pledged that we would not flee, and we did not pledge to him for death."

The tree was a Samurah tree, one of the desert trees. Its location became hidden from the Companions in the year following al-Ḥudaybiyah, for fear of fitnah (tribulation).

1. It is narrated from ‘Abd Allāh ibn Zayd (may Allāh be pleased with him) who said: "During the time of al-Ḥarrah, someone came to him and said: Ibn Ḥanḏalah is taking a pledge from the people for death. He said: I will not pledge for this to anyone after the Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him)." (Narrated by al-Bukhārī).

Al-Ḥarrah: A battle that took place in Madīnah in the year 63 AH. It was named al-Ḥarrah because the cavalry of Yazīd stormed the Ḥarrah (a volcanic tract), which was the first time cavalry had breached the stony ground of the Ḥarrah. The Ḥarrah is an area of black stones surrounding Madīnah from its east (Ḥarrah Wāqim) and from its west (Ḥarrah al-Wabarah), hence it is said "between its two Ḥarrahs" or "its two lābahs," referring to these two Ḥarrahs. When Yazīd's army violated Madīnah, the Companion ‘Abd Allāh ibn Ḥanḍalah began taking a pledge from the people for death to fight Yazīd after revoking his pledge of allegiance.

2. It is narrated from Salamah ibn al-Akwa‘ (may Allāh be pleased with him) who said: "I pledged allegiance to the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him), then I moved to the shade of a tree. When the crowd thinned, he said: 'O Ibn al-Akwa‘, will you not pledge allegiance?' I said: 'I have already pledged allegiance, O Messenger of Allāh.' He said: 'And also (again).' So I pledged allegiance to him a second time. He was asked: 'For what were you pledging allegiance on that day?' He said: 'For death.'"

The Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) used to select some of his companions whom he prepared for future tasks and then take special covenants from them by which they were distinguished from the rest of the Companions. Just as he took from Thawbān, Abū Bakr, and a group of Companions a pledge "not to ask people for anything," so much so that if one of them dropped his whip from his hand, he would not ask anyone to hand it to him.

The pledge is always for righteousness and piety, because it is a covenant to cooperate in righteousness and piety. It is not permissible to pledge for sin and aggression, such as those who make a special covenant and then, after a period, the one who pledged is asked to do deeds that Allāh does not approve of and the Sharī‘ah does not endorse, like boycotting so-and-so, spying on so-and-so, and tracking the faults of others.

It is permissible for a Muslim to give several pledges to several people. He may give a shaykh a pledge to engage in Jihād with him, and to others a pledge to receive knowledge at their hands and be educated by them. There is no contradiction between these pledges. It is not permissible for anyone to impose his obedience in everything on someone who has covenanted for something specific, nor is it permissible for anyone to use his pledge to prevent the one who pledged from doing a righteous act stipulated in the Book and the Sunnah, such as Jihād in the path of Allāh, for example, because the pledge then turns into a pledge for sin. "Obedience is only in what is right (ma'rūf)" and "There is no obedience to a creature in disobedience to the Creator." (End of quote from Al-Dhakhā'ir, vol. 1, p. 263).

15. Rulings Pertaining to the Martyr

In the section "The Martyr and His Rulings" from Shaykh 'Abd Allāh 'Azzām's (may Allāh have mercy on him) encyclopedia Al-Dhakhā'ir, there are useful details from which we briefly transmit the following:

Reason for being called a Shahīd (Martyr):

Al-Azharī said: "Because Allāh Almighty and His Messenger (peace and blessings be upon him) testified that he is in Paradise."

It was said: The Shahīd is "the living one," so they were named thus because they are alive with their Lord. And it was said: because the angels of mercy witness him and take his soul. And it was said: because he is witnessed to have faith and a good end by his outward state. And it was said: because his soul witnesses the Abode of Peace {at the time of his death}, while the soul of another does not witness it until the Day of Resurrection.

Definition of a Shahīd:

- According to the Shāfi'īs: "The martyr who is not washed nor prayed over is one who died due to fighting disbelievers while the fighting was ongoing, whether killed by a disbeliever, struck by a Muslim's weapon by mistake, his own weapon turned back on him, he fell from his horse, his mount kicked him and he died, he was trampled by the mounts of Muslims or others, he was struck by an arrow and it is unknown whether it was shot by a Muslim or a disbeliever, or he was found slain when the battle ended and the cause of his death was unknown, and whether there was a trace of blood on him or not. And whether he died instantly, or lingered for some time then died from that cause after the war ended, and whether he ate, drank, and made a will, or did none of that. All of this is agreed upon among us, as stated by al-Shāfi'ī."

- According to the Ḥanafīs: "The martyr is every accountable, Muslim, pure person who was killed unjustly by a weapon, and whose death itself did not necessitate a financial liability, and who did not linger (irtaththa)."

Conditions for Martyrdom:

1. That the fighting be in the path of Allāh: "Whoever fights so that the word of Allāh is supreme is in the path of Allāh." (Agreed upon). This is a definitive criterion: everyone whose intention was to support Islām and was then killed is a martyr, otherwise not.
2. Patience (ṣabr): "If you are killed while patient, seeking reward, advancing, and not retreating, Allāh will expiate your sins except for debt." (Narrated by Muslim). The patient one is he who advances towards the enemy with fortitude and a steadfast heart, and it does not harm him to feel pain in his heart and aversion to death and separation from family. Patience in worship means performing it with its conditions.
3. Advancing, not retreating.
4. Absence of Ghulūl (pilfering from spoils): "And whoever defrauds [will bring forth] what he defrauded on the Day of Resurrection," (Qur'ān, Āl 'Imrān: 161) carrying his ill-gotten gains on his back. Ghulūl is theft from the spoils before distribution. In al-Bukhārī: It is narrated from ‘Abd Allāh ibn ‘Umar (may Allāh be pleased with them both): "There was a man in charge of the Prophet's (peace and blessings be upon him) baggage, named Karkarah, who died. The Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) said: "He is in the Fire." They went to look and found a cloak he had pilfered."

The Effect of Debt on Martyrdom and Expiation of Sins:

Debt does not affect martyrdom status, but the expiation of all sins may be affected by debt. Al-Nawawī said: "'Except for debt' ... this draws attention to all rights of human beings. Only the rights of Allāh Almighty are expiated."

Similarly, Ibn ‘Abd al-Barr said this. Al-Qurṭubī mentioned a condition for debt preventing the forgiveness of sins, which is: "If he refrains from fulfilling the rights while being able to do so..." However, if he was unable to repay the debt despite trying, it is hoped from Allāh Almighty's generosity – if his intention was sincere and his purpose sound – that Allāh Almighty will satisfy his creditors on his behalf as He wills, until he enters Paradise.

Such are the rights of human beings. As for the rights of Allāh Almighty, it appears that they are all forgiven through martyrdom. In al-Nawādir, it is mentioned that the stern warnings regarding debt are all abrogated except for one who incurs debt through extravagance or corruption, and the like, according to Ibn Shihāb. This is the view of the Mālikīs.

Washing the Martyr:

The Four Imams agreed that the martyr is not washed. This is the opinion of the generality of scholars. Only al-Ḥasan, Sa‘īd ibn al-Musayyib, and Ibn Surayj al-Shāfi‘ī differed on this ruling, saying that the martyr should be washed. They argued that: no one dies except in a state of janābah (major ritual impurity), and one in janābah must be washed.

The majority argued with the Ḥadīth of Jābir: "The Messenger of Allāh (peace and blessings be upon him) ordered the martyrs of Uḥud to be buried in their blood; they were not washed, nor was prayer offered for them." And Aḥmad narrated that the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) said concerning the slain of Uḥud: "Do not wash them, for every wound or every drop of blood will exude musk on the Day of Resurrection," and he did not pray over them.

The opinion of the majority is more preponderant due to the authentic evidence, which almost reaches the level of tawātur (mass narration).

Prayer for the Martyr:

Scholars differed on praying over the martyr, holding two opinions:

The first – which is the opinion of the majority – is that he is not prayed over. This is the view of Mālik, al-Shāfiʿī, and the majority of Ḥanbalīs.

The second – which is the opinion of the Ḥanafīs, al-Thawrī, and a narration from Aḥmad – is that he is prayed over. This is also the view of al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī and Saʿīd ibn al-Musayyib.

Can one say, "So-and-so is a martyr"?

When we say that so-and-so is a martyr, it means we treat him with the worldly rulings of martyrs regarding not washing him and not praying over him. However, we do not testify for anyone that they are in Paradise or Hell, because hearts are in Allāh's hand, and to Him belongs the unseen of the heavens and the earth, and to Him all matters return.

This is what authors of Sīrah (biographies of the Prophet), Maghāzī (accounts of battles), and Islamic battles have followed, saying: the martyrs of Uḥud, Ḥunayn, al-Yarmūk, al-Qādisiyyah...

Categories of Martyrs:

1. Martyr of this world and the Hereafter: The Muslim killed in battle against disbelievers while fighting for the supremacy of Allāh's word.
2. Martyr of this world: The Muslim who fights in battle against disbelievers but fights out of partisanship or for show. (This person is treated with the rulings of a martyr by people).
3. Martyr of the Hereafter: One who receives the reward of martyrdom but is not treated with the worldly rulings of a martyr. He is washed, shrouded, and prayed over, such as one who dies on the path of emigration (hijrah) or Jihād, one who dies of an abdominal disease (mabṭūn), or one who drowns (gharīq).

Types of Martyrs:

(One who drowns, one who dies in a fire, a stranger who dies, one crushed under a collapsed building, one who dies of an abdominal disease, one who dies of plague (maṭ'ūn), a woman who dies in childbirth (nufasā'), one who dies on Friday night, one who dies of pleurisy (dhāt al-janb), one who dies seeking knowledge, a pregnant woman, one who dies of tuberculosis (sill), one who dies from epilepsy or fever, one who dies defending his property or life, one killed by a predatory animal, one imprisoned by a tyrant, one killed by beating, one who dies in hiding (from a tyrant), or one bitten by a venomous creature, the muezzin who seeks reward, the truthful merchant, one who vomits at sea, a woman who dies patiently enduring jealousy, one who prays Ḍuḥā, fasts three days each month, and never misses Witr prayer whether traveling or resident, one who adheres to his Sunnah (peace and blessings be upon him), one who says in his illness forty times "There is no god but You; exalted are You! Indeed, I have been of the wrongdoers," one who dies guarding the frontier (murābiṭ), one who recites Sūrah Yāsīn every night, one who falls from his mount and dies, one who sincerely seeks martyrdom, one who dies on a Friday, one who brings food to a city from other cities, one who bathes with snow and dies).

It is mentioned in Awjaz al-Masālik ilā Muwaṭṭa' al-Imām Mālik (4/267): "Al-Ḥāfiẓ mentioned in 27 of them that their chains are sound." "So, whoever has many reasons for his martyrdom, his bliss is increased."

Al-Murthath (The Fatally Wounded Who Lingers):

This is one who is carried wounded (rathīth) from the battlefield while still having a spark of life (ramaq). The jurists have agreed that the murthath is not treated with the rulings of a martyr, as the Messenger of Allāh did with Sa'd ibn Mu'adh, whom he washed and prayed over, and as the Companions did with 'Umar (may Allāh be pleased with him).

Jurists almost agree that the murthath is one who is carried wounded from the battlefield and performs actions of the living, such as eating, writing a will, or a prayer time passes while he is conscious and able to perform it. However, if he does this while the battle is ongoing and he is on the battlefield, he is not considered murthath.

As for one whose wounds are fatal (manfūdh al-maqātil), meaning his wound is deep and deadly with no hope of recovery, he is treated like a martyr even if he eats and makes a will. Likewise, one who is transported unconscious (maghmūr) is treated like a martyr even if he remains so for days. So, the conditions for being a murthath are:

1. To be transported wounded from the battlefield.
2. To perform actions of the living, such as eating, selling, or writing a will.
3. That his wound is not fatal.
4. That he is not unconscious (maghmūr).
5. If these four conditions are not met, he is treated with the rulings of a martyr.

(End of quote from Al-Dhakhā'ir, vol. 1, p. 314).

I say after these Jihādī juristic selections:

In general, a mujāhid must have a general foundation of Sharī‘ah knowledge. For this purpose, I advise him to study some books – under the supervision of a guide if available – to acquire an initial Islamic Sharī‘ah literacy in the following:

- A book on creed (‘aqīdah), and I recommend Al-‘Aqīdah al-Ṭaḥāwīyyah by Imām Ibn Abī al-‘Izz al-Ḥanafī.
- A book on Qur’ānic exegesis (tafsīr), such as Tafsīr Ibn Kathīr, and I recommend adding to it Fī Zilāl al-Qur’ān by Sayyid Quṭb (may Allāh have mercy on him).
- A concise book on noble Ḥadīth, such as Riyāḍ al-Ṣāliḥīn.
- A concise book on Prophetic biography (Sīrah Nabawīyyah), and I recommend Al-Raḥīq al-Makhtūm.
- A concise book on the principles of jurisprudence (uṣūl al-fiqh).
- A concise book on Ḥadīth terminology (muṣṭalaḥ al-ḥadīth).
- A book on the jurisprudence of worship (fiqh al-‘ibādāt). I recommend it be according to one of the four schools of thought (madhhabs), especially those known in his place of residence.
- A book on matters of the heart and spiritual conduct (raqā’iq wa al-sulūk). I recommend Ṣīfat al-Ṣafwah and Al-Targhīb wa al-Tarhīb.
- Kitāb al-Adhkār by al-Nawawī.
- A book on Sharī‘ah-based governance (siyāsah shar‘īyyah), such as Al-Aḥkām al-Sulṭāniyyah by Abū Ya‘lā al-Farrā’.

- I also recommend acquiring and reading Zād al-Ma‘ād by Imām Ibn al-Qayyim, as it is a comprehensive book on the guidance of the Messenger (peace and blessings be upon him).

The Second Domain in Education: Etiquette, Worship, Morals, and Heart-Softening Narrations

General Etiquette

Ibn al-Qayyim, may Allāh have mercy on him, said:

Allāh the Exalted said: {O you who have believed, protect yourselves and your families from a Fire whose fuel is people and stones, over which are [appointed] angels, harsh and severe; they do not disobey Allāh in what He commands them but do what they are commanded} (Al-Taḥrīm: 6).

Ibn ‘Abbās and others said: Discipline them and teach them. This word implies congregation. Thus, adab (etiquette) is the congregation of good qualities in a servant. From it is ma’dubah (banquet), which is the food around which people gather. The science of adab is the science of rectifying the tongue and speech, using them appropriately, beautifying its expressions, and safeguarding it from error and flaw. It is a branch of general adab, and Allāh knows best.

Etiquette is of three types: etiquette with Allāh, Glorified is He; etiquette with His Messenger and His Sharī‘ah; and etiquette with His creation.

First: Etiquette with Allāh is of three types:

One: Safeguarding one's dealings with Him from being tainted by any deficiency.

Second: Safeguarding one's heart from turning to anyone other than Him.

Third: Safeguarding one's will from becoming attached to what He detests.

Abū ‘Alī al-Daqqāq said: "The servant reaches Paradise through obedience to Allāh, and he reaches Allāh through his etiquette in his obedience." He also said: "I saw someone who wanted to extend his hand to his nose during prayer, so he restrained his hand." Ibn ‘Aṭā’ said: "Etiquette is to adhere to what is praiseworthy." He was asked, "What does that mean?" He replied, "That you deal with Him, Glorified is He, with etiquette secretly and openly." Then he recited:

If she speaks, she brings forth every charm... And if she is silent, she brings forth every beauty.

Ibn al-Mubārak said: "We are in greater need of a little etiquette than of much knowledge." Al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī, may Allāh have mercy on him, was asked about the most beneficial etiquette, and he said: "Understanding the religion, asceticism in the world, and knowing what Allāh requires of you."

Sahl said: "The people sought Allāh's help for Allāh's will and were patient for Allāh's sake regarding the etiquettes of Allāh." Ibn al-Mubārak said: "We sought etiquette when we missed those who could teach it." Abū Ḥafṣ, when al-Junayd said to him, "You have disciplined your companions with the etiquette of kings," replied: "Good etiquette in outward appearance is a sign of good etiquette in inward disposition. Etiquette with Allāh is good companionship with Him by performing outward and inward actions according to the requirements of veneration, glorification, and modesty, like the state of those who sit with kings and accompany them." Abū Naṣr al-Sarrāj said: "People are of three levels regarding etiquette. As for the people of this world, their greatest etiquette lies in eloquence, rhetoric, memorizing sciences, stories of kings, and Arab poetry. As for the people of religion, their greatest etiquette lies in disciplining the souls, training the limbs, observing the limits, and abandoning desires. As for the people of exclusivity, their greatest etiquette lies in purifying the hearts, observing secrets, fulfilling covenants, preserving time, paying little attention to distracting thoughts, and good etiquette in the stations of seeking, times of presence, and stations of closeness." Sahl said: "Whoever disciplines his soul with etiquette worships Allāh with sincerity." ‘Abd Allāh ibn al-Mubārak said: "People have said much about etiquette, and we say it is knowledge of the self and its deficiencies, and avoiding those deficiencies."

Abū ‘Uthmān said: "If love is sound, adherence to etiquette becomes confirmed for the lover."

Therefore, the perfection of this character was only for the Messengers and Prophets, may Allāh's peace and blessings be upon them. From this, the Prophet ordered a man to cover his private parts even if he was alone and no one saw him, as etiquette with Allāh, according to the closeness to Him, His veneration, His glorification, intense modesty before Him, and knowledge of His dignity. Some of them said: Adhere to etiquette outwardly and inwardly, for no one misbehaves outwardly except that he is punished outwardly, and no one misbehaves inwardly except that he is punished inwardly. ‘Abd Allāh ibn al-Mubārak, may Allāh have mercy on him, said: "Whoever takes etiquette lightly will be punished by deprivation of the Sunnahs. Whoever takes the Sunnahs lightly will be punished by deprivation of the obligatory acts. And whoever takes the obligatory acts lightly will be punished by deprivation of knowledge." The reality of etiquette is the application of beautiful character. Therefore, etiquette is to bring out the perfection inherent in nature from potentiality to actuality. For Allāh, Glorified is He, prepared man to accept perfection by what He gave him of capacity and readiness. Allāh the Exalted said: *{And [by] the soul and He who proportioned it * And inspired it [with] its wickedness and its righteousness, * He has succeeded who purifies it, * And he has failed who instills it [with corruption]}* (Al-Shams: 7-10). He expressed the creation of the soul with proportion, indicating moderation and completeness, then informed of its acceptance of wickedness and righteousness, and that this reached it from Him as a trial and test. Then He specified success for the one who purifies it, develops it, elevates it, and raises it with His etiquettes with which He disciplined His Messengers, Prophets, and allies, which is piety. Then He decreed misery for the one who instills it with corruption, hides it, belittles it, diminishes it, and suppresses it with wickedness. And Allāh, Glorified and Exalted is He, knows best.

The point is that etiquette with Allāh, Blessed and Exalted is He, is to uphold His religion and to be disciplined by His etiquettes outwardly and inwardly. Etiquette with Allāh is never upright for anyone except through three things: knowledge of His names and attributes; knowledge of His religion and Sharīʿah, and what He loves and what He hates; and a soul that is prepared, receptive, pliable, and ready to accept the truth in knowledge, action, and state. And Allāh is the one whose help is sought.

Second: As for etiquette with the Messenger, peace and blessings be upon him, the Qurʾān is full of it:

The head of etiquette with him is complete submission to him, obedience to his command, and receiving his reports with acceptance and affirmation, without subjecting them to the opposition of a false imagination called "reason," or subjecting them to doubt or suspicion, or preferring the opinions of men and the dregs of their minds over them. Thus, he is singled out for judgment, submission, obedience, and compliance, just as the Sender, Glorified and Exalted is He, is singled out for worship, submission, humility, repentance, and reliance. These are two aspects of Tawhīd, without which the servant cannot be saved from Allāh's punishment: the Tawhīd of the Sender and the Tawhīd of following the Messenger. So, one does not seek judgment from other than him, nor is one satisfied with the judgment of other than him, nor does one suspend the execution of his command and the affirmation of his report pending its presentation to the saying of his shaykh, his imām, those of his school of thought, his group, or those whom he venerates.

Part of etiquette with the Messenger is not to precede him with any command, prohibition, permission, or action until he commands, prohibits, and permits, as Allāh the Exalted said: {O you who have believed, do not put [yourselves] before Allāh and His Messenger} (Al-Ḥujurāt: 1). This remains until the Day of Resurrection and has not been abrogated. Preceding his Sunnah after his death is like preceding him during his life; there is no difference between them for one with a sound mind. Mujāhid, may Allāh have mercy on him, said: Do not innovate against the Messenger of Allāh. Abū 'Ubaydah said: The Arabs say, "Do not precede the imām and do not precede the father," meaning, do not hasten with command and prohibition before him. Others said: Do not command until he commands, and do not prohibit until he prohibits. Part of etiquette with him is not to raise voices above his voice, for that is a cause for the nullification of deeds. So, what is the thought of raising opinions and the results of thoughts above his Sunnah and what he brought? Do you think that is a cause for the acceptance of deeds, while raising the voice above his voice is a cause for their nullification?

Part of etiquette with him is not to find his saying problematic; rather, opinions should be considered problematic in relation to his saying. His text should not be opposed by analogy; rather, analogies should be discarded and nullified for his texts. His words should not be distorted from their reality for an imagination that its proponents call "reasonable." Yes, it is unknown and isolated from correctness. The acceptance of what he brought should not be suspended pending the agreement of anyone. All of this is from a lack of etiquette with him, and it is the essence of audacity.

Third: Etiquette with the creation:

As for etiquette with the creation, it is to treat them, according to their different ranks, in a manner befitting them. For each rank, there is an etiquette. And within the ranks, there is a specific etiquette. With parents, there is a specific etiquette, and for the father among them, there is an etiquette that is more specific to him. With a scholar, there is another etiquette. With a ruler, there is an etiquette befitting him. With peers, he has an etiquette befitting them. With strangers, his etiquette is different from his etiquette with his companions and those he is familiar with. With a guest, his etiquette is different from his etiquette with his household. And for every situation, there is an etiquette. For eating, there are etiquettes; for drinking, there are etiquettes; for riding, entering, exiting, traveling, residing, and sleeping, there are etiquettes. For urinating, there are etiquettes; for speaking, there are etiquettes; and for silence and listening, there are etiquettes.

A person's etiquette is an indicator of his happiness and success, and his lack of etiquette is an indicator of his misery and ruin. The good of this world and the Hereafter is not attracted by anything like etiquette, nor is deprivation of them attracted by anything like lack of etiquette. Look at the etiquette with parents, how it saved its practitioner from being trapped in the cave when the rock sealed it upon them. And the lack of it with the mother – through interpretation and preoccupation with prayer – how its practitioner was tested by the demolition of his hermitage, people beating him, and accusing him of indecency. Contemplate the conditions of every miserable, deceived, and declining person, how you find that lack of etiquette is what led him to deprivation. Look at ‘Awf's lack of etiquette with Khālīd, how it deprived him of the spoils after he had cooled his hands. Look at the etiquette of al-Ṣiddīq, may Allāh be pleased with him, with the Prophet in prayer, that he should not step forward in front of him. He said: "It was not for the son of Abū Quḥāfah to step forward in front of the Messenger of Allāh." How this earned him his position and the leadership of the Ummah after him. So that stepping back, when he (the Prophet) had gestured to him to stay in his place, was a leap and a stride forward, with every step backward being stages forward in which the necks of riding camels would break. And Allāh knows best.

Among the important matters in the upbringing of the mujāhidīn and Muslim youth in general, is what Ibn al-Qayyim mentioned when he said, drawing from Manāzil al-Sā'irīn:

"Etiquette is preserving the limit between excess and negligence by knowing the harm of transgression."

This is one of the best definitions, for deviation to one of the two extremes of excess or negligence is a lack of etiquette. Etiquette is to stand in the middle between the two extremes, so one neither falls short of the limits of the Sharī'ah from their completeness, nor exceeds with them what has been made limits for it. Both are transgressions, and Allāh does not love the transgressors. Transgression is bad etiquette. Some of the Salaf said: "The religion of Allāh is between the one who is excessive in it and the one who is negligent of it." So, wasting etiquette through negligence is like one who did not complete the parts of ablution and did not fulfill the etiquettes of prayer that the Messenger of Allāh legislated and practiced, which are close to a hundred etiquettes, between obligatory and recommended. And wasting it through excess is like obsessive meticulousness in forming the intention, raising the voice with it, and loudly proclaiming the remembrances and supplications that were legislated to be done secretly, and prolonging what the Sunnah is to shorten and abbreviate, like the first tashahhud, and the salām whose abbreviation is Sunnah, and increasing the prolongation beyond what the Messenger of Allāh did, not according to what those who steal from prayer and peck at it imagine and desire. An example of this moderation concerning the Prophets, peace be upon them, is not to exaggerate about them as the Christians exaggerated about Christ, nor to be negligent of them as the Jews were negligent. The Christians worshipped them, and the Jews killed and belied them. The moderate nation believed in them, honored them, supported them, and followed what they brought. An example of this in the rights of creation is not to be excessive in fulfilling their rights, nor to be engrossed in them such that one is distracted by them from the rights of Allāh, or from completing them, or from the well-being of one's religion and heart. And not to be negligent of them until one neglects them entirely. For both extremes are harmful transgressions, and this is the limit. So, the reality of etiquette is justice, and Allāh knows best. This is an abridged statement from Ibn al-Qayyim's Madārij al-Sālikīn, in the section on etiquette.

Etiquettes of Familiarity, Brotherhood, Companionship, and Social Interaction with Various Types of People:

Imām al-Ghazālī, may Allāh have mercy on him, said:

Praise be to Allāh, who has showered His chosen servants with the subtleties of His special favor, out of bounty and grace. He united their hearts, so by His grace, they became brothers. He removed rancor from their breasts, so they remained friends and companions in this world, and comrades and intimates in the Hereafter. Peace and blessings be upon Muḥammad, the Chosen One, and upon his family and companions who followed him and emulated him in word, deed, justice, and excellence. Thereafter:

Loving one another for Allāh's sake and brotherhood in His religion are among the best acts of drawing near to Him and the most refined benefits derived from acts of obedience in the course of daily habits. It has conditions by which companions join the ranks of those who love each other for Allāh's sake. And it has rights, by observing which brotherhood is purified from the impurities of troubles and the instigations of Satan. By fulfilling its rights, one draws nearer to Allāh, and by preserving them, one attains high ranks. This insight is abridged from Madārij al-Sālikīn, the section on etiquette. We will explain the objectives of this book in three chapters: The first chapter is on the virtue of familiarity and brotherhood for Allāh's sake, its conditions, degrees, and benefits. The second chapter is on the rights of companionship, its etiquettes, its reality, and its requisites. The third chapter is on the right of a Muslim, kinship, neighborhood, and property, and how to interact with those afflicted by these circumstances.

Chapter One: On the Virtue of Familiarity and Brotherhood, and on its Conditions, Degrees, and Benefits

The Virtue of Familiarity and Brotherhood: Know that familiarity is the fruit of good character, and disunity is the fruit of bad character. Good character necessitates mutual love, familiarity, and harmony, while bad character yields mutual hatred, envy, and turning away from one another. Whenever the producer is praiseworthy, the fruit is praiseworthy. The virtue of good character in religion is not hidden; it is that with which Allāh, Glorified is He, praised His Prophet, peace be upon him, when He said: {And indeed, you are of a great moral character} (Al-Qalam: 4). The Prophet, peace and blessings be upon him, said: "The things that admit most people to Paradise are taqwā of Allāh and good character." Usāmah ibn Sharīk said: We said, "O Messenger of Allāh, what is the best thing a person has been given?" He said: "Good character." He, peace and blessings be upon him, also said: "I was sent to perfect noble characters." And he, peace and blessings be upon him, said: "The heaviest thing placed in the balance is good character." He, peace and blessings be upon him, said: "O Abū Hurayrah, adhere to good character." Abū Hurayrah, may Allāh be pleased with him, asked, "What is good character, O Messenger of Allāh?" He said: "You maintain ties with those who cut you off, you forgive those who wrong you, and you give to those who deprive you." It is not hidden that the fruit of good character is familiarity and the cessation of estrangement. Whenever the producer is good, the fruit is good. And how could it be otherwise, when praise for familiarity itself has been mentioned, especially if the bond is taqwā, religion, and the love of Allāh, in verses, narrations, and reports that are sufficient and convincing? Allāh the Exalted said, manifesting His great favor upon creation with the blessing of familiarity: {If you had spent all that is in the earth, you could not have brought their hearts together; but Allāh brought them together} (Al-Anfāl: 63). And He said: {And you became, by His favor, brothers} (Āl 'Imrān: 103), meaning, through familiarity. Then He condemned disunity and forbade it, saying, Glorious is the Speaker: {And hold firmly to the rope of Allāh all together and do not become divided. And remember the favor of Allāh upon you - when you were enemies and He brought your hearts together and you became, by His favor, brothers} (Āl 'Imrān: 103). The Prophet, peace and blessings be upon him, said: "Indeed, the closest of you to me in seating [on the Day of Resurrection] will be those of you with the best character, those who are approachable, who are familiar and are made familiar with." And he, peace and blessings be upon him, said in praise of brotherhood in religion: "Whoever Allāh wishes good for, He blesses him with a righteous companion; if he forgets, he reminds him, and if he remembers, he helps him."

Abū Idrīs al-Khawlānī said to Mu‘ādh: "I love you for the sake of Allāh." Mu‘ādh replied: "Rejoice, then rejoice! For I heard the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, say: "Seats will be set up for a group of people around the Throne on the Day of Resurrection. Their faces will be like the full moon. People will be terrified, but they will not be terrified. People will be afraid, but they will not be afraid. They are the allies of Allāh upon whom there will be no fear, nor will they grieve." It was asked, "Who are these, O Messenger of Allāh?" He said: "They are those who love each other for the sake of Allāh the Exalted." The Prophet, peace and blessings be upon him, also said: "Allāh the Exalted says: My love is due for those who visit one another for My sake, My love is due for those who love one another for My sake, My love is due for those who spend on one another for My sake, and My love is due for those who support one another for My sake." This is a Ḥadīth: "Indeed, Allāh says: My love is due for those who visit one another for My sake, and My love is due for those who love one another for My sake." He, peace and blessings be upon him, also said: "Allāh the Exalted will say on the Day of Resurrection: 'Where are those who loved each other for My glory? Today I will shade them in My shade, on a day when there is no shade but My shade.'" And he, peace and blessings be upon him, said: "Seven whom Allāh will shade in His shade on the Day when there is no shade but His shade: a just imām; a youth who grew up in the worship of Allāh; a man whose heart is attached to the mosque when he leaves it until he returns to it; two men who loved each other for Allāh's sake, meeting for it and parting for it; a man who remembered Allāh in private and his eyes welled up with tears; a man whom a woman of high status and beauty invited [to sin], but he said, 'I fear Allāh the Exalted'; and a man who gave charity and concealed it so that his left hand did not know what his right hand spent." This is the Ḥadīth of Abū Hurayrah: "Seven whom Allāh will shade in His shade on the Day when there is no shade but His shade: a just imām..." 'Īsā, peace be upon him, said: "Endear yourselves to Allāh by hating the people of disobedience, draw near to Allāh by distancing yourselves from them, and seek Allāh's pleasure through their displeasure." They said: "O Spirit of Allāh, with whom should we sit?" He said: "Sit with those whose sight reminds you of Allāh, whose speech increases you in good deeds, and whose actions make you desire the Hereafter." 'Alī, may Allāh be pleased with him, said: "Adhere to brothers, for they are a provision in this world and the Hereafter. Do you not hear the saying of the people of Hell: {So now we have no intercessors, Nor a devoted friend} (Al-Shu'arā': 100-101)?" 'Abd Allāh ibn 'Umar, may Allāh be pleased with them both, said: "By Allāh, if I were to fast the day without breaking it, stand the night in prayer without sleeping, and spend my wealth pile after pile in the way of Allāh, and then die on a day when there is no love in my heart for the people of Allāh's obedience and no hatred for the people of Allāh's disobedience, that would not benefit me at all." Al-Ḥasan, in contrast, said: "O son of Adam, do not be deceived by the saying of one who says, 'A man is with whom he loves,' for you will not join the righteous except by their deeds. Indeed, the Jews and Christians love their prophets, but they are not with them." This is an indication that merely loving without corresponding in some or all deeds is not beneficial. Al-Fuḍayl said in some of his words: "Here you are, wanting to dwell in Paradise and be near the Most Merciful in His abode with the Prophets, the truthful, the martyrs, and the righteous. By what deed have you earned it? By what desire have you forsaken? By what anger have you suppressed? By what severed kinship have you reconnected? By what fault of your brother have you forgiven? By what relative have you distanced for Allāh's sake? By what distant person have you drawn near for Allāh's sake?"

A man said to Muḥammad ibn Wāsi': "I love you for the sake of Allāh." He replied: "May He for Whose sake you loved me, love you." Then he turned his face and said:

"O Allāh, I seek refuge in You from being loved for Your sake while You are displeased with me."

Al-Fuḍayl said: "A man's looking at his brother's face with affection and mercy is an act of worship." This concludes the abridged extract from Imām al-Ghazālī's Ihyā' 'Ulūm al-Dīn.

From the Etiquettes of Jihād

In the book Al-Dhakhā'ir al-'Izām min Mu'allafāt al-Shaykh 'Abd Allāh 'Azzām (The Great Treasures from the Works of Shaykh 'Abd Allāh 'Azzām), regarding the matter of the etiquettes and rulings of combat, we extract the following:

Combat was legislated in Islām to spread the Islamic call, rescue humanity from disbelief, and transfer them from the darkness of this world to the light of the Hereafter. Therefore, combat in this true religion is to remove political, economic, and social obstacles before the Islamic call. Indeed, you can say that the function of Jihād (combat) is to demolish the barriers that prevent the spread of this religion throughout the world. If people accept this religion, there is no need to unsheathe a sword, shed blood, or destroy facilities and properties, because this religion came for reform and construction, not for destruction and ruin.

Killing and combat are a necessity imposed upon Muslims because they carry the banner of Tawhīd, and they are commanded to spread it over every hill and plain. Necessity is measured by its extent.

If we cannot call to Islām except by fighting political systems and existing authorities, we fight them because they stand between us and conveying the message to the people. If political power, wealthy individuals, and tribal gatherings stand before us, we are forced to confront them with weapons until they submit to this religion and open the way between us and the peoples whom we are commanded to rescue.

{And fight them until there is no fitnah and [until] the religion, all of it, is for Allāh. And if they cease, then indeed, Allāh is Seeing of what they do} (Al-Anfāl: 39).

So, combat is to remove fitnah and to crush the tyrants who enslave people to themselves instead of Allāh. If these tyrants surrender and incline to peace, there is no need to unsheathe weapons nor any necessity to kill people.

Therefore, Islām is primarily keen on saving people – even tyrants – from the Fire: from the fire of ignorance in this world and from the Hellfire of the Hereafter. That is why the Prophet, peace and blessings be upon him, said to ‘Alī when he handed him the banner on the day of Khaybar: "By Allāh, if Allāh guides one man through you, it is better for you than red camels." (Agreed upon).

Hence, combat in Islām is a necessity to rescue oppressed peoples and herds enslaved to human deities. These human deities must be brought down to the level of servitude, and the slaves must be rescued and liberated. If these human lords refuse to relinquish their high positions, their pride must be shattered, and they must be returned to their natural size, to the limit they transgressed unjustly and aggressively over seas of blood, skulls of the innocent, and the remains of martyrs.

From here, Islām teaches major principles and draws clear lines that are considered general rules in Jihād, the most important of which are: Combat is for spreading the Islamic call. Whoever does not stand in its way, it is not permissible to fight him.

Therefore:

- The call must be presented to people before fighting them.
- It is not permissible to fight them before conveying the call to them.
- It is not permissible to kill those who do not fight ({And fight them until there is no fitnah} - qātilūhum (fight them) is a form of mutual participation, meaning: those whom the Muslims fight must be combatants).

- It is not permissible to fight those who have no power or might, and from whom no fitnah is feared, such as children, women, the disabled, dhimmīs, monks, and those isolated from people.
- It is not permissible to destroy property, cut down trees, or burn houses except to the extent necessary to remove barriers before the call.
- It is not permissible after combat to mutilate (muthlah) or disfigure the dead.
- It is not permissible after surrender, dhimmah, and covenant to fight or betray as long as they fulfill their dhimmah and covenant.

{Excepted are those with whom you made a treaty among the polytheists and then they have not been deficient toward you in anything or supported anyone against you; so complete for them their treaty until their term [has ended]. Indeed, Allāh loves the righteous} (Al-Tawbah: 4). "Every traitor will have a banner on the Day of Resurrection." (Authentic Ḥadīth). This concludes the extract from Al-Dhakhā'ir, vol. 1, p. 285.

Main Guidelines in the Etiquettes of Jihād:

Abū Bakr, may Allāh be pleased with him, drew clear landmarks and distinct lines in the policy of dealing with disbelievers during Jihād. He advised Yazīd ibn Abī Sufyān when he bid him farewell, walking with him as he dispatched him to Syria, saying: "I have appointed you to test you and try you. If you do well, I will return you to your post and increase you. If you do poorly, I will dismiss you. So, fear Allāh, for He sees your inner self just as He sees your outward appearance. Indeed, the closest of people to Allāh are those most devoted to Him, and the nearest of people to Allāh are those who draw closest to Him through their actions. I have appointed you to Khālīd's post, so beware of the arrogance of ignorance, for Allāh detests it and detests its people. When you reach your troops, treat them well, initiate good with them, and promise it to them. When you admonish them, be brief, for much talk makes one part forget another. Rectify yourself, and people will be rectified for you. Perform the prayers at their times, completing their bowing and prostration, and with humility in them. When the messengers of your enemy come to you, honor them and shorten their stay, so they leave your camp ignorant of it. Do not delay them – and Allāh knows best – lest they see your weaknesses and learn your knowledge. Settle them in the wealthiest part of your camp, and prevent those under you from conversing with them. You be the one to handle their speech. Do not make your secret public, lest your affairs become confused. When you consult, speak truthfully for the truthfulness of the counsel. Do not withhold your information from the counselor, lest you be harmed by your own doing. Converse at night with your companions; news will come to you, and hidden matters will be revealed to you. Increase your guards and distribute them throughout your camp. Frequently surprise them at their posts, without their prior knowledge of you. Whoever you find negligent in his guard duty, discipline him well and punish him without excess. Rotate them during the night, and make the first watch longer than the last, for it is easier due to its proximity to daytime. Do not fear punishing the deserving, nor be unjust in it. Do not hasten to it, and do not neglect the people of your camp, lest you corrupt it. Do not spy on them, lest you expose them. Do not uncover people's secrets; be content with their outward appearances. Do not sit with the frivolous; sit with people of truthfulness and loyalty. Be truthful in encounter and do not be cowardly, lest people become cowardly. Avoid embezzlement, for it brings poverty and repels victory.

You will find peoples who have secluded themselves in hermitages; leave them to what they have secluded themselves for." This concludes the extract from Al-Dhakhā'ir, vol. 1, p. 175.

Worship and Supererogatory Acts

Prayer:

On the authority of Abū Hurayrah, who said: The Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, said: **"Ask me."* But they were hesitant to ask him. Then a man came and sat by his knees and said, "O Messenger of Allāh, what is Islām?" He said, "That you do not associate anything with Allāh, establish prayer, give Zakāh, and fast Ramaḍān." He said, "You have spoken the truth." He said, "O Messenger of Allāh, what is Īmān (faith)?" He said, "That you believe in Allāh, His angels, His Book, His meeting, His Messengers, and that you believe in the Resurrection, and that you believe in aḍ-ḡadar (Divine decree), all of it." He said, "You have spoken the truth." He said, "O Messenger of Allāh, what is Iḥsān (excellence)?" He said, "That you fear Allāh as if you see Him, for if you do not see Him, He indeed sees you." He said, "You have spoken the truth." He said, "O Messenger of Allāh, when will the Hour occur?" He said, "The one asked about it is no more knowledgeable than the asker. But I will tell you about its signs: when you see the woman give birth to her master, that is one of its signs. When you see the barefoot, naked, deaf, and dumb as kings of the earth, that is one of its signs. When you see the shepherds of livestock competing in constructing lofty buildings, that is one of its signs. In five [matters] of the unseen, none knows them except Allāh." Then he recited: {Indeed, Allāh [alone] has knowledge of the Hour and sends down the rain and knows what is in the wombs. And no soul perceives what it will earn tomorrow, and no soul perceives in what land it will die. Indeed, Allāh is Knowing and Acquainted} (Luqmān: 34). He said, Then the man stood up. The Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, said: "Bring him back to me." They searched for him but did not find him. The Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, said: "This was Jibrīl; he wanted you to learn when you did not ask." (Narrated by al-Bukhārī, Muslim, al-Nasā'ī, and Aḥmad).

On the authority of Ibn 'Umar, may Allāh be pleased with them both, who said: The Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, said: "Islām is built upon five [pillars]: the testimony that there is no god but Allāh and that Muḥammad is the Messenger of Allāh, establishing prayer, giving Zakāh, Ḥajj, and fasting Ramaḍān."

(Narrated by al-Bukhārī, Muslim, al-Tirmidhī, and Aḥmad in al-Musnad).

On the authority of Abū Mālik al-Ash‘arī, who said: The Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, said: "Purity is half of faith. ‘Al-ḥamdu Lillāh’ (praise be to Allāh) fills the scale. ‘Subḥān Allāh wal-ḥamdu Lillāh’ (glory be to Allāh and praise be to Allāh) fill – or fills – what is between the heavens and the earth. Prayer is light, charity is a proof, patience is illumination, and the Qur’ān is an argument for you or against you. Every person starts his day as a seller of his soul, either freeing it or ruining it." (Narrated by Muslim, al-Tirmidhī, Ibn Mājah, and Aḥmad).

Abū ‘Amr al-Shaybānī said: The owner of this house – and he pointed to the house of ‘Abd Allāh – narrated to us, saying: "I asked the Prophet, peace and blessings be upon him: ‘Which deed is most beloved to Allāh?’ He said, ‘Prayer at its proper time.’ I said, ‘Then which?’ He said, ‘Then kindness to parents.’ I said, ‘Then which?’ He said, ‘Jihād in the way of Allāh.’ He said, ‘He narrated these to me, and if I had asked him for more, he would have told me more.'" (Narrated by al-Bukhārī, Muslim, al-Tirmidhī, al-Nasā’ī, and Aḥmad).

On the authority of Abū Hurayrah, that he heard the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, say: "Do you think that if there was a river at the door of one of you, in which he bathes five times every day, would that leave any dirt on him?" They said, "It would not leave any dirt on him." He said, "That is the likeness of the five daily prayers; Allāh erases sins through them." (Narrated by al-Bukhārī, Muslim, al-Tirmidhī, al-Nasā’ī, and Aḥmad).

On the authority of Abū Hurayrah, that the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, said: "The five [daily] prayers and from one Jumu‘ah to the next Jumu‘ah are an expiation for what is between them, as long as major sins are avoided."
(Narrated by Muslim, al-Tirmidhī, Ibn Mājah, and Aḥmad).

On the authority of Mu‘ādh ibn Jabal, who said: "I was with the Prophet, peace and blessings be upon him, on a journey. One day, I was close to him as we were traveling. I said, 'O Messenger of Allāh, tell me of a deed that will admit me to Paradise and distance me from the Fire.' He said, 'You have asked me about something great, and indeed it is easy for whom Allāh makes it easy. Worship Allāh and do not associate anything with Him, establish prayer, give Zakāh, fast Ramaḍān, and perform Ḥajj to the House.' Then he said, 'Shall I not guide you to the gates of goodness? Fasting is a shield, charity extinguishes sin as water extinguishes fire, and the prayer of a man in the depths of the night.' He said, Then he recited: {Their sides forsake their beds...} until he reached {...they were doing} (Al-Sajdah: 16-17). Then he said, 'Shall I not inform you of the head of the matter, its pillar, and its peak?' I said, 'Yes, O Messenger of Allāh.' He said, 'The head of the matter is Islām, its pillar is prayer, and its peak is Jihād.' Then he said, 'Shall I not inform you of what controls all that?' I said, 'Yes, O Prophet of Allāh.' So he took hold of his tongue and said, 'Restrain this.' I said, 'O Prophet of Allāh, will we be taken to account for what we say?' He said, 'May your mother be bereaved of you, O Mu‘ādh! Are people thrown into the Fire on their faces – or on their nostrils – for anything other than the harvests of their tongues?'" Al-Tirmidhī said this is a ḥasan ṣaḥīḥ Ḥadīth (narrated by al-Tirmidhī and Ibn Mājah).

On the authority of Abū Hurayrah, from the Prophet, peace and blessings be upon him, who said: "Congregational prayer is twenty-five degrees more [virtuous] than his prayer in his house and his prayer in his marketplace. That is because if one of you performs ablution well and comes to the mosque wanting nothing but prayer, he does not take a step but Allāh raises him a degree by it and removes a sin from him until he enters the mosque. And when he enters the mosque, he is in a state of prayer as long as it [the prayer] detains him. And the angels pray for him – meaning, upon him – as long as he remains in the place where he prayed, [saying], 'O Allāh, forgive him. O Allāh, have mercy on him,' as long as he does not break his ablution therein." (Agreed upon).

On the authority of Abū Hurayrah, who said: "A blind man came to the Prophet, peace and blessings be upon him, and said, 'O Messenger of Allāh, I have no guide to lead me to the mosque.' He asked the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, to grant him a license to pray in his house. He granted him the license. When he turned to leave, he called him and said, 'Do you hear the call to prayer?' He said, 'Yes.' He said, 'Then answer it.'" (Narrated by Muslim and al-Nasā'ī).

On the authority of Abū Hurayrah, who said: The Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, said: "Indeed, the heaviest prayer for the hypocrites is the 'Ishā' prayer and the Fajr prayer. If they knew what is in them [of reward], they would come to them even if crawling. I have indeed considered ordering the prayer to be established, then ordering a man to lead the people in prayer, then setting out with men carrying bundles of firewood to a people who do not attend the prayer, and burning their houses down upon them with fire." (Narrated by al-Bukhārī and Muslim).

Penalty for Abandoning Prayer:

On the authority of Abū al-Malīh, who said: We were with Buraydah on an expedition on a cloudy day, and he said: "Pray the 'Aṣr prayer early, for the Prophet, peace and blessings be upon him, said: "Whoever abandons the 'Aṣr prayer, his deeds are nullified."" (Agreed upon).

On the authority of Abū Hurayrah, who said: The Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, said: "When the son of Adam recites the [verse of] prostration and prostrates, Satan withdraws, weeping, saying, 'Woe to him!' – and in the narration of Abū Kurayb, 'Woe to me! The son of Adam was commanded to prostrate, and he prostrated, so for him is Paradise. And I was commanded to prostrate, but I refused, so for me is the Fire.'" Zuhayr ibn Ḥarb narrated to me, Wakī' narrated to us, al-A'mash narrated to us with this same chain of narration, similar to it, except that he said: "So I disobeyed, and for me is the Fire." (Narrated by Muslim, Ibn Mājah, and Aḥmad).

On the authority of Abū Sufyān, who said: I heard Jābir say: I heard the Prophet, peace and blessings be upon him, say: "Indeed, between a man and shirk (polytheism) and kufr (disbelief) is the abandonment of prayer." (Narrated by Muslim and Ibn Mājah).

Zakāh:

On the authority of Abū Ayyūb, may Allāh be pleased with him: "A man said to the Prophet, peace and blessings be upon him, 'Tell me of a deed that will admit me to Paradise.' He [the Prophet] said, 'What is wrong with him, what is wrong with him?' And the Prophet, peace and blessings be upon him, said, 'A need he has! Worship Allāh and do not associate anything with Him, establish prayer, give Zakāh, and maintain ties of kinship.'" (Narrated by al-Bukhārī and Muslim).

On the authority of Salīm ibn ʿĀmir, who said: I heard Abū Umāmah say: "I heard the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, delivering a sermon during the Farewell Pilgrimage, saying, 'Fear Allāh, your Lord, pray your five [daily prayers], fast your month [Ramaḍān], pay the Zakāh on your wealth, and obey your rulers; you will enter the Paradise of your Lord.'" Abū ʿĪsā said this is a ḥasan ṣaḥīḥ Ḥadīth (narrated by al-Tirmidhī and Aḥmad).

On the authority of Abū Hurayrah, who said: I heard the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, say: "Whoever spends two of anything in the way of Allāh will be called from the gates of Paradise, 'O servant of Allāh, this is good for you.' Paradise has gates. So, whoever was among the people of prayer will be called from the gate of prayer. Whoever was among the people of Jihād will be called from the gate of Jihād. Whoever was among the people of charity will be called from the gate of charity. Whoever was among the people of fasting will be called from the gate of al-Rayyān." Abū Bakr said, "Is there any necessity for one who is called from those gates? Will anyone be called from all of them, O Messenger of Allāh?" He said, "Yes, and I hope you will be one of them," meaning Abū Bakr.

On the authority of Khālīd ibn Aslam, who said: "We went out with 'Abd Allāh ibn 'Umar, may Allāh be pleased with them both. A Bedouin said, 'Inform me about the saying of Allāh: {And those who hoard gold and silver and spend it not in the way of Allāh - give them tidings of a painful punishment} (Al-Tawbah: 34).' Ibn 'Umar, may Allāh be pleased with them both, said, 'Whoever hoards it and does not pay its Zakāh, then woe to him. This was before Zakāh was revealed. When it was revealed, Allāh made it a purification for wealth.'" (Narrated by al-Bukhārī and Ibn Mājah).

Sin of Withholding Zakāh:

Imām al-Bukhārī said: Chapter on the sin of withholding Zakāh, and the saying of Allāh the Exalted: {And those who hoard gold and silver and spend it not in the way of Allāh - give them tidings of a painful punishment. On the Day when it will be heated in the fire of Hell and seared therewith will be their foreheads, their flanks, and their backs, [it will be said], "This is what you hoarded for yourselves, so taste what you used to hoard."} (Al-Tawbah: 34-35).

On the authority of Abū Hurayrah, may Allāh be pleased with him, who says: The Prophet, peace and blessings be upon him, said: "Camels will come to their owner in the best condition they were in, if he did not give their due right, and they will trample him with their hooves. Sheep will come to their owner in the best condition they were in, if he did not give their due right, and they will trample him with their cloven hooves and butt him with their horns." He also said, "And part of their right is that they be milked at the water." He said, "And none of you will come on the Day of Resurrection with a sheep bleating on his neck, saying, 'O Muḥammad!' And I will say, 'I have no power to do anything for you; I have conveyed [the message]. 'Nor will he come with a camel bellowing on his neck, saying, 'O Muḥammad!' And I will say, 'I have no power to do anything for you from Allāh; I have conveyed [the message].'" (Agreed upon).

Fasting Ramaḍān:

On the authority of Abū Hurayrah, may Allāh be pleased with him: "A Bedouin came to the Prophet, peace and blessings be upon him, and said, 'Guide me to a deed which, if I do it, I will enter Paradise.' He said, 'Worship Allāh, associating nothing with Him, establish the prescribed prayer, pay the obligatory Zakāh, and fast Ramaḍān.' He said, 'By Him in Whose Hand is my soul, I will not add to this.' When he turned to leave, the Prophet, peace and blessings be upon him, said, 'Whoever would be pleased to look at a man from the people of Paradise, let him look at this man.'" (Agreed upon).

On the authority of Abū Hurayrah, may Allāh be pleased with him, who says: The Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, said: "When Ramaḍān enters, the gates of Paradise are opened, the gates of Hellfire are closed, and the devils are chained." (Agreed upon).

On the authority of Abū Hurayrah, from the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, who said: "There is no good deed that the son of Adam does but it is written for him as ten good deeds up to seven hundredfold. Allāh, Mighty and Majestic, said, 'Except for fasting, for it is for Me, and I will reward for it. He forsakes his desire and his food for My sake.' Fasting is a shield. The fasting person has two joys: a joy when he breaks his fast, and a joy when he meets his Lord. And the smell emanating from the mouth of the fasting person is more pleasing to Allāh than the fragrance of musk." (Agreed upon, and the wording is al-Nasā'ī's).

On the authority of Abū Hurayrah, who said: The Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, said: "Whoever fasts Ramaḍān out of faith and hoping for reward, his past sins will be forgiven."

Obligation of Ḥajj:

Allāh the Exalted said: {And [due] to Allāh from the people is a pilgrimage to the House - for those who are able to find thereto a way} (Āl ‘Imrān: 97).

On the authority of Ibn ‘Umar, may Allāh be pleased with them both, who said: "I heard the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, say: "Islām is built upon five [pillars]: the testimony that there is no god but Allāh and that Muḥammad is the Messenger of Allāh, establishing prayer, giving Zakāh, pilgrimage to the House, and fasting Ramaḍān."

On the authority of Abū Hurayrah, may Allāh be pleased with him, who said: "The Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, was asked, 'Which deeds are best?' He said, "Faith in Allāh and His Messenger." It was said, 'Then what?' He said, "An accepted Ḥajj."" (Narrated by al-Bukhārī and Muslim).

And on his authority, he said: "I heard the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, say: "Whoever performs Ḥajj and does not engage in sexual relations nor commit sin, returns [as free of sin] as on the day his mother bore him."" (Narrated by al-Bukhārī and Muslim).

And on his authority, he said: "The Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, said: "Umrah to ‘Umrah is an expiation for what is between them, and an accepted Ḥajj has no reward but Paradise."" (Narrated by al-Bukhārī and Muslim).

And on the authority of ‘Ā’ishah, may Allāh be pleased with her, she said: "I said, 'O Messenger of Allāh, we see Jihād as the best deed. Should we not engage in Jihād?'

He said, "But better than Jihād is an accepted Ḥajj." (Narrated by al-Bukhārī).

And on her authority, that the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, said: "There is no day on which Allāh frees more servants from the Fire than the Day of 'Arafah." (Narrated by Muslim).

On the authority of Ibn 'Abbās, may Allāh be pleased with them both, that the Prophet, peace and blessings be upon him, said: "An 'Umrah in Ramaḍān is equivalent to a Ḥajj, or a Ḥajj with me." (Narrated by al-Bukhārī and Muslim).

'Ā'ishah, may Allāh be pleased with her, said: "I said, 'O Messenger of Allāh, is there Jihād for women?' He said, "A Jihād in which there is no fighting: Ḥajj and 'Umrah."

On the authority of Abū Hurayrah, may Allāh be pleased with him, who said: "Then the Prophet, peace and blessings be upon him, was asked, 'Which deeds are best?' He said, 'Faith in Allāh and His Messenger.' It was said, 'Then what?' He said, 'Jihād in the way of Allāh.' It was said, 'Then what?' He said, 'An accepted Ḥajj.'"

On the authority of Abū Hurayrah, may Allāh be pleased with him, who said: The Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, said: "Then, the delegation of Allāh is three: the warrior, the pilgrim performing Ḥajj, and the pilgrim performing 'Umrah."

On the authority of Shaqīq, from 'Abd Allāh, who said: The Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, said: "Then, perform Ḥajj and 'Umrah consecutively, for they remove poverty and sins just as the bellows remove impurities from iron and silver. And an accepted Ḥajj has no reward less than Paradise."

On the authority of Abū Hurayrah, who said: The Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, said: "Then, O Allāh, forgive the pilgrims and those for whom the pilgrim seeks forgiveness."

On the authority of Abū Hurayrah, who said: The Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, said: "Then, whoever comes to this House and does not engage in sexual relations nor commit sin, returns [as free of sin] as on the day his mother bore him."

Supererogatory Acts and Virtues of Deeds

Virtue of Ablution (Wuḍū’):

Allāh the Exalted said: {O you who have believed, when you rise to [perform] prayer, wash your faces and your forearms to the elbows and wipe over your heads and wash your feet to the ankles. And if you are in a state of janābah, then purify yourselves. But if you are ill or on a journey or one of you cometh from the place of relieving himself or you have contacted women and find no water, then seek clean earth and wipe over your faces and hands with it. Allāh does not intend to make difficulty for you, but He intends to purify you and complete His favor upon you that you may be grateful} (Al-Mā'idah: 6).

On the authority of Abū Hurayrah, may Allāh be pleased with him, who said: I heard the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, say: "Indeed, my Ummah will be called on the Day of Resurrection with bright faces and limbs from the traces of ablution. So, whoever among you is able to lengthen his blaze, let him do so." (Agreed upon).

another, 'Come to what you seek!' He said, So they envelop them with their wings up to the lowest heaven. He said, Then their Lord asks them – and He is more knowledgeable than them – 'What do My servants say?' They say, 'They glorify You, magnify You, praise You, and extol You.' He said, So He says, 'Have they seen Me?' He said, So they say, 'No, by Allāh, they have not seen You.' He said, So He says, 'And how would it be if they saw Me?' He said, They say, 'If they saw You, they would be more intense in worshipping You, more intense in extolling and praising You, and more frequent in glorifying You.' He said, He says, 'So what do they ask Me for?' He said, 'They ask You for Paradise.' He said, He says, 'And have they seen it?' He said, They say, 'No, by Allāh, O Lord, they have not seen it.' He said, He says, 'So how would it be if they saw it?' He said, They say, 'If they saw it, they would be more eager for it, more intense in seeking it, and greater in desiring it.' He said, 'So from what do they seek refuge?' He said, They say, 'From the Fire.' He said, He says, 'And have they seen it?' He said, They say, 'No, by Allāh, O Lord, they have not seen it.' He said, He says, 'So how would it be if they saw it?' He said, They say, 'If they saw it, they would be more intense in fleeing from it and more intense in fearing it.' He said, So He says, 'Then I call you to witness that I have forgiven them.' He said, An angel from among the angels says, 'Among them is so-and-so, who is not one of them; he only came for a need.' He said, 'They are companions, and their companion shall not be wretched.'" (Agreed upon).

And on the authority of Sālim ibn Abī al-Ja'd, may Allāh be pleased with him, who said: *"It was said to Abū al-Dardā', may Allāh be pleased with him, 'A man freed a hundred slaves.' Ibn al-Qayyim, may Allāh have mercy on him, said in his valuable book Madārij al-Sālikīn:

"It is the greatest station of the people, from which they take their provisions, in which they trade, and to which they always return. Dhikr is the proclamation of wilāyah (close friendship with Allāh); whoever is given it is connected, and whoever is denied it is cut off. It is the nourishment of the hearts of the people; whenever it departs from them, the bodies become graves for them. It is the cultivation of their lands; if it is suspended, they become barren. It is their weapon with which they fight highway robbers, and their water with which they extinguish the blaze of the path. It is the remedy for their illnesses; whenever it departs from them, their hearts relapse. It is the connecting cause and the relationship that was between them and the Knower of the Unseen.

If we fall ill, we seek remedy in Your remembrance... We leave remembrance at times, and then we relapse.

By it, they repel afflictions, discover relief from hardships, and calamities become easy for them. If tribulation darkens them, to it is their refuge. If calamities befall them, to it is their resort. It is the gardens of their Paradise in which they delight, and the capital of their happiness with which they trade. It makes the grieving heart laugh and rejoice, and it connects the one who remembers to the One Remembered; rather, it makes the one who remembers, remembered. In every limb, there is a temporary servitude.

Dhikr is the servitude of the heart and the tongue, and it is not temporary. Rather, they are commanded to remember their Worshipped One and their Beloved One in every state: standing, sitting, and on their sides. Just as Paradise is plains and it (Dhikr) is its planting, so too are hearts barren and ruined, and it is their cultivation and foundation. It is the polishing of hearts and their burnishing, and their remedy if illness befalls them. The more the one who remembers is engrossed in his remembrance, the more the One Remembered increases in love for meeting him and longing for him. If, in his remembrance, his heart agrees with his tongue, he forgets everything in the presence of His remembrance, Allāh preserves everything for him, and He becomes a compensation for him from everything. By it, deafness is removed from the ears, muteness from the tongues, and darkness is dispelled from the eyes. Allāh has adorned with it the tongues of those who remember, just as He adorned with light the eyes of those who see. The heedless tongue is like a blind eye, a deaf ear, and a paralyzed hand. It is the greatest gate of Allāh, open between Him and His servant, as long as the servant does not close it with his heedlessness. Al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī, may Allāh have mercy on him, said: 'Seek sweetness in three things: in prayer, in Dhikr, and in reciting the Qur'ān. If you find it, [good]; otherwise, know that the door is closed.' By Dhikr, the servant overcomes Satan, just as Satan overcomes the people of heedlessness and forgetfulness.

Some of the Salaf said: 'If Dhikr becomes established in the heart, then if Satan approaches it, it (the heart) throws him down, just as a human is thrown down if Satan approaches him. So the devils gather around him and say, "What is wrong with this one?" It is said, "He has been touched by a human."'

It is the spirit of righteous deeds. If a deed is devoid of Dhikr, it is like a body without a soul. And Allāh knows best.

Dhikr in the Qur'ān is of Ten Types:

First: The command for it, absolute and restricted.

Second: The prohibition of its opposite, which is heedlessness and forgetfulness.

Third: Linking success to its continuation and abundance.

Fourth: Praising its people and informing of what Allāh has prepared for them of Paradise and forgiveness.

Fifth: Informing of the loss of one who is distracted from it by something else.

Sixth: That He, Glorified is He, made His remembrance of them a reward for their remembrance of Him.

Seventh: Informing that it is greater than everything.

Eighth: That He made it the conclusion of righteous deeds, just as it was their opening.

Ninth: Informing about its people that they are the ones who benefit from His signs and that they are the people of understanding, not others.

Tenth: That He made it a companion to all righteous deeds and their spirit; whenever it is absent, they are like a body without a spirit.

In Detail:

As for the first, it is like His saying, Exalted is He: *{O you who have believed, remember Allāh with much remembrance * And exalt Him morning and afternoon. * It is He who confers blessing upon you, and His angels [ask Him to do so], that He may bring you out from darkneses into the light. And ever is He, to the believers, Merciful}* (Al-Aḥzāb: 41-43). And His saying, Exalted is He: {And remember your Lord within yourself in humility and in fear without being loud in speech - in the mornings and the evenings. And do not be among the heedless} (Al-A'rāf: 205).

There are two interpretations of this: one is, in your secret and your heart, and the second is, with your tongue such that you hear yourself. As for the prohibition of its opposite, it is like His saying: {And do not be among the heedless} (Al-A'rāf: 205). And His saying: {And be not like those who forgot Allāh, so He made them forget themselves. Those are the defiantly disobedient} (Al-Ḥashr: 19). As for linking success to its abundance, it is like His saying: {And remember Allāh much that you may succeed} (Al-Anfāl: 45).

As for praising its people and their good reward, it is like His saying: {Indeed, the Muslim men and Muslim women, the believing men and believing women, the obedient men and obedient women, the truthful men and truthful women, the patient men and patient women, the humble men and humble women, the charitable men and charitable women, the fasting men and fasting women, the men who guard their private parts and the women who do so, and the men who remember Allāh often and the women who do so - for them Allāh has prepared forgiveness and a great reward} (Al-Aḥzāb: 35).

As for the loss of one who is distracted from it, it is like His saying, Exalted is He: {O you who have believed, let not your wealth and your children divert you from remembrance of Allāh. And whoever does that - then those are the losers} (Al-Munāfiqūn: 9). As for making His remembrance of them a reward for their remembrance of Him, it is like His saying: {So remember Me; I will remember you. And be grateful to Me and do not deny Me} (Al-Baqarah: 152). As for informing that it is greater than everything, it is like His saying, Exalted is He: {Recite, [O Muḥammad], what has been revealed to you of the Book and establish prayer. Indeed, prayer prohibits immorality and wrongdoing, and the remembrance of Allāh is greater. And Allāh knows that which you do} (Al-ʿAnkabūt: 45).

There are four interpretations of this. First, that the remembrance of Allāh is greater than everything; it is the best of acts of obedience because the purpose of all acts of obedience is to establish His remembrance, so it is the secret of acts of obedience and their spirit.

Second, that the meaning is: if you remember Him, He remembers you, so His remembrance of you is greater than your remembrance of Him. According to this, the verbal noun is attributed to the doer, and according to the first, it is attributed to the one remembered.

Third, that the meaning is: and the remembrance of Allāh is too great for any immorality or wrongdoing to remain with it. Rather, if remembrance is complete, it eradicates every sin and disobedience. This is what the commentators mentioned. I heard Shaykh al-Islām Ibn Taymiyyah, may Allāh have mercy on him, say: The meaning of the verse is that in prayer there are two great benefits: one of them is its prohibition of immorality and wrongdoing, and the second is its inclusion of the remembrance of Allāh and its containing it. And what it contains of the remembrance of Allāh is greater than its prohibition of immorality and wrongdoing.

As for concluding righteous deeds with it, it is as He concluded the act of fasting with His saying: {And [for His guidance] to complete the period and to glorify Allāh for that [to] which He has guided you; and perhaps you will be grateful} (Al-Baqarah: 185).

And He concluded Ḥajj with it in His saying: {And when you have completed your rites, remember Allāh like your [previous] remembrance of your fathers or with [much] greater remembrance} (Al-Baqarah: 200). And He concluded prayer with it, like His saying: {And when you have completed the prayer, remember Allāh standing, sitting, or [lying] on your sides} (Al-Nisā': 103). And He concluded Jumu'ah with it, like His saying: {And when the prayer has been concluded, disperse within the land and seek from the bounty of Allāh, and remember Allāh often that you may succeed} (Al-Jumu'ah: 10).

Therefore, it was the conclusion of worldly life, and if it is the last words of the servant, Allāh will admit him to Paradise. As for specifying those who remember as benefiting from His signs, and they are the people of understanding and intellect, it is like His saying, Exalted is He: *{Indeed, in the creation of the heavens and the earth and the alternation of the night and the day are signs for those of understanding. **

Who remember Allāh while standing or sitting or [lying] on their sides} (Āl ‘Imrān: 190-191).

As for its accompaniment of all deeds, its connection with them, and its being their spirit, He, Glorified is He, connected it with prayer, like His saying: {And establish prayer for My remembrance} (Ṭāhā: 14).

And He connected it with fasting, and with Ḥajj and its rites. Indeed, it is the spirit of Ḥajj, its essence, and its purpose, as the Prophet said: "The Ṭawāf around the House, the Sa‘y between al-Ṣafā and al-Marwah, and the stoning of the Jamarāt were only established for the remembrance of Allāh."

And He connected it with Jihād and commanded its remembrance when meeting peers and confronting enemies. He, Exalted is He, said: {O you who have believed, when you encounter a company [from the enemy forces], stand firm and remember Allāh much that you may succeed} (Al-Anfāl: 45). And in a divine tradition, Allāh the Exalted says: "Indeed, My true servant is he who remembers Me while encountering his opponent."

I heard Shaykh al-Islām Ibn Taymiyyah, may Allāh sanctify his soul, cite this as evidence, and I heard him say: Lovers take pride in remembering those they love in this situation, as ‘Antarah said:

I remembered you when the spears were drinking from me... And the Indian swords were dripping with my blood.

And another said: I remembered you when the Khaṭṭī spears passed between us...

And the polished brown spears had drunk from us.

This is common in their poetry, and it is indicative of the strength of love. For remembering the beloved in such a state, where a person cares for nothing but himself, indicates that the beloved is, to him, like himself, or dearer than himself. This is evidence of sincere love, and Allāh knows best.

Those who remember are the foremost, as Muslim narrated in his Ṣaḥīḥ from the Ḥadīth of al-‘Alā’, from his father, from Abū Hurayrah, may Allāh be pleased with him, who said: "The Messenger of Allāh was traveling on a road to Makkah and passed by a mountain called Jumudān. He said, 'Proceed, this is Jumudān; the Mufarridūn have gone ahead.' They said, 'And who are the Mufarridūn, O Messenger of Allāh?' He said, 'The men and women who remember Allāh much.'" The Mufarridūn are either the monotheists or the unique individuals.

And in the Musnad, narrated as marfū‘ from the Ḥadīth of Abū al-Dardā’, may Allāh be pleased with him: "Shall I not inform you of the best of your deeds, the purest of them with your Sovereign, the highest of them in your ranks, better for you than giving gold and silver, and than meeting your enemy and striking their necks and them striking your necks?" They said, "And what is that, O Messenger of Allāh?" He said, "The remembrance of Allāh, Mighty and Majestic."

On the authority of Abū Ishāq, who said: I heard al-Agharr say: I bear witness concerning Abū Hurayrah and Abū Sa‘īd, may Allāh be pleased with them both, that they bore witness concerning the Messenger of Allāh, who said: "No group of people sits remembering Allāh but the angels surround them, mercy envelops them, tranquility descends upon them, and Allāh mentions them to those who are with Him." And it is in Ṣaḥīḥ Muslim.

It suffices for the honor of Dhikr that Allāh boasts to His angels about its people, as in Ṣaḥīḥ Muslim from Mu‘āwiyah, may Allāh be pleased with him: "The Messenger of Allāh came out to a circle of his companions and said, 'What has made you sit?' They said, 'We sat to remember Allāh and praise Him for guiding us to Islām and bestowing it upon us.' He said, 'By Allāh, did nothing but that make you sit?' They said, 'By Allāh, nothing but that made us sit.' He said, 'Indeed, I did not ask you to swear out of suspicion of you, but Jibrīl came to me and informed me that Allāh boasts about you to the angels.'" A Bedouin asked the Messenger of Allāh, "Which deeds are best?" He said, "That you depart from the world while your tongue is moist with the remembrance of Allāh." A man said to him, "The laws of Islām have become many for me, so command me with something to which I can cling." He said: "Let your tongue not cease from being moist with the remembrance of Allāh."

And in the Musnad and elsewhere, from the Ḥadīth of Jābir, who said: "The Messenger of Allāh came out to us and said, 'O people, graze in the gardens of Paradise.' We said, 'O Messenger of Allāh, and what are the gardens of Paradise?' He said, 'The gatherings of Dhikr.' And he said, 'Go forth morning and evening and remember. Whoever loves to know his station with Allāh, let him see what station Allāh has with him, for Allāh places the servant with Him according to how he places Allāh with himself.'"

The Prophet, peace and blessings be upon him, narrated from his father Ibrāhīm, peace be upon him, on the night of Isrā', that he said to him: "Convey my Salām to your Ummah and inform them that Paradise has good soil and sweet water, and that it is plains, and that its planting is: Subḥān Allāh (Glory be to Allāh), Al-ḥamdu Lillāh (Praise be to Allāh), Lā ilāha illā Allāh (There is no god but Allāh), and Allāhu Akbar (Allāh is Greater)." (Narrated by al-Tirmidhī).

And in the two Ṣaḥīḥs, from the Ḥadīth of Abū Mūsā, may Allāh be pleased with him, from the Prophet, peace and blessings be upon him: "The likeness of the one who remembers his Lord and the one who does not remember Him is like the living and the dead." And the wording of Muslim is: "The likeness of the house in which Allāh is remembered and the house in which Allāh is not remembered is like the living and the dead." So he made the house of the one who remembers like the house of the living, and the house of the heedless like the house of the dead, which is the grave. And in the first wording, he made the one who remembers like the living and the heedless like the dead. So the two wordings imply that the remembering heart is like the living in the houses of the living, and the heedless heart is like the dead in the houses of the dead. And there is no doubt that the bodies of the heedless are graves for their hearts, and their hearts in them are like the dead in graves, as it was said: Forgetting the remembrance of Allāh is the death of their hearts... And their bodies, before the graves, are graves.

And their souls are in desolation from their bodies... And they have no resurrection until the Resurrection.

And in a divine tradition, Allāh the Exalted says: "If My remembrance is dominant over My servant, I love him and he loves Me." And in another: "So in Me rejoice, and in My remembrance find delight." And in another: "O son of Adam, you have not been fair to Me. I remember you, and you forget Me. I call you, and you flee to other than Me. I remove calamities from you, and you persist in sins. O son of Adam, what will you say tomorrow when you come to Me?" And in another: "O son of Adam, remember Me when you are angry, I will remember you when I am angry. And be content with My support for you, for My support for you is better than your support for yourself."

And in the Ṣaḥīḥ, in the tradition that the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, narrates from his Lord, Blessed and Exalted is He: "Whoever remembers Me in himself, I remember him in Myself. And whoever remembers Me in an assembly, I remember him in an assembly better than them."

We have mentioned about a hundred benefits of Dhikr in our book Al-Wābil al-Ṣayyib wa Rāfi‘ al-Kalim al-Ṭayyib. And we mentioned there the secrets of Dhikr, the greatness of its benefit, and the goodness of its fruit. And we mentioned therein that Dhikr is of three types: remembrance of the Names and Attributes and their meanings, praising Allāh with them, and affirming the Tawhīd of Allāh with them; remembrance of the command and prohibition, the lawful and the unlawful; and remembrance of the bounties, blessings, benevolence, and favors. And that it is also of three types: Dhikr in which the heart and tongue agree, which is the highest; Dhikr with the heart alone, which is in the second degree; and Dhikr with the mere tongue, which is in the third degree.

Virtue of Remembrances After Obligatory Prayers:

On the authority of Abū Hurayrah, may Allāh be pleased with him, from the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, who said: "Whoever glorifies Allāh thirty-three times after every prayer, and praises Allāh thirty-three times, and magnifies Allāh thirty-three times – that is ninety-nine – and says to complete the hundred: 'Lā ilāha illā Allāh waḥdahu lā sharīka lah, lahu al-mulku wa lahu al-ḥamdu wa huwa 'alā kulli shay'in qadīr' (There is no god but Allāh alone, without partner; His is the dominion and His is the praise, and He is over all things competent), his sins will be forgiven, even if they are like the foam of the sea." (Narrated by Muslim).

And on the authority of Mu'ādh ibn Jabal, may Allāh be pleased with him, that the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings be upon him, took his hand and said: "O Mu'ādh, indeed I love you. I advise you, O Mu'ādh, not to fail to say after every prayer: 'Allāhumma a'innī 'alā dhikrika wa shukrika wa ḥusni 'ibādatik' (O Allāh, help me to remember You, to thank You, and to worship You well)." (Narrated by Abū Dāwūd).

The Virtue of Supplications After Obligatory Prayers

It is narrated from Abū Hurayrah, may Allāh be pleased with him, that he said: "The poor came to the Prophet, peace and blessings of Allāh be upon him, and said: 'The people of great wealth have gone with the highest ranks and everlasting bliss. They pray as we pray, and they fast as we fast, but they have an excess of wealth with which they perform Ḥajj, 'Umrah, Jihād, and give charity.' He said: 'Shall I not tell you something that, if you do it, you will catch up with those who have preceded you, and no one after you will catch up with you, and you will be the best among those you are with, except for one who does the same? You say Subḥān Allāh (Glory be to Allāh), Alḥamdulillāh (Praise be to Allāh), and Allāhu Akbar (Allāh is Greater) thirty-three times after every prayer.' We differed among ourselves; some of us said, 'We say Subḥān Allāh thirty-three times, Alḥamdulillāh thirty-three times, and Allāhu Akbar thirty-four times.' So I returned to him, and he said: 'You say: Subḥān Allāh, Alḥamdulillāh, and Allāhu Akbar, so that each of them is said thirty-three times.'" (Agreed upon).

It is narrated from ‘Abdullāh ibn ‘Amr, may Allāh be pleased with him, that the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings of Allāh be upon him, said: "There are two qualities which, if any Muslim man observes them regularly, he will enter Paradise. They are easy, but those who practice them are few." The Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings of Allāh be upon him, said: 'After each of the five obligatory prayers, one of you should say Subḥān Allāh ten times, Alḥamdulillāh ten times, and Allāhu Akbar ten times. That is one hundred and fifty on the tongue, and one thousand five hundred in the Scale. And I saw the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings of Allāh be upon him, counting them on his hand. And when one of you goes to his bed or lies down, he should say Subḥān Allāh thirty-three times, Alḥamdulillāh thirty-three times, and Allāhu Akbar thirty-four times. That is one hundred on the tongue, and one thousand in the Scale.' The Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings of Allāh be upon him, then said: 'So which of you commits two thousand five hundred sins in a day and night?' It was said: 'O Messenger of Allāh, how is it that we do not observe them regularly?' He said: 'Shayṭān comes to one of you when he is in his prayer and says, "Remember such-and-such, remember such-and-such," and he comes to him when he is going to sleep and makes him sleep.'" (Narrated by al-Tirmidhī, al-Nasā’ī, Abū Dāwūd, Ibn Mājah, and Aḥmad).

The Virtue of Morning and Evening Supplications

I had intended to compile a selection of these supplications from some well-known sources for this section. Then I found in what our Shaykh, the martyr ‘Abdullāh ‘Azzām, may Allāh have mercy on him, had collected, a concise sufficiency suitable for this summary. Here it is:

Shaykh ‘Abdullāh ‘Azzām, may Allāh have mercy on him, said about the collection of Ḥadīth he gathered:

All these Ḥadīth are authentic and are essential for protecting a person from all evils, for preserving him from Shayṭān and all harms, in addition to the great reward that awaits the one who says them.

There is no cure more healing for the diseases of the heart than remembrance (dhikr). Remembrance is like water for fish, and like water for plants. Remembrance purifies the heart, heals the chest from anxiety and distress, strengthens the body and soul, removes worry and grief, expels Shayṭān, and brings down angels, mercy, and tranquility.

Whenever a person engages in remembrance, the angels build for him mansions in Paradise. If the remembrance stops, the building stops. Likewise, remembrance is the planting of Paradise; if the remembrance stops, the planting stops.

Remembrance removes the rust from hearts, purifies the soul, instills love for Allāh and then for creation, builds reliance (tawakkul), and instills tranquility and contentment with destiny.

Remembrance, in its various forms, is like a pharmacy that contains different types of medicine for various illnesses. Some cure worry, others grief, a third insomnia, a fourth fear, a fifth Shayṭān, and so on. The wise physician, peace and blessings of Allāh be upon him, prescribed the dosage (one, three, seven, etc.).

The time for morning supplications is from the break of dawn until sunrise, and the evening supplications are from after the ‘Aṣr prayer.

1. Immediately after the Fajr prayer, while still in the prayer posture, say ten times: “Lā ilāha illā Allāh waḥdahu lā sharīka lah, lahu al-mulk wa lahu al-ḥamd wa huwa ‘alā kulli shay’in qadīr” (There is no god but Allāh alone, with no partner; His is the dominion and His is the praise, and He is over all things competent).

It is narrated from Abū Ayyūb, may Allāh be pleased with him, that the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings of Allāh be upon him, said: "Whoever says: 'Lā ilāha illā Allāh waḥdahu lā sharīka lah, lahu al-mulk wa lahu al-ḥamd wa huwa 'alā kulli shay'in qadīr' ten times, Allāh will write for him ten good deeds, erase from him ten bad deeds, they will be for him equivalent to freeing four slaves, and they will be a protection for him until evening. And whoever says them after the Maghrib prayer, after finishing his prayer, will have the same until morning."

2. Āyat al-Kursī: {Allāh - there is no deity except Him, the Ever-Living, the Sustainer of [all] existence. Neither drowsiness overtakes Him nor sleep. To Him belongs whatever is in the heavens and whatever is on the earth. Who is it that can intercede with Him except by His permission? He knows what is [presently] before them and what will be after them, and they encompass not a thing of His knowledge except for what He wills. His Kursī extends over the heavens and the earth, and their preservation tires Him not. And He is the Most High, the Most Great.} (Qur'ān, al-Baqarah: 255).

It is narrated from Ubayy ibn Ka'b, may Allāh be pleased with him, that he had a barn of dates that was diminishing. He guarded it one night and saw a creature resembling a young boy. He greeted him, and the creature returned the greeting. He asked: "What are you? A jinnī or a human?" He replied: "A jinnī. Give me your hand." He gave him his hand, and it was the hand of a dog, and its hair was like a dog's hair. He said: "Is this the form of the jinn?" He replied: "The jinn know that there is no man among them stronger than me." He asked: "What brought you?" He replied: "We heard that you love to give charity, so we came to take some of your food." He asked: "What protects us from you?" He replied: "This verse in Sūrat al-Baqarah: {Allāh - there is no deity except Him, the Ever-Living, the Sustainer of [all] existence...}."

Whoever says it in the evening will be protected from us until morning, and whoever says it in the morning will be protected from us until evening. When morning came, he went to the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings of Allāh be upon him, and mentioned it to him. He said: "The wicked one spoke the truth."

3. The last two verses of Sūrat al-Baqarah: *{The Messenger has believed in what was revealed to him from his Lord, and [so have] the believers. All of them have believed in Allāh and His angels and His books and His messengers, [saying], "We make no distinction between any of His messengers." And they say, "We hear and we obey. [We seek] Your forgiveness, our Lord, and to You is the [final] destination." * Allāh does not charge a soul except [with that within] its capacity. It will have [the consequence of] what [good] it has gained, and it will bear [the consequence of] what [evil] it has earned. "Our Lord, do not impose blame upon us if we have forgotten or erred. Our Lord, and lay not upon us a burden like that which You laid upon those before us. Our Lord, and burden us not with that which we have no ability to bear. And pardon us; and forgive us; and have mercy upon us. You are our protector, so give us victory over the disbelieving people."}* (Qur'ān, al-Baqarah: 285-286). The Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings of Allāh be upon him, said: "Whoever recites the two verses from the end of Sūrat al-Baqarah in a night, they will suffice him."

4. {Qul Huwa Allāhu Aḥad, Qul a'ūdhu bi Rabb al-falaq, Qul a'ūdhu bi Rabb an-nās}... each one (three times).

‘Abdullāh ibn Khubayb said: We went out on a rainy and very dark night looking for the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings of Allāh be upon him, to lead us in prayer. We found him and he said: "Say." I said nothing. Then he said: "Say." I said nothing. He said: "Say." I said: "O Messenger of Allāh, what should I say?" He said: "Say: Qul Huwa Allāhu Aḥad (Say, He is Allāh, the One) and the Mu‘awwidhatayn (Sūrat al-Falaq and Sūrat al-Nās) when you reach the evening and when you reach the morning – three times – they will suffice you against everything."

5. Subḥān Allāh (Glory be to Allāh) thirty-three times, Alḥamdulillāh (Praise be to Allāh) thirty-three times, Allāhu Akbar (Allāh is Greater) thirty-four times. The Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings of Allāh be upon him, said: "Whoever says Subḥān Allāh thirty-three times after every prayer, and Alḥamdulillāh thirty-three times, and Allāhu Akbar thirty-three times – that is ninety-nine – and completes the hundred by saying: Lā ilāha illā Allāh waḥdahu lā sharīka lah, lahu al-mulk wa lahu al-ḥamd wa huwa ‘alā kulli shay’in qadīr (There is no god but Allāh alone, with no partner; His is the dominion and His is the praise, and He is over all things competent), his sins will be forgiven, even if they are like the foam of the sea."
6. The Ḥadīth: "Aṣḥabnā wa aṣḥaḥa al-mulku lillāh, wal-ḥamdu lillāh, lā sharīka lah, lā ilāha illā huwa wa ilayhi an-nushūr" (We have reached the morning and at this very time all sovereignty belongs to Allāh, and all praise is for Allāh. There is no partner with Him, there is no god but Him, and to Him is the resurrection).
7. The Ḥadīth: "Aṣḥabnā ‘alā fiṭrat al-Islām, wa ‘alā kalimat al-ikhlāṣ, wa ‘alā dīni nabiyyinā Muḥammadin ṣallā Allāhu ‘alayhi wa sallam, wa ‘alā millati abinā Ibrāhīma ḥanīfan wa mā kāna min al-mushrikīn" (We have reached the morning upon the natural disposition of Islām, upon the word of sincerity, upon the religion of our Prophet Muḥammad, peace and blessings of Allāh be upon him, and upon the creed of our father Ibrāhīm, inclining toward truth, and he was not of the polytheists).

8. The Ḥadīth: "Allāhumma mā aṣbaḥa bī min ni'matin aw bi aḥadin min khalqika fa minka waḥdaka lā sharīka lak, fa laka al-ḥamdu wa laka ash-shukr" (O Allāh, whatever blessing has reached me or any of Your creation this morning, it is from You alone, You have no partner, so to You belongs all praise and to You belongs all thanks).

It is narrated from ‘Abdullāh ibn Ghannām al-Bayāḍī, may Allāh be pleased with him, that the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings of Allāh be upon him, said: "Whoever says in the morning: 'Allāhumma mā aṣbaḥa bī min ni'matin aw bi aḥadin min khalqika fa minka waḥdaka lā sharīka lak, fa laka al-ḥamdu wa laka ash-shukr,' has fulfilled the thankfulness of his day. And whoever says the like of that in the evening has fulfilled the thankfulness of his night."

9. The Ḥadīth: "Yā Rabbī laka al-ḥamdu kamā yanbaghī li jalāli wajhika wa ‘aẓīmi sulṭānik" (O my Lord, to You is praise as befits the majesty of Your Countenance and the greatness of Your authority).

It is narrated from ‘Abdullāh ibn ‘Umar, may Allāh be pleased with them both, that the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings of Allāh be upon him, told them that a servant from among the servants of Allāh said: "Yā Rabbī laka al-ḥamdu kamā yanbaghī li jalāli wajhika wa ‘aẓīmi sulṭānik." This perplexed the two angels – it overwhelmed them – and they did not know how to write it down. So they ascended to heaven and said: "Our Lord, Your servant has said a statement that we do not know how to write." Allāh, Exalted and Majestic is He – and He knows best what His servant said – asked: "What did My servant say?" They said: "O Lord, he said: 'Yā Rabbī laka al-ḥamdu kamā yanbaghī li jalāli wajhika wa 'aẓīmi sulṭānik.'" Allāh, Exalted and Majestic is He, said to them: "Write it down as My servant said it, until he meets Me, and I shall reward him for it."

10. The Ḥadīth: "Raḍītu billāhi Rabbā, wa bil-Islāmi dīnā, wa bi Muḥammadin nabiyyan wa rasūlā" (I am pleased with Allāh as Lord, with Islām as religion, and with Muḥammad as Prophet and Messenger).

It is narrated from Thawbān and others that the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings of Allāh be upon him, said: "Whoever says in the evening and in the morning: 'Raḍītu billāhi Rabbā, wa bil-Islāmi dīnā, wa bi Muḥammadin, peace and blessings of Allāh be upon him, nabiyyan wa rasūlā'... it will be a right upon Allāh to please him."

11. The Ḥadīth: "Subḥān Allāhi wa bi ḥamdih, 'adada khalqih, wa riḍā nafsih, wa zinata 'arshih, wa midāda kalimātih" (Glory be to Allāh and praise Him, by the number of His creation, by the pleasure of Himself, by the weight of His Throne, and by the ink of His words) (three times).

It is narrated from Juwayriyah, the Mother of the Believers, may Allāh be pleased with her, that the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings of Allāh be upon him, left her early in the morning when he prayed Fajr, while she was in her place of prayer. Then he returned after the sun had risen high, and she was still sitting. He said: "Are you still in the state I left you in?" She said: "Yes."

The Prophet, peace and blessings of Allāh be upon him, said: "After I left you, I said four words – three times – which, if weighed against what you have said since today began, they would outweigh them: Subhān Allāhi wa bi ḥamdih, ‘adada khalqih, wa riḍā nafsih, wa zinata ‘arshih, wa midāda kalimātih."

12. The Ḥadīth: It is narrated from Abān ibn ‘Uthmān ibn ‘Affān, may Allāh be pleased with him, that the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings of Allāh be upon him, said: "There is no servant who says every morning and every evening: 'Bismillāh alladhī lā yaḍurru ma‘a ismihi shay’un fī al-arḍi wa lā fī as-samā’i wa huwa as-Samī‘ al-‘Alīm' (In the name of Allāh, with Whose name nothing on earth or in heaven can cause harm, and He is the All-Hearing, the All-Knowing) – three times – that anything will harm him." (Narrated by the Four).

Abān ibn ‘Uthmān had suffered a stroke (hemiplegia), and a man began to look at him. Abān said: "What are you looking at? Indeed, the Ḥadīth is as I narrated it to you, but I did not say it on that day so that Allāh's decree might come to pass."

13. The Ḥadīth: "Allāhumma innā na‘ūdhu bika min an nushrika bika shay’an na‘lamuh, wa nastaghfiruka limā lā na‘lamuh" (O Allāh, we seek refuge in You from associating anything with You knowingly, and we seek Your forgiveness for what we do not know). (Narrated by Aḥmad).

It is narrated from Abū Mūsā al-Ash‘arī, may Allāh be pleased with him, that he said: The Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings of Allāh be upon him, addressed us one day and said: "O people, beware of this shirk (associating partners with Allāh), for it is more hidden than the crawling of an ant."

Someone whom Allāh willed to speak said to him: "How can we beware of it when it is more hidden than the crawling of an ant, O Messenger of Allāh?" He said: "Say: Allāhumma innā na'ūdhu bika min an nushrika bika shay'an na'lamuh, wa nastaghfiruka limā lā na'lamuh."

14. The Ḥadīth: "A'ūdhu bi kalimāt Allāh at-tāmmāti min sharri mā khalaq" (I seek refuge in the perfect words of Allāh from the evil of what He has created) (three times). (Narrated by Muslim).

"Whoever says in the evening – three times – 'A'ūdhu bi kalimāt Allāh at-tāmmāti min sharri mā khalaq' will not be harmed by the bite of a snake that night." (Narrated by al-Tirmidhī).

15. The Ḥadīth: "Allāhumma innī a'ūdhu bika min al-hammi wal-ḥazan, wa a'ūdhu bika min al-'ajzi wal-kasal, wa a'ūdhu bika min al-jubni wal-bukhl, wa a'ūdhu bika min ghalabat ad-dayni wa qahr ar-rijāl" (O Allāh, I seek refuge in You from worry and grief, I seek refuge in You from incapacity and laziness, I seek refuge in You from cowardice and miserliness, and I seek refuge in You from being overwhelmed by debt and the subjugation of men). (Narrated by Abū Dāwūd).

It is narrated from Abū Sa'īd al-Khudrī, may Allāh be pleased with him, that he said: The Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings of Allāh be upon him, entered the mosque one day and saw a man from the Anṣār called Abū Umāmah. He said: "O Abū Umāmah, why do I see you sitting [in the mosque] at a time other than prayer time?" He said: "Worries have beset me and debts, O Messenger of Allāh." He said: "Shall I not teach you words which, if you say them, Allāh will take away your worry and settle your debt?" He said: "I said: 'Yes, O Messenger of Allāh.'" He said: "Say in the morning and in the evening: 'Allāhumma innī a'ūdhu bika min al-hammi wal-ḥazan, wa a'ūdhu bika min al- ‘ajzi wal-kasal, wa a‘ūdhu bika min al-jubni wal-bukhl, wa a‘ūdhu bika min ghalabat ad-dayni wa qahr ar-rijāl.”

He said: "So I did that, and Allāh took away my worry and settled my debt."
(Narrated by Abū Dāwūd).

16. The Ḥadīth:

"Allāhumma ‘āfinī fī badanī, Allāhumma ‘āfinī fī sam‘ī, Allāhumma ‘āfinī fī baṣarī, Allāhumma innī a‘ūdhu bika min al-kufri wal-faqr, wa a‘ūdhu bika min ‘adhāb al-qabr, lā ilāha illā Ant" (O Allāh, grant me well-being in my body. O Allāh, grant me well-being in my hearing. O Allāh, grant me well-being in my sight. O Allāh, I seek refuge in You from disbelief and poverty, and I seek refuge in You from the punishment of the grave. There is no god but You).
(Narrated by Abū Dāwūd).

17. The Ḥadīth:

From Shaddād ibn Aws, attributed to the Prophet (marfū‘): The master of seeking forgiveness is to say: "Allāhumma Anta Rabbī lā ilāha illā Ant, khalaqtanī wa anā ‘abduk, wa anā ‘alā ‘ahdika wa wa‘dika mā istaṭa‘t, a‘ūdhu bika min sharri mā ṣana‘t, abū‘u laka bi ni‘matika ‘alayya wa abū‘u bi dhanbī faghfir lī fa innahu lā yaghfir adh-dhunūba illā Ant" (O Allāh, You are my Lord, there is no god but You. You created me and I am Your servant, and I am upon Your covenant and Your promise as much as I am able. I seek refuge in You from the evil of what I have done. I acknowledge Your favor upon me, and I acknowledge my sin, so forgive me, for none forgives sins except You).
Whoever says it during the day with certainty in it, and dies, he is from the people of Paradise. And whoever says it during the night – while being certain in it – and dies before morning, he is from the people of Paradise. (Narrated by al-Bukhārī).

18. The Ḥadīth:

It is narrated from Abū Hurayrah, may Allāh be pleased with him, that Abū Bakr al-Ṣiddīq said: "O Messenger of Allāh, teach me something to say in the morning and in the evening." He said: "Say: 'Allāhumma 'ālim al-ghaybi wash-shahādah, fāṭir as-samāwāti wal-arḍ, Rabba kulli shay'in wa malīkah, ashhadu an lā ilāha illā Ant, a'ūdhu bika min sharri nafsī wa sharri ash-shayṭāni wa shirkīhi' – and in another narration – 'wa an aqtarīfa 'alā nafsī sū'an aw ajurrahu ilā Muslim' " (O Allāh, Knower of the unseen and the seen, Originator of the heavens and the earth, Lord and Sovereign of all things, I bear witness that there is no god but You. I seek refuge in You from the evil of myself and the evil of Shayṭān and his polytheism – and in another narration – and from committing evil against myself or bringing it upon a Muslim). Say it in the morning, in the evening, and when you go to your bed. (Narrated by al-Tirmidhī).

19. The Ḥadīth:

‘Abdullāh ibn ‘Umar, may Allāh be pleased with them both, said: The Prophet, peace and blessings of Allāh be upon him, never failed to say these supplications in the evening and in the morning: "Allāhumma innī as'aluka al-'āfiyata fid-dunyā wal-ākhirah, Allāhumma innī as'aluka al-'afwa wal-'āfiyata fī dīnī wa dunyāya wa ahlī wa mālī, Allāhumma ustur 'awrātī, wa āmin raw'ātī, Allāhumma ihfaznī min bayni yadayya wa min khalfī wa 'an yamīnī wa 'an shimālī wa min fawqī, wa a'ūdhu bi 'aẓamatika an ughtāla min taḥtī" (O Allāh, I ask You for well-being in this world and the Hereafter. O Allāh, I ask You for pardon and well-being in my religion, my worldly affairs, my family, and my wealth. O Allāh, conceal my faults and calm my fears. O Allāh, protect me from before me and from behind me, from my right and from my left, and from above me, and I seek refuge in Your greatness from being unexpectedly destroyed from beneath me). (Narrated by Abū Dāwūd).

20. The Ḥadīth: "Astaghfirullāh alladhī lā ilāha illā huwa al-Ḥayy al-Qayyūm wa atūbu ilayh" (I seek the forgiveness of Allāh, other than Whom there is no god, the Ever-Living, the Sustainer of existence, and I repent to Him).

It is narrated from Abū Mas'ūd, attributed to the Prophet (marfū'): Whoever says: "Astaghfirullāh alladhī lā ilāha illā huwa al-Ḥayy al-Qayyūm wa atūbu ilayh, his sins will be forgiven, even if he had fled from the battlefield."

21. The Ḥadīth: "Yā Ḥayyu yā Qayyūm, bi raḥmatika astaghīth, aṣliḥ lī sha'nī kullah, wa lā takilnī ilā nafsī ṭarfata 'ayn" (O Ever-Living, O Sustainer of existence, by Your mercy I seek help. Rectify all my affairs for me, and do not entrust me to myself for the blink of an eye).

It is narrated from Anas ibn Mālīk, may Allāh be pleased with him, that he said: The Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings of Allāh be upon him, said to Fāṭimah: "What prevents you from saying in the morning and in the evening: Yā Ḥayyu yā Qayyūm, bi raḥmatika astaghīth, aṣliḥ lī sha'nī kullah, wa lā takilnī ilā nafsī ṭarfata 'ayn?" (Narrated by al-Nasā'ī).

22. Sending blessings upon the Prophet ten times.

"Whoever sends blessings upon me ten times in the morning and ten times in the evening, my intercession will reach him on the Day of Resurrection." (Narrated by al-Ṭabarānī).

23. Subḥān Allāhi wa bi ḥamdih (Glory be to Allāh and praise Him) one hundred times.

Muslim narrated from Abū Hurayrah that he said: The Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings of Allāh be upon him, said: "Whoever says in the morning and in the evening: 'Subḥān Allāhi wa bi ḥamdih' one hundred times, no one will come on the Day of Resurrection with anything better than what he has brought, except for one who said the same as he said or more."

24. Expiation for a gathering (Kaffārat al-Majlis): "Subḥānaka Allāhumma wa bi ḥamdika, ashhadu an lā ilāha illā Ant, astaghfiruka wa atūbu ilayk" (Glory be to You, O Allāh, and praise. I bear witness that there is no god but You. I seek Your forgiveness and repent to You). It is narrated from Abū Hurayrah that he said: The Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings of Allāh be upon him, said: "Whoever sits in a gathering and engages in much idle talk, then says before leaving that gathering: 'Subḥānaka Allāhumma wa bi ḥamdika, ashhadu an lā ilāha illā Ant, astaghfiruka wa atūbu ilayk,' Allāh will expiate for him what occurred in that gathering." (Narrated by al-Tirmidhī).

25. The Ḥadīth: "Subḥāna Rabbika Rabb al-‘izzati ‘ammā yaṣifūn, wa salāmun ‘alā al-mursalīn, wal-ḥamdu lillāhi Rabb al-‘ālamīn" (Exalted is your Lord, the Lord of might, above what they describe. And peace upon the messengers. And praise to Allāh, Lord of the worlds). (Narrated by Abū Ya‘lā).

This concludes the selection from Shaykh ‘Abdullāh ‘Azzām, as cited in al-Dhakhā’ir, vol. 1, p. 114.

The Virtue of Supplications Before Sleep

1. It is narrated from Abū Hurayrah, may Allāh be pleased with him, from the Prophet, peace and blessings of Allāh be upon him, that he said: "When one of you comes to his bed, let him dust it with the edge of his garment three times, and let him say: 'Bismika Rabbī waḍa'tu janbī wa bika arfa'uh, in amsakta nafsī faghfir lahā, wa in arsaltahā faḥfazhā bimā taḥfaẓu bihi 'ibādaka aṣ-ṣāliḥīn'"

(In Your name, my Lord, I lay down my side, and in Your name, I raise it. If You take my soul, forgive it, and if You send it back, protect it as You protect Your righteous servants). (Narrated by the Group).

2. And it is narrated from 'Ā'ishah, may Allāh be pleased with her, that she said:
"When the Prophet, peace and blessings of Allāh be upon him, went to his bed every night, he would join his palms together, blow into them, and recite into them (Qul Huwa Allāhu Aḥad), (Qul a'ūdhu bi Rabb al-falaq), and (Qul a'ūdhu bi Rabb an-nās). Then he would wipe with them whatever he could of his body, starting with his head, his face, and the front of his body. He would do that three times." (Narrated by al-Bukhārī).
3. And it is narrated from Abū Sa'īd al-Khudrī, may Allāh be pleased with him, from the Prophet, peace and blessings of Allāh be upon him, that he said: "And whoever says when he goes to his bed: 'Astaghfirullāh alladhī lā ilāha illā huwa al-Ḥayy al-Qayyūm wa atūbu ilayh' – three times – Allāh will forgive him his sins, even if they are like the foam of the sea, even if they are (the number of) the leaves of trees, even if they are the number of the sands of 'Ālij (a vast desert), and even if they are the number of the days of the world." (Narrated by al-Tirmidhī).
4. And it is narrated from Abū Hurayrah, may Allāh be pleased with him, that the Prophet, peace and blessings of Allāh be upon him, said: "Whoever says when he goes to his bed: 'Lā ilāha illā Allāh waḥdahu lā sharīka lah, lahu al-mulk wa lahu al-ḥamd wa huwa 'alā kulli shay'in qadīr, lā ḥawla wa lā quwwata illā billāh al-‘Azīm, Subḥān Allāh wal-ḥamdu lillāh wa lā ilāha illā Allāh wallāhu Akbar’ (There is no god but Allāh alone, with no partner; His is the dominion and His is the praise, and He is over all things competent. There is no might nor power except with Allāh, the Great. Glory be to Allāh, praise be to Allāh, there is no god but Allāh, and Allāh is Greater), his sins will be forgiven, even if they are like the foam of the sea.” (Narrated by Ibn Ḥibbān).

5. And it is narrated from al-Barā’ ibn ‘Āzib, may Allāh be pleased with him, that he said: The Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings of Allāh be upon him, said:

"When you go to your bed, perform ablution as you would for prayer, then lie down on your right side, and then say: 'Allāhumma aslamtu wajhī ilayk, wa fawwaḍtu amrī ilayk, wa alja'tu zahrī ilayk, raghbatan wa rahbatan ilayk, lā malja'a wa lā manjā minka illā ilayk, āmantu bi kitābika alladhī anzalt, wa bi nabiyyika alladhī arsalt' (O Allāh, I submit my face to You, I entrust my affair to You, and I commit my back to You, out of desire for You and fear of You. There is no refuge and no escape from You except to You. I believe in Your Book that You revealed, and in Your Prophet whom You sent). If you die that night, you will die upon the natural disposition (fiṭrah). And make these the last words you speak." (Narrated by the Group).

Supplication for Fear During Sleep:

6. And it is narrated from ‘Amr ibn Shu‘ayb, from his father, from his grandfather, may Allāh be pleased with them, that the Messenger of Allāh, peace and blessings of Allāh be upon him, said:
